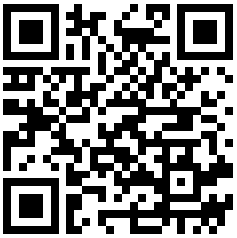
This is a reproduction of a library book that was digitized by Google as part of an ongoing effort to preserve the information in books and make it universally accessible.

Google™ books

https://books.google.com



Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

Per. 256 d. 76*

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY G. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

No. 523. FOR WEEK ENDING JANUARY 7TH, 1899. [ONE PENNY.

For the Masses and Classes Alike.

Dr. Tibbles' Vi-Cocoa supplies something more than any other similar preparation, ancient or modern, which has been put on the market. And this, too, without attributing anything wonderful to it. Vi-cocoa is a drink which may be taken at all times and seasons with beneficial results. As a vitaliser it stands, perhaps, in the front rank, and continues a grateful, pleasant, nutritious and refreshing drink. Its ingredients form a compound which must commend it to all.

IS

A Food and Drink in One.

What this beverage really contains is certainly worth stating again, even although it is already well known. It consists of malt and hops, together with kola and cocoa, and when that is said its excellent qualities are patent enough. Dr. Tibbles' preparation, in the first place, affords all the stimulating refreshment afforded by tea, while, on the other hand, it has none of its enervating influences. But by its use, also, there is a real building up of the system; it furnishes a lasting support to the brain-worker, to the manual worker, and to toilers in all vocations. So much is this the case, that thousands are regularly using a food beverage which, while it has no evil effects, invigorates the frame and makes all exertion a less burdensome thing. And the testimony to the excellence of Dr. Tibbles' Vi-Cocoa is universal.

Digitized by Google

COFFEE WITHOUT DREGS.

GOOD! ITS MASON'S

MASON'S ESSENCE OF COFFEE AND CHICORY

EXPELS THE OLD METHOD

An agreeable, stimulating and sustaining beverage. Instantly prepared and most economical. Equal to the very finest coffee. Highly recommended by the Medical Profession.

Of all Grocers and Stores, or a Sample Bottle post free for 9 stamps.

ALSO TRY

MASON'S WINE ESSENCES AND MASON'S EXTRACT OF HERBS.

Sample Bottle of either sent free for 9d.; two assorted 1/3; three assorted 1/8.

Agents Wanted.

Manufacturers—

NEWBALL & MASON, NOTTINGHAM.

BODLEIAN LIBRARY 16 MAR 1981

THE SALTER

£8 8s. CASE 10/6

IMPROVED No. 5

WHAT TO DO WITH YOUR DAUGHTERS.

BUY THEM A

"SALTER,"

ENGLISH Made, with Latest Improvements. Does as good work as one at 20 Guineas, and guaranteed for 12 months. When learnt they can soon earn a comfortable living. Lessons free. Arrangements made for Easy Payments. It has Good Alignment, Visible Writing, Light Touch, Universal Keyboard, and is the Best Manifolder and Stenciller on the Market.

Offices: 7 NEWGATE STREET, E.C.

ZOX

CURES

NEURALGIA

Toothache, Headache, Sciatica, and all Nerve Pains.

PURE, HARMLESS, AND NON-APERIENT.

Do not be persuaded to take a substitute, there is nothing as good as ZOX.

Of all Chemists, 1s. and 2s. 6d. per Box.

ZOX Co., 11 HATTON GARDEN, E.C.

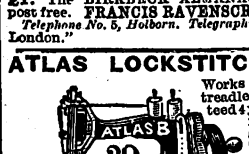
ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK

Southampton Bldngs., Chancery Lane, London, W.C. Invested Funds, £10,000,000. No. of Accounts, 85,094. TWO-AND-A-HALF per CENT. INTEREST allowed on DEPOSITS, repayable on demand. TWO per CENT. on CURRENT ACCOUNTS, on the minimum monthly balances, when not drawn below £100. STOCKS, SHARES, and ANNUITIES purchased and sold for customers. SAVINGS DEPARTMENT.—Small deposits received, and Interest allowed monthly on each completed £1. The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with particulars, post free. FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

Telephone No. 5, Holborn. Telegraphic Address: "Birkbeck, London."

ATLAS LOCKSTITCH MACHINE.



Works by hand or treadle. Guaranteed 4 years. Equal in quality and size to any machine. To ensure satisfaction, we will send machine on receipt of 5/- P.O. for ONE MONTH'S TRIAL. Balance can be paid 5/- Monthly. Call or write for designs and Samples of work.

39/-

THE ATLAS SEWING MACHINE CO., 168a High St., Camden Town, London, N.W.; 63 Seven Sisters Rd., N.; 14 High Rd., Kilburn.

MESSRS. C. ARTHUR PEARSON'S GIFT BOOKS.

PIRATE GOLD. By J. R. HUTCHINSON, Author of "Romance of a Regiment," "Quest of the Golden Pearl," etc. Crown 8vo, cloth, with Eight Illustrations by ERNEST SMYTHE, price 5s.

"The story will bring joy to the boy reader. . . . The pictures are excellent."—PALL MALL GAZETTE.

"A real good old tale of adventure. . . . There is plenty of incident and life in the book."—BELFAST NORTHERN WHIG.

JOHN OF STRATHBOURNE. A Romance of the Days of Francis I. By R. D. CHETWODE, Author of "The Knight of the Golden Chain." Crown 8vo, cloth, with Eight Full-page Illustrations by ERNEST SMYTHE, price 3s. 6d.

"We can only say that had it appeared anonymously it might have passed for the handiwork of Mr. Stanley Weyman, and it would be difficult to give higher praise."—TIMES.

THE GREAT HOUSE OF CASTLETON. By WINIFRED GRAHAM, Author of "When the Birds Begin to Sing," etc. Crown 8vo, cloth. Illustrated, price 3s. 6d.

"This is a delightful little story full of brightness and vivacity. The reader cannot fail to be interested in the four young people who spent their summer holiday at an old Elizabethan house with 'a secret room, a tower, and four-post bedsteads, upon one of which Queen Elizabeth is reported to have slept.'"—METHODIST RECORDER.

LITTLE MISS ROBINSON CRUSOE. By Mrs. GEORGE CORBETT. Author of "The Adventures of an Ugly Girl," "The Young Stowaway," etc. With Illustrations by A. KEMP TEBBY. Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 3s. 6d.

PRINCE UNO: Uncle Frank's Visit to Fairyland. Illustrated by W. D. STEVENS. Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, gilt edges, price 3s. 6d.

"We feel sure this pleasant fairy story, revised and embellished as it has been by excellent illustrations, will amuse little folk as much as it will touch and interest their elders."—DAILY TELEGRAPH.

JUMBLES. By LEWIS BAUMER. With 48 pages. Illustrated by the Author, printed in colours, and bound in paper boards with cloth back. Price 2s. 6d.

"Mr. Baumer is a clever and vigorous draughtsman, with a true gift of irresponsible fun—of nonsense, in fact—which he is able to express with pencil and with pen."—ACADEMY.

IN A CHINESE GARDEN. By ANNIS LENNOYS. Illustrated by LAWSON WOOD. Fcap. 8vo, price 1s. 6d.

"This is a dainty little book, quite out of the beaten track, and contains a series of pretty stories all about Chinese children. There is a quaintness about them that is charming, and the happy youngster who receives this pretty gift-book will rejoice."—CATHOLIC TIMES.

London: C. Arthur Pearson Limited, Henrietta Street, W.C.

Digitized by Google

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

SHORT STORIES

Edited By C. ARTHUR PEARSON

No. 523. ONE PENNY.

For the Week ending January 7th, 1899.

In the Lift.

CAMPERTON stopped at the hotel desk long enough to read the letter which was handed to him; then he started for his rooms to dress for the club dinner.

But the club dinner was no longer in his mind. The contents of that letter engrossed his thoughts to the exclusion of everything else.

It was from his friend Birch, whom he had left in Cairo a month ago, and who now wrote that the Kingsley's were leaving that city for London, but would stay in Paris for a fortnight.

"So the coast is clear, old man, and you can come back," declared the writer persuasively. "You were an idiot ever to run away as you did. Join me here in a fortnight, and we'll still be in time for that little jaunt."

Camperton's jaws were set and his brows contracted as he stepped into the lift.

He knew that the Kingsleys, in returning at this time, were curtailing their original programme. And it was easy to guess the reason. They were coming home to prepare for their daughter's marriage to her titled suitor.

"And I must get away before they arrive," decided the young man. "I'll go back to Cairo without delay."

Through the midst of his mental abstraction he observed besides himself a woman—who had seated herself in a shadowy corner of the lift—but her presence did not change the current of his thoughts.

He saw only her hat as he dropped his vacant eyes upon her from his six feet of altitude, and he remained in the other corner, while the brass-buttoned boy slammed the door and pushed the lever, which sent the car soaring to regions above.

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

The lift came to a sudden stop—so sudden, indeed, that Camperton not being prepared, involuntarily rose to his tiptoes, waving his arms like a huge bird about to take flight, and then pirouetted gracefully towards the other passenger in the opposite corner.

Before he could recover himself the lift shot downwards a few feet, and again stopped with an abruptness that bent his spinal column backwards like a steel spring and caused him to drop upon his knees in front of the lady.

Worse than that he had thrown out his hands in a frantic search for support, and in coming to the floor he unwittingly seized the fair stranger by each of her arms, almost crushing them in his grasp.

There was a moment of confusion, in which he had an indistinct vision of a white scared face under a large hat, and heard a half-suppressed shriek as the woman tried to draw away from him. The shriek brought him to his senses. He got upon his feet, stammering his apologies.

"There is no danger, madam," he began in his most reassuring tones. "We're fast between two floors, and must wait——"

He stopped short as he noted, with surprise and alarm, the attitude of the lady. She was still sitting in her corner, and was holding a handkerchief over her face, while little convulsive quivers and shrugs of the shoulders indicated that she was weeping.

In his contrition and his desire to soothe her harrowed feelings, he was about to sit down beside her, when a sound that was strangely like a giggle came from behind the handkerchief.

Camperton started up, flushing hotly.

"Do forgive me!" and the laughing voice suddenly became coaxing. "I know it is rude of me to laugh, but oh, Mr. Camperton, you can't imagine how funny you looked just now when you went hopping and waltzing about and kneeling at my feet—for all the world like a performing bear!"

Camperton did not hear. He was staring at her in blank amazement. He made several attempts to speak before the words would come.

"Miss Kingsley," he managed to articulate at last. His heart had almost stopped at the moment of recognition, but it was now beating furiously. "I suppose this is your astral body. It cannot be your real self."

"Oh, but it is!" said the girl with animation. "We left sooner than we had arranged to leave, and came direct to London. We arrived this morning. We are stopping at this hotel until our house is put in order."

"We?"

"Of course; papa and I. You don't suppose I would come alone?"

"I—I didn't know. I was not exactly expecting you to come at all. Your plans, as I understand them, would have kept you abroad for some time longer."

Miss Kingsley dropped her eyes.

"It is always easy to change one's plans, you know," she said, betraying a slight confusion.

"You did not honour me with an explanation of why you left," she said.

"But the note!" he exclaimed.

"The note, Mr. Camperton?"

"And my letter? Do you mean that you did not read my letter through—the one I sent to you two days before my departure?"

"I received no letter from you."

"But, Miss Kingsley, you—you answered it.

"You told me not to mention the subject again, and you are annoyed because I have insisted on reminding you of that letter. But I only want to explain why I wrote it. All Cairo was connecting your name with that of the Earl, and there were persistent rumours that you were to become his wife. It was common talk that your father had set his heart on the match, and nobody seemed to question your willingness to become a countess.

"The rumours and the gossip had a most depressing effect upon me. I think you know, Miss Kingsley, what my own hopes were. I had loved you for a year, although I had made no confession. I could not believe that you cared for the Earl, or that you would sacrifice yourself for a title, even to please your father. But the anxiety and suspense became so intolerable that I resolved to end the uncertainty and learn my own fate. Owing to your father's espionage I was unable to find an opportunity to speak with you alone. So I wrote that letter, confessing my love, begging the right to put an end to the rumours concerning you and his lordship, telling you how anxiously I should wait for an answer."

"I never received the letter," she said softly, without looking up.

"Never received it! Then how do you explain this answer?" he demanded.

"I wrote that note—yes, but not in answer to any communication from you. It was not intended for you. I do not know how it came in your possession. You will see that the upper part of the sheet has been carefully cut off. On the detached part was the name of the person to whom it was addressed."

She raised her eyes, and he saw that there were tears in them, but before he could speak she asked:

"Did you send your letter to me by post or by messenger?"

"Why, I sent it by Tomasso, the little Italian whom I often employed in that way."

"And he brought you the answer?"

"Certainly."

"Ah! I think I understand it now," she said, her expression showing the light of a sudden conviction. "Tomasso, as we afterwards heard, was in the pay of the Earl, who employed him to spy on the movements of people whom he desired to keep under surveillance. It was he, I am now sure, who intercepted your letter and sent back to you this note. His object was to get you out of the way. The note was originally addressed to him—in reply to his proposal of marriage—and he cut off his own name and sent it to you."

Camperton listened like one in a trance. Then he cried out sharply:

"Do you mean to say you are not engaged to him?"

"Engaged! Why, I hated him! He is a wicked, designing man. And he wasn't a lord at all—he had to fly because he would have been charged with impersonation! The real Earl was ill in an Italian village. It was on account of the worry of it all that I prevailed upon papa to take me home. Oh, Jack—Mr. Camperton! how could you believe such a thing of me?"

Ten minutes later, when they were released from their imprisonment in the lift, they parted with the understanding that they were to meet in the Kingsleys' rooms within an hour. There was a vacant seat at the club dinner that night, and the lift boy received a handsome present for holding his tongue.

B. LOVELL.

Digitized by Google

THE ITALIAN'S SECRET.

By John K. Leys.

I.

TIMES were bad in the City. I was sitting in my office one day in a very despondent mood, when my old friend Dan Bunbury walked in. Dan was a good little fellow, honest "as they make 'em," though perhaps a trifle sanguine in disposition—short, stout, fair, and freckled. He helped himself to a cigarette and sat down.

I could see that there was something on his mind, and I waited patiently, chatting about indifferent matters till he should please to unbosom himself. At length it came out.

"Jack," he said abruptly, "I've got hold of a big thing, a very big thing. Would you care to go in with me?"

"Well, I'm obliged to you, old fellow, for the offer," said I; "but I'm bound to tell you that I'm rather in low water just now, so that I must be careful. Still, I dare say I could find a few hundreds for a really good thing, if that would be of any use."

Dan seemed to be scarcely listening. He stole to the door of my room and opened it suddenly, to make sure that no inquisitive boy was at the keyhole.

"It's all right, Dan," said I with a laugh. "I'm too old a bird to allow what is said in this room to be overheard. You may speak freely."

Dan sat down, and tried to light another cigarette, but his hand shook so that he gave it up. I could see that he was labouring under intense excitement.

"Jack," he said to me, "we've been friends since the old Silchester days, and you know I wouldn't let you in for dropping so much as a sov—and there are always risks. So don't think I want to haul you in for this. In fact, it was only after a good deal of bother that I got leave to bring you in with me, as I couldn't raise all the capital required. I'll tell you what it is, on the understanding, of course, that whether you come in with me or not it goes no further without the permission of me and my friend."

"All right. It's a syndicate, I suppose?"

"It's a syndicate, of course. And it's—well, it's saying nothing to say that it's the biggest thing that has ever been brought out, I won't say in London, but on this earth!"

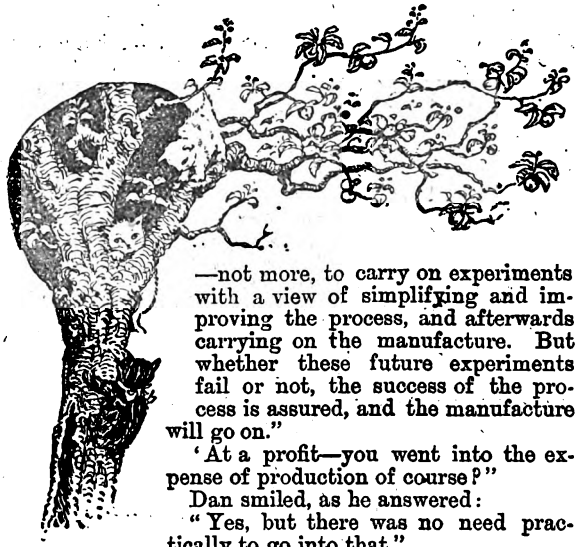
This was interesting, at all events; and I sat regarding Dan as he passed his handkerchief across his brow. For a few moments he was silent, as if lacking the courage to broach the great secret.

"I'll tell you just what happened to me," he burst out at length, "and then you may use your own discretion about it. About six weeks ago I met at dinner at a friend's house an elderly man, an Italian, who was described to me as a great scientist. Chemistry, and particularly metallurgy, was said to be his department. We fell into talk after dinner, and he seemed to take to me, as I did to him. When he heard that I was in the City, he seemed interested, and hinted that perhaps we might be of service to each other by and by. We exchanged cards, and I found that he had taken a quiet place down in the country, that he might be able to carry on his chemical experiments without any interruption.

"He asked me to go and see him, and he told me then that he was making experiments for the manufacture of a substance in great demand, and that it was possible that he might ask my help to provide a little capital to perfect the experiments and bring out the invention. I said I would be happy to consider the matter, for I knew that nothing pays better than getting into a good invention at the start, and the subject dropped.

"Two days ago I had a wire from the Italian saying, 'I have succeeded. Come and see me to-night.' I went and found the old boy in a state of great excitement—and no wonder. His experiments had succeeded. He repeated them before my eyes next morning, and I am convinced that he has found a method of manufacturing the—the substance I spoke of. And I agreed to go in partnership with him. We want three thousand pounds

Digitized by Google



—not more, to carry on experiments with a view of simplifying and improving the process, and afterwards carrying on the manufacture. But whether these future experiments fail or not, the success of the process is assured, and the manufacture will go on."

'At a profit—you went into the expense of production of course?"

Dan smiled, as he answered:

"Yes, but there was no need practically to go into that."

"The profit would be so large?"

Dan nodded.

"We want three thousand pounds, as I told you," he said, "and as it happens I can't scrape more than two thousand together just at present. So, if you like you can come in to the extent of the odd thousand."

"But you haven't told me yet what is to be manufactured."

Dan looked this way and that, bent over to me, and whispered in my ear:

"It's—gold!"

"I knew you would laugh at it," said Dan without a trace of annoyance in his voice. "So should I have laughed if any one had said to me a week ago what I have said to you. But it's true, all the same. Listen now. Why should it be beyond the power of modern chemistry to manufacture gold any more than diamonds, or sugar, or a dozen other things that are artificially made every day? You know that diamonds can be made—true, real diamonds, though not of a size big enough to make it pay commercially. I repeat, why not gold? There is said to a certain number of simple elements in Nature. But that number is always changing—in the first place because chemists are always finding new substances, and in the second place because every now and then somebody finds out that what had been supposed to be a simple substance is in reality compound—in other words, he has resolved the thing into its constituent elements. Now, that is just what the Professor has done with gold. He has found out what it is made of, and having done that it is comparatively an easy matter to put the constituent metals into a melting-pot and fuse them into gold. Of course I don't know what these metals are, but I know that silver is the principal one. You can bring your own silver to be the subject of the test experiment, if you like.

"But I beg you, my dear fellow, to be very careful that you don't breathe a hint to anyone of what is going on; for you can see that if it were even suspected that gold could be manufactured, there would soon be a thousand chemists trying to discover the secret, and it could not be long till it was found out."

I assured him that I would be discretion itself.

"The thing has been done," repeated Dan. "Gold has been made under my very eyes, and if you like you shall see it done yourself. Now, what do you think of it?"

"I can scarcely say just yet," said I. "I won't insult you by declaring that whatever you say to me I believe implicitly; and I am awfully obliged to you for putting what seems a tremendously good thing in my way. But the fact is, a thousand pounds means a great deal to me, and I am bound to be cautious. Granting that your friend is honest, it is possible that he may to some extent deceive himself, especially as to the cost of production. You know all inventors are sanguine. There may be a hitch somewhere. So I think I would like a day or two to think it over."

"Quite right, old man," exclaimed Dan. "No harm in being cautious, especially when your caution will serve for both of us. Send me a line to-morrow, if possible, saying, 'I am off,' or 'I am on.' If you decide to go in for it (supposing that you are satisfied about the success of the experiments), meet me to-morrow at Waterloo at four sharp, and we will run down to the Professor's at once. I think you will find that the discovery will stand any test you like to apply to it."

On this understanding we parted.

II.

I am free to confess that although I had preserved my sang froid in my friend's presence, I was secretly as much excited as he was himself. I knew enough of chemistry to be aware that theoretically the resolution of a supposed simple substance into more elementary metals or gases was quite possible. Why, as Dan asked, why should gold be any exception to this law? Supposing that the Professor was not what I had been at first inclined to believe him, a vulgar charlatan—supposing he had really mastered this secret of Nature, what a vista was opened for any one who should be associated with him in the transcendent discovery! In the long run, of course, commerce would be brought to a stand still, and finally adapted to a new medium of exchange. Debts, whether public or private, would cease to exist. Every man belonging to a country which had a gold standard would offer to pay his debt at once. The terrible title of Creditor would henceforth be but an empty name. The distinction between poverty and wealth would exist no longer; or rather it would only apply to the possession or lack of land, of flocks and herds, of actual, tangible goods.

But of course we should take care that that should not happen during our lives. Till death claimed us we should be more powerful than kings. We should have the world in chains at our feet.

It would be perfectly practicable for me to found a colony, nay, to found an empire! What monarch could lack subjects who scorned the idea of taking tribute, and offered his people absolute security against want? Putting these more ambitious dreams aside, it was evident that if the Professor had rightly estimated the effect of his discovery—on which point I must of course satisfy myself before I proceeded a step—I would be a millionaire twice, ten times, twenty times over; and that surely was enough for any reasonable man.

It is not to be wondered at that I slept but little that night. And with the morning light I came to a decision. I would go down and see the Professor, taking a piece of pure silver with me. I would use the utmost care to make sure that there was no trickery anywhere —that by no possibility could gold be introduced into the crucible without my knowing it. I would be doubly, trebly, on my guard against all possibility of deception.

Digitized by Google

I would bring the silver back to town with me next day, never allowing it to be out of my possession a single moment till it reached the hands of the London silversmith; and I would abide by his verdict. If he assured me that gold was present with the silver in any considerable quantity, I would risk my money, in the hope of winning the largest prize man ever played for.

If there was no gold, or but a trace of it, along with the silver, I would say that the speculation was too risky for me, and leave it alone. This resolution I carried out.

I purchased a small ingot of pure silver from a firm of undoubted respectability, sent my friend the message we had agreed on, and met him at Waterloo the same afternoon at the hour he had named.

He had already wired to the Italian that we were coming; and as there was now no reason why I should be kept in ignorance of the name of my host, Dan told me that he had the Professor's permission to say that his name was Giovanni Galzoni.

Chadwick Hall, the house which the Professor had taken, stood in a remote corner of Hampshire, though not very far from a wayside railway station. It was a fine old place, but the appearance of the house was spoilt by a new building of red brick close by, which I rightly guessed to be the laboratory.

The Professor was a tall, dignified-looking man of perhaps sixty years of age. He wore his silver-grey hair cut short, and a long white moustache, which made him look like a retired colonel. He spoke with a slightly foreign accent, but his English was faultless.

As we stood together in the hall a door opened, and a girl appeared on the threshold.

"Come, Nora," said the Professor, "and let me introduce a new acquaintance to you." He pronounced her name distinctly—Miss Leonora Nugent; and I found myself bowing before a tall, slender creature with a sweet smile, a dazzling complexion, glorious black hair, and eyes of a ravishing blue. She smiled as she gave me her hand, but she smiled yet more frankly when Dan laid his great honest paw in her slender fingers, and I remembered that in all probability they were old acquaintances. Dan had not mentioned Miss Nugent to me at all, which I looked upon as a bad sign.

We sat down to dinner almost at once, and I may as well say that I fell head over ears in love with Nora, as Signor Galzoni called her, from the moment when my eyes first lighted on her face in the hall of the old house. It was plain to my jealous eye that Dan was in the same boat; and while I saw the awkwardness of playing the rival to Dan, who had brought me to the house, I could not bring myself to the point of steeling my heart against Nora's charms because my friend felt them as well as I.

For the rest of the evening however, Dan had his innings, and I was barely able to exchange half a dozen words with the Professor's beautiful niece. After dinner, Signor Galzoni took me to one side, and while Nora was singing Italian and Irish airs for Dan's benefit, I was being treated to a lecture upon inorganic chemistry, of which I comprehended very little.

We retired to rest early, intending that the whole of the following afternoon should be devoted to an investigation of the Professor's power to manufacture the most precious of metals.

Nora presided at the breakfast table with the charming grace of a girl matron, and when she withdrew at the conclusion of the meal, she left one of us, at all events, more madly in love with her than ever.

The Professor took us out to smoke a cigarette before commencing the labours of the day.

"I understand," he said, turning round sharply in my direction, "that my young friend has communicated to you frankly and unreservedly, under the seal of confidence, our hopes, and our necessities, and that you are prepared, when satisfied of the genuineness of the discovery, to join the scheme, and bring capital into it to the extent of one thousand pounds?"

"That is so," said I.

"I have been considering the matter very carefully," he broke off, turning to Dan, "and I am quite convinced that the only safe way to put our new metal on the market is to do it ourselves—in other words to set up as dealers in bullion. This will make it easy and natural for us to go in rather extensively for coining gold, and will make it possible for us to increase our wealth in a hundred ways at the same time. To establish a business of this kind will require some time, as well as some capital. Then there will be the furnaces to be built, metals and chemicals to be bought, as well as powerful dynamos—But I said three thousand pounds would do, and I will make it do. We must have no more noses in the dish. That is absolutely fixed in my mind."

To this both Dan and I warmly assented, and then the doctor proceeded to explain to me something of his method.

"The process is simplicity itself," he said. "I put into a crucible a number of metals, the principal one being silver. What the other ingredients are is part of my secret, but not the most important part of it. I care very little who knows what is added to the silver; the secret chiefly consists in knowing the exact weights of the substances added. All depends upon that, and you will excuse me if I say no more on that subject in the meantime. You will have every facility for seeing that no gold is introduced into the mass in the crucible—indeed I shall ask you to do me the favour of adding the various elements yourself, and you will easily be able to judge by the weight of what I give you to put into the crucible, whether it is gold or not.

"The mass, when fused, is subjected to a very powerful electric current, for the purpose of disintegrating the molecules of which the different substances are composed, and resolving them into their constituent atoms. During all this time the crucible will remain suspended over the furnace, and will be entirely within your sight.

Digitized by Google

When the process is completed, the molten metal will be cast in a mould, and you will take this, or part of it, to a metallurgist of your own choosing in London, and he will tell you whether gold is in the mass or not, and if so in what proportions. And now shall we go into the laboratory?"

We went up to the red brick structure which I had noticed the previous evening. It was a spacious apartment, filled with the usual array of scientific instruments, prominent among which was an immense "dynamo,"—a furnace, capable of developing a high temperature, shelves with metals, drugs in bottles, and the other paraphernalia of a chemical laboratory.

While the Professor secured the door, Dan, who had visited the place before, took me forward to the furnace, and showed me a small earthenware crucible, which he asked me to examine. It was fitted with a lid, pierced with two tiny holes for passing the wires of the electrical machine, and a larger one for introducing a rod of fireclay for stirring the mass of molten metal.

The furnace was already in full blast. I produced the ingot of silver which I had brought with me, and under the Professor's superintendence it was soon reduced to a molten state. The wires from the great magnet were then introduced, and a powerful current was kept flowing through it. Next, I poured into the crucible various substances, of which I did not know the nature, but which I knew from the weight could not contain gold, which the Italian handed to me from time to time. As soon as each powder—they were almost all in the form of powder—was slipped through the hole in the lid of the crucible, the Professor stirred the molten mass, to make sure that the contents of the crucible were thoroughly mixed. This went on for some time, and after all the ingredients had been added, the force of the electric current was greatly increased.

During this process I could not detect the least trace of anxiety on the Professor's face. He wore the serene look of a man confident of victory. From first to last I never took my eyes off the crucible, and I was ready to swear that it was a physical impossibility for the Italian, however ready he might have been to deceive us, to touch the crucible without our knowledge.

At length Galzoni announced that the gold had begun to form in the vessel, and another half hour of waiting was all that was required. At the end of that time the contents of the crucible were poured out into three moulds of about equal size; and when the metal was cool, one of the ingots thus formed was handed to me, another to my friend, while the Professer kept the third for purposes of further experiment.

Nora appeared at luncheon, and when we rose from table she strolled out into the garden with me, while our host discussed with Dan the first steps which had to be taken for turning the great discovery into a commercial success. Naturally I made the most of my opportunity, and Nora told me a good deal about herself during our tete-à-tete. She was the daughter of the penniless son of an Irishman of good family, who had married an Italian girl. Her mother also was dead, and she had no friend but her guardian, who had brought her up as his own child, and had told her to call him uncle. I gathered that although he was never unkind to her he neglected her a good deal, that she was singularly ignorant of the world, and that Signor Galzoni dissuaded her from accepting any advances which had from time to time been made to her by people they had casually met in the course of their wanderings.

Ever since she could remember, Nora and her guardian had been wanderers on the face of the earth, seldom remaining long in one town or country. The Professor's friends were all men of his own age and nationality; Nora had never known what it was to have a friend of her own sex, and I could see that she was pining for companionship. It was too soon, of course, to declare the nature of my feelings for this beautiful and lonely girl, and yet I often thought afterwards that she must surely have guessed from my manner, from my very silence, many things that my lips did not dare to utter.

In the evening Dan and I returned to London.

Next day I gave the ingot I had taken from the Professor's crucible to a metallurgist, and a few days later I received from him a report as to its nature. My heart beat as I unfolded the sheet of paper; and yet I fully expected to see the magic name that would be a pledge to me of untold wealth.

I was not disappointed. The ingot contained gold to a considerable amount, in quantity quite sufficient to make its production immensely profitable. The bulk of the mass was composed of silver, which was of course of its original value. There was some alloy, worthless, or nearly so.

That very day I made the necessary arrangements, and sent Dan a cheque for one thousand pounds to be transmitted to the Professor as my share in the joint enterprise.

III.

In the course of a few weeks we had opened a bullion merchant's office in Paris, of which Dan Bunbury took charge. Already the gold was being turned out in considerable quantities, and was disposed of by being coined, or sold to goldsmiths. We had all agreed that it would be safer to begin in a small way, and extend our operations by degrees.

One day in November I was siezed with an uncontrollable desire to see Nora again; and as I had a tolerable excuse for calling on her guardian, I ran down to Chadwick Hall without giving any notice of my coming.

The Professor, I was told, was too busy to see me, but on my asking for Miss Nugent, I was shown into a small room on the ground floor, where, in the dusk of the November day, I found her alone, gazing out on the rain-sodden, desolate trees.

Her sweet face bore traces of recent tears, but my heart beat fast to see that a lovely blush overspread her cheeks as she turned and saw me.

It was evident that she was in a state of great dejection, and it seemed to be beyond my power to cheer her. At length in desperation I ventured to beg her to tell me the cause of her unhappiness. For answer she turned away and hid her face against the elbow of the couch on which she was sitting. She was evidently trying hard not to break down, but the tears would come. I went down on my knees beside her, and whispered to her that I could not bear to see her grief, because I loved her better than my life. In hackneyed phrases, I dare say, but in words that came straight from my heart, I tried to make her believe that I was only speaking the truth—that nothing on earth was of any consequence to me compared with her happiness, and I implored her to tell me what was troubling her. I took her little hands in mine, and by degrees I drew her nearer to me till her head rested on my breast.

Then in broken words she confessed that in happier

Digitized by Google

circumstances she would have listened to me—she might have loved me, but at present, it was not to be thought of.

She owed a duty to her guardian, and he wished her to marry a countryman of his own, who had come to England for the purpose of pressing his suit. The utmost I could wring from her was a promise that she would give me an opportunity of speaking to her guardian, and that she would not marry anyone without letting me know.

How long we sat there I cannot tell. The twilight had faded into night when I suddenly recollected that I had an important engagement in London for a late hour that evening, which must be kept at all costs. I pulled out my watch, and found that I had not too much time to catch the last train which would enable me to be in town in time to keep my engagement.

Hurriedly I told Nora that I must go, and I was in the act of bidding her good-bye, when I heard the sound of voices and footsteps in the hall. A moment later the Professor entered the room.

He started on seeing me, and greeted me rather coldly, saying that he had been under the impression that I had gone back to town.

Unwilling to miss the opportunity of pleading my cause in person, I resolved to use the few minutes that were left in telling Signor Galzoni of my love for Nora, and making formal application for her hand. The Professor listened in silence, and he did not, as I had feared he would, tell me that what I asked was out of the question. He invited me to stay over the night, adding that he would give me an answer in the morning. When I explained to him that this was impossible, as I must return to London immediately, he said it would be unnecessary for me to walk through the rain to the station, as he had ordered a fly to come for him that evening, and it would be at the door in a minute or two.

This relieved my mind, and I recurred to the subject of my passion for Nora. He heard me patiently, but said that he must have a day or two to think it over—a request which was certainly not unreasonable, and which made me hope that he would not forbid the engagement. But while we had been talking, the minutes had been flying, and on looking at my watch, I saw that in foolishly depending on the arrival of the fly I had lost my train. There was just the possibility that it might be a little late, and that I might catch it if I took to my heels at once. I caught up my hat, and disregarding the Italian's entreaties that I would stay over the night, or wait till the next train, I shook him by the hand, and literally ran from the house.

The distance was not great, but to my dismay I saw the steam from the engine of the approaching train while I was still some little way from the station. Putting on a trifle more speed, I raced on, vaulted over a fence which shut out the public from a short cut across a siding, and reached the platform just as the train started again.

A man with a red beard was standing idly on the platform watching the retreating carriages. I dashed past him, and making a supreme effort tore open the door of a compartment and sprang in. Turning immediately to close the door behind me, I saw, to my surprise, that the red-bearded man, stimulated, apparently, by my example, had suddenly made up his mind that he would not be left behind. He was in the act of clambering into the adjoining compartment.

I reached town, and drove to my rooms, where I changed my clothes for evening dress; and I was getting into my hansom again, when I noticed a man lounging (in spite of the rain) against the railings on the opposite side of the street. As I passed him he looked steadily the other way. But I felt certain that he was none other than the man who had followed me into the railway carriage that afternoon. Certainly both men had red beards. It struck me as a curious coincidence, but it was not until afterwards that it occurred to me that the man might be a spy.

IV.

SIGNOR GALZONI had promised to send me his answer by letter. But two days went by, and I heard nothing from him. I was getting uneasy, when on the morning of the third day a letter bearing the Chadwick postmark was put into my hand. It was not from Galzoni. The moment my eyes fell on the handwriting on the envelope, I knew that the letter was from Nora.

I tore it open, and my face blanched as I read. In a few tear-blotted words Nora bade me good-bye. She assured me that this was a final farewell, that it would be impossible for us to meet again. She was leaving England, she said, with her guardian, and before the letter reached me, they would be far away from the Hall Almost in so many words she told me that I possessed her heart, but she said that she was not free, and we must part.

Without waiting to see whether a train was about to start for Hampshire, I rushed downstairs, caught a hansom, and drove at the horse's best pace to Waterloo.

It was possible, I thought, that something had occurred to delay the Professor's departure—it was possible, even if I was too late, I might find out where he had gone. Of course he would return, or at least it would be easy for me to find him by-and-bye.

But I feared that his intention was to separate Nora from me permanently, or at least until after her marriage to the suitor whom he preferred. Either out of regard for him, or for some reason, he had resolved that Nora and I should not meet again; and he had asked for delay only that he might arrange his plans for placing her beyond my reach. But I determined that I would not be so easily baulked.

When I arrived at the Hall I found it deserted. Not a living creature was about the place. I could glean no information at the village or the railway station, except that the station-master assured me that the Italian had not left by rail.

I was in despair, when it occurred to me that I might be able to learn something from the owner of the Hall. Even if he could tell me nothing as to the Professor's present movements, he might be willing to give me the names and addresses of the references he had given when he took the house, and through them I might be able to trace him. I had no doubt that he would communicate with Dan Bunbury shortly, but I could not brook the delay.

Digitized by Google

I got the landlord's address, and went part of the way by rail. The rest of the distance, some five or six miles, I had to walk.

I had scarcely set out to cover this piece of country, when a deluge of rain drove me to take shelter at a wayside public-house. As I ran up to it, a man whom I took to be the ostler came out of the tumbledown stable. I met him face to face, and to my amazement I recognised him as the man who had followed me to my lodgings three days before! I was thunderstruck. It seemed absolutely impossible that the man could have followed me from Chadwick, much less from London, without my knowing it. And what he could be following me at all for, I could not conceive. I resolved to question him, and went after him into the stable, but I could make nothing of him. He stoutly denied that he had ever set eyes on me before, and in his turn began to put some questions to me, which I considered an impertinence. I left him, therefore, almost persuading myself that my imagination had been playing me a trick, and went into the inn.

A cart of coals and a carrier's cart were standing before the door, and the carters were drying their steaming garments at the fire of the inn kitchen. As there was no fire in the parlour, and the room looked damp and cheerless to the last degree, I went into the kitchen, and made my way to the ample hearth, calling at the same time for a pint of ale.

As I advanced, a woman whom I had not at first noticed turned sharply round, and then, after a moment's hesitation, retreated by a side door. There were four or five labourers, whose work had apparently been stopped by the rain, seated on a bench that ran along one side of the kitchen; and as I stood drying my clothes a dispute sprang up between one of them and the driver of one of the carts which were at the door.

I paid no attention to it, but took a vacant chair in the chimney corner; and as I sat there the combined influence of my fatigue, the ale I had drunk, and the warmth of the fire, made me drowsy. Suddenly I started up, wide awake, convinced for the moment that the voice of the man I had been thinking about all day, and of whom I had been dreaming at that moment, was actually sounding in my ears. I started up, half expecting to see the Italian's grave face looking down into mine, and found that the kitchen was nearly empty.

The labourers had gone back to their work, the carrier's cart had disappeared, and the other, laden with coals, was slowly surmounting a rising-ground a short distance from the inn-door. The driver, his hands in his pockets, and his slouch-hat drawn over his ears, trudged heavily beside it; and at his side walked, with light, elastic step, the young woman who had left the inn kitchen as I entered it.

There was something in the girl's gait, in her manner of carrying herself, that struck me, and held me a prisoner at the window as long as the cart was in sight.

It was now almost dark, and I would have started at once, but I had eaten nothing since the morning, and I ordered a hasty meal of bread and cheese. As soon as it was despatched I called for the reckoning, and rose to go.

At that moment a poor old creature, bent with age and rheumatism, came through the kitchen, and as she passed me she thrust an envelope into my hand. It contained nothing; but there was written on it, in place of an address, the words:

If you value your own safety, stay where you are for the night, and return to London by some indirect way.

I rushed after the woman who had given it to me, but she maintained that she had picked it up on the floor, and that as she could not read, she had guessed that it belonged to me. For a moment or two I felt bewildered. Then I recollected the voice I had heard, as if speaking in a dream—and that poorly-clad, slender form—good Heavens! was it possible?

I dashed out of the house, and ran up the ascent up which I had seen the cart pass a quarter of an hour before.

Although it was now dark, I had no doubt that I would overtake the heavily laden cart, unless I came to a cross road, and in order to avoid this risk, I pushed on at the top of my speed. I had not even time to think what it meant that Signor Galzoni should be escaping in disguise.

After running a mile and a half I stopped and heard the low rumble that told me the cart was near at hand. I ran on, overtook it, and saw to my joy that the same two figures were plodding on by its side.

I passed them, turned, and looked the supposed carter straight in the face. It was the Professor, beyond a doubt. And the country girl at his left hand was none other than my own peerless Nora!

"You, here, Signor!" I exclaimed, with affected surprise. "Pray, what does this mean?"

"You fool!" burst out the Professor—and I noticed that he now spoke without the slight foreign accent I had always observed hitherto—"You fool! You can't say I didn't warn you!"

So saying he hurriedly turned his ungainly vehicle down a narrow lane which we were passing, and after going on for a few yards in this new direction stopped it. He then went back to the mouth of the lane, and stood there, in the rain and darkness, listening, anxiously listening. Then, apparently satisfied, he returned to the cart, near which Nora and I were standing.

"Signor Galzoni," said I, going up to him, "or whatever your true name may be, I think your conduct is strange and suspicious to the last degree. But, no matter what you may have done or left undone, that does not affect your ward. I repeat that I wish to make her my wife. You are evidently in great danger. Will you trust Miss Nugent to me? I am ready to swear to you that we shall be married as soon as—"

"She would be no more safe with you than with me!" exclaimed the Professor.

"Not safe with me! Why not? Do you mean that I am in danger as well as you?"

The answer was a harsh laugh. An angry retort was on my tongue, but I remembered the red-bearded man at the railway-station, in the London street, at the wayside inn, and I remained silent.

"Look here, girl," he said turning roughly to Nora, who had not uttered a word,—"time presses, and it's going to be a wet night. Will you stick to me, or will you go with this young fellow, who seems to run straight, though he is a most thundering fool. Or will you go off on your own hook? Hang it if I don't think that would be the best thing for you to do, for the chances are that by morning both he and I will be in chokee.—

Digitized by Google

—Now, look sharp—which is it to be?"

For answer Nora stole to my side, and laid her little wet hand in mine.

The Professor's voice, when he next spoke, sounded as if he felt relieved by her decision.

He advised that we should separate, a counsel which I was willing, indeed eager, to follow; and it was agreed that Nora and I should continue along the lane, while the Professor backed his cart into the high road and continued his journey.

I sent Nora on a little way in advance, while I waited behind to help Galzoni to get his cart back into the road, not a very easy matter, as there was no room in the lane to turn the horse and cart.

We had nearly reached the road when we heard the sharp sound of horses' hoofs. I forced my way into the hedge that bounded the lane on my left, and found that the fence was so thick and tall that I was in a place of comparative safety.

But before the Professor could follow my example the mounted police were upon him. He made no resistance, and as soon as he had been secured, two of the constables leapt into the cart and began tossing the coals which it contained into the roadway.

They had not worked long before one of them gave a cry.

"It's here, sir" he shouted, "and mortal 'eavy it be!"

I had heard enough. I turned and ran without a sound over the rain-softened grass till I had overtaken Nora.

She was of course on the other side of the hedge, but I called softly to her, and as soon as I came to a gap I rejoined her.

We walked all that night, for we did not dare to seek shelter, resting occasionally under a haystack, and in the morning we returned to London by the Great Western line.

That very day, following the advice of my solicitor, I gave information to the police to the effect that I had been swindled out of a thousand pounds by the man who called himself Galzoni. I was unwilling to join in the prosecution of Nora's guardian, but it was necessary my lawyer told me, that I should take some step to dissociate myself in a marked way from the swindler, seeing that the police had evidently suspected that I was an accomplice rather than a dupe. As it turned out, the charge I brought against Galzoni was never investigated, as there were several which had the priority to mine; but as the booty had been recovered when Galzoni was arrested, I recovered the greater part of my thousand pounds.

Dan was less fortunate. He had associated himself more closely with the rogue than I had done. He had never suspected for a moment that the gold he was dealing in was merely a fraction of that which the so-called Professor had obtained from his numerous dupes. He thought, as I did, up to the last moment, that it had been honestly manufactured. But he considered, wisely enough, that he would not get the police to believe that he had been so credulous. He left his affairs for me to wind up, and made tracks for Johannesburg, where he has since done well.

It turned out that "the Professor," had been playing this game for years, frequently changing the scene of his operations. Most of his dupes were so much afraid of the ridicule they would meet with if they complained in public, that they refused to prosecute, even when they had been rather badly hit. The peculiarity of his scheme of plunder was that his dupes kept his secret almost better than he could keep it himself, for fear that other people would share the treasure which they believed they were about to enjoy. Of course, it was necessary that each should believe himself the only man whom the Professor had taken into his confidence, and I have no doubt that the reason of his lying to me about the fly, and trying to persuade me to stay overnight was that he had a visitor from the city in the house at the time, and he feared that he and I might know each other, and might meet on our way back to town.

I puzzled for some time over the mystery of the gold appearing in the crucible, and I came to the conclusion that it must have been introduced by means of a hollow in the rod of fire-clay with which the Professor had mixed the molten metal. I now understood why he had been so particular in keeping secret the weights of the added substances. It was in order to guard against a demand that the weight of the resulting ingot should be compared with the weight of what had been seen to go into the crucible. No doubt he had kept part of the ingot in order to prevent its weight being ascertained.

Notwithstanding my most earnest entreaties, Nora refused to marry me until some time after the Professor's trial, for, innocent as she was personally, she had learnt the secret of his misdeeds before his flight, she had accompanied him when he tried to escape, and she would not compromise me so long as there was a fear that she would be involved in his punishment. But that fear has long since gone by. For three years Nora and I have been living happily together as man and wife. The Professor must be out of prison by this time, but we have not seen him, and our hope is that his path and ours may never cross again.

Digitized by Google

A CLEVER WOMAN.

MY Lady Wynne's jewels had been stolen, and the old house of Wynne was in a dreadful commotion. Doors were being banged; maids stood in groups discussing this thing which had happened in their midst, and offering their own opinions and suggestions. They were glad of a little excitement, it is true, for Wynne in the winter was a dreary house, and their tongues went quickly. Her ladyship's companion moved through them, hearing everything and saying nothing, and carrying all she heard to my lady upstairs. But my lady was not thinking of the servants' sayings and doings. All her thoughts were with her husband, and what he would say when he came home, and found the jewels that the wives of Wynne had worn for generations gone.

"Oh, hush, Miss Egerton," she said, raising her pretty dark head. "I do not care what the housemaid thinks. She knows nothing about it."

Edith Egerton smiled her amiable smile, that showed so perfectly her small white teeth, and shaking back her golden curls, answered my lady softly.

"One never can pay enough of attention in these cases."

In the bright, dark eyes of the young mistress of Wynne the tears were gathering again.

"Oh, whatever will Sir Charles say!" she burst out. "I know he thought me too young to take care of them. He said I was the youngest bride that had ever worn them yet, and I'm sure no one knew where the key was but Emily and yourself."

Miss Egerton smiled again.

"Maids are always supposed to be perfectly trustworthy, but of course we can do nothing until the detectives come," she said insinuatingly.

Lady Wynne looked at her sharply, but she did not speak. Somehow she did not like that soft, cooing voice.

"It was so strange," her ladyship began again in a few minutes. "To think that nothing should be taken but my jewels."

Yes, it certainly was strange. One of the side-doors had been left open overnight, although no maid had been found to own the fault, and when my lady woke in the morning, it was to see her jewel-box lying open on the floor, and the keys dangling from it. Ringing furiously for her maid, she searched wildly in every corner of the room.

But it was useless; the jewels were gone, and all her ladyship's tears could not bring them back. Her husband was away, and the young girl-wife of Wynne was at her wit's end. True, her self-possessed companion was there to advise and direct, but Alicia Wynne felt strangely distrustful of the golden-haired, apple-blossom complexioned little creature just then. She seemed to know so well what to do, think, and say, that her ladyship felt dreadfully silly and girlish beside her.

But the detective was come and was summoning the household together, and practical Miss Egerton was ordering the servants. Not that there was much to be got out of them. They had seen nothing, heard nothing, until her ladyship's bell had aroused them, and even then it was only from Emily, the maid, that they learnt what had happened. Although Emily herself could tell him little, the detective questioned her very closely. It was evident from his manner that he suspected her, and anyone watching Edith Egerton would have seen a triumphant glance shoot from her eyes. As for young Lady Wynne she could only cry and wish Sir Charles would come home, and within himself the detective wished that, too. He felt a slight disgust for all those women, except Miss Egerton. There seemed to be an air of business about her.

At last Sir Charles came. He scarcely gave the jewels a thought, until he had assured his girl-wife that he would rather have them lost than have her in hysterics. And his words had the effect of driving the tears from her dark eyes as the sun drives the morning mist away, and she was ready to talk the affair over with her husband in a manner that would have astonished the detective, who had put her down as a senseless baby.

"You say that only your maid knew of the place where the key lay?"

"Yes—and Miss Egerton," she added. Her husband went on speaking, but he did not notice how silent his wife had grown. The words—"and Miss Egerton—" kept sounding in her ears, and seemed to point to the golden-haired little woman. She shuddered and tried to drive the thought away, but it only forced itself upon her more strongly. Suddenly her husband turned to her and said:

"You must dismiss this maid of yours."

Lady Wynne rose to her feet, and answered with an angry glance towards Miss Egerton:

"I shall not. Whoever stole my jewels, it was not Emily."

She saw the amused look Edith Egerton exchanged with her husband, and the young wife's temper rose, for in her heart she knew they thought she was a baby, hardly fit to manage for herself. Sir Charles smiled down on her, as if he smiled on a child, and said coaxingly:

"We are not too sure of that, but I think she had better go."

The soft eyes of the lady flashed fire, and she was resolved to fight it out. But gentle Miss Egerton and her husband were too strong for her, and she was obliged to give in with a burst of tears. But as she left the room, she looked at Edith Egerton with angry, suspicious eyes, and with a heavy heart sought her maid.

Emily Miller was a tall, superior girl, entirely devoted to her young mistress. Alicia had brought her with her to the old house of Wynne—when she had come to it a bride, and Emily had been more a companion than any one else, ever since. And the sight of my lady in tears drew a hurried exclamation from her lips, as she started forward to meet her.

"Is there anything wrong, my lady?" she asked quickly.

"Oh, yes!" sobbed herladyship. "They are accusing you of stealing my jewels, and they say I must send you away."

The words came trembling out, and Emily stood listening as one dazed.

"Me take your jewels, my lady?" she repeated slowly.

"They are saying it, and they make me promise to send you away."

Digitized by Google

Emily had gathered her wits together again, and, as she drew herself up, she said proudly:

"I would not stay in a house where I was suspected for worlds!"

"Oh, Emily, I don't suspect you, and I don't want to send you away."

"I don't blame you, my lady," the maid answered quietly. "Miss Egerton's at the bottom of it."

Alicia Wynne looked up quickly, but she did not speak. Although she did suspect Miss Egerton, she was too wise to discuss the matter with her maid.

Emily Miller left, and Wynne settled down to the old winter life again. The jewels had not been found, although the detectives had worked hard, and although every little thing had been thoroughly sifted. And my lady went about amongst them with her sweet, ready smile, and saw more than any one of them thought with her bright dark eyes. In fact, she was the cleverest detective of them all, as the future was to prove.

* * * * *

"I have not had a chance yet, but you shall have them as soon as possible."

"It will be better to get them out of here. Are you sure they are quite safe?"

"Quite," and the speaker laughed lightly. "But if you come this day week, I think it will be all right. That lynx-eyed wretch is going to a dinner-party. She has made a point of staying at home of late."

"Very well, then! Good night."

The sound of heavy footsteps crashing through the brushwood followed his words, and Alicia Wynne came out of her hiding-place. But it was not on the man her eyes were fixed, but on the little graceful figure of a golden-haired woman, gliding through the misty light. A peculiar smile parted her red lips, and she said quietly to herself:

"It will not be my fault if I do not wear my diamonds next season."

* * * * *

"Are you going to Mrs. Vane's to-night?" asked Sir Charles that day week.

"Yes."

"Well, I'll meet you there. I have very important business to transact at Carnick to-day."

His wife smiled sweetly, and a peculiar gleam shot from her eyes as her husband strode away. And that afternoon her ladyship's tall figure crossed the wintry fields, and sought a little thatched cottage. Emily Miller opened the door in answer to her knock, and my lady entered. A long whispered conversation took place between them, and they seemed to understand the matter in hand fully before her ladyship left.

That night my lady's carriage had hardly issued from the lodge-gates when she furiously pulled the checkstring. The horses were quickly stopped, but before the footman had descended, Alicia had jumped out, and had raised her fair face to the old coachman.

"It's such a lovely night, John, I think I'll walk through the wood while you drive round the road. I'm early anyway."

And before the dumfounded servant could answer, my lady was gone. She walked swiftly to the shade of some bushes, and then stood. Her white dinner-dress was carefully hidden by a long grey cloak, and a passer-by would never have noticed her. Suddenly Emily appeared through the trees, and my lady started forward eagerly. But the maid only shook her head.

"She is gone, my lady. She has left with him by train."

"But she will come back. Her things are all here," gasped Alicia.

"No, my lady. She's had them sent away bit by bit without anyone knowing."

"Why didn't you stop her?"

"I could not, my lady. I had no proof."

Her ladyship's fair face was a study, but the sound of the horses' feet on the frosty road made her start.

"I'll see you again, Emily. I must go now," and she ran away through the trees.

Sir Charles was at a loss to account for his wife's clouded face that night, but if anything his own was more clouded when she told him the story on the way home.

"To think that they should have been so near to us all the time," he said.

"Yes; but I always had my suspicions," and her ladyship leant back and gave her jewels up with a sigh.

* * * * *

The bright lights from the gases of a London mansion shone on all that was fair and lovely—beautiful women, gorgeous dresses and shimmering jewels. Soft laughter and voices filled the air, and everything seemed joyful.

"See! There is young Lady Wynne," whispered one lady to another. "Her new jewels are even finer than the last."

As the other turned to look at the tall, winsome figure of the young mistress of Wynne in her flowing white dress and glistening diamonds, her eye was arrested by another woman—a dainty little creature with dark hair, light blue eyes and glowing complexion, and wonderful sparkling jewels.

"Who is that?" she asked of her friend.

"Oh, the little dark woman! Ethel Macdonald I think the name is. I met her some nights ago."

But the other's eyes had wandered back to young Lady Wynne. There was a puzzled look in my lady's face. Decidedly the dark woman's face was familiar to her—perhaps not exactly the face but the light blue eyes. Suddenly those who were watching her saw the languid, wondering air pass away, and a startled look flash from her eyes. Her husband came to her side instantly, and she turned to him quickly.

"Charles, it's my Norpolli emerald. I could not mistake it."

Her husband looked towards the dark woman to whom she was pointing, and on whose arm shone an emerald of unusual size and brilliance. One rapid glance sufficed him.

"It's Miss Egerton," he said quickly.

"Impossible!"

"It is. She has dyed her hair."

He was gone before she could answer, and she did not see him again in the house that night, and Miss Ethel Macdonald was gone too. But when she reached home that night he was waiting for her, and he had the jewels with him.

"We've lost her, but I've got the jewels. She slipped through our fingers like water. She's the cleverest woman I know."

Alicia was looking at the Norpolli, but her brows went down as her husband mentioned Miss Egerton's cleverness. But clever as the little woman was, some three years after someone very like her was convicted of robbery to a large extent, and made the acquaintance, perhaps not for the first time in her life, with the inside of a prison.

Digitized by Google

DUNCAN ANSTRUTHER.

Sandy Carmichael.

By CUTCLIFFE HYNE.

Author of "The Adventures of Captain Kettle," etc., etc.

BOOK I.—CONCERNING THE FLIGHT FROM CULLODEN MOOR.

SUMMARY.

A MAJOR and a cornet of Sheridan's Horse seek refuge in the wilds of Lochaber after the battle of Culloden Moor. They are joined by another refugee, Murtagh O'Neill. The major succumbs to wounds received in the engagement, and a troop of heavy cavalry discover the hiding place of the remaining two fugitives, and give chase to them.

They manage to get away safely and reach St. Peter's Strait, where they discover a trading cutter standing apparently empty. They take possession and make off with their prize before the owner's return. A boy appears out of the forepeak and volunteers to act as pilot, and they decide on a cruise to France.

CHAPTER V.

How the cutter was victualled; how a compass was procured from the snow Biddy, of Waterford; and how the moonlight failed off Bristol Channel.

IN the year of grace 1745 sheep-stealing was a hanging offence, as was also the case at the beginning of this present century of enlightenment. But to men of whom the death sentence had already been passed for treason against King George the Second's Government, the reimposition of that penalty made but little difference. A man can be hanged but once. Or, at all events, if the authorities chose to hang him a second time, it would be a matter of utter indifference to him, as, by virtue of the first experience, he would have risen superior to all sublunary pains and indignities.

And so, as Sandy Carmichael was hardened by previous acts of sheep-lifting undertaken at the instance of his former owner, Duncan Carmichael, it may be taken for granted that the cutter's crew set about their hunting with but few qualms of conscience.

They had gone past Charsaig, and had come to an anchor in a wild, desolate little bay shut in by islands, just a mile further south.* There was no human habitation nearer than the tiny village on Lough Swen. There was but slender chance of being disturbed, yet they did not dawdle for all that. It was late afternoon when the little cutter rounded to her anchor, and, after waiting for dusk, Sneyd and O'Neill put ashore. They had not far to go. Just over the ridge they came upon a dozen sheep sleeping in a scattered circle of twenty yards' radius. The dirk did its work. Five were secured before the rest ran away into the darkness.

One by one the carcasses were carried over the rough ground to the shore, a task which occupied them well on into daylight; for, owing to the steepness of the hills which ran down to the loch, a considerable circuit had to be taken with each load. But by the time the first sunbeam had begun to fall on the summit of Clachbheinn in Jura across the sound, the clumsy wooden-stocked anchor was catted and fished once more, and the cutter was standing out from her anchorage close-hauled for the fresh northerly wind. Once outside and clear of the Coinean Island, the sheets were started, and away she went for Lowlandman's Bay.

The two hunters—sheep-stealers, to be more prosaic—took their watch below; that is, they lay down and slept on the ballast, so as to be ready on the instant if they were wanted.

The boy, at his own suggestion, steered. He had been resting all night whilst the others worked, and so was the freshest of the trio. But, had he been dog-tired, he would have volunteered to steer just the same. His notion of the laws of slavery was vague—everybody was not as enlightened in 1745 as we are now—and he considered Sneyd his owner, by right of conquest from Duncan Carmichael. Duncan Carmichael he hated (with some reason), and worked for him through motives of fear alone. Sneyd he liked, as far as it was in his mind to like anybody; and the Irishman he liked too. They had been kind to

* One of the bonniest anchorages on the coast. The author knows it well. Save for a rock, bare at three quarters ebb, right in the middle, the ground is all good. The place is very pretty, and the high shores around have a look suggestive of never being trodden on by human foot.

Digitized by Google

him. Very probably, so he thought, there was an ulterior motive to their kindness, but that need not be reckoned with till it appeared. Sufficient for the moment that he had received from them a boon that had never fallen to his lot before—civil treatment, and thanks for services rendered—and he intended to return it by every means that lay in his power. Accordingly he sat now grasping the tiller, steering the cutter on to a far-away point of Jura, and not till he had rounded the northern shoal at the entrance to Lowlandman's Bay did he wake his companions.

A couple of short tacks brought them up to an anchorage, and having made all snug, they hauled the boat up along-side, slung the dead sheep into it, and prepared to go ashore.

As they were shoving off O'Neill gave a joyous exclamation.

"Yer honour," he cried, "luck's for us. Look there! on the shore fornenst yez. See that drift timber an' them barrels? It's the wreckage of some craft that the tide has sent in to the bay. No smoking of the mutton now till it's as dhry as a leathern scabbard. We can bile out our brine, an' salt it down in the tubs like Christians."

On inspection, the casks proved little the worse for their knocking about. One was certainly smashed by the rocks irretrievably. But three were as good as new, and four others, which had a stave or two started, were not beyond the efforts of an amateur cooper, and by dint of a little labour were soon made sound again.

The first thing done on landing was to light a fire. The iron pot was set on this, and Sandy was placed in charge, with instruction to replenish it with sea water as fast as the contents steamed away. At long intervals it was allowed to boil dry, and the resulting saline matter was put carefully on one side, and the operation continued as before.

Whilst the boy was thus engaged, the other two were busying themselves with the carcasses of the sheep. They had to be hung up, skinned, eviscerated, washed. The hearts, kidneys, livers, were reserved for immediate consumption. The rest was jointed up, rubbed thoroughly with the salt, and spread out on a huge flat stone. Every day for a week was the salt rubbed in afresh, and then the meat was packed away in three of the casks, which it just filled. The other three casks, and the one they had already on board, were filled with fresh water, and all were lashed securely to prevent them shifting in a sea-way. A score of goodly faggots of wood were added to supplement the peats already on board; and with them the storing of the little vessel was completed.

These operations occupied, as I have hinted, a week. During them, all hands were fully employed. After the first burst of work—getting the meat into shape for the salting, and so on—Sneyd did all the shore duties. He collected fuel, attended to the fire and the pot, and rubbed in salt when it was necessary to do so. O'Neill stayed on board the cutter, and gave her sails, standing and running rigging, and in fact almost every part of her, a thorough overhaul; a piece of attention which she had apparently stood in need of for some time past. Her canvas was old, thin, and stained into countless hues by mildew. It was patched in several places, and rent sorely in others. Her standing rigging was bleached and weather-worn. Her running rigging was flattened in the strand, and in many places perilously frayed. The store of lumber in the little hutch forward offered a varied selection of articles; but little was of any use. The ropes there had for the most part been discarded years ago as useless, and the scraps of canvas were one and all extremely rotten. But the Irishman was handy and contriving, and with palm and needle, marline-spike and spunyarn, he did wonders. The upper fabric of the little craft was rejuvenated under his clever fingers, and at the end of the week her gear was almost as sound as if it had just left the rigger's hand, and her canvas as serviceable as though it had but that day come out of the sailmaker's loft. Sandy Carmichael, too, was not idle during this busy time. When his services were dispensed with as stoker to the salt-kettle, he betook himself to the old boat (which had been towed down thus far), and providing himself with hooks, lines, and shell-fish for bait, sculled himself to various points of the bay, which instinct or experience told him were suitable for the purpose, and periodically brought back a store of dabs, whiting, gurnet, and codling, which not only gratified present consumption, but when split, sun-dried, and slightly smoked, offered a pleasant change of diet for the future.

The dirk did its work.

Sandy was placed in charge.

In fact, the cutter was fully fitted out save for chart and compass. O'Neill had made a lead-line, and a log-ship and line; but the two other necessaries to navigation were beyond his scope. Neither grew on Jura, and it was useless to expect them there. They must be obtained elsewhere if at all.

So, at four o'clock one morning, when the flood tide had just commenced to run, they got their anchor, and after beating out of the harbour, set a course for Rathlin Island. The tide, what there was of it, was against them then, but they calculated that the cutter would get into the channel between the Irish coast and the Mull of Cantyre in the six hours, and so get full benefit of the ebb, which courses past the Mull at a great rate.*

Keeping in mid-channel for awhile, so as to avoid the Maidens rocks, they held on down the North Channel, with intention of picking up the Isle of Man. Here, if they could not do so before, they might hope to purchase the necessary compass; though they could be by no means sure of doing it, for the islanders then spoke their own language, and had but little intercourse with the adjacent islands of Great Britain and Ireland. However, as it turned out, there was no need to make a landing. Traffic was not so plentiful in those days as it is now, and the craft they sighted even at a distance were few. The first vessel that came within hail of them they let pass without speaking. She had compasses on board, spare ones too, and charts galore, but they had the best possible reason to let her go her ways without trying to beg, borrow, buy, or steal anything of or at all belonging to her. She happened to be a King's ship; comparatively harmless-looking now, with bristling array of artillery hidden behind the closed gun-ports, and her long black hull neatly edged with snowy hammock cloths.

She came up after them hand-over-fist, close-hauled on the starboard tack, shouldering the waves aside with her bluff black bow in a pother of yeasty surge, and doing her good six knots an hour. She sweltered up alongside, bowing majestically over the larger seas, and disdaining to notice the smaller ones; everything spick-and-span, from maintruck to waterline, from the freshly-painted boats in davits to the nettings which hedged in her heavy tops. As she drew ahead and brought her gilded quarter galleries into view, the crew of the little cutter saw a couple of smartly-dressed officers leaning over a rail, and evidently discussing them; but the topic did not hold its interest long, for after a momentary glance they turned their heads away and began to talk of something else. The little half-decked-boat, with its dingy, weather-stained sails and gear, and its unkempt crew, were beneath more than a passing notice; and their mission could have no interest for so great a swell as a King's officer.

No, there was little fear that the frigate would heave-to and send a boat to examine their papers; the little craft was "too insignificant to contain treason." But for all that her crew were not sorry to see the white-sailed, heavily-sparred fabric draw further and further ahead, and finally dive hull down, and then deeper still, over the horizon.

Before the man-of-war ran out of view another sail hove in sight, coming from the southward. She was a vessel of a very different class; a little snow (or, as we say now, brig), born some time early in the seventeenth century, with lofty poop, low waist, and a great beak protruding from her square, tall bow. Her foremast was stepped right up in the eyes of her, and her bowsprit raked out at an angle which approached the perpendicular. She was running up channel with the wind free; yawing wildly, although there was but little sea on; and weltering about, till, from the foam around, one might well have likened her to a whale at play.

She came plunging along, her stained and patched old courses and topsails bellying out like dirty streaked half oranges to the fair wind, and the spritsail under her bowsprit dashing into every sixth or seventh sea which passed beneath her. The cutter approached, close-hauled. A man in a dingy red nightcap was standing on the snow's lofty poop with one hand on the tiller, and the other clutching the weather tiller rope. Straddle-legged beside him was a short, pot-bellied man, with a fierce-looking red face and an enormous purple bottle-nose.

The cutter slid by, and then, putting up her helm and easing out her sheets, ran back again. The red-faced man saw this manœuvre, came aft, and leant over the taffrail. "Cutter ahoy!" he bawled; "what cutter's that?"

"Cutter Lawful Prize, in ballast," shouted O'Neill in response, at Sneyd's desire. "Lawrence, master. Twelve days out of Ballachuilish. Bound for Brest av we can make it. What ship's that?"

"Snow Biddy of Watherford, laden wud spuds for Glaisca'. Twenty-foive days out of Watherford. Pathrick Muldoon, master. What is it y'are afther?"

"Afther speaking yez, avic," replied O'Neill, edging closer away into the snow's wake.

"It's meself that 'ud ruyther see yez haul away on to yer own coorse again," grumbled he of the bottle-nose. "Ahoy there! sphake what yez want to say now, and don't come any closer. 'Tis the narvous man I am meself wud strangers."

"There isn't a hair of the venerable head of yez I'd harm," responded O'Neill.

The bottle-nosed man turned sharply round. "Forrard there!" he bawled; "cast loose them two brass patareroes an' run 'em out; they be loaded; and stand by wud a hot bacca-pipe. Now then, ye spalpeens," he continued, turning round again, "if yez sheer up alongside, be all the saints, I'll blow yez out of the wather."

* In southerly gales, this race attains the velocity of five knots and upwards.—Pilot Book.

"Arrah now, honest man, be raysonable," said O'Neill. "Is it picaroons yez take us for, here under the lee of ancient Oireland?—Hoist that main-tack there, Sandy, or we'll be shootin' past him.—It's in disthress we are, or it isn't me that 'ud be botherin' yez."

"Av it's wather ye're wantin'," growled the bottle-nosed skipper, "I can't help yez. The winds has been bafflin', an' I'm that long out o' port I'm on short rations meself. Run into Belfast loch, an' get yer casks filled there."

"'Tisn't wather we want, Capt'n dear, nor grog neither; ptaise be, we've lashin's o' both. It's a compass we was wantin' to trade from yez, an' a bit chart, if yez had such a thing to spare."

"What's that?" bawled the bottle-nosed man; "put to sea widout a compass, that looks queer. Forrard there! stand by with that hot bacca-pipe. Cutter ahoy! kape her aisy as she's goin', av yez value yer skins."

"Set taut the weather toppin'-lift, yer honour," whispered O'Neill; "an' do you, Sandy, just start them peak-halyards. 'Tis hard to keep her back aqual to that sluggish ould haystack."—Then, aloud: "'Tisn't meself that likes to tell yez quite how it came about. Ye see we had a bit of a misfortune—But yez have such a hape of bhoys there forrard listenin', that I hardly like to sphake."

"Never mind them," bawled back the bottle-nosed skipper, in more amicable tones. "They're honest lads all when it comes to bearin' a hand to a fellow-crittur in disthress. But tell me, what is't ye've done?"

"It's the whole of the King's army, an' the half of his navy, we have afther us," quoth O'Neill, with many mysterious signs. "There's been a big battle fought in the North—by Inverness—an' his honour here was one of the Prince's right hand men."

"Ach, why didn't yez say so before? an' here's me, wud an ownly brother that carried a pike for him, just dyin' for the news. Just mind yourself, while I heave the snow to, an' then come aboard as fast as yez like."

O'Neill put up his helm, jibed, ran away for a cable's length, and then hove to, with his staysail-sheet a-weather.

The snow came far more slowly head to wind, clewing up her courses as she did so; but finally, after much splashing and wallowing and bustle, she was brought up stationary under a backed maintopsail. Four minutes afterwards saw the cutter alongside, her crew on the snow's deck, and their craft passed away astern at the end of a stout warp.

The bottle-nosed master welcomed them with effusion, and marched the three of them off to his cabin, which was entered by a low, narrow door in the break of the poop. It was an evil-smelling little den, and warmth was evidently more aimed at than ventilation. A broad locker ran along the sides, and a fixed oak table was in the middle. All seated themselves, and the host produced a demijohn of delf, and four tin mugs. "That's good honest potheen," he said, "and there's a pitcher of water on the flure for anybody that likes to mix. An' now for the yarn, av yez plaze; for it's just dyin' I am to hear what's befallen."

The story of the Prince's march northwards from Cheshire was told with all amplitude of details; and though neither Sneyd nor O'Neill knew that doughty pikeman the skipper's brother, and so could give no tidings of his probable welfare, their worthy host seemed in nowise disturbed.

"Andy Muldoon's all right, yer honour, we may lay to that. He'd be as bad to kill as an eel. Yez might cut him in two and flay the hide off him, but the bits 'ud be as lively as ever. Yer honour's shyin' at the whiskey and drownin' yer dhrink wid wather. Be advised by an ould sayman an' take it 'nate, an' sorra spasm'll yez ever have in the stomach after."

Apparently Mr. Pat Muldoon had been following his own prescription, if a nose is any measure of one's potations. But Sneyd declined to try it.

"You forget I'm English," said he, "and we in our country are not great drinkers of strong waters. Beer is our national beverage, and we stick to it for the most part; drink some foreign wines, but not so much; and scarcely ever touch usquebaugh, or, what you Irish and Scots swear by, whisky."

"Well, yer honour, every man to his own dhrink, but may the saints be good to the bhoy that first made whisky. An' that's a toast that no Fermanagh man, let alone one from County Watherford, would refuse." He and O'Neill emptied their mugs, and then he continued, "It's sorry I am, yer honour, that I'm not headin' to the s'uthard, or 'tis the proud man I'd be to take yez aboard the ould Biddy. But that's a nate little craft yez have astern, an' a good say-boat too, I'll take me davy; an' it's to Brest she'll be takin' yez before ye might get turned round and see where yez are."

"Arrah now, Patsey Muldoon, don't be afther blarneying us. It's yerself that knows we'll have the devil's own work to keep her goin' av it comes on to blow, or gets at all thick. How did yez suppose we could steer a straight line? Shoot a pisthol-shot over the bows and follow the shmoke?"

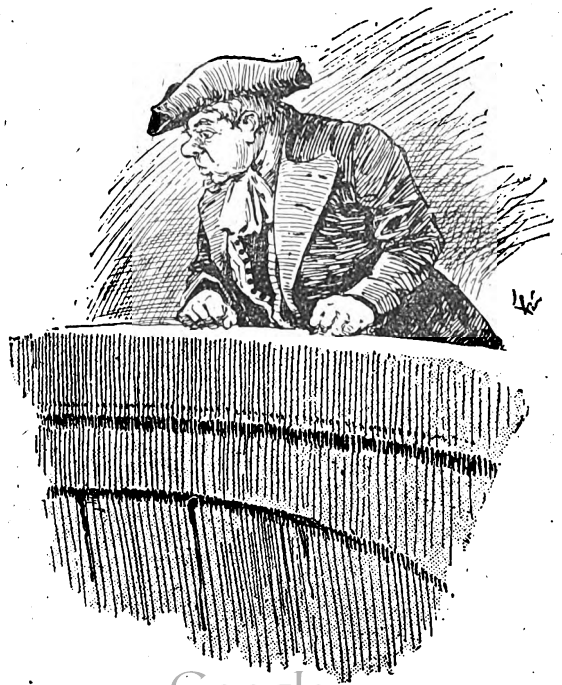
"Begob, I forgot," exclaimed the bottle-nosed man. "Yez haven't a compass aboard. There's a little gem in the locker there under the gorsoon. Get up, Sandy, me honey, lift the lid an' hand me out the wee oak box. That's it. There we are. There's a compass for a say-way now. Give it a jolt up occasionally, and it'll not vary a couple of points. On deck there, Tommy!"

"Sor?" said he of the red nightcap, lifting the skylight, and presenting an extremely dirty face.

"Get one of our wee lanthorns, an' a flask o' oil."

"Lanthorn an' oil it is, sor," said Tommy, disappearing.

"Now, that's well so far," continued the skipper; "but to a chart I can't help yez. Haven't one aboard o' me—couldn't use it if I had. Don't believe in charts meself.



The red-faced man . . . leant over the taffrail.

Digitized by Google

Gimme log-ship and lead-line; and, wud them an' me compass, I'd find me way anywhere I been before."

"So'd I, dacent man, for that matter," rejoined O'Neill, "but never having been to any of the French ports in me life, I can't quite tell how they lie. An' just knowing the names don't help one."

"Thrue for yez, thrue for yez," replied Muldoon, rubbing his great nose perplexedly. "Yez could find yer way down to Land's End aisy enough by keepin' wudin shmell o' the land, and by aid o' a few thriflin' sailin' directions that I'll be givin' yez presently: but 'tis a good step across from there to Brest. However, I can give yez bearings, an' distances, an' tell yez what yer landfalls ought to be like. But, first of all, have yez a good memory?"

"Me memory houlds things," said O'Neill, "just like a basket houlds wather."

"That's bad," replied the skipper. "Well, I must repate an' repate till yez have it all be heart."

"Stay a moment," interrupted Sneyd. "Have you any writing materials on board? If we had the instructions down in black and white, there would be no chance of forgetting them."

"There's an inkhorn," replied the bottle-nosed man thoughtfully, "an' there's a goose-quill or two, I know; but whether there's a scrap of paper, that I can't say. —On deck there! Tommy!"

"Sor?" said Tommy, putting dirty face and red nightcap to the open skylight.

"Get me some writing-paper, quick."

"Writing-paper it is, sor," replied Tommy, withdrawing his head. Two minutes afterwards he knocked at the cabin door and coming in said, "Writing-paper, sor," clapped half-a-dozen odd scraps of not over-clean paper on to the table, and retired. Muldoon had produced a dusty inkhorn and quills, and Sneyd quickly fashioned one of the latter into a pen, and stood ready to take notes. The bottle-nosed man's information was astonishingly complete and accurate. He gave landmarks, told of rocks, shoals, and races, and related every item that could possibly be of use along the course to Brest. But as retailing these would be remarkably like giving a lengthy—a very lengthy—quotation out of a modern pilot-book, with just a few details such as those of lights and buoys omitted, I shall forbear.

The instructions took fully three hours, and, at their conclusion, Muldoon hailed again, "On deck there! Tommy!"

"Sor?" said he of the dirty face and nightcap, appearing as usual.

"Biled junk an' spuds, and look lively."

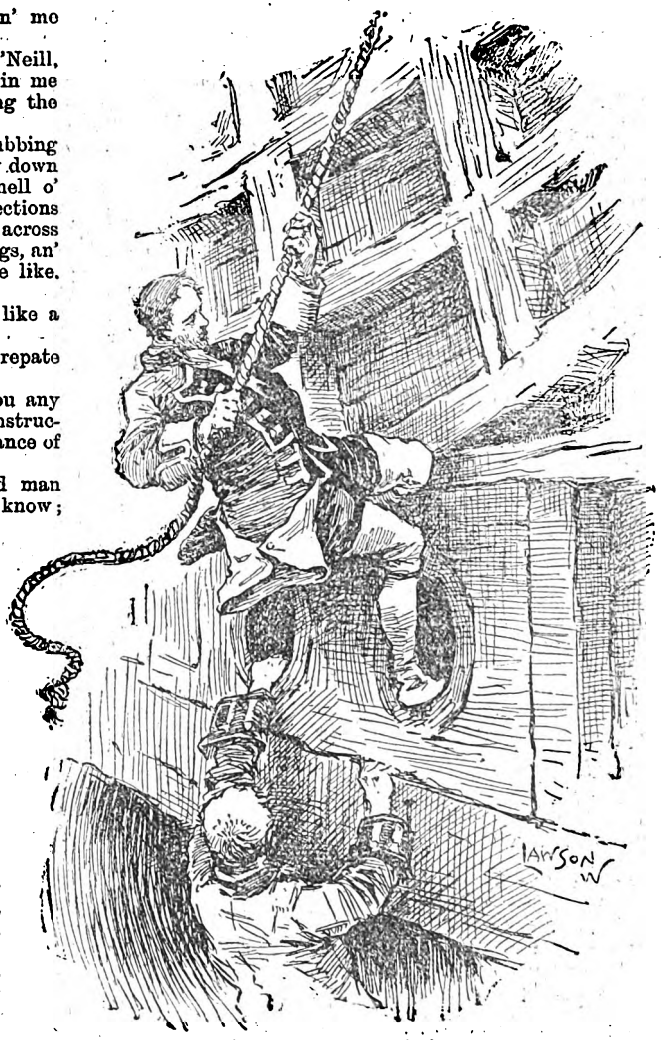
"Junk an' spuds it is, sor," replied Tommy, shutting down the skylight, and going his ways, to arrive ten minutes afterwards with two steaming tin dishes. Wooden platters were produced from a locker; each used his own knife; and forks there were none. But the viands did not stay long untouched. Healthy sea-appetites do not need much coaxing.

At its conclusion, they drank a parting cup, and went on deck. Sneyd, as delicately as he could, offered payment for the compass, but as it was refused indignantly, he was tactful enough not to press the matter further, but gave a couple of guineas from his slender store to be shared amongst the crew. Then they hauled their little cutter alongside, boarded her, and shoved off. The two craft parted, exchanging cheers, and in a couple of hours' time had lost sight of one another for ever.

But that's the way at sea.

* * * * *

The little cutter held on her course a point or two east of south, intending to make Holyhead her first landfall, after which she was to hit off the northern cape of Cardigan Bay, and then bear across to St. David's Head at its southern extremity.



Each had clutched at some portion of the stranger's gear.

The crew was divided into two watches. O'Neill took one by himself, whilst Sneyd and the boy managed during the other. Sandy was a good steersman, but he was deficient in strength; and Sneyd, whose nautical knowledge was still in its embryonic state—though growing apace—was always ready when there was any heavy work to be done. In practice, he generally took the watch by himself, for Sandy was ship's cook, being accustomed to the limited appliances, and able to make the most of them. Of course, in heavy weather Sneyd and O'Neill stayed above the whole time; and as they invariably turned in "all standing," the one whose watch it was below was ready to present himself for duty at the first call.

As it turned out, the weather favoured them on the whole. There was one short, sharp gale, which they ran before under the tiny square sail; but the cutter shipped no green water, and the spray that boarded her was easily baled back again to its proper place.

This bit of a blow brought them abreast of St. David's Head by the time it moderated, and although a tidy sea was running, they were able to give her a single-reefed mainsail almost directly afterwards.

Wind soon dropped, and headed them, blowing from the W.S.W.; and it bade fair to be a dead ratch, up to Land's End. But provisions and water were holding out well, and they stood sturdily on, fearing nothing. Once again they saw a King's cruiser; but, as before, she ignored them. She would very likely have overhauled a more pretentious craft; but she evidently thought that no Jacobite, worthy of the catching would deign to escape in such an unkempt-looking, half-open boat as theirs was.

One day, just before nightfall, they sighted land—it turned out to be Lundy Island; but that they did not know till afterwards, and as the weather came on thick with the darkness, they deemed it wisest to heave-to till it should clear again. Accordingly the mainsail was close reefed, and the sheet hauled amidships; the staysail-sheet put a-weather; and with the helm lashed as she liked it, the little craft lay head to the seas, riding over them like a duck.

Sandy took the first watch; O'Neill followed him for the next four hours, and went below without seeing any signs of the weather improving; and then Sneyd came out of the snug little forepeak, and scrambled aft to face the driving rain in his turn.

The night was so pitchy dark that it was impossible from where he sat to see beyond the mast. The hiss of the seas, as they ran along the clincher sides, sounded monotonously in his ears. The rain drove ceaselessly into his face. Sneyd wrapped himself closely in his military cloak, and wedged himself firmly into an angle. It was an unpleasant night, but he might as well take it philosophically. There was no particular danger to be apprehended. The cutter was not likely to broach-to, for it was not blowing at all hard, and the gear had been tested by much heavier weather.

Hour by hour his watch wore on; and, as the last of it passed away, he thought the night, if anything, grew clearer. The rain was certainly not so heavy as it had been, and overhead the sky was far less murky. With luck, he thought, they'd have a fine day on the morrow. He had just arrived at this idea, and had stood up to stretch himself—for keeping in one attitude had made him feel rather cramped—when a restlessness seized him which he could not account for. He peered eagerly into the darkness on all sides, but could distinguish nothing save the dim shapes of the rolling waves. He listened attentively, but could hear no sound except the incessant swishing of the seas, the occasional groan of a timber, or the ceaseless squeak of the blocks.

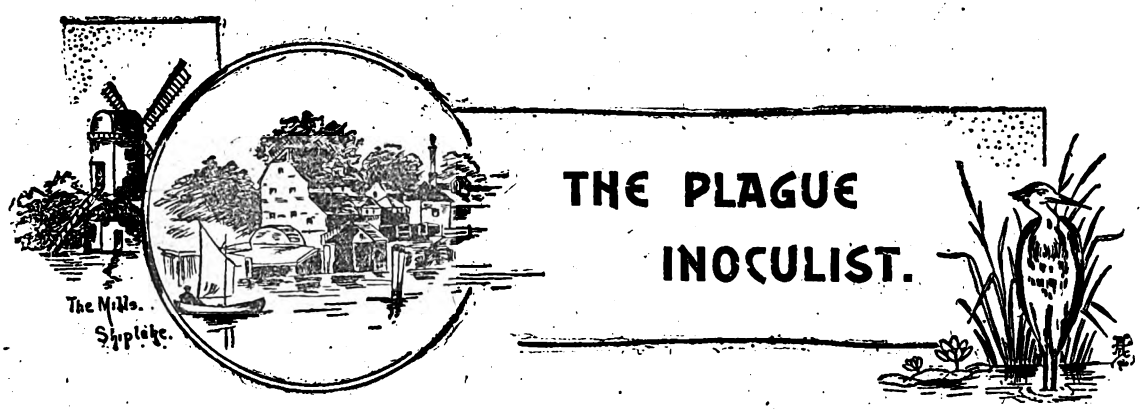
Then of a sudden a great shape loomed through the mist on the cutter's starboard beam, towering like some huge black phantom away on all sides into the darkness, and churning over the waves directly towards her.

Sneyd yelled like one possessed. "Up with your helm! Hard-a-larboard, for Heaven's sake!" and then rushed forward to call his companions on deck. They had awakened at the first alarm, and were coming through the hatch as he met them; first Sandy, then O'Neill.

"There's a big ship close aboard of us," exclaimed Sneyd, and, before the words were fairly out of his lips, the great solid beak which projected from the bows of the stranger rose to the lift of a sea, and crashed down on the little cutter just abaft 'midships, tearing through her slender fabric as though it had been so much paper.

No man could help his neighbour. It was sauve qui peut, and that in an instant of time. Directly she was struck, the cutter seemed to crumble into staves beneath their feet. Each had clutched at some portion of the stranger's gear, and found himself saved without knowing the fate of his comrades; and it was not till all three had been hauled up on deck by some sailors, who had run forward with ropes at the first alarm, that they thoroughly realised how they had got there.

(To be continued.)



"ONE hundred and ninety three have kicked the bucket," reported Harry O'Neil popping his head in at the open door.

"Won't you come in, man?"

"Thanks, Major, I think not! Might give you the plague." The Irish doctor's eyes twinkled merrily "One hundred and ninety three, remember."

"I'm not likely to forget it, O'Neil, any more than I am likely to forget Bombay. Confounded hole that it is!" cried Major Dothrington with a groan.

O'Neil having given his report, vivâ voce, proceeded to whistle blithely as he sauntered down the passage. He was an army medico, detailed on special service in the town to aid the Bombay doctors in their efforts to cope with the dread disease.

O'Neil had just left the bungalow when he was met by Harold Vermont, a doctor of exceptional skill, who practised but for love of his science.

"Ah, you, O'Neil! I thought I should find you here." He reined in his horse. "You're the very fellow I want to see. Can you spare me a moment?"

"Ten, if you like. I'm going to the town, will you accompany me?" inquired the Irishman, mounting his horse and dismissing the native who held it.

"Sorry, but I must see the Major. I'll go a little way along the road with you, though."

Vermont paused, then as the horses entered the Bombay road, said:

"O'Neil, I'm going to ask you a straight question. Will you give me a straight answer?"

"I never beat about the bush, Vermont," replied the Irishman with a smile.

Vermont hesitated, then said:

"What's your idea of the plague?"

"That it is exceptionally bad."

"You have no other idea regarding it?" Vermont glanced scrutinisingly at his companion.

"None."

"What is your idea as to its origin?"

"The native's innate love of dirt and the bad sanitation of the native quarter."

"That's just where you and all the other fellows have gone wrong."

"How?" O'Neil asked curiously.

"Have you ever paid particular attention to your patients' arms?" inquired Vermont.

"No, I can't say that I have. But what has this to do with the origin of the plague?"

"A good deal, only you don't know it," replied Vermont coolly. "Since this scourge commenced I have treated four hundred of its victims. On the right arm of two hundred and seventeen, slightly to the right of the triceps. I have observed a pustule, and on eighty others I have noticed it slightly above the deltoid."

"Well?" remarked O'Neil with a smile. "So far I see nothing remarkable."

"Wait a moment before going off at a tangent," exclaimed Vermont. "It struck me as odd that one particular pustule should always be met with in one particular spot, and that the patient possessing such a pustule would never suffer so acutely as those who did not. Therefore I minutely examined the mystifying spot on one patient. It was then that I was able to discover the origin of this outbreak. Not only one patient did I examine after that, O'Neil, but everyone who had a pustule situated as I tell you, and everyone bore out the truth of my conclusion."

O'Neil reined in his horse, a flush of interest suffusing his sunburnt cheeks.

"What was your conclusion" he cried almost peremptorily.

"That each pustule covered a scar which could be caused by nothing but a hypodermic syringe."

"Good Heavens!" ejaculated O'Neil, horror-struck. "Then the origin of the plague——"

"Was by the inoculation of sundry persons with the plague lymph."

The Irishman held out his hand.

"Vermont," he exclaimed, "you are a young man, and I an old one. You are a doctor because medicine is your hobby; I am one so as to be able to make both ends meet. You have made a discovery which I never dreamt of, and I congratulate you on it. Vermont, you are a clever fellow."

"It was luck and a little observation," replied Vermont modestly, grasping the outstretched hand. "Having now expounded to you the cause of the appearance of the plague, I will advance my theory as to how it was propagated. Of late—by that I mean within the last eighteen months—there has been great unrest among the natives, trees have been smeared white as in the days preceding the Mutiny, a spirit of coming evil has oppressed most of us, and, lastly, the fakirs have been active. This plague, O'Neil, in my mind, has been originated by a fanatic."

"It is a very likely hypothesis," replied the Irishman. "Well?"

"That is all. I'd like to see you this evening, to chat over this affair. I have to see the Major and it's late now. Come to dinner, will you?"

"Thanks, I will," replied O'Neil genially. Then added admiringly, as he watched Vermont canter away in the direction of the Major's bungalow: "That fellow has a future before him—if only he went in for medicine professionally."

True to his promise, the Irish doctor arrived at Vermont's bungalow at six, in time for dinner, but the young Englishman had not returned all day; therefore, O'Neil decided to await his return on the verandah.

The time passed slowly, till midnight boomed out from the city.

Seriously alarmed, the doctor rode through the silent streets to headquarters, inquiring after Vermont. They had not seen him since ten in the morning, when he had left to go to Major Dothrington's.

With a vague foreboding of evil O'Neil retraced his way to Vermont's bungalow, had a horse saddled and, accompanied by a native servant, clattered along the road to the Major's.

The young doctor had not been seen there since the afternoon. He had had tiffin and left somewhat about three, riding in the direction of the Western Ghauts.

With a heavy heart O'Neil turned his horse's head in this new direction and galloped along the road accompanied by the Major and Vermont's man.

The trail was easy to follow, as most of the villagers and hut-dwellers had seen him pass.

Meanwhile, Harold Vermont, after leaving the Major, had blissfully forgotten the invitation he had given O'Neil, and, forgetting, had ridden towards the Western Ghauts and stopped in front of one of the grotto-like caves which riddled the mountain side.

It was about seven when he reached his destination. Dismounting, he put his arm through the reins and whistled softly.

A beautiful young girl of some twenty summers appeared in answer to the call, and with a glad cry flung herself into his arms.

"Verda! My darling!" he cried rapturously, kissing her passionately. "It seems a year since I saw you last, though it was only yesterday."

"And to me it seems as if I had lived a lifetime," she replied. "You are late, my love—"

"Ah! Only an hour and that was not by my fault! I was speaking to the Major Sahib of the best way in which to quell this scourge."

She twined her arms around his neck and raised her soft eyes to his.

"I feared some ill had befallen you, or——" She hesitated a moment, then continued: "Or that some beautiful mem-sahib had charmed you. Oh, Harold—the women of your nation are so beautiful!"

"Do you think so?" he cried gaily. "For me, however, there is but one beautiful woman in the universe—and her name is Verda of the Ghauts."

"Oh, Harold, if I were to lose your love!" she cried impulsively; then added: "My father has arrived at last."

"Ah, this is good news; is it not, my love?" exclaimed Harold. "A fakir of some note, is he not?"

"Of some note?" She glanced questioningly at Vermont; then added almost reverently: "In India he is known as the Fakir of Fakirs."

"You must present me to your father. I am eager to see him!"

Leading him into the cavern, she halted before a low-burning fire, on the further side of which, dimly outlined in the surrounding gloom, sat a tall, gaunt Hindoo, asceticism stamped on every feature.

Digitized by Google

"My father," said Verda gently, "behold the Englishman I have already spoken about."

The gaunt native sprang to his feet and earnestly scanned the features of the stranger. Apparently satisfied with his scrutiny, he drew a deep breath, then exclaimed:

"So you are the Feringhee whom my daughter loves! I know your face as belonging to the man who has done much to stay the ravages of the plague at Bombay. Your skill is great in medicine—yet it is useless to pit it against the Divine will. Verda, leave us alone. I have much to say to this Englishman, and he, I doubt not, desires to speak privately to me."

Verda glanced questioningly at her lover.

"Your father is correct," he replied gently, "Go, Verda, and wait for me outside till I can come to claim you."

Without a word she obeyed, leaving together the two men of so widely different races.

"Sit down, Feringhee," commanded the Fakir, setting the example. "I heard in Bombay to-day that you have solved the cause of the outbreak of this scourge. What is it?"

"I see no reason why I should hide it! I attribute this plague primarily to inoculation."

The Fakir started, his eyes glittering.

"Ah! A good hypothesis, perhaps!" he muttered. "Tell me, Feringhee, having in your own mind solved an important problem, what will be your next step?"

The Fakir's eyes gleamed wildly beneath his shaggy eyebrows.

"I shall proceed to run the inoculist to earth."

"Ah!" The Fakir passed his hand over his shaven crown.

"A worthy resolve, but hard of accomplishment! But to change the topic; Stranger, you, I believe, love my daughter Verda?"

"Passionately!" exclaimed Vermont impulsively.

The Fakir laughed sardonically.

"Of course," he remarked stridently. "We all love passionately before marriage—and hate afterwards."

"Perhaps you were unfortunate in that respect."

"I?" The Fakir rose. "My wife died thirteen months after I married her; I had not time to hate. You desire to marry Verda?"

"You have guessed my heart's desire."

"Then know that I refuse——"

"I don't care if you do!" cried Vermont angrily. "By Heaven, I don't! Neither you nor anyone else shall separate us, for we will marry with or without your consent!"

The Fakir listened with an amused smile to the young Englishman's outburst.

"You lack courtesy," he remarked coldly. "I had not finished my sentence. With your permission I will repeat it. I refuse to permit you to marry her unless you promise to renounce your scheme of running this inoculist to earth."

"I can promise that, for I can tell others his name and leave to them the honour of tracking him!"

"You know his name? What is it?"

"Rahajat the Fakir,"

The Hindoo staggered, and placed his hand in his dress.

"Are you ill?" asked Vermont in an anxious tone.

"No! No! It is only a heart spasm. I am better now." The Fakir laughed discordantly. "Feringhee, you are a clever man, and, unlike your brother Englishmen, are correct."

"How do you know that the Fakir is the inoculist?" queried Vermont, surprised.

"Because I am Rahajat the Fakir!" shouted the other, springing at the astounded Vermont with a hypodermic syringe in his hand. "Your discovery is too weighty a one to be entrusted to such an addlepate as you!".

The young doctor's surprise was but momentary, for, realising the peril he ran of being inoculated, he seized the Fakir's wrists and called all his strength into play.

Inch by inch Vermont pressed the Fakir's hand towards his own breast, and despite the lithe Hindoo's frenzied resistance, pressed till the needle of the syringe penetrated the dusky skin.

With a scream of fear the Fakir felt the puncture, thrice repeated, then Vermont, releasing Rahajat suddenly, struck him a violent blow between the eyes which felled him, stunned and bleeding, to the ground.

Striking a match he surveyed the prostrate Fakir with a smile of satisfaction.

"The virus has begun to take effect!" Vermont remarked grimly. "I can see that by the punctures. The lymph is strangely virulent, so much so indeed that two hours will see him out of his misery."

He approached the cavern mouth, leaving the darkness behind him, to find Verda waiting for him.

"You are mine for ever, darling!" he cried joyfully. "We must escape. Your father is stricken with the plague."

"Then my duty is to nurse him."

For sole answer, Vermont mounted his horse, and, seizing Verda, placed her before him on the saddle and galloped away, to fall in with Major Dothrington and Doctor O'Neil four hours later.

Calling them on one side he briefly explained what had occurred.

"By Jove, man, you deserve a medal!" exclaimed the cheery Major enthusiastically. Then his face clouded. "But you won't get a thing, I suppose, for the Government daren't take any notice of this affair. I should cut India, if I were you, for once the natives get wind that you inoculated Rahajat, their most sacred of sacred Fakirs—well——"

"I don't want any more reward than what I have already!"

"What's that—the girl?"

"Yes, Major—my future wife."

The following day the great plague's register showed a decrease of fifty victims.

TRISTAM MONCK.

"WHY does that man keep watching me all the time?"

"Perhaps it's because he wonders why you're staring at him!"

BEAUTIFUL MAIDEN: "I have here a little poem: the only one I ever wrote."

Over-Sensitive Editor: "Then, my dear madam, I haven't the heart to take it from you."

QUIZZEL: "What will you give your girl on New Year's Day?"

Sharpleigh: "Well, that depends. If she says 'Yes,' New Year's Eve, I shall give her a seal-skin sacque; if she says 'No,' I suppose I shall have to let her give me the sack."

Digitized by Google

A DINNER-TABLE DAYDREAM.

We were a large, jolly party, who had now been staying at the country house of my old friend, Charlie Whistler, for three days. I need not tell you who we all were; suffice it to say that I am Jack Tatham, and that my interest in this visit was centred in one of the other guests—Miss Vera Majoribanks.

Our hostess had the tact and good-natured consideration of her friends' wishes to send the object of my interest down to dinner under my especial care; and it can easily be imagined that, such being the case, all arrangements for our entertainment during the next two hours seemed perfect to me. The lighting of the table more especially so, since it all appeared to proceed from the brilliant light in my fair neighbour's blue eyes, and to be reflected in the exquisite diamonds on her snowy neck and arms.

Our conversation had gone on during three courses with no more interruption than the occasional attentions to the rest of the party which courtesy demands; when I became aware that Miss Majoribanks was no longer listening to me—or, indeed to anybody or anything. Her eyes were fixed with an expression of terror on the face of a servant, who was handing a plate to an old lady exactly opposite. There was nothing in the man's appearance to cause such fear as her face and even her attitude expressed. He was a pale-faced, morose looking man, with straight black hair, and small eyes. I did not remember having seen him on my last visit, six months ago, so concluded he was a servant who had not been there long. These thoughts did not occupy a moment, and the next I bent over Miss Majoribanks and asked:

"Are you cold—or perhaps not well? You look so pale and wretched."

She started, and turned to me as if just awaking from a dream, and answered:

"Yes, I am cold, I was shivering at thoughts which came into my head when I saw that man opposite to us."

"It was so exact," she continued. "Just the same small gleaming eyes, the same black hair, only—I thought it was covered by a woman's cap. Ah! is it a dream, or how do I know it all?"

I thought she was a little upset; though why, I knew not, and so I tried to calm her, and told her that dreams always went by contraries—for instance, that to dream of a death meant an approaching marriage. I tried to say this meaningly as well as encouragingly.

When she was more collected I pointed out to her that fewer servants were in the room now; her particular horror being one of the absentees.

"You must think me very silly," she said, blushing. "But I still feel that I have seen that man before, and I must tell you all about it when we can talk quietly."

Soon after this the ladies left us, and it was some time later that we found ourselves settled in a shaded corner of the drawing-room for a quiet talk. I began by saying:—

"Now for the mystery! and I hope we shall be able to clear it up satisfactorily."

"I wish you could put it all out of my head," she said dreamily. "I know I shall never dare to go to bed to-night."

Then she began in hurried, excited tones to tell me what her impressions had been.

"I will tell you all I saw as soon as I caught that man's eyes," she said. "They seemed to me to be fixed on my diamonds, the man's face was bent over me with a greedy gleam in those small black eyes, while an awful, sharp, cruel knife was in his hand. Such a thing has never been told to me; oh, must it not mean that it is going to happen? Don't you think that dreams are sometimes sent as warnings?"

"But you do not know that you ever dreamt it," I said. "I think you must have read something of the kind, and you have allowed it to prey on your imagination."

"No, it is all connected with my diamonds; I saw the man's eyes attracted by them when we were at dinner, and it was that which led to the dream, or vision, or whatever it may be."

An idea occurred to me.

"Will you leave the diamonds in my care when you are not wearing them?" I said. "Then, if, as you say, the man's face and all its horrors are distinctly connected with them, he will trouble me, and you need not think of him any more. But wear them now until bed-time, so as to avoid drawing attention to what might have to be explained; and how could you explain all these vague doubts and suspicions, which to-morrow you will remember only as empty fancies?"

Then I added—

"If you are at all nervous I will sit up all night in the library, the side door of which is exactly opposite to the one door of the room you occupy. I can easily make an excuse for going there when the household settles for the night, and I promise you to remain there with that door open until morning."

Digitized by Google

Of course Miss Majoribanks replied with many thanks, that she would feel quite safe under such circumstances, but could not think of robbing me of my rest because of her foolish fancies. To which I responded by assuring her that the thought of her anxiety alone would be sufficient to keep me awake in any case—which argument was conclusive.

When bed-time arrived I gave her her candle, and she quietly put the diamonds into my hand; then said good-night with a shy, grateful look, which it is pleasant to remember.

We men-folks were not fond of late hours; and on this particular night we seemed more sleepily inclined than usual. So I was soon able to carry out my programme, saying I had some writing to do before the early post, and should probably burn the midnight oil in the library.

There I carried my rugs; and, having carefully turned down and shaded the lamp, I settled myself in an arm-chair near the door, but in such a position as not to be easily seen through it.

I imagine that I must have been sitting there about two hours, when I heard a soft step approaching from the hall. It came as far as the door opposite—and there stopped.

The lights were kept burning all night in the corridors, so I was able to distinguish the figure of one of the housemaids, as I supposed, taking coals to Miss Majoribanks room. But why should coals be needed at 2 a.m.? I knew how startled Miss Majoribanks would be by her entrance. Putting up the lamp while the servant's back was turned to me, and she intent upon opening the door quietly, I went into the corridor, and said:—

"Thank you, it was I who wanted the coals in the library. Bring them in, please."

The maid looked startled, as she well might, and did not seem as if she understood me; so I repeated:—

"In here, please," pointing to the library door. She then brought them in, rather sullenly I thought, and was going to put some on the fire, when I stopped her saying:—

"Leave the box there, please, and I will put them on as I need them."

There was nothing more to be said, and she withdrew, but not before I had noticed that her eyes were singularly like those of the man-servant who had caused such alarm; that her cap did not appear to sit on her head as a woman's cap should; and that her clothes did not look as if they were made for her square, masculine figure.

After thinking over this, something prompted me to examine the coal-scuttle which she had brought in; and there to my horror, if not to my surprise—under two or three of the larger coals was a knife. "awful, sharp, cruel!" as it had been described to me. Need I say how thankful I then was that I had prevented the coals being taken into the room for which they were intended.

The next morning I heard that one of the men-servants had obtained leave of absence that he might go to see his wife, the news of whose serious illness he had just received. He was gone before we were down, and I knew well how to interpret this, but determined to say nothing, and have since learnt—as I expected—that for some reason or other he never returned.

Miss Majoribanks now thinks that her fears were without the slightest foundation, and I try to appear as if I thought so too.

G. FENTON.

£50 OFFERED EVERY WEEK. £50

Every week the Editor of SHORT STORIES addresses 50 envelopes to 50 people in various parts of the country. Inside each envelope he places a sovereign and locks them away in his private safe.

SIMPLY TAKE A POST-CARD

and address it to the Editor under the following conditions: Ask if a sovereign has been addressed to you, giving your full name and address clearly written in ink.

Fifty names and addresses have been picked out at random from directories, etc., etc.

No sovereign, however, will be awarded unless it is applied for, so it would be advisable for you to tell your friends to drop us a post-card, whether they are readers or not.

All applications for No. 14 distribution must reach us by January 9th, addressed to The 14th Sovereign Editor, "Short Stories" Office, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Each application must be made separately.

Result of Distribution No. II.

Two of the fifty people selected to receive a sovereign this week have applied for it. They are:

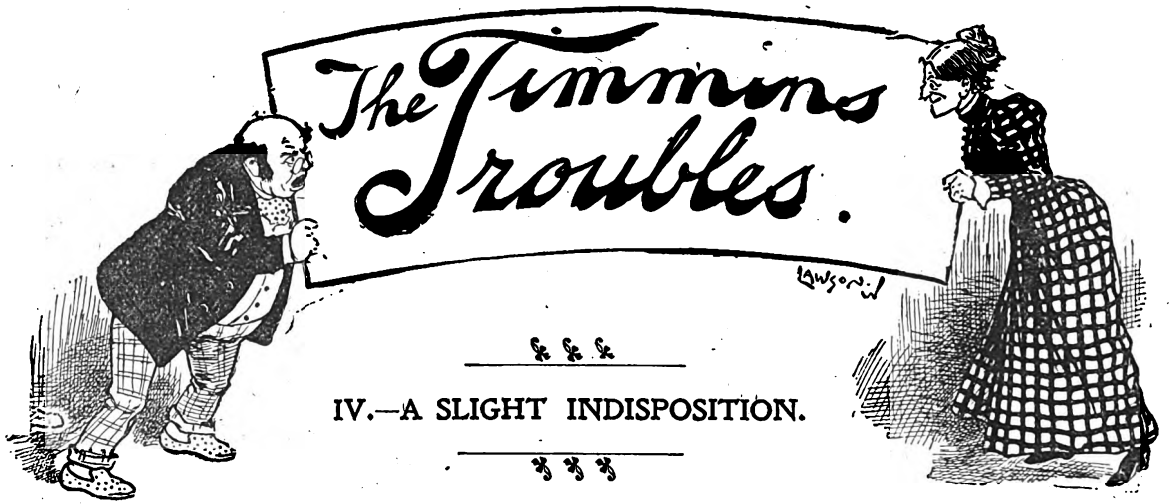
Miss R. Const, 101 Victoria Buildings, Clerkenwell Road, E.C.

R. Groves, 3 Market Place, Waltham Abbey, Essex.

The unclaimed sovereigns were addressed to:

James Dixon, Hebburn Villa, Hebburn-on-Tyne; Mrs. Dalton, Palace Road, Ripon; Miss Anthony, 19 Caloy Place, Otley, Leeds; J. Cartwright, 13 Toon Street, Buxton; W. Griffiths, Wharf Street, Ellesmere, Shropshire; W. Phillips, 5 East Cross Street, Sunderland; J. H. Porter, Army Ordnance Corps, Ordnance Office, Harwich; R. Pugh, 14 King Street, Oswestry; E. Peake, 8 Bond Street, Swansea; C. Croeskill, 7 Oxford Street, Wellingborough; Miss Morice, 17 Edith Road, West Kensington; J. E. Hehir, 149 Upper Lewes Road, Brighton; F. Roberts, 8 Crickerfield Road, Clapton, N.E.; J. K. Engall, 1 Springfield Lodge, Springfield Road, Guildford; E. Beach, 3 Newchapel Road, Perry Hill, Catford; E. Jay, 12 Clwyd Street, New Brighton, Cheshire; W. J. Nagle, 17 North Street, Skibbereen, Ireland; S. Vincent, 19 Parthenia Road, Fulham, S.W.; A. Harris, 5 Frederick Street, Martin Street, Stratford; George Amos, Dovesford, Jedburgh, N.B.; J. Easton, 7 Bath Terrace, Blyth, Northumberland; A. B. Thomas, 1 Eaton Place, Llandaff; A. Smith, 51 Borton Road, Chorley, Lancs.; Mrs. Gear, 8 Woodstock Terrace, Ilfracombe; Miss Deane, Garden Cottage, Fingest, Henley-on-Thames; Charles Ibbot, Goldington, Bedford; Mrs. Cameron, Cairngower, Crieff, N.B.; T. Sale, 14 West Street, Hackney, N.E.; Charles Young, Rollesby, Yarmouth; John Mower, Little Cornard, Sudbury, Suffolk; George Douglas, 174 High Street, Margate; W. Treby, 51 Lawrence Road, Southsea; O. Pemberton, Myrtle Cottage, Desborough, Sussex; Miss Dodd, 8 Eaton Road, West Kirby, Cheshire; H. Neale, Railway Inn, Church Street, Bromyard, Herefordshire; W. Fevin, St. Cleers, Somerton, Somerset; John Fowler, Aston, Avonmouth, Gloucestershire; J. Wilson, Dalston Road, Commersdale, Carlisle; Mrs. Parker, Walton Cottage, Chapel Hill, Ambleside; F. Orange, 104 Front Street, Arnold, Notts; A. Green, 38 Derby Road, Hinckley, Leicester; F. Joyce, Cromwell Place, St. Ives; W. G. Leigh, Bridge Street, Peterborough; J. Wells, 37 North Street, Hornsastle; J. Tailby, Mill Street, Sutton Coldfield; Mrs. Kemp, High Street, Pershore; Miss Faulkner, George Street, Oxford; W. Kent, Tronance Farm, Newquay, Cornwall.

Digitized by Google



IV.—A SLIGHT INDISPOSITION.

"THAT'S better," groaned Mr. Timmins, as his wife arranged the cool pillows under his head. "Now I can die looking out upon the trees and the sky," and Mr. Timmins assumed a resigned expression of visage, and gazed out of the corner of his one eye upon a bare tree and half a dozen telegraph wires.

"Oh, you won't die," said Mrs. Timmins cheerfully. "You're only a little ill, and you'll get over it."

"That's all you know about it," snarled Mr. Timmins. "To hear you talk, one would think you only had to be fitted up with little beds and a smell of liniment to be a hospital. I'm very ill, I tell you, and I don't want any nonsense about it."

"Well, well," cooed Mrs. Timmins, "don't excite yourself. Keep quiet and you'll get well."

"Much you'd care!" muttered Mr. Timmins turning on his side and resting his cheek on his hand, an attitude generally assumed by martyred spirits on the approach of dissolution.

"Will you take your drops again, dear?" asked Mrs. Timmins. "It's time for them."

"No, I won't. They're nasty. I haven't had anything but drops for a week. From the way you administer drops one would think you were the trap-door of a hanging machine. Give me some figs."

"But there are no figs, dear. I'll go and get you some," said Mrs. Timmins.

"That's it," growled her husband. "You only want an excuse to leave me to die alone. Why haven't you got some figs? You might know I'd want figs. Have you got any prunes?"

"No, I haven't any prunes, but I won't be more than a minute away, and I'll get you any fruit you want."

"Oh, yes. You'd get it, I've no doubt. What you want is a railing round you and a gate off the hinges to be an orchard. Fetch me some strawberries."

"Why, strawberries are out of season! There are none in the market."

"I supposed you'd say that," moaned Mr. Timmins. "You've always got some excuse. If I should die you'd have an apology ready. Give me something to take this taste out of my mouth."

"What would you like, dear?" asked Mrs. Timmins.

"Soap, hang it all! give me soap, if you can't think of anything else," demanded Mr. Timmins. "May be you haven't got any soap. At least, you wouldn't have if I wanted it. Have you got any cherries?"

"No. They are out of season, too. There are some grapes in the cupboard."

"I don't want any grapes. If I can't have what I want I don't want it. Where are those drops? Why don't you give me my medicine? Are you going to let me die for want of a little attention? You want the life insurance, don't you?"

Mrs. Timmins ladled out the dose, half of which went down Mr. Timmins' gullet, and half over the front of his nightshirt.

"That's it," he howled. "Spill 'em. They're for external application, Put 'em anywhere. Pour 'em up the chimney," and Mr. Timmins hurled the spoon across the room.

"Have a piece of orange to take the taste away?" asked Mrs. Timmins pleasantly.

"No, I won't," objected her spouse. "Give me a piece of melon."

"I don't believe they have melons in December," sighed Mrs. Timmins.

"Of course they don't," reasoned Mr. Timmins. "They don't have anything when I'm ill. It's a wonder they have houses. It's a miracle that they have beds. I'm astounded to think they have doctors and chemists' shops. I've got to hurry up and die, or they won't have any undertakers, or coffins, or graves. Give me a piece of orange, will you? D'you suppose I'm going to lie here and live on the taste of those drops for a month?"

"You'd like these grapes," suggested his wife.

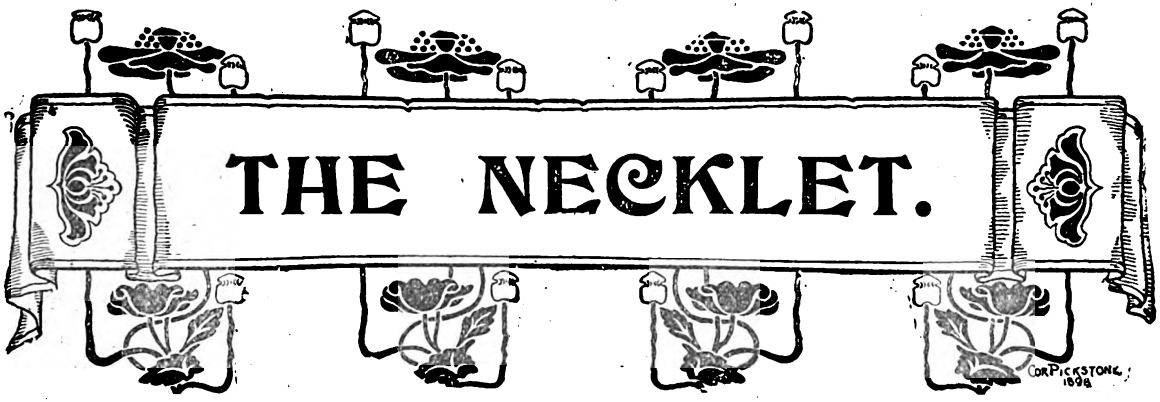
"No, I wouldn't either. What do you want me to eat 'em for? Have you got any interest in the grape trade? Who's paid you to make me eat them? One would think you only wanted a porch and four boys climbing over you to be a grape vine. Where's my pill?"

"You took your pill, dear," replied his patient wife.

"Oh, of course! A pill is out of season now. I can't even have a pill when I feel like it;" and Mr. Timmins groaned in spirit and looked dismal. "Now sit down and don't move. I want to sleep. Don't you make a bit of noise if you want me to live."

And Mrs. Timmins held her breath and never rustled a feather, while her husband lay and glared out of the window for an hour and a half.

THE NECKLET.



"WHAT right have you to accept a present from him?"

"Right!"

The girl's eyes flashed angrily as she arose from her recumbent attitude by the side of the old fishing boat and looked haughtily down upon the young fellow who uttered the words.

She was a pretty girl of nineteen. She was not handsome, but just pretty, and she knew it. As she stood defiantly before him—for he also had risen to his feet, slowly—with her flushed face, her white teeth just visible between her rosy lips, and her well-formed figure drawn to the full of its limited height of five feet, the pang of bitterness in Dick Burrell's heart was at first subdued by his admiration and then returned with double force. Jenny Raynes, whom he loved so passionately, was slipping away from him.

"Why haven't I a right to take a present from him?" asked Jenny, in the same angry tone and with a slight toss of the head. "Who has any right to stop me?"

"I—" began Dick, but the flash of her eye warned him, and he quickly turned the words. "Everybody knows that you are keeping company with me."

"Everybody knows that you have been trying to make love to me," she retorted, "but I am not bound to you, and I can take any presents I like!"

"He's playing with you, Jenny," Dick said doggedly. "It stands to reason that an artist gentleman don't want you, however pretty you are. You see, Jenny, you're a lot below him, being a servant—though you are as good as any lady. He gave you that gold necklet, and he's going to paint your portrait for some——"

"I won't listen to another word!" exclaimed Jenny Raynes. "You're jealous because you can't afford to give me things—because you are only a fisherman and egg hunter and not a gentleman, like him. I can please myself!"

And with another toss of the pretty head, she turned on her heel and left him.

Dick watched her until she had disappeared; then, with a heavy heart, he wended his way towards the town in another direction. He entered an inn where he was wont to take his daily half-pint, called for the drink and buried himself in a corner of the parlour to give himself up to bitter reflections.

He loved Jenny, but she was a wayward lassie and her head was turned by flattery. He had no tongue for polite compliments such as the gentry knew how to utter, but he loved her with deep affection and would have given his life to benefit her. His mother had told him that she would not make a fitting wife for him; she was too "flighty" and would never be a steady, contented woman until she had been sobered by some great trouble, so ran his mother's opinion. But Dick could not control the dictates of his heart and he—yes, he loved her. How would it——

"Hallo, Dick! You're the very man I am looking for."

Dick started as his reverie was thus broken. He looked up slowly, like a man returning to consciousness, and beheld the well-known form of Sergeant Samuel Silkins, of the West Police.

Silkins was a character in his way, and had several peculiarities. One of these was his fondness for alliteration in names; he had three children, each of whom had three names (including the surname) and all the names began with S. The eldest was Sophia Selina, the second was Susan Sarah, and the third, a boy and the hope of his heart, was Steven Scipio. The officer had always regretted that he himself had only two names, but on attaining the rank of sergeant he had become reconciled to the deficiency, since he could make up the three S's in that way. It is scarcely necessary to add that Silkins was an important personage in the town; but it may be well to mention it, so that you may treat him with due deference when you chance to visit Dexham.

"I think you can be of service to Her Majesty's Government, Dick," continued the Sergeant, dropping into a chair. "What's the matter with you, man?" he asked, as Dick remained silent.

"Nothing in particular," replied Burrell, rousing himself. "What do you want me to do, Sergeant?"

"I want you to look a little less like a funeral, for one thing," said Silkins. "Your mug's empty! Have another—it won't hurt you, man, and I'll pay for it."

When the ale had been brought in, Silkins cautiously closed the door and spoke in a low tone.

"We have been informed," he began in an impressive manner, "that a notorious individual has slipped away from London, and is probably somewhere along the coast in this direction. We have to keep our eyes open and report if we see anyone suspicious."

He leant back in his chair and glanced at Burrell.

"Well?" queried the latter indifferently.

"Now, I have my suspicions about that artist chap who has been here for the last three weeks. Been paying attention to Jenny Raynes, so I'm told. (Ah! That's woke him up!) Do you know what he is doing here?"

"No," replied Dick, with a little more animation. "What do you want me to do?"

"Now you're talking sensibly," remarked Silkins. "The long and the short of it is this: we want to know what he is up to, and I thought you could keep your eye on him or get the information from someone."

"She don't know any more about him than you do," said Burrell, who at once grasped the meaning of Silkins' words. "She's lost her head because a man in fine clothes has spoken to her and"—he was going to say "given her a necklet," but he stopped.

"Oh!" said Silkins in a disappointed voice. "Then you can't help me?"

"I can keep a look-out, but I can't do any more," returned Dick. "Of course, if I see anything wrong I'll tell you."

The Sergeant tried in various ways to make Burrell take a more lively interest in the matter, using the words "Her Majesty's Government," in every other sentence, but without success.

They left the inn together and Silkins, finding that Dick was not particular whither he went, artfully walked with him, chatting on other subjects and guiding him away from his home towards a quieter part of Dexham. As they walked along an idea came to Silkins, a recollection which made him say hard things to himself for not having remembered it before.

"You ought to have been a detective, Dick; you'd stand more chance with a girl like Jenny if you had a year or so in the force and worked yourself up to be a plain clothes man. It smartens a man up so, you know. But, bless me! You did do a little in that line about a year ago, didn't you?"

"I put the police on the track of a gang of swindlers while I was in London for a couple of months. It's about a year ago," returned Burrell.

"Put them on the track!" exclaimed Silkins, drawing on his imagination. "Why I was told—from headquarters, you know—that it was really through you that they were nabbed! It broke up the Langley gang, for they were all sent to penal servitude except one, who nearly murdered the detective and was never caught. Why, you are the very man to help me, and I can't understand why you persist in saying you won't. You'd get all the credit."

Burrell was tired of the subject. He did not know whether to be pleased or vexed. He wanted to get rid of Silkins.

"Very well," he said wearily, "I'll do my best for you, and see if I can discover this fellow's little game. Now I must be off, Sergeant."

And although Silkins tried to detain him, Burrell shook hands with the great man and left him.

The two men went their ways unconscious of the fact that the latter portion of their conversation had been overheard. Neither had noticed that a man had been crouching near them under a low shed, his concealment having been assisted by the gathering gloom. He emerged into the open and gazed at the retreating figure of Dick Burrell.

"Listeners never hear any good of themselves, they say, and it is probably true," he muttered with an evil expression on his not unattractive features, "but they often hear something that is good for them to know. It is rather lucky that I dodged down when I saw them coming. I didn't want them to see me just here, but I certainly did not think of 'hearing something to my advantage,' as the legal advertisements say. H'm, so it was you, my young fisherman, eh? Very good!"

It was two days later when Dick Burrell went on his next egg-hunting expedition. On the previous afternoon he had seen Jenny and found her less inclined than ever to listen to him; he had left her with the remark that he was going egg-hunting over the Boverhyde Cliff on the following morning, and did not care if the rope broke and dropped him on the rocks below. At which she had laughed scornfully.

Dick thought of this laugh as he hung over the high cliff, sitting in the noose of his rope. At that moment he was suspended about twelve yards down the side of the cliff, steadying himself by placing his feet against it, while with both hands he was feeling in a hole for eggs. As the thought came to him, he stopped in his work and glanced at the rocks below. He could not repress a shudder at the idea of falling that distance on the jagged points rising from the sea.

"It would be a pleasant drop, eh?"

The air was still; there was scarcely a breath of wind; and the words came distinctly to his ear.

He turned his eyes upwards to the summit and saw the artist—his rival—standing by the stout bough to which he had attached his rope. A thrill of fear passed through Burrell's frame at the expression on the man's countenance; he felt instinctively that the intruder meant mischief.

"I am glad you told Jenny that you were coming here," continued Clarke, (that was the name he had given in Dexham). "It gave me the opportunity of having a little talk with you without fear of interruption. Don't attempt to climb up," he added warningly, "or I will cut the rope."

Suiting the action to the word, he drew out a pocket knife and laid the edge of the blade against the line.

"You——"

"Tut, tut!" Clarke broke in. "You will not help yourself by calling me names. Listen to what I have to say.

"I have a big score and two small ones to pay off, Mr. Richard Burrell; and, by the Lord Harry! I'm going to wipe the slate clean! Do you hear?"

"You coward!" cried Dick scornfully. "Let me come up, and fight it out with me like a man!"

The other smiled sardonically.

"And miss the sport? No! You are in league with that thick-headed policeman to spoil my game here; that is little score No. 1. You are trying to make Jenny throw me over; that's No. 2. Pretty girl isn't she? Sorry to disappoint you, but I require the little fool's assistance for the job I have on hand. But the big score is the one I am most anxious to pay off. So it was you who gave us away in London? I was one of the 'Langley gang,' and I had to nearly kill a man to escape. I swore that I would have revenge if I ever met you again. I can't imagine how it was that I didn't recognise you. But your appearance is different in those clothes, and I never heard your full name down here till two days ago."

Clarke tried the edge of the knife-blade on his thumb and continued:

"I am not of a forgiving disposition. I am going to send you to—well, I don't trouble much about such matters, so I'll leave you to imagine to which place you will go. But I intend to have a little sport.

"This rope has five strands apparently. I shall cut one strand at a time. You have about five minutes to pray before you go down below on the rocks. I must say that they do not look very tempting, but we cannot always pick and choose. I was obliged to take my lot as it came to me through you; the tables are now turned."

Digitized by Google

"I did my duty as it was shown to me by accident," replied Dick. He was pale, but he spoke quietly and evinced no sign of fear. If his last minutes had come, he would meet his death bravely, however terrible it might be. "Was it my fault that you were one of the evil-doers? I knew nothing of you."

"You know something about me now," said Clarke. "I owe it to you that I have to hide from justice, and now you are on my track again. I am on a job that will make me for life, and I don't intend to be foiled. It's very little I'll stop at; especially when I can have revenge at the same time! But we have wasted enough time; there goes one strand, so make a beginning with your prayers."

As he spoke the villain deliberately cut through one strand of the line upon which Dick's life depended.

Without moving his head, Dick turned his eyes along the face of the cliff in a vain endeavour to find some chance of escape. The ledge or hole in which he had been feeling was the only place to which he could clutch, but of what avail would that be? He could not hang there for more than a few minutes, even if he succeeded in clutching it before Clarke prevented him; for it was nearly three feet beyond his reach, and to get his hands on it he had to work himself along sideways with his feet. He had allowed himself to swing away from it when Clarke appeared. Clarke would certainly frustrate any such attempt by cutting the rope through at once.

"Two!" exclaimed the murderous rascal as he again made use of his knife. "I hope you are making good use of your time."

Dick seemed to feel the strand go, and a pang went through his heart. Was there no escape? Must he die like this? Again his eyes wandered over the face of the cliff, only to receive confirmation of the utter helplessness of his position.

"Three! Have you any message for Jenny? I shall be pleased to deliver your last dying wish, provided it is a proper one."

"You villain!" burst from Burrell's lips. The exclamation was wrung from him by the heartlessness of his murderer and by the thought of Jenny. He would willingly have died to benefit her, but his death at this time meant the loss of the only one who would take any interest in her well-being.

Clarke saw the agony in the upturned face and gloated over it.

"Four!"

He was hanging now by one strand. His mind was in a whirl; he could think of nothing. He was conscious that Clarke was speaking; he could not distinguish the words, but he perceived that he was being taunted. Then he distinctly heard the word:

"Five!"

Dick Burrell shut his eyes with an agonised groan and the name of Jenny on his lips. Down, down, down! Would it never end? Would he be dashed to a shapeless mass, or would Heaven miraculously save him to defeat the villainy of that man? These thoughts flashed through his brain, he knew not how. Then it seemed to him that he was not falling, that he heard voices above.

He opened his eyes and slowly raised them. Yes, he was still suspended by the rope and there were voices above. Some struggle was taking place. If he could climb the rope! Would it bear the strain?

In the meantime, what had occurred at the top of the cliff?

Jenny, impelled by some feeling which she could not define, had contrived to slip out and had made her way to the Boverhyde Cliff to see Dick. As she approached the spot where she expected to find her lover, she was surprised to see the form of Clarke bending over the cliff, supporting himself by clasping the bough with his left arm. Not suspecting anything wrong, she had walked up to the spot; her light steps made scarcely any noise, and Clarke was too engrossed to notice them.

She reached him just as he cut the fourth strand. She heard his taunting remarks. She was too horrified to act at once, and stood as if chained to the ground. The word "Five!" and the gleam of the blade in the sunlight aroused her to a knowledge of the situation; with a cry of horror and indignation she sprang forward and dragged his arm back with all her strength, which was increased for the time by her desperation.

Taken by surprise, Clarke was dragged right round and stumbled. When he saw who it was, he was nonplussed for a second; then he rushed at her with an oath and they struggled together on the turf. This was the sound that met Dick's ears.

Clarke dragged her to the edge; his face was convulsed with passion, and Jenny felt he would have no mercy Nearer and nearer. In her despair she mustered. strength enough to wrench her right hand free and threw it around the trunk. At that moment—she never knew how it happened—he stumbled, released her left arm in a frantic effort to save himself, and disappeared over the edge of the cliff.

Dick, looking up, saw the body rush past him and shuddered. He saw Jenny's agonised face as she bent over the edge and told him he was safe.

He began to climb up the rope, hand over hand, but he felt that it would not bear the strain. A few inches at a time he went up, his heart beating quickly, while Jenny watched him in suspense. The remaining strand was giving; it would not hold his weight long. If he sat still, he would soon be dashed to the rocks below; on the other hand he might succeed in reaching the top in time if he climbed carefully. It was an awful time of suspense, but Dick felt that he would not bear the strain long enough. He shouted to her, asking her to tie something round the rope under the cut so as to relieve the strain. He saw her look round helplessly for a second, then she hastily undid the chain from her neck, tied one end as he had suggested, and held it taut with her disengaged hand.

It was a delicate thing to look at, but it was good and strong, and it served the purpose. Dick climbed up cautiously until his hands were level with the turf, then he abandoned the rope and scrambled up with the assistance of Jenny.

Who can describe the joy of that meeting?

The affair caused a great sensation in Dexham. The excitement lasted more than the nine days, but it wore off gradually. The event was brought back to the minds of the inhabitants some weeks later by the marriage of Dick and Jenny and their departure for London, where the former had obtained a better situation.

And the necklet? Dick wanted to keep it, but, in spite of the part it had played in saving her lover, the sight of it was distasteful to Jenny. It was therefore decided to give it to some fund for the benefit of our fisher folk.

GEO. DAY.

Digitized by Google

PEARSON'S 100 BEST BOOKS.

100 BEST BOOKS.

FIRST FIFTY VOLUMES. No. 1.

1. Bacon's Essays.
2. Pope's Iliad of Homer.
3. Pope's Odyssey of Homer.
4. Shakespeare's Complete Works.
5. Spenser's Faery Queen.
6. AEsop's Fables.
7-10. Gibbon's Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire. 4 vols.
11. Arabian Night's (The) Entertainments.
12-15. Plutarch's Lives (2 Grecian). " " (2 Roman).
16. Horace, the Works of.
17. Dante, the Vision of.
18. Milton's (John) Poetical Works.
19. Pepys' Diary. 1659-1669.
20. Grimm's Fairy Tales.
21. Don Quixote de la Mancha, Adventures of.
22. The Ingoldsby Legends.
23. Gems of National Poetry.
24. Keble's Christian Year.
25-28. Half-hours with the Best Authors. 4 vols.
29. Uncle Tom's Cabin.
30. Waverley.
31. Rienzi, the Last of the Tribunes.
32. White's Natural History of Selborne.
33. Robinson Crusoe.
34. Poe (E. A.)
35. On Honour's Roll.
36. Goethe's Faust.
37. Jack Hinton.
38. Cowper's (William) Poetical Works.
39. Goldsmith (Oliver).
40. The Scottish Chiefs.
41. Ben-Hur (A Tale of the Christ).
42. The Koran—The Alkoran of Mohammed.
43. Dryden's Poetical Works.
44. England: Its Constitutional History, and THE CONSTITUTION OF ENGLAND.
45-47. Disraeli's (Isaac) Curiosities of Literature. 3 vols.
48. Byron's (Lord) Poetical Works.
49. Mary Barton.
50. The Last of the Mohicans.

SECOND FIFTY VOLUMES. No. 2.

51. Longfellow's (Henry W.) Poetical Works.
52. Moore's (Thomas) Poetical Works.
53. Schiller's Poems and Ballads.
54-56. The Rise of the Dutch Republic. 3 vols.
57. Southey's Life of Wesley.
58. Wordsworth's (William) Poetical Works.
59-60. Twice-told Tales. 2 vols.
61. Gil Blas, The Adventures of.
62. The Talmud (Selections from).
63. Virgil (Dryden's).
64-67. Half-hours of English History. 4 vols.
68. Harry Lorrequer.
69. Baron Munchausen (The Travels and Surprising Adventures of).
70. Lamb's Tales from Shakespeare.
71. Tales of Colonial Adventure.
72. Hood's (Thomas) Poetical Works.
73. Andersen's (Hans) Fairy Tales.
74. Romance of History.—England.
75. Romance of History.—France.
76. Romance of History.—India.
77. Heber's (Bishop) Poetical Works.
78. Jane Eyre.
79. Shelley's (Percy Bysshe) Poetical Works.
80. Johnson's Lives of the Poets.
81. Eastern Tales and Tales of the Genii.
82. Southey's Life of Nelson.
83-84. The Romance of London. 2 vols.
85. Lamb's (Charles) Poems and Essays of Elia.
86. Willmott's Poets of the Nineteenth Century.
87-92. Napier's Peninsula War. 6 vols.
93. Night and Morning.
94. Sea Fights and Land Battles.
95. Whittier's (J. G.) Poetical Works.
96. Scott's (Sir Walter) Poetical Works.
97. Rory O'More.
98. Keat's (John) Poetical Works.
99. The Spectator.
100. Burn's (Robert) Poetical Works.

Twenty Extra Volumes.

1. David Copperfield.
2. The Count of Monte Cristo.
3. Ivanhoe.
4. The Three Musketeers.
5. Twenty Years After.
6. Westward Ho!
7. Walton and Cotton's Angler.
8. Evelyn's Diary, 1641—1705-6.
9. Roscoe's Italian Novelists.
10. " German Novelists.
11. " Spanish Novelists. (Choice stories and selections from the great novelists of these countries.)
12. Christian Lyrics. (Sacred Poetry.) 200 Illustrations.
13. Mrs. E. B. Browning's Poetical Works.
14. Hazlitt (William) Essayist and Critic.
15. Gibbon's Life and Letters.
16. Ernest Maltravers.
17. Pope's (Alexander) Poetical Works.
18. J. R. Lowell's Poetical Works.
19. Shirley.
20. Men who have made the Empire.

120 VOLUMES to select from.

EACH VOLUME IS complete as the author wrote it.

THE ENTIRE LIBRARY of 100 volumes contains about 60,000 pages of reading, and many hundreds of illustrations, maps, plans, etc.

TEN SHILLINGS secures immediate delivery of the entire library, the balance payable in easy monthly amounts.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS says: "How many of us wish that when we were boys we had been thrown among one hundred books of this kind! We might have read only fifty of them, but what a delight those fifty would have been! Even to-day one thinks with pleasure of the many households throughout England which will, within a year or so, contain a certain number of books that it is always a joy to pick up."

A MEMBER OF THE QUEEN'S HOUSEHOLD, who wishes to remain anonymous, writes: "I consider your scheme to be the most important and far-reaching literary enterprise ever undertaken in this country."

A MEMBER OF PARLIAMENT writes: "In the years to come the young man of to-day will be writing his autobiography, and he will look backward and say: 'I made success, I made fortune, I made fame, because I bought and read your hundred

MONTHLY PAYMENT ORDER FORM FOR 100 BOOKS.

Date.....

Please send me the hundred books as marked by me, carriage paid. I enclose 10s., and agree to make my next payment of 20s. when I receive the hundred volumes, and my succeeding six payments of 20s. on the corresponding day of each month following. Until I have paid you the whole £7 10s. I engage that the volumes, not being my absolute property, shall not be disposed of by sale or otherwise.

Signed .....

Address.....

.....

MONTHLY PAYMENT ORDER FORM FOR 50 BOOKS.

List No. ..... Date.....

Please send me the fifty books as marked by me, carriage paid. I enclose 10s., and agree to make my next payment of 10s. when I receive the fifty volumes, and my succeeding six payments of 10s. on the corresponding day of each month following. Until I have paid you the whole £4 I engage that the books, not being my absolute property, shall not be disposed of by sale or otherwise.

Signed .....

Address.....

.....

ALL COMMUNICATIONS TO BE MADE TO "BEST BOOKS DEPARTMENT,"

Digitized by Google

The - Final - War.

BY LOUIS TRACY.

CHAPTER XLV. (continued).

THEY were now passing along the large public square in the centre of the city. The dense throng on either side their path pressed disorderly upon them and progress became slow and difficult. The intermittent growling that rumbled through the spectators reached the Tsar's ears and he spurred his horse on in anger.

At the same time the guards rode forward on either side to keep off the press, and beat the people back with their sabres. At this act of wanton cruelty a hoarse roar went up mingled with hisses and shouts of disloyalty. The spirit of the citizens, too long repressed, sought a vent, and in a moment a sullen crowd threatened to become a dangerous mob.

"Down with the Tsar!" suddenly cried someone who was standing in the front line. It was like a spark setting gunpowder ablaze. Curses and cries of hatred beset the royal ears. The people of Moscow had spoken at last.

The Tsar reined in his horse. Gourko placed his hand upon his sovereign's arm, but it was roughly shaken off.

Turning round, the Tsar beckoned towards him Pochowski, who still acted as captain of the royal guard. And this in no treacherous spirit. The Nihilist leaders feared the extremities to which fury might drive their fanatical armies. The Tsar, at least, must be safe-guarded from their violence.

Pale with rage Nicholas pointed to the clamorous bystanders.

"Captain!" he commanded. "Fire on this rabble."

Pochowski started and changed colour.

"Your Majesty——" he commenced.

"What, sir! Do you attempt to argue?" shouted the Tsar.

"But, sire," stammered the confused officer. "I dare not fire, for your Majesty's sake. Such an act would excite them to a riot. Your life would be endangered."

"You dare to disobey me?" cried Alexander. "You may consider yourself under arrest. Slivinski," he went on, turning to the officer next in command, "I place you in authority. Do my bidding."

Slivinski coloured and hesitated.

"I agree with Captain Pochowski," he faltered.

"Enough," cried the enraged sovereign. "I have no longer even a faithful bodyguard, then! Silence, sir!" he exclaimed, as he saw Slivinski was about to make some deprecatory explanation. "You have chosen your time well. Gourko, let us get on to the Palace."

So saying, the two dashed off rapidly in the direction of the Kremlim, the crowd parting to let them pass. Slowly and ashamed the Royal Guard halted, with the two disgraced officers at their head.

Within a few minutes the news of this outburst flew through the streets like wildfire, and the most violent excitement prevailed. A rush was made to the great square, and here the dense crowd swayed and seethed with the passion of turbulent fury. Moscow, runs the saying, is a kitten when it is at play, but a tiger when it is aroused. And now the great city abandoned itself to all the tempestuous fury of ungovernable revolt. There was no longer any attempt at concealment. From every nook and cranny crept forth the hunted Nihilist, the terrible minister of destruction, pest and patriot, the reformer aflame with generous purpose, and the vile assassin athirst for blood. All that was good and all that was bad blended in this surging multitude of men.

Pochowski saw it and trembled. It was becoming a tempest that he could not direct. To what terrible lengths might not this passionate community proceed, if once it abandoned itself to its fury? The revolution he aimed at might become nothing less that a new Reign of Terror, a tornado of destruction and unbridled license. It would make the patriot's deed accursed.

He flung himself among the uncarious people. He appealed to them to remain orderly.

"Men of Russia," he said passionately, "we must be united or we shall lose all. Our brothers without are completing the great plan; let us hear from them first. It becomes us to see that no stain rests upon our noble work. We get our victory twice over if we get it without bloodshed. All is well so far. Moscow is true to the cause, and it is due to her that she should set an example of dignity and self-control to the rest of the empire."

His words, heard by but a few amid the deafening roar, were little heeded. Some temperate citizens attempted to aid him in calming the passions of the constantly increasing multitude, but it was a task quite beyond their power.

"Shall we be idle whilst our brethren are at work?" cried one of the orators, who were by this time haranguing the crowds in every direction. "We have the fox safe in our power, and shall we let him escape?"

"Down with the Tsar," cried a thousand voices, as the speaker stretched out his hand to the ancient palace of the Muscovite kings, and a great roar of assent went up.

The passions of the people were inflamed to a still more violent pitch by a small body of the royal troops, who, hearing these cries of disloyalty, and fearing for their master, had issued from the Kremlin and charged into the vast crowd with the mad hope of dispersing them. With a howl of rage, the people flung themselves fiercely upon their assailants.

The latter though armed, could do nothing against this resistless torrent of humanity, who, in frightful earnestness, beset the little company of soldiers, tearing the men from their horses attacking them with every weapon that lay to their hand, and splitting them up into sundered atoms, which were entirely at the mercy of a merciless and howling multitude.

Pochowski saw these things and shuddered. The wild beast was already loose. He looked anxiously at his watch.

Already three hours had passed by, and there was no news.

But what would happen when it did come? Moscow was a mad dog. Success would only goad her into new violence and unutterable outrage.

He gave a few hurried directions to the soldiers in attendance on him, and dashed off to the scene of this sickening conflict. As he did so, he perceived a single horseman making off along the square, evidently in the direction of the Tverskaga Zastava.

"A royal messenger!" he exclaimed. "The Tsar must have had news. Is it well or ill?"

His question was destined to be speedily answered.

The crowd also seeing the orderly, who was evidently seeking to evade notice, suddenly turned upon him with a shout.

"He bears dispatches!" shouted someone, and in a second he was dragged off his horse, and held violently struggling on the ground.

A dozen hands searched him—nor vainly. A sealed packet snatched from his tunic, was held triumphantly aloft amid screams of exultation.

"Read it aloud," came the shout. "Mount the pedestal. Let us hear what he is doing to destroy us."

In obedience, the fortunate citizen thus raised to distinction got upon the base of the Miniv Monument, and tore open the dispatch. As he read it, the joy that illumined his face betrayed the character of the news.

A sealed packet . . . . . was held triumphantly aloft.

"Friends," he shouted, "Russia once more is free. St. Petersburg has fallen. This morning she is in the hands of the Nihilists. The flag of the Republic waves from the Winter Palace. The reign of the Romanoffs is over."

He would have proceeded, but his voice was drowned in the vociferous shouting that beat through the Red Square like the thunder of the waves upon the sea. There was no restraint now. St. Petersburg was calling upon Moscow, and Moscow would not be found wanting.

Riot ran wanton through the streets. With the rough reason that animates a multitude when success welds its strange fragments into the semblance of unity, it split itself into several divisions and made for the different gates of the city, fearful that an attempt to escape might be made by the Royal party. A rush was made to the entrance of the Kremlin, but the huge fortress palace defied such amateur bombardment, and Pochowski only smiled grimly when he saw the dissipation of energy which, after all, might but prove the Tsar's salvation.

His own little troop of soldiers he dispatched to take observations, and keep him informed of what went on whilst he dashed off past the Church of St. Basil in the direction of the Red Gate.

As he swept round the great cathedral, a young officer met him and saluted.

"Ah, Prenskovitch," he exclaimed, "You bring news."

"Yes," answered the lieutenant. "You have heard that St. Petersburg is in our hands?"

"What else?" asked Pochowski anxiously.

"The British and United States fleets are in the Neva. The forts are already being bombarded."

Pochowski paused, clearly troubled by the intelligence.

"There will be no landing for the present, I suppose?" he asked.

"I think not," was the reply. "The forts are holding out and are well garrisoned. News has also come that the British are engaging us to-day at Kharkof. It is mere rumour, but I fancy that it is true. Perchance the battle is now over."

"If so," said Pochowski reflectively, "the fate of Russia will be decided. There will not be a second battle. Meanwhile, what of the Tsar. I presume you learnt this within?"

"Yes, captain," replied Prenskovitch. "The Kremlin is put in readiness for a siege. The Tsar and his family are in council in St. George's Hall. His advisers are with him, and also the Generals who have remained on his staff."

"The Romanoffs are at their last council!" said Pochowski bitterly. "Do you know to what conclusion they have come?"

"The Tsar awaits the issue of the day at Kharkof," replied Prenskovitch. "He intends to collect an army to invest St. Petersburg. For the present he will wait events in the south."

Pochowski smiled grimly and pointed to the cathedral. From one of its minarets waved a flag of quite new design. It was the white and red banner of the revolution.

"It is well he waits," he said. "The empire is already departed. Let us salute the youngest of republics!" And the stern agitator, with real emotion, raised his sword in military fashion in salutation of the fluttering silk.

Dismissing Prenskovitch, Pochowski rode on to the Red Gate. On his way he saw signs of the energy and determination of the people of Moscow. The whole town was in their possession. Here and there a small knot of soldiers had endeavoured to make a stand, but they had been ruthlessly cut down by the infuriated mob. From most of the public buildings flew the flag of the revolution, in all kinds of material, shape, and tint, as eager hands had contrived it. Evening had approached, and the city had become calm, for there was no longer any resistance to this new and terrible power that stirred fiercely within the breast of the great Russian people.

Yes, Russia was at last free.

Pochowski, as he rode along, felt his heart glow with the consciousness of the great, the noble, task he had that day completed.

His country had wrested itself from the tyrant's grasp with scarce an effort; nay, more than this, the path of the revolution was almost unstained by blood.

These dark, cruel forces he feared so much, the fierce spirits whose cunning brutality had made his cause so hated by those who did not understand it, had made no definite movement. The Tsar was safe in his royal palace—in honourable durance—and the republic would burst upon the world in all the glory of unsullied innocence.

Pochowski might well rejoice, for his life's mission was consummated. He was close to the Red Gate when his eye fell upon the figure of a man creeping cautiously along in the shadows, as if anxious to escape observation. Something in his appearance and manner caused Pochowski's heart to throb with a strange sensation of terror and foreboding, for he recognised in him one of the daring leaders of that most desperate band, the Nihilists of Moscow, whose sleepless hatred of authority had invented a thousand deeds of outrage to sully almost beyond redemption the cause of liberty in Russia.

He . . . . . gripped him by the throat.

Springing from his charger he rushed upon his dread associate, gripped him by the throat and pinned him with his back against the wall.

"There is some devilry afoot," he cried. "Why are you here? Tell me the truth or I will stretch you lifeless where you stand."

The eyes of the stranger cowered before his stern gaze.

"There is nothing. Believe me," he stammered.

"Liar!" shouted Powchowski, tearing a document from an inner pocket of the man's coat.

Digitized by Google

Scorning the shrinking form beside him, he hastily opened the paper and read its contents by the fading light. He started violently, and great beads of perspiration stood upon his brow.

"Merciful Heaven!" he exclaimed, "shall I be in time?" An instant later his horse struck fire from the hard road as he was urged into a headlong gallop.

Dashing through the streets, careless of the straggling groups gathered here and there in animated discussion, with eyes firm set upon the noble outline of that splendid palace of the Tsar which fretted itself in graceful silhouette against the deepening azure of the sky, Pochowski, with a desperate rage in his heart, sped towards the stately gateway which dominates the outer gardens of the Kremlin.

But before he had reached it there came to his ears a dull muttering as of distant thunder, which instantaneously broadened out into a savage crash.

And then, as he gazed horror-stricken, he saw the graceful pinnacle which surmounts the chapel of St. George lurch outwards and fall in reverberating ruin.

This proud triumph of a great architect was now a shapeless mass of débris.

Realising too well the unutterable catastrophe that had occurred, he reeled in the saddle with anguish, and grew faint and sick at heart.

"The fiendish deed is done, then," he groaned. "Russia's grim destiny is too stong for us. Freedom has come, but she has extorted a terrible price!"

At this moment a man darted towards him from the dark shadow of the arch, with eyes aglow in the demoniac gleam of fanatical exultation.

"It is done," he yelled triumphantly, recognising his leader, "the Romanoffs are no more."

"Villain," exclaimed Pochowski, now rendered half mad with impotent fury; "you have slain our cause and you shall perish with it."

Drawing his sword he hacked at the murderer like a maniac, and not satisfied with the first two terrible blows, he leapt to the ground and did not desist until he had mangled the body beyond recognition.

And thus was Russia re-born.

CHAPTER XLVI.

A SORTIE FROM PARIS.

ADHERING inflexibly to his plan of operations throughout the campaign, Lord Roberts marched on Paris by both banks of the Seine. The northern advanced by way of Meulan and Triel to Herblay, and the southern concentrated at Poissy.

Sorely were the French tempted to break through their self-imposed restraint and attack him in detail, when the great bend of the Seine—where it sweeps round the heights of St. Achères—imposed a formidable obstacle to complete unity of action between the two forces.

In view of the history of subsequent events, they would undoubtedly have been well advised in risking much upon a series of determined battles in this locality. They must have inflicted great damage upon the invaders and caused considerable delay, even were they unsuccessful in the main issue. Besides, they had always the formidable teinture of fortifications to fall back upon.

But the heart of France was not in this war. Her soldiers were listless and dispirited, her generals fearful of disastrous consequence.

So the counsels of prudence prevailed, and beyond the constitution of comparatively feeble corps of observation, nothing was done to check the British at the one great point in the advance on Paris, where they laid themselves absolutely open to strong assault, without the possibility of either section of the army helping the other.

The result was seen when too late.

When the staid JOURNAL DES DEBATS informed the Government that "forts were all very well, but fighting was better," Lord Roberts was in possession of St. Germain and Argenteuil, with his gigantic force spread over the intervening ten miles of the Seine valley where it bends due south towards Versailles.

At once there was a fierce outbreak of public opinion in Paris. The dancing behind the fortifications so graphically depicted by the GIL BLAS was suspended whilst the merry makers prepared a surprise visit to the Lycée, and the outcome of a savage determination on the part of the authorities to preserve order at all costs, was seen in the shooting of many innocent victims in the streets, and the execution of several too emphatic patriots.

Something, however, had to be done to allay popular feeling. M. Hanotaux was equal to the occasion.

He issued a flowing manifesto in which he wept in printers' ink over the necessity, paramount as it was in the opinion of military experts, that kept the regular troops inactive behind the vast line of defences. At all costs these must be held inviolate and impregnable.

"But," he went on, "Frenchmen, citizens of Paris, it shall not be said that the Government restrained you when panting in your rage, you seek to annihilate the enemy at your gates. It has been decided to form two special sortie columns for immediate service at the front. Citizens desiring to hurl themselves upon the British will give in their names at bureaux constituted in the different quarters, and preparations will be made for an immediate assault on the hostile lines."

There was a perceptible cooling of collective ardour when this official notification was read and digested.

Fewer speeches were made in the cafés, fewer taunts levelled at the Government in the press. Henri Rochefort, in the INTRANSIGEANT, boldly denounced the scheme. He headed the article: "Another Way of Killing Communards," and explained whether they were shot in batches by French soldiers at Père Lachaise, or shot in hundreds by the callous British, the end and aim of the authorities was the same—to get rid of the disaffected.

M. Hanotaux smiled as he read, but went on with the arrangements nevertheless, and civilly offered M. Rochefort the colonelcy of one of the newly raised regiments.

The editor..... lit a cigarette with the Minister's letter.

And the editor of L'INTRANSIGEANT smiled in his turn, lit a cigarette with the Minister's letter, and wrote another article, saying that the fantastic project might, perhaps, result in teaching the authorities some valuable lessons in strategy.

But the more ardent spirits among the populace were not to be repressed. No less than 50,000 names were enrolled for this special service.

They were hastily mobilised, marched outside Paris, and there armed, whilst the supreme command was given to a crackbrained general, whose loud-spoken condemnation of the Council of War had already nearly led to his imprisonment.

To launch these crazy and ill-formed thunderbolts of tin against the victorious troops of England was a mad notion in itself, were it not in strict pursuance of the policy discovered by M. Hanotaux and Rochefort.

But de Bossy, the leader, saw nothing outrageous or ludicrous in the scheme. He was fully persuaded that his cohort of enthusiasts, directed by his genius, was capable of clearing a path through the strong British lines, and he no sooner got within striking distance than he hurried forward to the attack.

This was delivered at a peculiar hour, four o'clock in the afternoon, and was heralded by an unexpected artillery movement by the French, who galloped up to close quarters and shelled the British centre, held by Massy's division, as it happened, before their opponents quite realised what was occurring.

Digitized by Google

Under cover of the momentary confusion thus created, de Bossy brought on his two army corps, divided into ten brigades of five thousand men each, and without paying the slightest regard to reserves or supports, attacked with his whole force along a front extending nearly a mile.

A few minutes after they were first discovered, the leading brigades were close to Massy's outposts; within half-an-hour de Bossy's followers had by sheer weight and uncontrolled audacity forced their way like a gigantic wedge right into the centre of the British position.

Four regiments were cut into ribands in the vain attempt to dam this outrageous torrent of madmen.

Guns were thundered to the front and discharged shrapnel and grape point blank at the assailants, but they scarce had time to limber up and retreat before the ground they had taken was overrun by the now frenzied French.

De Bossy, who seemed to lead a charmed life, rode at the head of the right attack and cheered on his men with a courage and buoyancy of spirit that rendered him almost inspired.

For a little while matters looked very serious indeed.

French staff officers, who watched the progress of events from the neighbouring heights, sent off urgent messages for more guns and prompt assistance by trained troops, and by five o'clock there was every indication of a great struggle commencing, which might last all through the night.

But a check now occurred.

Lord Roberts, who had been taking a rest after an exceptionally busy day, when the heavy firing at the front warned him of some unusual development, hastily summoned his staff and rode forward to get definite information.

This no one could give him. But from the summit of a hill he was able to note the method and manner of the assault, and he quickly made up his mind as to the course to be pursued.

"Tell General Massy," he said to an aide-de-camp, "to attack with every available man, and use the bayonet at the earliest possible moment."

Two others he despatched to Generals Alleyne and Nairn, the one to hurry up his division on the left, and the other to fight every available gun under any conditions.

Turning to Harington, he continued: "You go to Sir Drury Lowe and ask him to charge with 10,000 cavalry on the enemy's left flank within half-an-hour. That is the line of country to be followed by the division," pointing with his sword to an open stretch of meadow land that ran from the British lines and bent towards the French columns. "You had better accompany Sir Drury Lowe and show him the proper direction."

Harington rode two miles in eight minutes, which is good going across country, and found Sir Drury Lowe already busy marshalling his array in anticipation of hasty orders.

There were about 8,000 sabres on parade, but the gallant cavalry commander decided to lose no time in trying what these could effect as a preliminary. Giving instructions for a reserve brigade to be constituted, and brought to his assistance, he set off at a sharp canter, and five minutes before the time allotted by the Commander-in-Chief the British horses were sweeping in splendid style along the level belt of grass selected for their passage.

By this time the tumultuous mob of the enemy had been effectually halted.

The 42nd Highlanders, the Yorkshire Regiment, the Lincolns, the Durham Light Infantry, the 1st and 4th battalions of the 60th, the 3rd battalion of the Rifle Brigade, and many other gallant corps, had flung themselves upon the advancing French, and were now holding them back with the bayonet as a strong swimmer buffets his way against a stream.

Slowly but surely they forged through the struggling mass, whilst the screams of the unfortunate victims who vainly sought to escape, mingled with the exultant yells of their comrades in the rear who pressed on to death in their turn.

The Colonel of the 42nd, mounted upon a magnificent grey horse, encountered de Bossy and struck at him with his claymore in such hearty earnest, that the blow broke the Frenchman's sword raised for the parry.

The noble horse leapt right into the midst of the press.

De Bossy lurched from his charger on the offside and was received on the point of a bayonet, whilst a gruff Argyllshire voice roared at him:

"Ye drivellin' eediot, could ye no fa' like a mon and not like a bag o'meal?"

Which was De Bossy's requiem.

When Sir Drury Lowe's division was within striking distance, he did not hesitate a second in divining the true conditions under which to make his cavalry most effective against the disorderly rabble in front.

"Echelon formation," and "fresh points of attack," were the instructions quickly transmitted to commanding officers and squadron leaders. Then the series of charges commenced.

Liberally interpreting Lord Robert's orders, Harington accompanied Sir Drury Lowe in the first rush, at the head of the 17th Lancers.

Practically no attempt was made by the French to beat off the terrible engine of destruction now levelled at them. Lances were slung and swords drawn as being far more deadly under the circumstances, and forthwith the British horsemen began their awful work as though they were cutting down brushwood. Yet, after the first flinching of the human undergrowth through which they hewed their way, the task became a strenuous one. Desperate, maddened with the final rage against unavoidable death that renders the tiger so fearsome, the Frenchman, unable to retreat or go forward, sought to sell their lives dearly.

Harington's charger had his flank ripped open with a bayonet thrust. Frenzied with pain, the noble horse leapt right into the midst of the press, lashed out furiously to clear a way for himself, and then bounded into a fresh group. This time he stumbled, and blundered to his knees, throwing Harington forward on his neck. Whilst striving to recover his seat Teddy felt a heavy crack on his head, the light left his eyes, the sound of conflict died away into nothingness, and he fell from the saddle as one dead.

He had been struck by a clubbed rifle, and would infallibly have been stabbed by his infurated assailants did not his charger again strike vigorously on all sides with his iron-shod feet.

A rush of Lancers now cleared the locality, and the horse finished the charge with them, receiving no further injuries and trotting back to his quarters when the business was over.

The end came quickly once the constituent elements of the sortie became convinced that death and not glory lay in front.

(To be continued.)

Digitized by Google

PYN-KA

THE WONDERFUL METAL POLISHER

The Lustre Lasts!

Pyn-Ka Leaves no Scratches!

Cleans and burnishes gold, silver, plate, copper, brass, nickel, tin, glass, etc., better, quicker, and at less cost of labour and money than any other polish known.

Paste or tablets, 1d. to 6d. All dealers.

NOSE MACHINES as worn by Nobility. Shape altered permanently by few weeks' wear, from 9/9 each. Red Nose Cure, Medically Approved, 3/9. Pamphlet, "Cause and Prevention," 1/-; particulars for stamp. Mention Paper.
LEES RAY, Specialist, South Castle St., Liverpool.

£20 Hairdressers fitted up. Estimates free.

Tobacconists Commencing. See Illd. Guide (259 pages) 3d. How to open a cigar store, £20 to £2,000 Tobacconists Outfitting Co., 186, Euston Road, London. The largest and original house (50 years reputation. Mgr., H. Myers

MANDOLINES.

PINE ITALIAN MODELS, 13 Rod Maple Ribs, 7s. 6d.; Brown and White Ribs, 10s. 6d.; GENUINE ITALIAN, with 15 Maple Ribs, 15s. 6d.; ditto, 17 Rosewood Ribs, 17s.; 19 Rosewood Ribs, Pearl Inlaid, 24s.; ditto, superior, Closed Machine, 30s. Magnificent De Meglio Model, Rosewood, 50s.; ditto, superior, 63s. Genuine De Meglio, finest-toned instrument made, £5 15s. For cases, strings and pick, see list post free. All with machine heads and bent sound boards. Crate and carr. free.

JOSEPH RILEY'S, ON CONSTITUTION HILL,
BIRMINGHAM.

VARICOCELE.

Every man suffering from Varicocele and the allied troubles, or Varicose Veins, should send for treatise, describing their Causes, Symptoms, Results, and Successful and Painless Treatment without surgical operation or the use of cumbersome trusses and electrical appliances. Will be sent sealed, post free.
S. S. MURRAY,
7 Southampton Row, London, W.C.

PALATABLE SUBSTITUTE FOR COD LIVER OIL.
DEVONSHIRE CREAM
(Really Genuine.) In Patent Air-tight Tins. ½lb., 10d.; 1lb., 1/4; 1lb., 2/4; including Tin and Postage.
MRS. CONYERS, MORCHARD BISHOP, DEVON.

TRILENE REGD. TABLETS THE ONLY CURE for STOUTNESS Registered by GOVERNMENT Price 2/6

ALL FAT PEOPLE

Readily Reduce Weight and Cure Corpulency Permanently by taking TRILENE TABLETS (Regd.) for a few weeks. They are very agreeable, harmless, and never fail to PRESERVE both HEALTH and FIGURE without change of diet. Reduction begins immediately.

An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

MISS HEYWOOD, 77 Hindhill Street, Heywood, Lancs., says: "I am 21lb. lighter, and my rheumatism also seems cured."

MRS. WEAVER, of Greenpits Villa, Station Road, Ross, Hereford, says: "Am reduced from 13st. 8lb. to 11st."

MR. CANHAM, 57 Alexandra Road, Norwich: "Tablets cured my wife of extreme stoutness; it has never returned."

LADY CONSTANCE CONRAD writes from Wiesbaden: "I am very pleased with the Tablets."

PRINCESS LIECHTENSTEIN writes from Laudsberg, Austria: "Pray send your excellent Tablets directly."

COUNTESS G. FURSTENBERG, Stammheim, Germany, writes: "They act speedily and well."

MR. BUTLER, Surgeon, Hampton Manor, Evesham, says: "My patient lost more than a stone.

Send 2/6 to THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION, 66 Pinsbury Pavement, London, E.C.

Don't Cough-use
They at once check the Cough and remove the cause.
The Unrivalled
One Lozenge alone relieves.
Sold everywhere, Tins 1½d. each.
Keatings Lozenges

PIANOS. UPRIGHT IRON GRAND.

Complete Iron frame, Brass Pin Plate, Nickel-bolted Wrest Plank, Check Action, Full Trichord, Full Compass, Rivetted Hammers, Handsome Walnut Case, Inlaid Marqueterie Panel, Sconces, Trusses, etc. Tone and touch perfect. Guaranteed 25 years. 23 guineas, at 10/6 per month. Delivered free on payment of 10/6. Approval Catalogues Free.

ORGANS. GENUINE AMERICAN.

Imported Direct. Solid Walnut Case, Mirror Top, Music Case, 2 Knee Swells, Mouse and Dust Proof, 8 Stops, 3 Sets of Reeds, 14 Guineas, at 6/- per month. 10 Stops, 3 Sets of Reeds, 2 Octave Couplers. 15 guineas, at 7/- per month. Illustrated Lists Free. Kindly mention this paper.

THE LONDON AND LIVERPOOL PIANOFORTE CO.
Granby St. & Selborne St., LIVERPOOL.
Agents wanted where not represented.

KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR.

WHY INDUCE HEART DISEASE TO CURE YOUR HEAD

When you can get a real safe remedy like KAPUTINE?

Dr. Thurston, Licentiate, of the Royal College of Physicians, writes November 16th: "Knowing the formulæ from which KAPUTINE is compounded, I unhesitatingly recommend its use in preference to crude Antifibrin and other synthetic drugs which, unfortunately for sufferers, are so commonly used for Headache, and which have undoubtedly injurious effects on the Heart, Brain, and Vescicle tissues generally."

NOTHING LIKE KAPUTINE. NOTHING SIMILAR. NOTHING AS GOOD.

All leading Chemists sell it. Packets of 18 doses 1s. Sample 1d.

After 13 Years' Suffering, Cured for 1s.

The Rev. T. TAYLOR, Vicar of St. Bredward, Cornwall, writes: "Owing to a severe accident while riding, my wife has for the past thirteen years been subject to violent attacks of neuralgia. The relief she has experienced from KAPUTINE has been speedy and effectual. KAPUTINE, while it is efficacious in its use, is attended with none of the disagreeable after effects which she has experienced in the case of other drugs."

After 10 Weeks' Suffering, Cured for 1d.

From Rev. J. H. BURN. DEER RECTORY, MINTLAW, ABERDEEN, NOVEMBER 8TH, 1897.

"My own cure with one dose of KAPUTINE was marvellous after ten weeks incessant neuralgia.

Used also by Her Grace the Countess of Cavan, Lady Dashwood, The Countess of Munster, Surgeon Lieut.-Col. Baker, etc., etc.

Nothing Similar. Nothing as Good. KAPUTINE CURES HEADACHE IN 10 MINUTES.

If you enclose stamped envelope to A. M. Kaputine Ltd., Huddersfield, you will get free samples by return.

KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR.

Digitized by Google

PLAIN SPEAKING.

T. R.—Butter made from the thin milk of the native cow in India is bluish in colour. To those who have been accustomed to the golden tint of fresh butter it is decid dly strange to see the bread apparently painted blue, and it is with reluctance that they touch it; but it's very good stuff, after all.

S. P.—In this country, during the reign of Charles I., spurs were commonly worn as part of the male attire, whether the wearer was accustomed to ride or not.

R.—Your canary probably came from Germany. The exportation of canaries from that country is estimated at more than 100,000 yearly; of these by far the greater portion go to the United States, some come here, and some are sent to Russia.

A CORRESPONDENT who has just returned from China after a stay of four years sends me a letter in which he writes in the following manner concerning railway accommodation: "The carriages are fitted up in the simplest possible manner; no cushions or cl th or mattings are used, owing to the uncleanliness of the natives. Metal parts are used as sparingly as possible, because the native finds it difficult to resist the temptation of cutting them off and stealing them. Chinamen take an awful lot of luggage, and are quite content to travel in an open goods-truck. Fares are very low, and I have known a man to charter a whole train of such trucks for his not very numerous family and his immense quantity of luggage. On the mail trains there are carriages fitted with more comfort for the convenience of more civilised people."

M. L. asks: "Can you tell me where the quotation 'Men are but children of a larger growth' appeared."——————In Dryden's "All for love."

W. R. D. asks: "What difference is there between a minute gun and any other gun?"——————A minute gun is so called because a minute elapses between each discharge. It is generally a signal of distress at sea, or a gun fired at the death of a distinguished individual.

HYGIENIC.—There is said to be only one make of shoe in the world which countenances five toes on the human foot, and that is the wooden shoe of Belgium.

F. G. H.—I should say the most expensive sporting events in the world are international yacht races. Some years ago, five days of yachting between the Vigilant and Valkyrie, including the cost of three other vessels who were built to defend the Cup, but were not selected, probably cost the Americans £111,000.

S. D. G. writes: "Is there any reason attributed to the saying that if one's ears burn someone is talking about you?"——————This conceit is ascribed to the superstition of guardian angels, who are supposed to touch the right ear if the talk is favourable, and the left if otherwise. This is in order to cheer or warn, as the occasion necessitates.

C. H.—Any dance in which the partners stand up and face one another may be called a country dance.

B. Y.—To "knock the spots off anything" is an allusion to the traditional skill of Western cowboys and famous rifle shots, who would shoot the spots out of a card held between the fingers of a friend.

IMP.—The word "imp" formerly meant "child." Shakespeare speaks of the imps in the Tower, thereby meaning children, and in one of his sermons Jeremy Tayler refers to "the imps that sang Hosannas to Jesus in the Temple."

M.—A cigar is served to the Italian soldier as part of his daily ration.

H. B.—The Belgian peasant goes in largely for the rearing of cock fowls, which he trains to crow very frequently. Cock-crowing competitions take place at intervals, and the peasant whose bird excels in this performance has attained the height of his ambition. The birds are placed in cages set in a row, for the purpose of stirring the spirit of emulation within them; near each bird is a marker, whose duty it is to mark down each crow made by the bird. The cock that scores the highest number wins the prize and becomes the joy of its master's heart.

Y.—The most interesting, if not the oldest, pawnticket in existence was that discovered at Florence some two years ago. It was found in an old portfolio of drawings, and bears the signatures of Tasso, the great poet. On this ticket he acknowledges the receipt of 25 lire (£1), for which the lender held as security his father's sword, four sheets, and two table-covers. It is dated March 2nd, 1570. Tasso, like Milton, did not make a fortune by his poetry.

D.—At the battle of Trafalgar the heaviest gun used threw a projectile weighing 32lb.; our modern 110-ton gun throws a shot that weighs 2,000lb.

L. O.—The porters of Smyrna are exceedingly strong; they carry with comparative ease a load of 200lb. Their diet is chiefly fruit and olives. Olives, by-the-way, are very sustaining.

ETHEL M.—Generally speaking, examinations for lady clerkships in the G.P.O. are held every six months. Candidates must be of not less than eighteen and not more than twenty years of age.

W. P. writes to ask if the transmission of messages through telegraph wires injures birds that may be perched upon them.————Certainly not.

ALICE W.—The first woman to obtain the degree of M.D. was Elizabeth Blackwell, of the United States, in 1849.

S. P. G. writes to ask if the common idea that a seafaring life tends to prevent growth is a true one?————Although this was no doubt the case in the days of small ships, cramped accommodation, bad food and water, and, practically, unventilated living apartments, it is doubtful whether it is true of the present day. There is, however, one reason which would largely account for stunting of growth in those who have been sailors from early youth. This is the fact that from the time he leaves port the sailor can never sleep more than four hours at a time. Now sleep is very important to growth, and no doubt this has some effect. At the same time, it is quite possible that the constant exercise and the constant breathing of the pure sea air may largely counteract it.

C.—The tea-cigarette that was placed upon the market some time ago was not a success. It was made of the unbroken leaf of green tea, slightly moistened. The effect on the practised smoker was bad, but on the tyro it was indescribable. Strangely enough, the cure for the sickness was a cup of tea.

A. H.—The longest tunnel in England is the Severn Tunnel, on the Great Western Railway; it measures 7,664 yards.

SHORT STORIES' ADVERTISEMENT RATES.

Single column, per inch, per insertion	£0	10	0
Double ,, ,, ,,	1	0	0
Full page inside, facing page of matter, either white paper or 2nd or 3rd page of cover, or back page, per insertion	10	0	0
Half-page ,, ,, ,, ...	5	0	0
Quarter-page ,, ,, ...	2	10	0
Eighth-page ,, ,, ...	1	5	0
Front page, whole ,, ,, ...	12	10	0
,, half	6	5	0

All spaces above one-eighth of a page are charged at per page rate.

Series discount: 5 per cent. for 13, 10 per cent. for 26, 15 per cent. for 52 insertions.

Black blocks are charged 25 per cent. extra. All advertisements are subject to approval. All copy must be sent in by Noon on Tuesday, Jan. 10th, if intended for the Issue on sale Jan. 24th, and dated Jan. 28th. The Proprietors reserve the right to hold over or suspend the insertion of any advertisement without prejudice to other insertions on order. All communications should be addressed to the Advertisement Manager, "Pearson's Weekly" Offices, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Printed and Published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON LTD., at Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

A Magnificent Complexion

Is assured in a short time by using LILLIE POWDER, which, owing to its medicinal qualities, is absolutely the finest preparation for the skin obtainable. Invented by Mrs. Langtry.

Unrivalled for all affections of the skin. Should be used by all men after shaving; and by all ladies. No toilet table is complete without it. Send for it at once; and if there is any difficulty about it come straight to us.

These are Proofs Indeed.

MOST EXQUISITE: "I think your new Lillie Powder most exquisite."
ADELINA PATTI.

THE VERY BEST: "I think your new Lillie Powder is quite the very best, and you may be pleased to know I have used it ever since I first went on the stage!"—ELLALINE TERRISS.

THE NICEST: "Please send some more of your Lillie Powder. It is the nicest I have ever used. I find it quite excellent."
CISSIE LOFTUS.

MOST BENEFICIAL: "I find Lillie Powder most beneficial to the skin, and shall always use it."—PHYLLIS BROUGHTON.

DELICIOUS: "I find it delicious, and never use any other."—LETTY LIND.

PREPARED AND EXQUISITELY SCENTED UNDER THE STRICT SUPERVISION OF HER MAJESTY'S PERRUQUIER, Mr. W. CLARKSON.

THREE TINTS—BLANCHE, NATURELLE, & RACHEL.

To be had of all the best Chemists and Hairdressers.

PRICE ONE SHILLING. BY POST, 1s. 2d.

THE LILLIE SYNDICATE, 3 Henrietta Street, Strand, London, W.C.

A NATIONAL TOAST LIST

The Proprietor of Beecham's Pills, knowing well that a number of people when called on for "A TOAST" at the festive gatherings of the season will feel suddenly at a loss for something to say, ventures to offer the following suggestions, with the comforting conviction that they "fill a long-felt want":

Health to our Queen! Prosperity to her people! and good luck to BEECHAM'S PILLS

The Prince of Wales, the Royal Family, and every other Family that takes BEECHAM'S PILLS

May every true Briton enjoy comfort and content, and have plenty of BEECHAM'S PILLS

Bonny Scotland; may her brawny sons, the descendants of heroes, never lack BEECHAM'S PILLS

Erin, the Emerald Jewel of the Sea, but never green enough to do without BEECHAM'S PILLS

Here's to our Soldiers, and the tiny sentinels that keep watch over their health, BEECHAM'S PILLS

Our Navy; may it ever sail on a sea of glory, and be fortified by a stock of BEECHAM'S PILLS

Health to every member of the Freemason's Craft; may they never tile the door against BEECHAM'S PILLS

May old England's sons abroad never forget their Mother Country and BEECHAM'S PILLS

Health to the Ladies who wear British Fabrics, and take BEECHAM'S PILLS

The Englishman's Castle, his home, and may it always contain a box of BEECHAM'S PILLS

Success to the Inventions of Our Country, including that valuable remedy BEECHAM'S PILLS

What every Briton loves: his Native Land, his Liberty, and his box of BEECHAM'S PILLS

Health to the four B's: Beauties, Benedicts, Bachelors, and BEECHAM'S PILLS

Life's four comforts: a Good Wife, a Full Purse, a True Friend, and a box of BEECHAM'S PILLS

Amidst the World's Changes may we never be tempted to swerve from BEECHAM'S PILLS

May the population of the world continue to be remarkable for their faith in BEECHAM'S PILLS

Absent Friends; may all Christmas Hampers include a box of BEECHAM'S PILLS

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

WHEN YOU SEE "HOME NOTES," BUY IT.

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

No. 524. FOR WEEK ENDING JANUARY 14TH, 1899. [ONE PENNY.

DON'T TAKE A SLEDGE-HAMMER

to crack a black beetle. Why? Because it is not necessary. You can crack a black beetle with the end of a small poker, and save your strength, and shew your wisdom. Don't give your lad a big thrashing for a small fault, or your maid a big scolding for a slight offence. You lose your dignity, and do no end of harm. Neither lads nor maids are perfect, and we've an idea that there is room for improvement in most of us. But do nothing in a towering passion. Leave that to mad dogs. Don't use unparliamentary language when we tell you of a good thing, say Page Woodcock's Wind Pills for the cure of Indigestion, Liver Complaints, Wind on the Stomach, Costiveness, Sick Headache, &c.

Read this plain statement: Mr. Ben Simons, Sutton-on-Sea, says: "For a long time I suffered from Indigestion, Loss of Appetite, and general depression: life was a burden. I was recommended to take Page Woodcock's Wind Pills. In a few weeks I was a new man, and now enjoy excellent health."

Page Woodcock's Wind Pills, being purely Vegetable, Tasteless, and Mild and Tonic in their action, may be taken with perfect safety by the most delicate of either sex.

All sufferers from Indigestion, Liver Complaints, Wind on the Stomach, Costiveness, Sick Headache, Nervous Debility, Palpitation of the Heart, Biliousness, &c., should avail themselves of this most excellent Medicine.

All Medicine Vendors at 1/1½ and 2/9. Post free for price by Page Woodcock, Lincoln.

10/6 ALLEN FOSTER & CO., 10/6

SOLE MAKERS OF THE

'ALFOSCO' COSTUMES.

Buy Direct by Parcels Post from the Leading Firm of London Manufacturers.

AMAZING OFFER. NEW YEAR'S GIFT.

ALLEN FOSTER & CO. are presenting a Diamond Brooch, consisting of seven beautifully cut imitation Diamonds in chaste gilt setting, as a New Year's Present to every Purchaser of their goods mentioning Short Stories.

Design No. 545. 10/6

Design No. 94. 10/6 Carr. Paid 6d. extra.

Ladies are invited to call and inspect goods at our Showrooms—
17 ROSCOE STREET, GOLDEN LANE, E.C.
BUSINESS HOURS, 9 TO 6. SATURDAY 9 TO 1.

Design No. 545. 10/6.

The Reefer Costume.—This tailor-cut Costume consists of the Reefer Jacket and Skirt. The Collar is of Velvet, made in the Spécialité Serge (all colours). Price only 10/6. Carriage, 6d. extra. This fashionable Coat and Skirt made in the heavy Amazon Coating (all colours) will be 19/6. Carriage, 9d. extra.

Design No. 94. 10/6.

Velvet-trimmed Costume.—Consists of fashionably-made Skirt and Bodice, trimmed with Velvet and Buttons. GREAT VALUE FOR MONEY. This Costume is made in the Spécialité Serge (all colours). Price only 10/6. Carriage, 6d. extra.

Skirt alone, 5/6. Carriage, 5d. extra.

Colours of Famous Specialite Serge: Black, Navy, Electric, Blue, Myrtle, Blue-Grey, Bronze, Green, Brown, Fawn, Purple, Red, etc.

1/3 per yard, 52in. wide. Any length cut.

Patterns and Illustrated Sketch Book sent post free on application.

In sending order for Costumes, please give measurement round bust (under arms), waist, and length of skirt in front.

ALLEN FOSTER & CO.,

17 ROSCOE ST., GOLDEN LANE, LONDON, E.C.

Digitized by Google

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

COFFEE WITHOUT DREGS.

GOOD! ITS MASON'S

An agreeable, stimulating and sustaining beverage. Instantly prepared and most economical. Equal to the very finest coffee. Highly recommended by the Medical Profession.

Of all Grocers and Stores, or a Sample Bottle post free for 9 stamps.

ALSO TRY

MASON'S WINE ESSENCES

AND

MASON'S EXTRACT OF HERBS.

Sample Bottle of either sent free for 9d.; two assorted 1/3; three assorted 1/8.

Agents Wanted.

Manufacturers—

NEWBALL & MASON, NOTTINGHAM.

"WORTH A GUINEA A BOX."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

FOR ALL

BILIOUS & NERVOUS DISORDERS,

SUCH AS

Sick Headache, Constipation, Weak Stomach, Impaired Digestion, Disordered Liver & Female Ailments.

SALE NOW OVER SIX MILLIONS YEARLY.

In Boxes, 1s. 1½d., and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.

Prepared only by the Proprietor,

THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.

Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere.

ENORMOUS PRIZE SCHEME

For JANUARY, FEBRUARY and MARCH, 1899.

WATSON'S MATCHLESS CLEANSER

12,000 OR MORE HANDSOME PRIZES, VALUE OVER £5,000.

LIST OF PRIZES TO BE COMPETED FOR EACH MONTH.

1	Cash Prize of £100 0 0	£100 0 0
4	Cash Prizes of £25 0 0	100 0 0
8	Cash Prizes of £12 10s.	100 0 0
16	Cash Prizes of £6 5s.	100 0 0
20	Sewing Machines, value £5 each ...	100 0 0
33	Cash Prizes of £3 each	99 0 0
100	Cash Prizes of £1 each	100 0 0
200	Cash Prizes of 10s. each	100 0 0
200	Ladies' Umbrellas, value 10s, ...	100 0 0
600	Cash Prizes of 5s. each	£150 0 0
400	Ladies' Umbrellas, value 5s. each ...	100 0 0
2,000	Boxes of our famous "Nubolic Soap," packed in fancy boxes containing 18 12-oz. Tablets, value 4s. per box ...	400 0 0
1,000	Pictures of the famous "Charge of the Light Brigade," in gilt frame, value 4s. each	200 0 0
Total	... 4,582 Prizes value	£1,749 0 0 per month.

CONDITIONS OF COMPETITION.

Cut off the top portion of wrapper, with the words Watson's Matchless Cleanser and send, postage or carriage paid, to Joseph Watson and Sons Limited, Whitehall Soap Works, Leeds, not later than either January 31st, February 28th, or March 31st. If the wrappers arrive after these dates, they will count for the following month's competition, and if they arrive after April 2nd, they will be valueless. If any parcel arrives postage or carriage not being paid, the parcel will be refused. Be careful to see that the full postage is paid. The prizes will be awarded in above order to the senders of the highest number of wrappers. The wrappers must be in bundles of 50, and each parcel must contain the full name and address of sender, and the number of wrappers sent must be marked on the same paper. The packages must be marked on the outside, "Prize Competition." The wrappers of unsuccessful competitors will be added to those sent in by them in the following month. A list giving result of competition will be enclosed with each prize, when it is sent out. All possible speed in counting the wrappers will be made, and Joseph Watson and Sons Limited hope they will be able to dispatch all prizes not later than the 21st day of the month following the competition. The decision of Joseph Watson and Sons Limited to be final. Every wrapper must have first contained soap. No employee of Joseph Watson and Sons Limited will be eligible.

WATSON'S MATCHLESS CLEANSER

Has the Largest Sale of Full Weight 11b. Tablets in the World, and has proved itself to be one of the best Soaps ever used.

WATSON'S MATCHLESS CLEANSER

Is Full Weight 11b. Tablets, and is to be had of all Grocers, Oilmen and Co-Operative Stores throughout the United Kingdom.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

No. 524.] [ONE PENNY.

For the Week ending January 14th, 1899.

Edited by J. ARTHUR PEARSON.

THE NEW NURSE.

"WELL," said Mrs. Abbott, leaning back in her big chair, "well, the directors have 'sat upon' Miss Clyde, and the general verdict is 'acceptable.'"

"Poor Miss Clyde!" said Dr. Lane, with lazy sarcasm.

"I am afraid," said Miss Morse, the head nurse, with a would-be coquettish glance at the indifferent doctor, "that you don't treat that august body with due respect. In fact, you are almost frivolous in your mention of it."

"They have discussed the matter," continued Mrs. Abbott, "and they have decided that she shall be capped. What do you think of it, Doctor?"

"What do you think of it? That is more to the purpose, it seems to me."

"I am all in favour of it," confessed the superintendent of nurses, with a good-natured laugh. "She is fast becoming a special favourite of mine. She is young, pretty, and an only child; it seems she was a society butterfly, but had aspirations. Of course, the parents were not aware of the extent of her dissatisfaction, and it came upon them like a blow when she decided to leave home and become a nurse. Certainly the vagaries of girls are very perplexing."

"They are, indeed," sighed Miss Morse.

"When she first came I was doubtful of her staying a week. I saw her look of astonishment when our stew came on the table, and it amused me. Then I saw that she forced herself to eat it, and I rather admired her pluck. My admiration has grown as I have seen the manner in which she has gone through her tasks. It has not been easy for her, but I really think she is beginning to enjoy it."

"She is evidently a very determined individual," said Dr. Lane carelessly. "So, now, as your soft heart is taken by her prettiness——"

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

"Oh, no, Doctor! By her earnestness."

At this moment the Doctor was called away, so he evaded a reply.

When he returned he found another person in the room.

A tall, slender, very graceful girl, not more than twenty years old. Her blue print gown and sheer apron were dainty and fresh, and the kerchief crossed over the rounded bosom left the white throat bare. Her hair, which was abundant and of a very beautiful gold colour, was braided and wound round and round the little stately head; and her eyes, large, soft and grey, were fixed half-anxiously on Mrs. Abbott's ruddy countenance.

"Come here, my dear," that kindly woman was saying. And with her breath coming a little quicker, Miss Clyde obeyed, and advanced a little nearer:

"I am pleased to be able to tell you," continued the superintendent, "that the Board of Directors have decided to accept you. They met to-day, as you may be aware, and from your record they think you suitable for the post. Let me congratulate you, and also welcome you into the profession."

"Thank you," said the girl, with a grateful glance. "You have been very kind to me, Mrs. Abbott, and I—I appreciate it."

"So now," said Mrs. Abbott, with a smile, "you are a nurse, and may get your cap as soon as you like."

Miss Clyde was on the point of retiring, and had, in fact, almost reached the door, when Dr. Lane's voice arrested her.

"I wonder," he said in his lazy fashion, "how Miss Clyde would look in a cap? Miss Morse, will you not lend Miss Clyde your cap for a moment?"

With very evident reluctance Miss Morse removed her cap, and Mrs. Abbott placed it on Miss Clyde's head.

And there the new nurse stood, her hands tightly clasped together, her colour coming and going with every breath. But there was a passionate indignation in her heart. What right had he to make her stand here and be looked at in such a fashion! He was quite the most insulting man she had ever met!

"Very becoming," he said at last, in a careless, somewhat bored tone.

Without waiting for any more, she almost tore the cap from her head, and gave it back to its owner.

"I wonder, now," he went on meditatively, "why you did not become a nun?"

Mrs. Abbott laughed in her jolly way.

Miss Clyde turned to the door and went out without a word.

* * * * *

Katharine Clyde had not enjoyed an easy position since her arrival at the hospital one month ago. She was so different from the other nurses that they generally looked askance upon her, and while they had not been actually unkind, had not treated her in a friendly manner. Miss Morse, she felt, had for some unknown reason hated her from the first, and had shown it in every petty way possible. While Katharine's strict attendance to duty, and evident desire to learn, had left her head nurse very little room for complaint, yet every trifle had been represented in the worst light possible, until the girl wondered how Mrs. Abbott's opinion could have been so favourable.

And this was not the worst. "I could stand everything else if it were not for him!" she told herself to-night. And in fact the greatest antagonism seemed to have sprung up between herself and Dr. Lane from the moment of their first meeting. His calm assumption of superiority over everyone with whom he came in contact was what she could not endure. The fact that he was really a rich man, that he was the cleverest young doctor in the city, and that his only reason for studying surgery was his love for it, made him, perhaps the most influential person in the hospital. And so used was he to admiration and flattery, that he could not imagine anyone's refusing them to him. The girl had always disliked him, but to-night she felt that she fairly hated him.

"He will find," she said between her shut teeth, as she walked quickly away, "that there is one woman who has no intention of falling down and worshipping him. A nun indeed!"

* * * * *

Not the least of her trials had been the persistent determination of everyone here to ascribe her taking up nursing to a disappointment in love, and no one knew how her proud spirit chafed under it. Why could not they understand that a dreamy, romantic girl, with nothing on earth to do but enjoy herself, should be attracted by a life that promised self-sacrifice and a continual round of good works? To a woman of Katharine's temperament it was the most natural thing in the world.

Dr. Lane appeared the most determined of all to believe in her sentimental disappointment, and she considered that his question to-night added insult to injury.

Within the next week she had donned her uniform, and then began to feel for the first time like a nurse. And very sweet she looked in the severely plain gown and ample, snowy apron, the soft kerchief crossed demurely on her breast, the pretty cap crowning her gold braids.

Miss Clyde had been at the hospital nearly eight months before she was required to nurse for Dr. Lane. But one unfortunate evening in February, when she was chatting for just a moment with Miss Grayson, a dark-eyed, vivacious little maid, whose cap was never straight, Mrs. Abbott bustled in hurriedly.

"Miss Clyde," she said quickly, "prepare immediately to go on special duty with a typhoid fever case in the Mason's ward."

"Whose case is it?" said Katharine.

"Dr. Lane's. And, my dear," added the kindly lady, who had certainly opened her heart completely to this soft-eyed girl, "you must do your best, and win golden opinions from him. It is rather a desperate case, and his asking so particularly for you, such a young and almost inexperienced nurse, shows how highly he thinks of you. For he is very difficult to please."

The end of this speech brought them to the door of the Mason's ward, and Katharine, with a sinking heart, followed Mrs. Abbott into it. To have to nurse for this man! To have to converse with him, to take orders from him, to be liable to visits from him at all hours of the day! She hated the thought.

He left the room shortly after she entered it, and she could see him through the half-opened door, going slowly down the corridor, giving his orders very earnestly to Mrs. Abbott. Miss Clyde lost the count of her patient's pulse as she dreamily thought what broad shoulders he had; then she flushed indignantly, told herself she disliked fair men, and that he was overbearing and intensely disagreeable.

When she came over to the ward—or room, for it was a room off the ward—the next morning, Miss Murray, who was on special night duty with her patient, gave her a discouraging report. Katharine was engaged in giving her patient one of his frequent sponge baths when the doctor came in. He looked grave and tired, and scarcely noticed her. When his visit to the patient was over, and she followed him out to the corridor, he gave his orders in an abrupt manner, and then walked quickly away, at which Miss Clyde was extremely well-pleased.

Digitized by Google

The patient was trying; he was very ill and delirious most of the time. The nurse grew thin and nervous over him, but her energy and her wonderful patience never flagged. She was indefatigable, and could not be persuaded to leave him to take proper meals and exercise. Dr. Lane noticed her pale cheeks and the hollows round her large eyes, and on several occasions ordered her out in a by-the-way tone that she resented and did not obey.

To-day, however, she had nearly fainted during his afternoon visit, and was still sitting on the sofa at the foot of her unconscious patient's bed, striving giddily to recover her strength, and feeling weakly indignant because he was standing there, gazing at her from under his lowered brows; when he abruptly turned and left the room.

Outside he encountered Miss Grayson.

"Please go to Miss Clyde's room and bring me her cloak and hat," he said quickly, and then passed on down the corridor, not noticing, perhaps not caring, that the little nurse made her black eyes very big and round with astonishment and curiosity, and stared after him.

* * * * *

When he returned to Miss Clyde, he was dressed for a walk and had her cloak and hat.

"I am going," he said "to take you out for an airing, Miss Arnold will take your place for an hour."

He stood there, holding her cloak for her.

"I—" began Katharine.

"You must go or break down, and I have no desire to have another patient on my hands."

"Not on your hands," said Miss Clyde haughtily. "Dr. Yates is the house physician."

"Nevertheless, I should certainly consider you my patient. Will you kindly put on this cloak, Miss Clyde, and relieve me of it?"

Katharine looked up into his stern face, and then she obeyed! She stood quite silent and passive, and allowed him to put on her cloak, and even to button it under her dimpled chin, although his hands were strangely awkward and unsteady for a young doctor with such iron nerves as he was known to have.

Then they went out, passing several nurses, who looked at them in astonishment, as their mutual antagonism was well known to all. He assisted her into the carriage, and she made herself as small as possible in her corner, and did not volunteer a word as the swift horse whirled them off.

He made one or two careless observations, to which she replied in monosyllables, and would not unbend from her dignity an inch. The rapid, gliding motion through the keen, bright air would have been highly enjoyable to her under any other circumstances, but under these the only emotion of which she was cognizant was of an intense longing to be back.

But the drive really did her good, and she went about her duties on her return with a renewal of her old energy.

* * * * *

It was later in the evening, and everyone was down at tea, when the Doctor sent Miss Clyde to the pharmacy for something he was in immediate need of. It seemed to him, sitting there in that dim room with his fingers on the patient's rapid pulse, that she was very long about it. At last, so impatient did he become, he softly opened the door, and stepped out into the corridor.

It was deserted. He met not a soul on his quick, noiseless walk to the pharmacy. The lights were all somewhat dim, and everything seemed unnaturally quiet. He paused on the threshold at the sight of Katharine.

She was leaning over the counter mixing something, with quick fingers, in a glass. He could see her in profile—the graceful bend of her golden head, the round white throat where the kerchief had a little slipped aside in her haste, the upward curve of her dark lashes against the softly flushed cheek, the dainty, curled red lips a little parted.

In an instant, before he quite knew what he was doing, he had started forward and caught her to his breast, and was pressing his lips in a long, burning kiss to hers.

Katharine wrenched herself free, and stood looking at him for a moment, white and panting, and then swept past him, with head held haughtily erect.

The Doctor stared after her until she quite disappeared, and then leant back against the counter and put his hands in his pockets. His blood was still racing with unusual violence through his veins and his pulses thrilling from that recent contact, yet he had realised for the first time, as he caught that strange pale look on her face, of fear and aversion, the enormity of the thing he had done. He was appalled, literally frightened—he!—at the realisation; yet, not for all he was worth would he have missed it.

In this contradictory state he was still standing when he heard the nurses come trooping up from tea. The pharmacy was a common meeting place for them all, and as he felt too agitated to face them at present, he walked slowly down towards his patient's room. He had passed by the door two or three times and was trying to gather up the courage to enter, when Katharine opened the door and looked out. Alarm was plainly imprinted upon her lovely face. Without a word he followed her back through a few feet of the ward into the room.

A great change for the worse had taken place in the patient, and in working over him these two appeared to forget their relative positions. The Doctor, however, followed wistfully with his eyes the golden gleam of Miss Clyde's hair as she moved about the dim room, and Katharine, for her part, carefully avoided getting anywhere near the Doctor.

Miss Morse, who now joined them, noticed that there was something between them, and was puzzled.

The patient died just as it was time for the night nurse to come on duty. Miss Clyde looked so white and so weak, that the Doctor whispered to Mrs. Abbott, and she drew the girl away as she was about to attend to the body.

"Miss Murray will do that," she said kindly. "You must come away, my dear, and rest. You look ill."

"I—I don't feel very well," gasped Katharine.

She staggered a little, and everything grew black before her. She was just dimly conscious of seeing Dr. Lane spring towards her, and of fighting feebly against him—and then lost everything.

"She has fainted," said the Doctor, in a subdued voice. "Get the nearest room ready, and I will bring her in."

Very tenderly and reluctantly he laid his unconscious burden down upon the bed they had prepared for her, and left her to the care of the nurses. He was wandering about aimlessly and unhappily, not being able to settle to anything, when Miss Grayson came running up to him.

Digitized by Google

"Doctor," said she breathlessly, "will you please come in and look at Miss Clyde? I can't find Dr. Yates, and she is delirious."

Without waiting for her to finish, Dr. Lane hastened off in the direction of Miss Clyde's room. As he opened the door a wild, unmeaning babble in her sweet treble fell upon his ear, and she was sitting up in bed, her lips and cheeks crimson, her eyes glittering with fever, her golden hair all unbound and falling over her white gown. She was laughing and talking very fast, and Mrs. Abbott and Miss Morse stood one on either side of the narrow bed, trying to sooth her.

Katharine had got the fever. For days she was delirious, and then lay in a stupor that was even worse. Dr. Lane scarcely left her, neglecting all other duties to sit in that darkened room, with bowed head, listening to her wild ravings.

He was much too wretched to attempt to hide his feelings. He cared very little whether they were known or not, and every one knew that if Miss Clyde died the dearest thing in life to Dr. Lane would be gone.

She did not die, however. Slowly, almost with reluctance, as it would seem, she struggled back to life.

The first warm days of April were come, and Miss Clyde's first airing was being talked of. It seemed to be all "Miss Clyde" now; everyone in the hospital was talking and thinking of Miss Clyde.

After dinner one day when the scent of the spring flowers came softly in, Miss Morse was closeted with Mrs. Abbott in the superintendent's office.

"And you are sure you are not mistaken?" Mrs. Abbott was saying, in a perplexed tone.

"I saw it with my own eyes," declared the other.

"And Miss Clyde was angry, you say?"

"She seemed startled at first, of course, but she has evidently got over it," said Miss Morse, with a sneer. "And you must acknowledge it is light conduct, unbecoming a nurse."

The older woman looked at her steadily for a moment, then directed her gaze out of the window.

"Has it ever occurred to you that Dr. Lane is very much in love with Miss Clyde?"

"Probably," said Miss Morse sullenly. "But you know he has no intention of marrying. Hasn't he often said so?"

"However, if I mistake not, this is the Doctor's brougham stopping here now. We can easily refer this matter to him."

When the Doctor came in Mrs. Abbott met him gravely. He looked flushed and confused at her story, and Miss Morse smiled triumphantly. When the superintendent had finished, however, he looked up with sudden resolve.

"Mrs. Abbott," he said earnestly, "I acted unpardonably on the occasion you refer to, and my only excuse is that the love I have for Miss Clyde overcame my reason for the time being. My highest ambition is to make that young lady my wife. If you have any regard for her (and I think you have), you will not allow this story to become common property. However, enough of this. I have come to-day to take her for a drive, and I know you will see that she is comfortably dressed for it."

Katharine was delighted at the prospect of a drive. She was still very weak, and the Doctor carried her in his own strong arms down the stairs.

Dr. Lane placed himself beside her, and the horses dashed off. They were both very silent. He was sunken in thought, half-painful, it would seem by his expression, half-sweet.

Katharine at first contented herself with looking out of the window at all the sights she had been shut in from so long. Presently, however, something appeared to vaguely trouble her. She was trying to remember something. She turned her head and looked at her companion. Surely she had seen him before—where? Where? A pained, puzzled look came over her face, and then—then—it all rushed back upon her, and the dim, tormenting fancies of sickness cleared away.

At that moment Dr. Lane turned towards her—to catch again that look of fear and aversion he had seen in her eyes on that fatal night. He shrunk back an instant as from a blow. Then:

"Katharine, darling," he said humbly, "don't look at me so! I cannot bear it from you! Can't you forgive me, and pity the most wretched fool in Christendom? Sweetheart, if you knew how I love you, and how miserable I have been, you could not find it in your tender heart not to forgive me!"

She had turned her head away, and was looking from him, out of the window. One little ungloved hand lay on the seat between them. Lane put his own very tenderly over it.

"Won't you speak to me, Katharine? Won't you forgive me? My little love, look at me, and tell me I have not sinned past all hope of pardon."

Slowly Katharine turned her head, until her great soft eyes, filled with tears—and something else—looked into his. And then, somehow, it happened that the little weak head was laid down on his breast, and she was weeping for very happiness.

"And you really love me?" said Lane at last.

She looked up at him with some tender reproach in the grey eyes.

"Do you think," she said, "that I should be here if I did not now that memory has returned? Will this convince you?" and, drawing down his head, she put her soft, quivering lips to his.

"I believe you, Kate!" he whispered, drawing her closer to him.

T. G. BOWEN.

DEPARTURE OF THE FIRST TRAIN IN ENGLAND.

Digitized by Google

THE TIMMINS TROUBLES.

V.—A FRIENDLY GAME OF DRAUGHTS.

"Now, my dear," said Mr. Timmins, as he drew on his slippers and settled himself for the evening, "if you will get the draught-board I'll play you a game. You're learning so rapidly that it's really a pleasure to play with you."

Mrs. Timmins giggled with delight, kissed her husband on the top of the head, and fluttered away to find the board and men.

"Which shall I take, the white or the red men?" she asked, as she plumped down on a stool about a foot and a half lower than his easy chair, and arranged the apparatus at an angle of fifty degrees.

"I think you misapprehend my suggestion," retorted Mr. Timmins. "I didn't propose to go tobogganing down hill. My idea was a game of draughts, and if you think those men are going to stand on a board tipped up on one end, and wait to be moved, you're not thoroughly acquainted with their habits. There, can't you hold it like that?" and Mr. Timmins jerked his wife's side of the board up to her chin, and began arranging the white men on his rows.

"I'd better put a book under it," said Mrs. Timmins. "Or if you would lower your knees a little it would come even."

"Very likely," replied Mr. Timmins; "but my knees weren't constructed with special regard to draughts. They were put where they are and fastened, and they won't run up and down like a flag. If you can't hold up your side of the board we won't play."

"Oh, yes, certainly," said Mrs. Timmins. "Let's see, is it your move or mine?" And she pushed a man straight forward.

"What are you trying to play?" demanded Mr. Timmins. "Do you think this is a game of football? Don't you know you've got to move sideways? It isn't your move either. Put that back. There. Now I'll move there."

"Oh, I know you're going to take me, you always do," squealed Mrs. Timmins, picking up the draught she had moved before and putting it in her mouth while she studied the prospect. "If I put it here you'll——"

"Swallow it, why don't you? If you don't want it taken, why don't you swallow it?" interrogated Mr. Timmins. "Can't you leave the thing alone till you're ready to move? Put it down, I tell you."

Mrs. Timmins restored it to its square and kept her thumb on it so as not to lose her move.

"If I put it there, can you take it?" she asked, wriggling it round and finally drawing her hand away in jerks, as if afraid to leave it.

"Just watch and see," grinned Mr. Timmins, as he popped a man over it and gathered it in.

"Now I'll move here," said Mrs. Timmins. "I don't know, though. Perhaps I'd better move here." And she chased a man over a half a dozen squares.

"Are you going to move 'em all?" demanded Mr. Timmins. "Do you think that a man's triplets, and goes in six places at once? Move it there. Now, let me see. Let me see." And Mr. Timmins began to whistle.

Mrs. Timmins glanced up at the curtains to see if they were hung right, and then she turned to the board again, and shoved a man into another square.

"What are you doing?" howled Mr. Timmins. "'Tisn't your move! I haven't moved yet. Put him back and wait till I move."

Mrs. Timmins put it back with a sigh, and raised the board a little to get a rest for her elbow on her knee.

"Hold it still, can't you?" scowled Mr. Timmins. "Now I'll move here," he continued, not noticing that he left his king row open.

"Then do I take these two men and get a king?" inquired Mrs. Timmins. "Of course I do. Crown me. I've got the first king." And Mrs. Timmins chuckled hysterically.

"No, you haven't either. I didn't mean that move. If you can't play draughts without cackling like a hen you'd better give it up. I'll take that back and move here; now, so. Now you can move."

"Over here?" asked Mrs. Timmins.

"Certainly. That's very good." And her husband gobbled two men.

"I didn't see that; I'd rather put it here," she remonstrated.

"Too late now," said Mr. Timmins, pegging away for the king row. "You should study your moves first."

"If I go here I get another king," said Mrs. Timmins, plunging through an unguarded space.

"What d'you want to tumble 'em all over for?" shrieked Mr. Timmins. "Haven't you got any sense? You make more fuss over a king than most women over a baby. Don't you know it's my move? Give me back those men. What are you putting them there for? Here, this one goes there."

"No, it doesn't," reasoned Mrs. Timmins. "I know——"

"Oh, of course you know. You've got it all. All you want is a pair of hinges and speckled sides to be a draught board. If I ever want to beat some good player I'll put a wash-tub on your head and move you for a king. Where are my men?"

"I think they slid off," said Mrs. Timmins, screwing herself round to look under her chair, and thereby losing the rest of the draughts.

"Are you satisfied?" raved Mr. Timmins, kicking the board under the table. "Can't even play a game of draughts without making a fuss about it, can ye? I beat you, anyway." And Mr. Timmins plunged upstairs.

"Never mind," said Mrs. Timmins to herself. "I got a king."

Digitized by Google

SUPPRESSED EVIDENCE.

It might truly have been styled a military dinner, for, with the exception of the host and hostess and three young society belles, the entire party was made up of army officers and their wives. The one other exception was only apparent, for Mr. Wright belonged to the body of war, although his duties were those of the department in London and not of the field.

Mr. and Mrs. Powell had, during the past five summers, spent their holidays in garrison towns where they k new many of the officers, and their dinner was the outward sign of sincere appreciation of similar hospitalities extended to them by their guests of the evening. It had proved an unqualified success, and now, as the coffee was served, the stories of army life, so gratifying to Mrs. Powell's love of things military, were going the rounds.

Colonel Hopgood had told of stirring times in which he had participated; Major Hinton, with his usual gallantry, had declared what a blessing women were to a soldier's life; while of the younger division, Lieutenant Savage, true to his branch of the service, let out the secret of how the infantry officers had, the year previous, outwitted their brethren of the cavalry at the Christmas ball.

Mr. Wright, when called upon, stated that, owing to his position in the Department, his knowledge of the army was purely documentary, and was made up entirely from the reports of the several commanding officers. Of its social life he knew little or nothing, and as official business was rather dry talking, he asked that the duty of story-telling might be transferred to one better posted in garrison life—Colonel Keller, he meant.

The Colonel was one of those old-school officers who never flinched when duty called, whether it was on the field of battle or in the social arena, and this summons found him alert to respond,

"Mr. Wright," he began, "is correct when he says that one who obtains his knowledge of army life from official reports knows very little of its inward workings and social life. In fact, some of these reports, although strictly in accordance with regulations, if read between the lines would convey a great deal more than one would infer from the stiff official wording. It is upon a report that I made over ten years ago that I now base my story.

"As a usual thing, there is nothing of so little use to the regiment on foreign service as a sub fresh from a Military Academy. He arrives on the full tide of his glory, and is hard to break in; although I will say that, with a few exceptions, these same raw recruits, after a couple of years' training, turn out to be good officers and a credit to the service.

"Lieutenant Dorsey—for reasons that will appear later, I have withheld his real name—was an exception to the usual run of these youngsters, inasmuch as he was both a popular and good officer from the day he joined us. He was also a thorough gentleman, and it was not a month before he was the favourite of the station; petted by the ladies, and admired and looked up to by the men. Strange to say, his head was not turned, and I soon began to look upon him as the most promising officer in my command.

"Major Hinton has spoken of the good influence of women on the lives of soldiers, and I agree with him. There are, however, exceptions to every rule, and such was the case in my story, for it was a woman who spoilt a career which at the start promised so much.

"It was the third summer after Lieutenant Dorsey had joined us that a young woman, whose name I shall not mention, came to visit the wife of one of the captains. I recall having read somewhere, 'Wherever youth and maiden are, there is a certainty of romance, and a chance of tragedy.' There was surely romance in this case, for at the end of the summer, when she returned to her home, she took the heart of my favourite lieutenant with her. It was to my wife that he shortly afterwards confided the secret of the engagement.

"During all that winter there was not a happier or more jovial officer than he, and when in the spring his application for leave was granted, he left for Bombay, followed by the good wishes of every officer and man in the regiment.

"Just three weeks from the time of his departure, and before his furlough was up, he again stood before me and reported for duty—a changed man. From the moment I looked into his eyes I knew something of serious import had occurred; but the chance to invite his confidence seemed never to present itself, so it was not until a couple of months afterwards that I learnt the true facts.

"The details came from my wife, who had written for particulars to a former school friend in Bombay. It was the old story. A young girl of more or less romantic turn of mind had become enamoured with army life during a visit, and had fallen in love, to a greater or less extent, with a good-looking young officer, the affair ending in an engagement. But a winter at home and a more tempting offer, from a financial point of view, had brought a change of mind, and to be the wife of an army officer with rather poor pay was no longer to her liking.

"Woman-like she was pleased with his devotion, and instead of breaking the engagement, she allowed him to continue writing such letters as might be expected from a man so thoroughly in love. One thing, however, he omitted to write. He did not tell her of his leave of absence, as he wished to surprise her. And he did.

"What occurred at the meeting none of us ever knew, but the man who returned to us 'for duty' was but a poor substitute for the light-hearted fellow who had so recently left us. The ladies attempted, by every womanly expedient, to cheer him and to bring him out of himself; the men tried, sometimes clumsily, but always sincerely, to show their sympathy and regard.

"It was useless—the arrow had gone home, and the wound would not heal.

"Then we were moved to an advance post on the frontier, and I hoped that would mend matters. But it didn't. Young Dorsey wanted above all else, apparently, to be left alone; and when not on duty he would shut himself in his room and remain invisible to every one.

Digitized by Google

Nor was this the most serious change. The entire character of the man seemed transformed. The once reliable officer became careless and untrustworthy.

"When the outbreak on the border, early in spring, required immediate attention, it so happened that his troop was the only one that could be dispatched without delay. His captain was on leave and he, being the senior lieutenant, would naturally have been placed in command, but I felt that I could no longer trust him; I confess it was one of the hardest duties of my career as a soldier to order him on special duty, and send away the troop in the command of another officer. Poor fellow! The lesson was needed, but it cut deeply.

"For some time I feared that he would simply let himself sink into the depths of despondency. It must have been especially galling to his spirit when, after some hard work, the troop came home covered with glory, a share of which might have been his.

"Perhaps just that bitter medicine was needed as a tonic to his pride. At any rate, during the weeks of quiet that followed, I noticed in him a decided change for the better, more determination and resolve. The improvement was so marked that I decided to give him another trial. So one day when it became necessary to send a small detachment to quiet some unruly natives, I put him in command, and he departed with twenty-five men.

"It was the third afternoon after their departure that the officer of the day rushed into my room and reported that a messenger had just arrived with the news that a fight had taken place, and that Lieutenant Dorsey had been killed, but none of the men had been injured.

"It had been a long time since an officer had been brought home dead, and as the body was carried down the line of officers' quarters, every head was uncovered.

"With the death of the lieutenant the command had devolved upon his sergeant-major, a man well advanced in years, who worshipped the very ground upon which his lieutenant walked. It seemed only natural then, when describing the death of his favourite officer, before the members of my staff, that at times his voice should fail him, and tears dim his eyes.

"'It was just the day after we left,' he said, standing at attention, 'that we came upon their deserted camp. From signs we knew that they were not far off, and by noon we had located them. They had taken a position among a lot of rocks, and evidently intended to fight. The lieutenant called to me and said: "The only way to get those rascals out is to charge them. I shall lead. Follow me. Continue the pursuit until every one is taken or killed." We wheeled into line, but before we were fairly ready, he gave the word, and putting the spurs into his horse, bounded away far in the lead. We went after him as fast as possible, but he distanced us, and was far in advance when they opened fire. They fired only about six shots in all, and I saw him discharge his revolver twice in return, and then fall from the saddle. When we reached him he was dead, shot through the heart.

"'I left two men to look after him, while we continued the pursuit, as ordered. We captured four, wounding one, the rest escaped. As there was nothing more to do we returned.'

"That was a gloomy afternoon, and as I sat alone in my room looking over the official report written by my clerk and handed to me for correction and signature, I must acknowledge that I dwelt upon the death of my officer with feeling of the deepest sorrow. I forgot his failings of the past year, and thought only of the bright young fellow whose life had promised so much. It is no wonder that I wrote after the closing lines of the report: 'An officer who was an honour to the service, and died a soldier's death in the performance of his duty.'

"Just as I was about to sign the document my orderly entered and announced that Sergeant-Major Hooper desired to see me. Hooper was the man who had made the report of the lieutenant's death, and thinking he might have some favour to ask, I ordered that he be shown in. He appeared, carrying under his arm a bundle wrapped in an old newspaper.

"'I know that I should report to the officer of the day,' he said, 'but what I have to say is something about the lieutenant's death, and I think I should tell it to you a one.'

"'Something you omitted from your report?' I asked, and my voice must have sounded rather stern. For to withhold facts in such a case was a grave offence.

"'Yes, sir. But what I did not relate before your staff I intended to tell you,' and the same tremour was noticeable in his voice as when he reported the death. 'The facts of the fight are just as I related them. But after the fight I examined the lieutenant. He was dead, but I saw something that made me take off his tunic and put on another.'

"He undid the string of the bundle he carried under his arm.

"'It is the only evidence I withheld from my report.'

"He unfolded the coat, and held it up without a word. As I took it from him, turning it this way and that, to get the light upon it, something fell from the inner left-hand pocket to the floor. Very reverently the sergeant stooped and gathered up—what? Simply a delicate gold rim, a few scraps of blood-stained velvet, and what seemed the fragments of a miniature portrait of a woman painted upon porcelain. Yet though shattered beyond recognition, I think that as we viewed it silently, neither of us doubted whose picture, worn to the last over the young officer's heart, had been destroyed by the bullet that took his life.

"Replacing the remains of the portrait, I held up the coat so that I could see the hole through which the bullet had gone. The blood had long since dried, leaving its stain, but that was not all—the cloth was badly burnt.

"The garment slipped from my nerveless grasp, as a hundred thoughts flashed through my mind, and seizing Hooper by the shoulders, I cried:

"'Your report! You said no one was near him.'

"'I told the truth, sir,' he replied, and his head was bowed for the first time.

"'Heavens!' I breathed, 'you don't mean——'

"There were tears in his eyes as he slowly replied: 'Yes, sir; the lieutenant shot himself.'

"It must have been some hours later when an orderly appeared and asked if the report was ready to be forwarded, as the messenger had been awaiting it for some time. Where had my thoughts been during those hours? In the past, recalling some little act or saying of a brave young soldier who had made his last march.

"I picked up the report and re-read the lines I had added. Should I change them, giving the true facts and thereby cloud his memory? Or should I send it as it stood?

"Ladies and gentlemen, what would you have done in my place?"

H. FAIRFAX.

Digitized by Google

A Special Report.

Fox Kneller was a district reporter on the Southern Star, a half starved, undermanned little provincial daily that was effusively grateful for a three-and-sixpenny advertisement, and threw in half a column of "notice" for a week's four-inch "run."

The Southern Star paid no dividends, being worked at a loss by a handful of local politicians, whose remarks were always given verbatim, with grammatical corrections by the editor, when necessary.

It never by any chance took an independent view of anything, excepting perhaps the weather; lightning and snowstorms not being advertised functions.

Its great rival contemporary was the Daily Dawn, and a reportorial error or even a misprint in that journal caused the Star to twinkle furiously.

Then would the Southern Star's editor—a weary old hulk with a fine education and a riotous nose—take a new nib and wax sarcastic to the full extent of his two-pound-ten a week. Then would the little boys who wrote the "locals" drop in funny lines on their own account, in prose or in verse according to the number of months which had elapsed since they had left school, and the state of their love affairs.

But the Star people looked chiefly to Fox Kneller to uphold their honour and confuse the enemy when possible, and Fox was as keen on the job as anyone.

He had been on the Daily Dawn himself once upon a time, and had left it "through misadventure," as he termed it. To put it briefly, Fox had misjudged the relative importance of Scotch whisky and a weighty political speech. On the night of his downfall the whisky was first and the speech nowhere—that is to say, it was nowhere in the Daily Dawn next morning.

Since that time Fox had taken nothing but coffee in winter and "small lemons" in summer. But he had conceived a venomous dislike for the Dawn people, and anathematised them illogically under his breath every time he saw one of their contents bills.

Curious to say "Fox" was not a nickname. He had been so baptised somewhere in West Cornwall, and possibly the name had suggested the profession of journalist, his forbears having caught pilchards from time immemorial. One of them, however, had, a few hundred years before married the daughter of a stranded French spy, which fact may account for some things.

Anyhow, the name, if scarcely a "Christian" one, fitted him exceedingly well, for his senses were marvellously acute, and that extra one peculiar to pressmen and engine-drivers, which is made up of all the others, together with a mechanical memory and some kind of doggish instinct, was developed in him to an almost incredible extent.

He was of middle height, square-jawed, in Cornish style, talked well, moved in jerks, was unmarried, and never caught colds.

The Dawn editor, an Oxford University man who had been, amongst other things, a war-correspondent and a Cook's tourist guide, had just been appointed when he discharged Fox Kneller, and the remainder of the staff had ever since taken turns, directly or indirectly, according to their position, in making that Oxford man understand what a blunder he had committed.

Fox had the same duties to perform for the Southern Star as he had previously fulfilled for the Daily Dawn, that is to say, he covered a district somewhere about sixteen miles by three, which district included a fashionable watering-place—Fox's home and headquarters—and two country towns of some importance, and lay at its nearest point about ten miles from the assize-town from which both the Daily Dawn and the Southern Star were published.

It was at the station of one of the two smaller towns—Marsh Royal—that Fox Kneller alighted at nine o'clock on this particular October night, to the not over cheerful accompaniment of thick driving rain from the south-east. Fox's advent there may be explained by the following three facts:—

(1) He had for some time past heard mysterious hints of a prize-fight without gloves being arranged between certain champions who were to meet somewhere in that neighbourhood.

(2) At a vestry meeting held that afternoon, he had overheard a churchwarden, known to be addicted to surreptitiously reading pink sporting papers in church, say that he had an important engagement that evening, and had moreover seen him wink, as he said so, to another member, who was an ex-army drill sergeant.

(3) He had, some hours later, seen these two men get into a much over-loaded cab, which cab he had watched driven away by a road that led to only two places, viz., the deep sea, which was absurd, and Marsh Royal, in which locality Fox Kneller now found himself.

The station stood just outside the town itself, and Fox shivered and grunted as he started to walk along the straight, level road, which presently became a street with low melancholy rows of houses on either side, all of one monotonous pattern, and all having the same tragic uninhabited appearance.

The lamps flickered in blue despair, and the pavements near them glistened through the darkness and fog.

Warm visions of a well-lit billiard-room with accompanying cries of "Ah, too hard!" and "Thirty-nine all," flashed across Fox Kneller's mind as he drew his shining waterproof cape more closely around him with a malediction on all forms of "sport"—except billiards.

Digitized by Google

Directly he came upon a building with a series of glowing upper windows, from which issued sounds of revelry and song. He halted opposite it for a few moments.

"Club Social," he muttered, "Jimmy Kent's there and be hanged to him!" and he grinned as there rose before his mental eye a slightly foppish figure with a pince-nez, superciliously listening to the local musical talent of Marsh Royal.

"Jimmy Kent" did the same district for the Dawn, and had in fact stepped into Fox's shoes.

"So near and yet so far, Jimmy," he muttered as he hurried on again. "You'll have something for breakfast besides toast in the morning—that is if I have any luck."

Fox was quite in the dark as to the exact locale of the fight, but he had a tolerably clear notion of where to look.

A few minutes after he had passed the Club, he came upon a triangular piece of shrubbery inclosed by iron railings.

Suddenly turning from the direct road, Fox Kneller passed rapidly to the most unfrequented side of the triangle and there halted.

Rapidly slipping off his waterproof coat he rolled it up tightly and thrust it, with his hat, through the railings into the midst of some shrubs. A little emptying of pockets, and behold the rain from the south-east beat on another Fox Kneller—one with a thick pea-jacket, a fur cap, a coarse red scarf and a square-cut goatee-beard—with a dingy clay-pipe to keep it all fitting company.

The next half-hour saw this transformed individual visiting sundry insignificant red-curtained public-houses, ostensibly in search of a mysterious (and mythical) "Mr. Martin," which individual had, it appeared, promised to meet him that evening at each of these very same public houses in order to "show him some sport."

Two—three—four he tried without success, but upon entering the fifth bar his quick senses immediately became aware of an air of bustle and subdued excitement which seemed very encouraging.

The place was crowded, not with loafing farm hands and unclean clay-cutters as had been the others, but with men of quite a different stamp.

Surely such a collection of small eyes and straight, thin lips were not there for nothing!

"Evening," said Fox, addressing an extremely busy young person with a shock head of orange hair behind the bar, "'ave there been a Mr. Martin here inquiring for me?" hoping fervently two things—that there did not happen to be a Mr. Martin present, and that he had repeated his formula for the last time that evening.

"Scotch yours, sir?—coming, sir—Martin—Martin—don't know no sich name—yes, very good cider, sir,"—thus the young person.

"He told me to meet 'im here," said Fox, growing more certain as he glanced round and affected a dubious air. Then making a bold stroke he sidled up to the bar, and leaning over close to the girl, whispered:

"Where's it coming off, my dear?"

"Straight through the passage," came the prompt reply.

Fox heaved a deep sigh of relief.

"Ah," said he, "give us a Burton."

Retreating with his beverage, he coolly threw it out into the road, and replacing the empty glass, dived into the narrow passage to be confronted by a burly man, who extended a huge, beefy hand.

"Arf a minute! Where's yer t'oket?" said this obstacle in husky tones.

"That's all right, mate, I came with Mr. Parkin's," replied Fox, naming the vestryman; "only I had to go somewhere else first—didn't he tell you?—he got my ticket fur me."

Verbal fiction was a strong point with Fox. Possibly the fact of his having to stick so closely to veracity in his ordinary work made some outlet for romance necessary.

"Ugh! All right, I 'spose," grunted the obstacle doubtfully, and Fox's way was clear.

He stood within a roomy skittle alley transformed for this night only into the prize ring, ropes, stakes and all complete.

With a luck which persistently stuck to him through most of his doings, Fox Kneller had arrived just as the great fight was about to commence, and the consequent excitement and influx of the stragglers from the bar combined to cover Fox's entrance, which might otherwise have more nearly coincided with his exit than would have been pleasant.

There must have been many present whose knowledge of Fox Kneller's features was too good for them to be deceived by even such an excellent disguise as a square-cut goatee-beard. Had he been recognised, it was probable that the anomaly of an illegal prize-fight with an uninvited newspaper reporter present would not have struck the management unfavourably.

However, Fox contrived to establish himself in a comparatively dark corner, and chuckled as he saw the two vestrymen contentedly puffing cigars just opposite.

For a thoroughly detailed description of that fight between the "Bristol Darkey" and the local "Marsh Sparrow," I must refer you to the following day's issue of the Southern Star, which may be seen on the file at the office. Fox gave no particulars as to place or people beyond the principals, but he was very entertaining concerning the way in which the master of the ceremonies unceasingly requested the spectators to "pit their hands together, gents," and that same gentleman's humourous suggestion of a "collection" at the end of the ninth round "to get a bottle of stove-polish for the Darkey's face," which had become somewhat dilapidated.

Fox had been fairly well hardened by inquests and such-like functions, but he felt relieved when the local "Sparrow" lay on the sawdust completely finished, with both eyes closed up, one ear hanging loose, and his nose a mere sanguinary excresence.

Then he quietly slipped round behind the feverish, shouting crowd—which included the orange-haired barmaid—and darted out into the fresh air.

On his way he had to pass the vestrymen. He resisted a strong temptation to reveal himself to them and hurried on. Another quick change at the shrubbery and Fox arrived at the station about thirty minutes before the train which was to bear his "copy" to headquarters left Marsh Royal station.

During the e thirty minutes he sat in a waiting-room and wrote deliriously. As the train came in he sealed up his "frank," and handed it to the guard with a gasp of relief.

"Ah, how do, Fox?" said a well-known voice behind him.

It was Jimmy Kent with his social "item" also for the guard.

Digitized by Google

"What's on to-night—fire—suicide—floods—what is it?" he inquired curiously, for Fox bore a hot, dishevelled appearance, as though he had been running an obstacle race. But a moment was enough for him, so he answered airily:—

"Oh, nothing particular, been up to see an aunt about a tea-cosy," and he winked with a Don Juan-like expression.

"An, naughty, naughty!" said Jimmy, gurgling deeply and wiping the moisture from his streaming eyeglasses.

"Yes, exactly!" concurred Fox absently. Then he used disreputable language to himself behind his coat-collar. He had caught a glimpse of the churchwarden and the drill-sergeant further down the platform. They had evidently not kept their cab, and were going home by the same train as Jimmy Kent and Fox himself, due in a few minutes. Should his rival get within half a dozen yards of those two loud-talking idiots he must smell a rat, and then the fat would be in the fire, for the Dawn acted royally, and had private telephone wires between the head office and its chief representatives. Jimmy could go home and reel off the whole thing before he went to bed—provided he got the chance.

All this flashed through Fox's brain in a few seconds. His course was clear. He must monopolise the Dawn man until he was safe home for the night.

"I saw you go by the club to-night," said Jimmy.

Fox shuddered involuntarily.

"You did—where were you?"

"I was looking out from one of the windows—I'd swear to your straddle anywhere," Jimmy said, complacently lighting a cigarette. "Had half a mind to shadow you just as you did me once, when Sir Tommy was here—only the beastly rain, you know."

"Oh," grunted Fox, wondering if he could lure his companion into the waiting-room and keep him there discussing the texts.

Jimmy Kent's sight was of a peculiar pattern. Had he passed Fox in the street he would probably not have recognised him, but the further an object was from him the more clearly he saw it. It was commonly asserted amongst his brother pressmen that when he read at his lodgings he put the book up in his bedroom and then sat comfortably downstairs and perused it through a crack in the ceiling.

Jimmy Kent wondered long after he got to bed what had come to Fox Kneller that night, ranging furiously as he did from Hypnotism, through Motor-cars, Rudyard Kipling, Socialism, Art and the Drama to parsnip culture, until he made poor Jimmy's head swim, walking him swiftly up and down a section of the platform the while.

When the train came in, Fox rushed his victim into an empty compartment, and after drawing down the blinds, sank suddenly into silence. When they reached their station his electrical behaviour recommenced, and he persisted, to Jimmy's great astonishment, in seeing him home, leaving him at the door with what seemed an almost maniacal laugh.

* * * * *

Next morning at the police-court, Jimmy Kent looked across at Fox Kneller and furtively shook his fist.

"You sweep!" said he, "you and your confounded parsnips!"

"All serene," replied Fox, ostentatiously refolding a copy of the Southern Star with "Brutal Prize Fight Last Night" outwards. L. H. HAROLDS.

£50 OFFERED EVERY WEEK. £50

Every week the Editor of SHORT STORIES addresses 50 envelopes to 50 people in various parts of the country. Inside each envelope he places a sovereign and locks them away in his private safe.

SIMPLY TAKE A POST-CARD

and address it to the Editor under the following conditions: Ask if a sovereign has been addressed to you, giving your full name and address clearly written in ink.

All applications for No. 15 distribution must reach us by January 16th, addressed to The 15th Sovereign Editor, "Short Stories" Office, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Each application must be made separately.

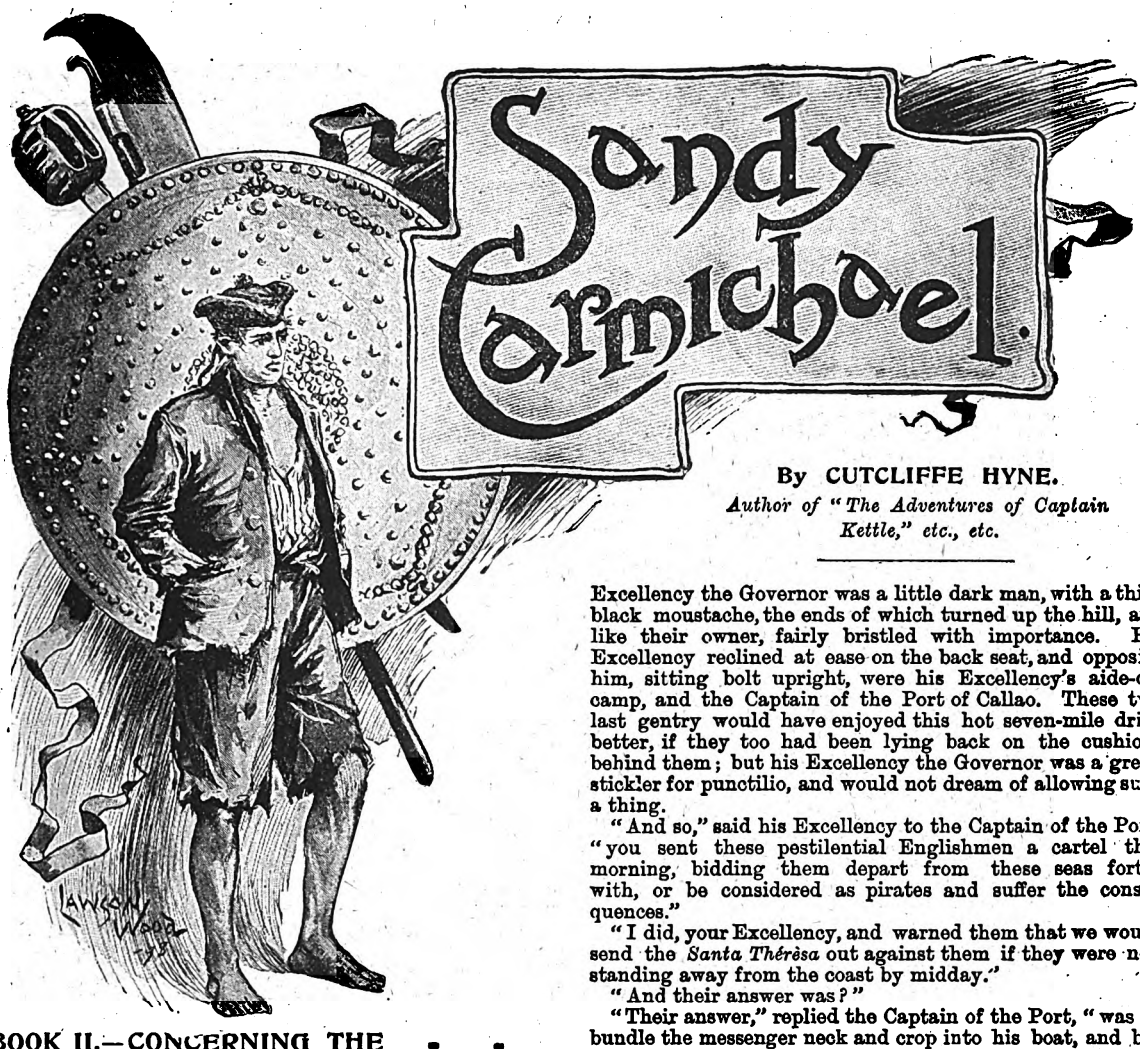
Result of 12th Sovereign Distribution.

100 Sovereigns were set aside for 100 people in this distribution. Only the following three have been claimed:

G. Woodcock, 33 High St., Southover, Lewes, Sussex.
Ernest Moss, 16 Worthbrook Road, Lee, S.E.
A. Cramphorn, 28 Woodlands Rd., Leytonstone, N.E.

Below is a list of the people who failed to apply:

Jas. Paton, 2 West Street, Ibrox Terrace, Broomloan, Govan, Glasgow; W. Landell, 89 High Street, Edinburgh; John Tabb, 4 Brighton Terrace, Penzance; Patrick Clarke, 29 Windham Square, Plymouth; Alf. Robinson, 5 West End Lane, Hamps ead, N.W.; H. Noakes, 29 Castle Street, Upton Park, N.; W. E. Stone, Bexley; W. Walters, 15 George Street, Croydon; Chas. Ruffell, 44 Atwell Road, Peckham, S.E.; R. Spelling, 65 Granville Street, Keighley; John Bingley, 16 Grace Street, Sheffield; Miss B. Henderson, 313 Fratton Road, Portsmouth; W. Needham, 81 Nottingham Street, Rotherham; Mrs. S. Harris, Cintra, Granville Road, Cowes, Isle of Wight; Chas. Parker, 25 Lea Bale Road, Guildford; Miss Osborn, 9 Spencer Road, Putney, S.W.; H. Mersh, Station Road East, Weybridge; Thos. Roope, 41 Victoria Road, Deal; H. King, New Pier Hotel, Station Road, Herne Bay; J. H. Fairhead, 55 Mount Zion, Tunbridge Wells; W. Philips, 66 West Street, Stratford-on-Avon; Jas. Oldaire, 20 Stove Street, Oldbury, Worcester; Jas. Hunt, Tunnel Hill, Worcester; Robt. Potts, 8 Victoria Terrace, Jarrow-on-Tyne; Jas. Young, 44 Stanhope Street, Tyne Dock, South Shields; Henry Busher, 2 Moor View, Newcastle-on-Tyne; Jas. Robinson, 47 Main Street, Keswick; John Bowstead, 6 Church Street, Berwick-on-Tweed; Geo. Tyson, 5 Peppercorn Lane, Kendal, Westmoreland; Turner Russell, 2 Heming.ord Terrace, Conway Street, Birkenhead; Alf. Evans, 1 Lower Bridge Street, Chester; John Robinson, 66 Victoria Road, Seacombe, Cheshire; T. H. Carver, Yew Tree, Garway, Ross; David Gaussen, Marion Hall, Shrewsbury; Jos. Jenner, 49 Castle Street, Cambridge; Mrs. Smith, 5 Avenue Road, Norwich; Mrs. Leggett, 82 Lower Cliff Road, Gor eston, Yarmouth; R. Powling, Kemball Street, Ipswich; Alf. Gillott, 31 Derby Road, Heanor; Geo. Thompson, 26 Ryeland Crescent, Nottingham; Sam Long, 28 Cecil Road, Leicester; U. King, Great Easton, Uppingham; W. Birkett, Abbey Street, Worksop; Albt. James Nowell, 1 Spa Road, High Street, Southampton; N Cavanagh, 23 King Street, Victoria Docks; F. D. Nicholson, 3 Almorah Road, Islington, N.; F. W. Finch, 34 Garter Street, Walworth, S.E.; G. A. J. Hopkins, 1 Gloucester Terrace, Kew Green, Surrey; James Walker, Selkirk Street, Hamilton; John Arthur 12 Beaufort Street, Brynmawr; Jos. Bailey, 158 Albert Road, Middlesborough; Miss Dabb, Gascoigne Villa, Hornsea-with-Burton, Yorkshire; Thomas Edginton, 17 Park Street, Windsor; H. Fisher, The Briar, West Road, Bowdon; George Gat house, Holyhead Road, Coventry; A. Harnden, 2A Mortimer Street, Herne Bay; John James, Hill S reet, Halesowen, Worcestershire; A. Killaway, 24 Station Road, Romsey, Hants; W. Lambert, 43 Bruce Street, Dunfermline; W. Mann, Dunstable Street, Ampthill, Bedfordshire; George Negus, Godmanchester, Hunts; C. E. Oldacres, 3 New Street, Daventry; Andrew Phelan, Main Street, Maryborough; Major Ross, Rosstrevor House, Rosstrevor; Miss S arle, 2 Raleigh Terrace, Exmouth; John Thomas, Clahar Crescent, Mullion, Cornwall; G. J. Woodroffe, 141 Chatsworth Road, Chesterfield; J. Vasey, 10 Carter Gate, Newark-on-Trent; M. Allard, 23 The Square, Market Harborough; Geo. Burton, Northgate Street, Oakham; J. Cattle, 154 Trinity Street, Gainsborough; J. Duffett, Bath Road, Keynsham, Somerset; Mrs. Evans, Queen's Square, Winchcombe, Glos.; Miss Fish, Lightburn Cottage, Ulverston, Lancs.; John Green, 43 Havelock Street, Blackburn; Percy Hall, 79 Hills Road, Cambridge; P. H. Impson, 5 St. Mark's Villas, City Road, Norwich; John Inkpen, Ipswich Road, Stowmarket; Miss Jay, New Street, Ledbury; Roff King, 38 Church Street, Wellington, Salop; G. S. Lamb, Three Tuns, Sodhouse Bank, Gateshead Fell; G. E. Macarthy, 4 Front Street, Tynemouth; G. Nicholson, 12A Burrowgate, Penrith; Mrs. Oram, 6 Castle Street, Kendal; Geo. Jones, Sandy Road, Worksop; Mrs. Beech, Stafford Road, Oakengates; C. Condy, Endsleigh Place, St. Mary Church; A. E. Lower, 51 Station Road, Horsham, Sussex; W. Rees, 16 Alexandra Road, Broadstairs; E. Packman, 10 Arbroath Road, Dundee; C. F. Frost, 11 Bosworth Road, Rugby; Mrs. E. E. M. Mapel, East Bank, Golborne, Lancs.; Mrs. Hill, 58 Clarence Rd., West St., Sutton; Thos. Biggs, St. Sampson's, Guernsey; C. M. Woollsey, 47 Park Hall Rd, East Finchley, N.; A. Wells, 64 James St., Oxford; H. Hands, 12 Lawford Rd., Rugby.



By CUTCLIFFE HYNE.

Author of "The Adventures of Captain Kettle," etc., etc.

BOOK II.—CONCERNING THE - - VOYAGE IN THE SOUTH SEAS.

SUMMARY.

A MAJOR and a cornet of Sheridan's Horse seek refuge in the wilds of Lochaber after the battle of Culloden Moor. They are joined by another refugee, Murtagh O'Neill. The major succumbs to wounds received in the engagement, and a troop of heavy cavalry discover the hiding place of the remaining two fugitives, and give chase to them.

They manage to get away safely and reach St. Peter's Strait, where they discover a trading cutter standing apparently empty. They take possession and make off with their prize before the owner's return. A boy appears out of the forepeak and volunteers to act as pilot, and they decide on a cruise to France.

The cutter is run down in a fog by a British schooner, giving the fugitives only just time to escape on to the larger vessel as their own goes to the bottom.

CHAPTER I.

How his Excellency the Governor of Lima was bearded by deputy; how he sent out the St. Thérèsa to work his vengeance; and how that same vengeance recoiled on his Excellency's own head.

His Excellency the Governor of Lima was coming into Callao as fast as his Excellency's coachman could urge the team of six mules that drew his Excellency's carriage. His Excellency the Governor was a little dark man, with a thick black moustache, the ends of which turned up the hill, and like their owner, fairly bristled with importance. His Excellency reclined at ease on the back seat, and opposite him, sitting bolt upright, were his Excellency's aide-de-camp, and the Captain of the Port of Callao. These two last gentry would have enjoyed this hot seven-mile drive better, if they too had been lying back on the cushions behind them; but his Excellency the Governor was a great stickler for punctilio, and would not dream of allowing such a thing.

"And so," said his Excellency to the Captain of the Port, "you sent these pestilential Englishmen a cartel this morning, bidding them depart from these seas forthwith, or be considered as pirates and suffer the consequences."

"I did, your Excellency, and warned them that we would send the Santa Thérèsa out against them if they were not standing away from the coast by midday."

"And their answer was?"

"Their answer," replied the Captain of the Port, "was to bundle the messenger neck and crop into his boat, and bid him go to the nether regions. And as he rowed off, one shouted to him to tell your Excellency—he used terms of opprobrium which I will not sully my lips by repeating—to tell your Excellency that the sea was made for all men, and especially for Irishmen, and maybe Englishmen, and that the King of Spain was a fool to try and lock up an ocean, since there was nothing the men of his country liked better than to use their swords as a key."

"Blasphemous heretic!" exclaimed his Excellency. "If the messenger can point him out, I'll have that man hanged when his ship is taken."

"So it please your Excellency," replied the Captain of the Port, "the messenger said he should recognise the man again; besides which, we have his name. He shouted out a challenge as the messenger left. 'If any o' them big-wigs ashore has the pluck to feel that they're insulted, tell 'om that it's Murtagh O'Neill that's the man to meet 'em wid pistols, hanger, or boardin'-pike, av they'll give him a shtrip of level beach an' fair play.'"

"Murtagh O'Neill," hissed his Excellency. "'Tis an outlandish name, but I shall remember it when the time comes. And the schooner, where is she now? After boasting and bragging, they ran away, I suppose?"

"No, your Excellency; it grieves me to say that she did not. In fact, the accursed vessel is hove-to a mile off the shore even now. And—and——" the Captain of the Port stammered.

Digitized by Google

Men . . . busily engaged . . . scrubbing clothes.

"And what?" snapped his Excellency testily. "Speak out, man!"

"Your Excellency, they have had the insolence to lash a broom to their mainmast head."

His Excellency swore in fluent Spanish that he would chastise these heretics, who had bearded him, before he was a day older, and then inquired whether they were holding themselves in readiness for action. Whereupon the Captain of the Port replied that the pestilential intruders were employing the time in washing their garments, and hanging them up in various parts of the rigging to dry; at which evidence of how little they cared for him or his authority, his Excellency very nearly fumed himself into a fit. By this time the carriage had driven into Callao, which lay at the water's edge,* and his Excellency was able to see how matters lay for himself. Out there beyond the island of San Lorenzo, with its mole and ship-yard, sliding gracefully over the long Pacific rollers below, lay a shapely schooner, hove-to on the larboard tack. She was riding almost stern-on to the shore, and when her bows rose on the swell, one could see her white decks dotted here and there with men leaning over sundry wash-tubs, with sleeves rolled up above the elbow, and hands busily engaged in the homely operation of scrubbing clothes. Above their heads, festooned on lines depending on the rigging, hung sundry grotesque evidences that the occupation had been going on for some time; whilst above all, lashed to a slender spire of wood that the vessel's movements caused to describe cones and arcs of circles in space, was a humble, deck-scrubbing besom, whose significance was beyond misconception.

His Excellency grated his teeth, tugged at his black moustache, abused his underlings, and strutted up and down like an excited bantam cock for some considerable time. Then he remembered the battery on the mole, and ordered its guns to be manned. The English were half-a-mile out of range? Carramba! He always knew them to be cowards. Then the Santa Thérèsa must put out and annihilate them.

This being the most obvious order to give, it had been more or less anticipated. The Santa Thérèsa was a most majestic and most cumbersome two-decker, built in the year of grace 1634. She had aftercastle and forecastle, barricades, and close-quarters; she had three huge poop lanthorns, each large enough to hold half-a-dozen men, and bulky round tops on her pole masts. Batteries bristled from every part of her, expected and unexpected. In gilding and carved wood-work, she was rich beyond description; and on her stern was a splendid picture of Santa Thérèsa, from the brush of a renowned artist. Her early designers had fitted her with courses and topsails only; but the rigger of later days had added a fore and main topgallant; so that now she could spread a goodly show of canvas.

A vessel of this size—she was over twelve hundred tons—naturally requires a heavy crew; and, in view of the emergency, men had been pressed from every craft in the harbour to serve aboard her. These had been bustling about various duties long before his Excellency the Governor put in an appearance; and directly the formal order was given for her to go out and give battle, every available soldier in garrison was marched on board of her. She had her powder on board, and being plentifully supplied with small arms, bullets, round shot, and similar engines of destruction, the Governor said that there was no occasion for her to delay a moment longer.

He felt as though a hot branding-iron was being held against some unseen part of his person. Let her fly at this insolent foreign cur's throat, and worry it to death. The Captain of the Port, who had a brother on board the Santa Thérèsa, ventured to suggest that it was unwise to put to sea with no provisions on board, and with water-casks gaping with the drought. But his Excellency snapped him up in the moment. "Do you think," he almost screamed, "that it is a campaign we are entering upon? Do you dare to tell me that yon accursed craft will be floating on the seas at sundown? No; she will be sunk at the first broadside. The holy power of Spain knows how to avenge an insult in a way that makes men chary of boarding her a second time. I tell you, Senor, I will not have that vessel brought in to contaminate His Majesty's harbour of Callao. If she doesn't sink, she shall be burnt. And of her crew, if any chance to be saved, I'll send them to the mines for the remnant of their miserable lives: excepting always that miscreant Murtagh O'Neill, for whom no death can be too bad, however slow and bitter."

Thus, his Excellency the Governor of Lima.

Meanwhile the Santa Thérèsa cast off from the mole, and stood across to the shallow spit which forms the other side of the harbour; whence, after a narrow shave of missing stays and going ashore in the surf, she managed to clear the mole, and draw gradually out to sea. The breeze was westerly, and the English schooner lay dead to windward of her. This was unfortunate, for the Santa Thérèsa had but little pace except when running free. But there was no help for it, and her commander kept her on down the coast, hoping that she would look up to the schooner on the next tack, and perhaps get the weather-gage of her.

Meanwhile his Excellency had marched solemnly up to the mole, with his suite in dutiful attendance. The road took a considerable circuit, and they were nearly an hour over it; all the time being out of sight of the sea. But as there was no sound of firing, they concluded the action had not commenced.

"She has run away," his Excellency asserted. "She ran the very moment she saw the Santa Thérèsa begin to move

* The old town of Callao was destroyed by earthquake in the succeeding year, viz., 1746. The new town lies further inland.

Digitized by Google

out of harbour. Cowards! I always did say that the Englishmen could brag and boast with any one, but that they'd never stand up for an equal fight."

But when directly afterwards his Excellency stood up upon the ramparts, and noted that objectionable English schooner in almost exactly the same position she had occupied before, and saw her pestilential crew still occupied with their laundry work, then his Excellency thought within himself that he had been rather premature in his remarks, and regretted having given utterance to them. But he did not own to his mistake aloud. No. He anathematised the impudent schooner with all the power that the Spanish language is capable of. He swore that she was staying on to the last moment out of sheer bravado, and declared that she would turn tail and endeavour to escape ere ever the Santa Thérèsa came within gunshot.

His suite remained respectfully and judiciously silent. His Excellency seldom brooked contradiction at all; and in his present mood he would resent it violently. Besides, their own vessel had gone about, and was approaching surely, if slowly, on the larboard tack. She would be in range directly; and if the English schooner did not wait till the last moment, and then show a quick pair of heels—well—she could not avoid capture.

But the English crew phlegmatically continued rinsing and wringing out their spare garments, apparently in no wise disturbed by the great engine of destruction that was bearing down upon them.

The Spaniards on shore could not make it out at all. Here was their huge war vessel almost within the range of her heavier guns, and the intruder did not so much as deign to notice them. Surely there must be some ruse in store. But what could it be? They began to look askance at one another. Spaniards were almost as superstitious then as they were a couple of centuries before, and more than one whisper of "Art-magic," "Aided by their patron saint, the devil," "Infernal agency to fall back upon," and the like was freely passed around.

And certainly, from an onlooker's point of view, it did look uncanny. The schooner was not more than two hundred tons burden, if that; and the Spanish carrack was, as I have said, at least twelve hundred. The one was flush decked, and low in the water. All her men would be exposed to an enemy's fire. The other towered high above the sea, and had almost all her fighting crew snugly ensconced behind stout wooden battlements. The English craft boasted of less than eighty men. The Spaniard had a complement of four hundred, and six times her small opponent's weight of heavy ordnance. Yet the schooner waited, with her crew hard at work washing, and apparently sublimely indifferent to the onset. Truly, from a spectator's gaze-point, there was something mysterious about the affair.

Nearer and nearer the Santa Thérèsa drew, and his Excellency, and his Excellency's suite on the mole, could scarcely breathe for excitement. She got within range, and several of the bow guns fired—three or four on either broadside popping off likewise; these last doubtless through accident.

As though touched by a magician's wand, the crew of the schooner seemed to throw off their torpor. The grotesque strings of drying garments came down on the decks in an instant. Up went foresail and jibs. The topsails were let fall and sheeted home. Fore-staysail-sheet was let draw, and before any of the Spaniards clearly knew what was happening, the schooner was passing across the Santa Thérèsa's bows, raking her at long range with her starboard battery; not blazing away at random, but firing every gun deliberately, as it bore. The large ship fell into great confusion. Ropes were flying, sails were perforated, and there were a dozen men lying in the crowded 'tween decks killed or wounded. Before they could pull themselves together, "Bang! Crash! Bang! Bang! Crash! Slish! Splinter! Bang!" came another broadside. The schooner had gone about like a top, and repassing close across her antagonist's bows, had raked her at pistol range with the larboard guns. These had been double shotted; but the charges were sufficient for the short distance, and the big Spaniard was riddled like a sieve.

There were a good many men killed, but worse than that (from a fighting point of view) the foremast, wounded by the first discharge, had parted, under the impact of a second shot just beneath the round top, bringing down the small-arm men who were aloft, forecourse, foretopsail, and foretopgallantsail, all by the run, leaving the foredeck in a most unholy hamper of blood, canvas, spars, and rigging. Add to which, the Santa Thérèsa forthwith refused to answer her helm, and lay stolidly head to wind, in spite of all efforts to get her under control again. But she had not given in by any manner of means. Her rigging —what was left of it—was still gaudy with ensigns and banners, that of Spain being conspicuous in no less than three several places; and her commander, whatever his private opinion was of the probable outcome of the combat, had no intention of striking then, if at all. So he ordered the fire to be kept up, and his gunners blazed away with every gun which could be brought to bear, and with a good many which couldn't; thereby keeping their spirits up (through excitement), and doing about as much harm to the schooner and her crew as they would have done to the moon by heaving pebbles at her.

His Excellency stood up upon the ramparts.

Digitized by Google

The soldiers were mostly employed as small-arm men, or sharpshooters; and at first they were as wild as the gunners below. But as, so they say, a regiment can always be steadied down if it is only fired into enough—for the survivors learn from the fate of their hotheaded comrades, that coolness and order is an essential—these Spanish soldiers began to see, after an hour's aimless burning of powder, that almost half their number were hors de combat, and those that were left thought fit to use their match-locks more circumspectly, and to endeavour not to throw away a shot.

A third of the Englishmen was hit.

Meanwhile the schooner kept up a heavy fire at long range. Her guns were rapidly served, and accurately trained, and although not to be compared in number with those of the Spaniard, they were of heavier metal, and did ninety per cent. more execution. Indeed, save for a score or so of circular punctures in her canvas, a dozen or so of white splinter marks on bulwarks and lower sides, she was unscathed; and as for her crew, beyond a few trifling scratches here and there, no casualties had occurred amongst them so far.

But when the Spaniard's musketry fire steadied down, first one, and then another, and then a third of the Englishmen was hit; and the captain of the schooner, anxious if possible to lose none of his men, executed a manœuvre which he had mercifully spared the enemy till then, in the humane hope that the Santa Thérèsa would strike her colours without such terrible punishment.

With his schooner under full command—for all running and standing rigging had been made good directly it was shot away—he stood on ahead, and hove his vessel to athwart the Spaniard's bows. Half the larboard guns had been run over to the other side, and with this augmented battery he raked the great ship through and through, once —twice—thrice. The four tiny bow-chasers she could bring to bear were dismounted, and their gunners were swept into eternity. The carnage was immense. Flesh and blood could hold out no longer. Down came the gaudy flag of Spain from the peak. The Santa Thérèsa was a prize to the English schooner.

A prize crew was sent on board to take possession, and proceeded to try and efface as much as possible the injuries to spars and rigging which they had been straining every nerve to effect during the last few hours; and in the meanwhile the schooner lowered another boat, which put off to shore with a flag of truce. The men pulled round the point of the island of San Lorenzo, and brought up to the mole. The officer in the stern relinquished the rudder-lines, drew his sword, and tied a white pocket-handkerchief to it. Then he stepped ashore, and a lad with a drum slung to his neck followed.

"Strike up, Sandy," said the officer; and the youngster rattled away at the drum. He beat his rat-a-plan with more goodwill than talent, having, to tell the truth, but seldom handled drumstick before; but "the intention was good," as a certain Irishman afterwards remarked, and the pair of them, drum leading, marched up to a group of uniformed men who came down to receive them.

An aide-de-camp stepped forward.

"Do you speak Spanish?" he asked.

"Yes, Señor," replied the envoy.

"Then permit me to have the honour of presenting you to his Excellency Don José de Corrio y Vadez de Bato, the Governor of Lima—er—I did not catch your illustrious name —thank you; Señor Don Laurenzo de Sneyd, a native of the happy island of Ireland—ah, beg pardon—England. England; yes, of course. Stupid of me to make such a mistake."

His Excellency bowed; and Sneyd bowed too. His Excellency inquired after Don Laurenzo's health, complimented him on the share he had taken in the action (whatever that might be), and, in fact, was vastly polite. Sneyd, not knowing quite what to make of this, hinted that he had come on business, and that his time was short, and his captain expected him back on board; whereat his Excellency was pleased to state that everything of his, inclusive of his time, was entirely at the disposal of Don Laurenzo of Sneyd.

"Then," said Sneyd bluntly, "I've come to arrange a ransom for the Santa Thérèsa, her crew, this town of Callao, and the shipping that is in the harbour."

This was a tolerably large order, and at first it fairly took his Excellency's breath away. At length he managed to stammer:

"But, Señor, the town and shipping are under the guns of this fort. The Santa Thérèsa and the cowards who manned her I am prepared to treat for, but Callao and the shipping——"

A shrug of the shoulders completed the sentence.

"You thought the Santa Thérèsa a match for us, your Excellency," replied Sneyd, "or you'd scarcely have sent her out. And as for calling her crew cowards, it doesn't say much for the rest, as you doubtless sent the best you had."

"Señor Sneyd," said his Excellency, "your words are very free."

"Maybe; but they are true, your Excellency. Let me see; we were two hours in beating the Santa Thérèsa—— Three hours, do you think, Señor? I give in to you. Three hours be it. Well, if that's the case, I should say we could silence the batteries here, and reduce the fort in about an hour and a half."

"Señor Sneyd," spluttered His Excellency, "I would have you remember that you are in my power."

Digitized by Google

An aide-de-camp stepped forward.

"Señor Governor," responded Sneyd contemptuously, "even if you do neglect my flag of truce, I would remind you that there are such things as reprisals. What do you suppose would happen to your countrymen, who are snugly under the hatches of their own ship out yonder, if you hanged me? Remember who were the aggressors. We were peaceful traders along the coast till you interfered with us. The onus of what has happened must lie on your own heads."

"The law against other nations trading with Spanish colonies was passed by my master the King, Señor," interposed his Excellency, who saw that he had made a mistake, and wanted to exculpate himself on some point if possible. "I am but his humble servant. It is my duty to enforce it so far as lies in my power."

"We will not argue that question," said Sneyd, "as we should probably not agree upon it, and time is precious. I am sent here to treat for a ransom for—if it suits your conscience better to consider it so—ship and crew. But mind, the total may seem excessive, for we have town, fort, shipping, and all, totted up in our bill."

"Well, Señor," said his Excellency in a very constrained voice, "what do you assess them at?"

"Two hundred thousand pillar dollars,* your Excellency. Could any of you gentlemen oblige me with a cigarette?"

His Excellency gasped. "Two hundred thousand pieces of eight! Good Heavens! Señor, we have not so much money in the country!"

"As you are a gentleman, I must believe your Excellency although Lima is reported worthy of its name, 'City of Kings,'" replied Sneyd; "but, as I am a gentleman, believe me that we intend to have that precise sum, or its equivalent in specie, by to-morrow midday. If it is not forthcoming—you must take the consequences."

"And the consequences will be, Señor?"

"We haven't contemplated them, your Excellency," returned the envoy drily. "We judged that you would take the wise course, and not force us to extremities. Sacking a town is a very wasteful way of collecting one's revenues, for all parties."

"Señor, I must ask your permission to confer apart with my advisers. If you will accompany my aide-de-camp, he will see to your personal comforts so far as our humble resources permit of."

Sneyd bowed, and followed the aide, who led to a house where a sumptuous meal was laid out in readiness for the Governor.

"We may as well fall-to, Señor," said the aide-de-camp. "His Excellency won't have much appetite just now. Never mind the servants, we'll look after ourselves. Uncork that bottle of country wine beside you, and I think you'll own it's not bad; and let me give you a little of this pie. I can't tell you what's in it, but we may take the contents on trust, as his Excellency is the greatest epicure

* So named from their having the pillars of Hercules stamped on the reverse side. Also spoken of as "Pieces of Eight." Worth about 4s. 3d. The Spanish dourо is the same to-day.

Digitized by Google

in all South America. Allow me, as an enemy, though I hope a courteous one, to compliment you on the success of your arms to-day over ours. Considering the numbers engaged on either side, your efforts were something marvellous, and your courage wonderful."

"I thank you, Señor, in the name of my shipmates and myself, but I think you over-rate us. Your side was handicapped. Your vessel was, pardon my saying it, no match for our schooner. It was our fortune to have a craft which outmanœuvred yours, that was all."

"But, Señor Sneyd, that alone could not account for such a crushing defeat as you have dealt us. See the way your men worked."

"Your own countrymen strove just as hard, Señor, but they laboured under the disadvantage of no knowing their ship, their guns, their officers, each other. We perforce, through long herding together, have acquired this trivial knowledge. Send the Santa Thérèsa and her complement to sea for a week, and she'd be able to cope with six schooners such as ours, and thirst for more."

With such an interchange of compliment did the meal pass away, each decrying his own countrymen and praising his opponent's. The custom was truly Spanish, and new to Sneyd, but he picked it up quickly enough, and, determined not to be outdone in politeness, capped all the aide's pretty speeches with others even more unveracious and fulsome. Over their cigarettes and coffee, Sneyd artfully drew his companion out about the resources of the country; decried Lima, and got him to give a fairly accurate description of its wealth and prosperity; and so with the other points of interest in the neighbourhood. The Spaniard, jealous for the honour and credit of his adopted country, lauded it to the skies, showing up all its good points in the most favourable light. When he had come to the end of his eulogies, Sneyd said quietly, "Thanks, Señor; your country seems more blessed by nature than any other on earth; Midas would have felt a poor man in Peru; and I do not think that our trivial impost will draw more than a feather's weight from your exchequer's balance."

The Spaniard bit his lip. He saw the blunder he had been led into, but, grasping the fact that what had been said could not be recalled, regained his presence of mind again on the instant. "You English, Señor, are, it seems, our superiors in the gentle art of diplomacy, as well as the rougher art of war," he remarked, with a courtly bow. "Doubtless I should have withheld much of the information which you have so skilfully drawn from me, had I had sufficient forethought to see the obvious deduction you would take from it; but as matters stand you have gained your point, and I can only ask that you will not embroil me with my superiors by saying whence your knowledge of our circumstances was derived."

Sneyd assured him on this point, and went on to say, "In defiance of the embargo which your king has laid upon the vessels of foreign powers doing such a thing, we have been trading all up the coasts, and from the Indians, from the half-breeds, and from your own countrymen have we heard of the great wealth centred in Lima. So, Señor, it was only to confirm their report that I ventured to sound you on the point; and so you may comfort yourself with the assurance that you have told me nothing of vital interest that I did not know before. But here comes his Excellency."

Both Sneyd and the aide-de-camp rose to their feet as the little great man entered.

"I accede to your part of your demand, Señor Sneyd," said his Excellency. "The ransom you claim is beyond my power to deliver. But I faithfully promise to have one hundred and twenty thousand pieces of silver, or their value in uncoined specie, ready for embarkation by midday to-morrow. Think before you reject the offer, Señor," he continued, as he saw Sneyd was about to speak. "The sum is an immense one. By refusing it, you may get nothing at all."

The money . . . was taken on board, counted, and stowed away in the hold.

"And the Santa Thérèsa and her crew, your Excellency; what do you suppose will happen to them if our negotiations fail?"

His Excellency shrugged his shoulders. "They must abide by the fortune of war, Señor."

"Then, as your Excellency refuses to accede to my terms, I shall return on board, and my commander will carry out the threat as regards Callao and the shipping which I have had the honour to communicate."

"Your commander may not find the fort on the mole here so easy to reduce as he thought for, Señor Sneyd," sneered the Governor.

"That means you are marching men out of Lima to occupy it?"

His Excellency nodded. "They will be here in half-an-hour, Señor."

Sneyd coolly relit his cigarette. "Would your Excellency oblige me by sending someone to look out to seaward?"

An aide-de-camp left the room, and returning shortly, announced that the English schooner was heading into the harbour. Sneyd imperturbably watched the blue smoke rising from his cigarette. His Excellency's brow darkened. "What does this mean, Señor?" he demanded.

"It means, Señor Don José de Lato, that my captain isn't such a fool as you took him for. He had a man on his foret'gallant-yard from the moment of my landing. That man commanded the Lima road with a glass. He reported a mounted messenger galloping out from here—do I not speak correctly?—The drum beat to quarters forthwith, the guns were cast loose, and the schooner's decks cleared for action. Then the look-out reports that a body of troops is being marched out from the city and is heading towards Callao. The schooner is promptly headed towards the harbour."

His Excellency trembled with rage. "You are a bold man, Señor Sneyd, to beard me thus."

Digitized by Google

"As I said before, your Excellency, a flag of truce—and dread of reprisal on the prisoners we hold—are my safeguards."

The Governor of Lima paced up and down the room like a bear in a cage.

"To prevent this bombardment," he said, "how shall I proceed?"

"Send a messenger to bid the soldiers march back again, your Excellency, and order two hundred and ten thousand dollars to be ready for handing over to me by midday to-morrow."

"How, Señor, do you think to trifle with me, and raise your demands in this arbitrary fashion? I would have you know that I, the vicegerent of his sacred Majesty the King of Spain, Governor of Lima, and——"

"Your Excellency, I pray you pardon my interruption, but kindly look through the window at your back. The schooner is just passing the spit, and putting down her helm to run up alongside here. She is handling some of her canvas, if you notice, and in five minutes will be at anchor. Directly after that my commander will open fire. He is not a man who brooks being trifled with."

The facts were apparent; and his Excellency, completely cornered, gave in without further demur. That the impudent little schooner would bombard his fort and town without further parley, if the money was not paid, he felt convinced; and he likewise was pretty tolerably confident that he would still have to find the ransom—perhaps with another substantial sum added to it—all the same.

So he said, "Señor Sneyd, I bow to the force of your stronger hand. My aide-de-camp starts this minute ventre à terre along the Lima road, to bid the troops fall back again into the city. The two hundred thousand dollars shall be ready by midday to-morrow."

"Two hundred and ten thousand, your Excellency, and not a maravedi less."

"Señor Sneyd, consider."

"Señor Don José de Lato, I would have you note that the schooner has run down head sails, and will be at anchor the moment way is off her."

His Excellency wrung his hands, vowed he was ruining his province, and promised that the full amount should be forthcoming; and Sneyd, walking smartly out of the room, waved a signal to the schooner to hold her fire.

It was a close thing. The guns had been run out; the men stood by them; linstocks were smoking: it needed only a word of command for the work of destruction to begin.

There came a hail from the schooner, "Are you and the boy all right, Sneyd?"

"All well."

"Are they going to pay up?"

"They promise to."

"D'ye know that a lot of soldier fellows are marching in along the Lima road?"

"Yes, I judged it from your turning up. But there's an order sent post haste for them to march back again."

"Oh, that's as well for all parties. But tell the dons that if they try any more of their 'anky-panky tricks, I'll blow the whole blessed place down about their ears."

Sneyd translated this polite message to the Governor, who had come out to him, and then the captain of the schooner hailed afresh—

"I say, Sneyd! Anybody know English there?"

"No," said Sneyd, "I don't think so."

"That's good. Who's that fat old chap at your elbow? 'Im with the black moustaches that are tickling his eyes?"

"His Excellency the Governor of Lima, with a name as long as the main-halyards. Call him Don José de Lato for short."

"H'm—funny sort of fish. Looks like the frog in the fable, who tried to blow 'isself up till 'e was as big as an ox. Well, tell 'im from me, that I'm going to quarter a boat's crew in that fort of 'is for the hevenin.' It'll take temptation out of 'is way. If the place was empty 'e might 'avo a shy at throwing some men into it after dark, and blazing away at us when we weren't ready for 'em. Say we'll clear out when the stuff's handed over without damaging anything, if we ain't annoyed."

Sneyd toned down the rough edges of the message in his translation, but even in its honeyed form the pill was a bitter one for his Excellency to swallow. It showed that the commander of the English schooner didn't trust him. And what made this all the more poignant, was a strong hint from his Excellency's own conscience that the Englishman was acting very judiciously; for, to tell the truth, his Excellency had been conning over a little piece of mild treachery.

The schooner would lie peacefully at anchor, so he thought, and those of her crew who did not get drunk—Englishmen always tippled heavily in harbour, so he'd been told—those who didn't get tipsy would sleep very soundly after their hard day's work. If the fort could be stealthily manned under cover of the darkness, then he would get the upper hand. The schooner lay directly under the heavy guns of the fort, and before their crew knew where they were, their heretical craft would be sunk beneath them. The glamour of victory would blazon over the means taken to obtain it. Modified somewhat, the move could very well be described as a masterly piece of strategy, and, once he finished the affair successfully, that little mishap with the Santa Thérèsa could be easily glossed over or forgotten.

This was something like the outline of his Excellency's scheme, and here this brutal Englishman spoils it. Don José could have wept with annoyance. But he restrained himself. That particularly cool person, the envoy, was waiting beside him for an answer, and reluctantly his Excellency gave the desired concession. There was no help for it. There, in the middle of the harbour, was that infernal schooner showing her ugly broadside, and the gunners were standing beside their pieces, each with a smouldering linstock in hand. His Excellency the Governor of Lima was more neatly pinned than he had ever been in his life before, and as he most devoutly hoped never to be again.

The boat's crew, armed to the teeth, came ashore, amb'ed up to the fort and took possession, as if the doing so were the greatest lark in the world; and the discomfited Spaniards had to look on non-interferent. His Excellency felt himself a ruined man. No amount of twisting and turning could get over the fact that the batteries of his seaport had been occupied by a handful of English free lances. Euphuism has its limits, even in a Spanish officer's despatches. Still, there was no help for it, and so he and his suite sorrowfully wended their way back to Lima to arrange for the ransom.

The money paid—either in specie, or coined dollars—they knew that their incubus would leave them. For, strangely enough, though they would not have hesitated in the least to further their own cause by treachery, and lies, and deceit, they had a perfect confidence that the English would evacuate the place, so soon as ever they had been paid off.

And so it turned out. The money collected from one place and another—from the royal treasury in part, and the balance by loans from the merchants—the money, packed in boxes, was brought down by a string of mules in the early morning, taken on board, counted, and stowed away in the hold; and then after recalling her men from the shore, and hoisting in boats, the schooner weighed her anchor, and, putting out to sea, disappeared into the distance.

(To be continued.)

Digitized by Google

Pearson's 100 Best Books

ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND OF THESE BOOKS WERE SOLD WITHIN FORTY-EIGHT HOURS OF OUR ANNOUNCEMENT.

THE MAIN OBJECT of this colossal offer is to enable those people to secure a presentable library who would otherwise be debarred from doing so on account of the enormous expense. Under the conditions which govern our offer you are enabled to secure fifty of the books—of which a list appeared last week and in the previous issues of "S.S."—for the initial payment of ten shillings, while the complete hundred will be sent to you on receipt of a postal order for twenty shillings, accompanied in each case by one of the coupons to be found below.

A big advantage lies in the fact that an extra twenty volumes is placed at the disposal of readers, any of which they may exchange for those that do not strike their fancy in the big list.

Altogether there are about 60,000 pages of reading matter, and many hundreds of illustrations, maps and plans, etc.

That the books are approved of by the highest authorities is unquestionable. Every post brings in letters of commendation from well-known literary and scientific men, who would scarcely have troubled to express their satisfaction spontaneously had the list been a second-rate one. As all these letters are written to me personally I cannot abuse their confidence by stating names, but I give below a few extracts which go to show the general tone of the letters.

A Scotch Professor writes:

"Your list is indeed a comprehensive one, and the task of selection must have been the result of many weeks of labour."

A Bishop writes from the West of England to say:

"I do not think that there is one book in the whole list to which one could take objection. If I were going to found a Library, I should have selected at least eighty per cent. of those you are offering for such a nominal sum. And I do not think that I am altogether a novice in these matters as I have in my library over 8,000 books."

A London Physician says, in ordering three sets of these books:

"Your effort to supply the public with sound and standard books on such reasonable terms is to be highly commended. I only hope that the offer will be largely taken advantage of."

MONTHLY PAYMENT ORDER FORM FOR 100 BOOKS.

Date .....

Please send me the hundred books as marked by me, carriage paid. I enclose 10s., and agree to make my next payment of 20s. when I receive the hundred volumes, and my succeeding six payments of 20s. on the corresponding day of each month following. Until I have paid you the whole £7 10s. I engage that the volumes, not being my absolute property, shall not be disposed of by sale or otherwise.

Signed .....

Address .....

.....

HOW TO OBTAIN 100 BEST BOOKS FREE.

Any reader who sends along ten of the coupons below, together with the names and addresses of the subscribers and the initial payments, will receive a complete set free of charge. If you want 100 books you must send ten order forms for 100 books; if you want 50 books you must send ten order forms for 50 books. You must not send some of each.

MONTHLY PAYMENT ORDER FORM FOR 50 BOOKS.

List No. ..... Date .....

Please send me the fifty books as marked by me, carriage paid. I enclose 10s., and agree to make my next payment of 10s. when I receive the fifty volumes, and my succeeding six payments of 10s. on the corresponding day of each month following. Until I have paid you the whole £4 I engage that the books, not being my absolute property, shall not be disposed of by sale or otherwise.

Signed .....

Address .....

.....

ALL COMMUNICATIONS TO BE MADE TO "BEST BOOKS DEPARTMENT," C. ARTHUR PEARSON LTD., HENRIETTA STREET, LONDON, W.C.

Digitized by Google

A Last Visit.

THEY called her Queen Elizabeth in Burford. No one knew why. Perhaps because she spoke with authority, like an officer in command, or because she was big, bony and imperious.

Possibly, also, because she governed a small kingdom of dumb creatures—hens, dogs, cats, canary birds, parrots—all things dear to an old maid's heart. She ruled these, her subjects, with a rod of iron; she was not given to any weakness of pet names, or loving, caressing words, such as flow so easily from the lips of most women. On the contrary, she governed with authority; she resigned absolutely.

She was harsh of voice, stiff of mein; she brooked neither contradiction, replies, hesitation, illness nor fatigue. She herself was never known to complain, never heard to regret anything, never to envy anyone. "Every one has his day," she said with the conviction of a fatalist.

She never went to church, she despised the clergymen, and hesitated not to express her contempt for all religious observances.

During the thirty years that she lived in the little house, with its tiny garden in front, she had altered nothing. The only change ever made was the implacable dismissal of her little servants when they reached their twenty-first year. There were no futile tears nor regrets wasted over her numerous dogs, cats, birds, when they died off by accident or of old age; she simply dug a little hole in the corner of the garden, threw them in, kicked the dirt over them, and calmly found a new subject to fill the place of the departed one.

Her few acquaintances in town were among the families of clerks employed in the neighbouring town during the day. Occasionally these people invited her to have tea with them. She invariably fell asleep at all these festivities, and had to be aroused when the time came to go home. No one was ever allowed to accompany her by day or night. She never appeared to care for children.

She spent her time like a man—carpentering, gardening, cutting wood with a saw or chopping it with an axe, keeping the old house in repair, even doing a mason's work when necessary.

She had two sisters, Mrs. Briggs and Mrs. Wood, the one having married a dealer in medical herbs, the other a man of small independent means. These people came to see her twice a year. The Briggses had no children. The Woods were blessed with three—Harry, Margaret, and Joseph. Harry aged twenty, Margaret seventeen, and little Joseph, only three.

No affection seemed to exist between the old maid and her relatives.

In the spring of 1882 Queen Elizabeth fell suddenly ill. The neighbours called in the doctor. She promptly ordered him about his business. The curate also put in an appearance. She jumped out of her bed, and chased him from the house.

The poor little maid, in despair, made herb tea for her.

After three days in bed, her condition became so grave that the cooper next door had a consultation with the doctor, and thereupon took the responsibility of sending for her relations.

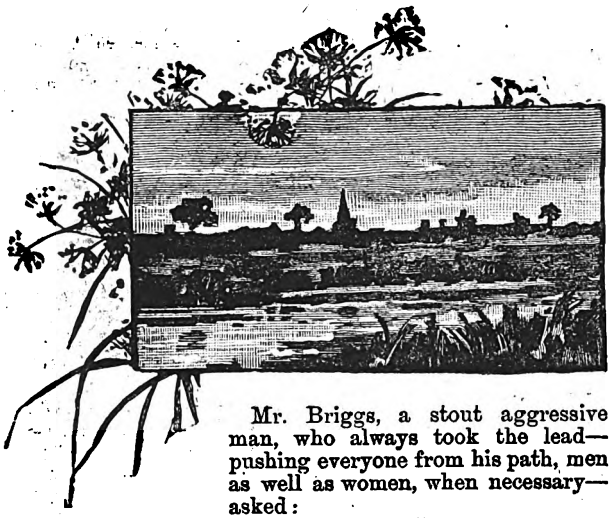
The two sisters, with their respective spouses, arrived by the same train, about ten o'clock in the morning. The Woods brought little Joseph with them.

At the garden gate, the first thing they saw was the little maid, leaning disconsolately against the side of the house, and weeping bitterly.

The dog lay asleep in the sun. The cats lay stretched at full length on either window-sill, their eyes shut, their tails extended. A big hen, surrounded by a brood of chicks, clucking noisily, strutted about the yard. A big cage hung against the wall, covered over with chickweed, and in it a number of birds were singing themselves hoarse in the joyous brightness of the spring morning.

The doves, in another cage, sat tranquilly side by side on the perch.

Digitized by Google



Mr. Briggs, a stout aggressive man, who always took the lead—pushing everyone from his path, men as well as women, when necessary—asked:

"Well, Clara, things going badly?"

The little maid sobbed through her tears:

"She doesn't know me now. The doctor says the end has come."

They all looked at each other. Mrs. Briggs and Mrs. Wood silently embraced. They were very much alike, these two women; they always dressed their hair alike, and wore red dresses and French bonnets of an amazing hue.

Briggs turned to his brother-in-law, a little, pale, jaundiced-looking man, who also, added to his other misfortunes, limped painfully, and said seriously:

"Ah! Just in time!"

But no one had yet dared to enter the chamber of the dying woman, which was on the ground floor. Even Briggs, always so consequential, ceded, for the time, the right of way. It was Wood who finally decided to enter first, forging along with the see-sawing motion caused by his lameness, and making the pavement ring with the iron ferrule of his stick. The two women next ventured, and Briggs brought up the rear. Little Joseph remained outside, beguiled by the sight of the dog.

A ray of sunlight lay across the bed, lighting up sharply the hand which twitched nervously, opening and shutting continually. The fingers moved as if animated by some fixed idea. The angular form lay rigid under the sheet. The eyes were closed.

The relatives formed a half-circle round the bed, watching, without speaking, the heaving breast and laboured breathing. The little maid followed them, still weeping. At last Briggs said:

"Tell me exactly what the doctor said."

The girl sobbed.

"To leave her alone. Nothing can be done," she replied.

All at once the old maid's lips began to move. She seemed to be saying to herself thoughts hidden in the dying brain, and her hands moved strangely.

Suddenly she spoke in a little thin voice scarcely recognisable—in a voice that seemed to come from afar, from the depths of this lonely creature's heart, possibly.

Briggs walked off on tiptoe, pained at the spectacle. Wood, whose crippled leg fatigued him, sat down.

The two women remained standing.

Queen Elizabeth continued to babble rapid, unintelligible words. She uttered many strange names, calling to them softly and tenderly. "Come here, my little Edith, kiss mamma. You love your mother? Tell me, child. You, Rose, must watch over your little sister while I am out. Be sure and not leave her alone, you understand? And you musn't touch the matches."

She was silent a moment, then, louder, as if some one was calling:

"Helen!" she waited a moment and then continued: "Tell your father to come and speak to me before he goes to the office." Then, suddenly: "I am not quite well this morning, dear; promise to come home early. Tell your chief that I am ill. You know it is dangerous to leave the children alone when I am in bed. I shall make a nice dish of curry for your dinner; the little ones love it. Won't Clara be glad?"

She laughed—such a laugh! with a young and happy ring in it.

"Look at Jackie, how funny he looks! All daubed over with jam, the dirty little fellow! Look, dear, isn't he funny?"

Wood, who fidgeted his lame leg, made stiff by the journey, muttered:

"She's dreaming she has children and a husband. The death struggle is beginning."

The sisters, dumb and stupid with surprise, never stirred.

"Won't you take off your bonnets and shawls, and come into this room?" asked the little maid.

They passed out without saying a word, and Wood followed limping, leaving the dying woman in solitude. Having laid aside their wraps, the women sat down. One of the cats left her seat on the window, stretched herself, hunched her back, and jumped into the room and upon the lap of Mrs. Briggs, who began to stroke her.

From the next room came the voice of the dying woman, living over, without doubt, in those last moments, the life she had long imagined and desired; rehearsing for the last time all her longings and dreams.

Briggs, in the garden, played with little Joseph and the dog, with all the pleasure of a man out for a holiday, forgetful of the departing soul.

Suddenly he entered the house and spoke to the maid:

"My girl, get us some dinner. What would you like, ladies?"

They decided on a rump steak and mashed potatoes, and as Mrs. Wood made a motion of searching for her purse Mr. Briggs stopped her, and, turning to the girl, said:

"You must have some money."

"Yes, sir," she replied.

"How much?"

"Fifteen shillings."

Digitized by Google

"That is enough. Hurry, my girl, I begin to feel hungry."

Mrs. Briggs, looking out longingly at the garden bathed in sunlight, and at two pigeons coquetting on the roof opposite, remarked in a dismal way:

"Such a pity to be here under the circumstances. It would be lovely in the country to-day."

Her sister sighed without answering, and Wood, possibly dreading the suggestion of a walk, muttered:

"My leg hurts me awfully."

Little Joseph and the dog made a terrible noise, the boy shrieking in the excitement of play, the dog barking furiously; they tore round the little garden, chasing each other wildly.

The dying woman continually called her children, talking to each in turn, going through the form of dressing them, caressing them, and even teaching them to read.

"Come now, Jackie, say it after me, A, B, C, D. You don't try, dear. Listen, D, D, D. Do you hear? Try again."

"What extraordinary ideas people have at such moments," Briggs remarked.

Mrs. Wood asked: "Would it not be better to go and sit by her?" But Mrs. Briggs dissuaded her.

"What is the use? You can't do her any good. We are of quite as much use here."

Wood fidgeted, and banged his stick on the floor.

The other cat entered, tail in air.

One o'clock struck before they sat down to dinner.

They had scarcely tasted the wine when Wood, who had been ordered to drink Burgundy, and only of the choicest vintage, called the servant.

"My girl, is there nothing better than this in the cellar?"

"Yes, sir, there is the wine that has always been served to you when you were here before."

"Well, bring us three bottles."

They seemed to enjoy the wine; not that it was anything very fine, but it had been fifteen years in the cellar. Briggs, smacking his lips pronounced it "good wine for an invalid."

Wood, possessed with a strong desire to have the wine for his own use, asked of the maid: "How much of it is still in the cellar?"

"Oh, a lot of it, sir. Mistress never drank any of it."

He then turned to his brother-in-law.

"If you don't mind, Briggs, I would like to make an exchange with you for this wine. It suits me admirably."

Joseph and the dog, having satisfied their hunger, went back to the garden.

Queen Elizabeth continued talking, but now in a lower voice: the words were barely audible.

When they had finished their coffee, they all returned to the sick room to ascertain the condition of the patient. She appeared to be calm.

They left her alone again and sat in the garden to better digest a good dinner.

All at once the dog tore about the chairs, rushing in and out, holding something in his mouth. The child chased wildly after him. Both disappeared in the house.

Briggs fell asleep in the sunlight.

The dying woman began to talk aloud. All at once she cried out.

The two women and Wood hurried in. Briggs awoke but did not stir; he disliked such scenes.

She was sitting up in bed, a wild look in her eyes. The dog, to escape pursuit, had leapt up on the bed, jumped over the poor thing, and entrenched himself behind the pillows. He looked at his little comrade with shining eyes, ready to begin the fray again. He held in his mouth one of his mistress's slippers, all in rags from the rough play.

The child, frightened by the woman who had so suddenly confronted him, stood still, gazing at the bed.

Queen Elizabeth cried with a piercing voice:

"No, no, I will not die. I will not. I will not. Who will bring up my children? Who will take care of them? Who will love them? No, no, I cannot, I cannot. I——"

She fell back. All was over.

The dog, still full of excitement, jumped to the floor, bounding about.

Wood ran to the window, and called his brother-in-law: "Come, quick! Come, quick! She's gone!"

Then Briggs arose, and resuming his usual important air, stalked into the death chamber, saying:

"Thank goodness, it's over!"

GEORGE MARRYATT.

"WAS your ship crippled by the storm?" asked the reporter. "She was not," replied the captain, "though she lost all her hands."

HAZEL: "Weren't you awfully afraid the first time you crossed the ocean?"

Nuttie: "Well—er—for a time I did feel a sort of groundless apprehension."

CUSTOMER: "Tell me, waiter, why do you only recommend stewed tripe to-day. Is it so excellent?"

Waiter (confidentially): "No, it isn't even fresh, but if there's anything left we have to eat it."

"I'D like to know when you are going to pay this bill? I can't call here every day."

"H—m! What day would suit you best to call, then?"

"Saturday."

"Very well; call every Saturday."

"THE only way for a man to learn all about women is to get married."

"And study the ways of his wife, eh?"

"Naw. Listen to what she tells him about the other women."

HAD TRIED THEM.—Little Dot: "Mamma read in a paper that a deaf man in the country was stung by a swarm of bees, and now he can hear as well as ever."

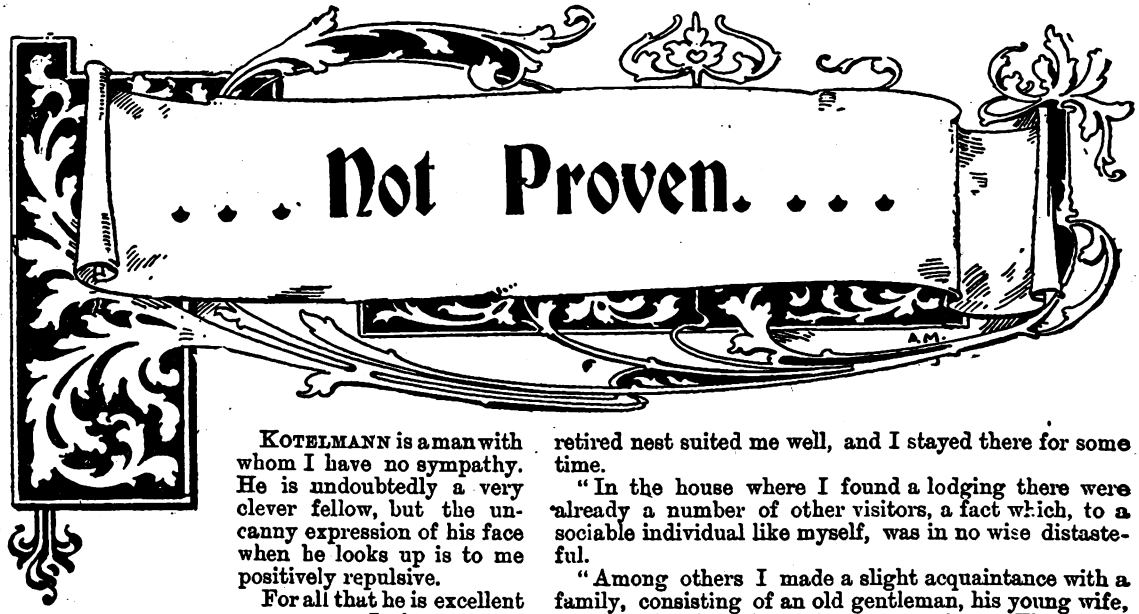
Little Dick: "I don't see how bee-stings could make a deaf man hear—but I should think they'd make a dumb man speak."

IN a Houston family, which was in rather poor circumstances, the arrival of a wealthy aunt was expected. The aforesaid aunt, by some accident or other, had lost a portion of her nose. The children were reminded frequently not to make any reference whatever to the defective nasal organ. The wealthy aunt arrived; but she had scarcely taken off her bonnet when the littlest kid in the flock exclaimed:

"Papa, you told us not to say anything about aunt's nose. Why, she hasn't got any nose at all!"

Digitized by Google

. . . Not Proven. . . .



KOTELMANN is a man with whom I have no sympathy. He is undoubtedly a very clever fellow, but the uncanny expression of his face when he looks up is to me positively repulsive.

For all that he is excellent company. I have spent many hours, many an evening, in his society and must, in fairness, own that I have never found him wearisome or dull.

Not long ago I took a walk with him. As we sauntered through the stubble-fields we discoursed of this and that, and at last we got upon the topic of the latest murder which had been reported in the press.

Kotelmann, as we talked about these things, had the look that always made my hair stand on end. We were discussing the question of circumstantial evidence and its value.

"In ninety-nine cases out of a hundred," I remarked, "there is nothing else to be done but to convict the criminal upon circumstantial evidence. No man in his senses would perpetrate a murder in the presence of an eye-witness."

"Probably not," returned Kotelmann slowly. "That kind of thing is usually done in private. It may so chance, however, that an eye-witness is present of whom the murderer has no cognisance."

After making this remark, he walked by my side for a while in silence, apparently deep in thought. Then he began again, in his characteristic fashion, "One may travel all round the world, and yet never witness a murder. I, however, have seen one."

"What! You—you have seen one!" I exclaimed almost terrified.

Kotelmann nodded assent.

"Explain yourself, man! Was the murderer caught? Was he punished?"

"It was no 'he' it was a 'she,'" said Kotelmann with a laugh. "And as she was not caught, it stands to reason that she was not punished."

"Yet you—" I began. My companion interrupted me. "I had nothing to do with it. My evidence was never called for or required. The thing was accomplished in the neatest and most refined manner possible. If you like, I will tell you the whole story."

I pricked up my ears.

"Four years ago I was spending my summer vacation at the little watering place of B—— This quiet, retired nest suited me well, and I stayed there for some time.

"In the house where I found a lodging there were already a number of other visitors, a fact which, to a sociable individual like myself, was in no wise distasteful.

"Among others I made a slight acquaintance with a family, consisting of an old gentleman, his young wife, and his daughter by a former marriage. The girl, a slim, delicate creature, apparently about twenty years of of age, was blind. She could not be termed pretty, but her personality was indescribably attractive, gentle, and, I may say, pathetic.

"The wife was a beauty! She had a splendid figure, and a pair of grey eyes not easily to be forgotten. I should judge her age to have been about twenty-eight. These people seemed to be in very easy circumstances, and kept themselves as much as possible apart from the other visitors.

"I can boast, as you are aware, of some gift of observation. Although my acquaintance with this family was, as I have already stated, but a slight one, I yet took some interest in studying the different members which composed it. For, wherever I go, I make it a rule to study all the new characters I meet.

"It was not long before I discovered three things concerning this trio. Firstly, that the old man was passionately in love with his wife, but had for his daughter neither eyes, ears, nor heart; secondly, that the daughter had an almost idolatrous reverence for her father, but a secret dislike for her step-mother; thirdly, that the wife had a downright hatred for the other two.

"None of the other inmates of our villa, however, had any suspicion of this state of affairs; to the superficial observer, these three persons appeared to be living together in perfect harmony.

"One morning, the old gentleman did not appear, and in answer to inquiries his wife said that he was ill. In the course of a day a physician was summoned to him, and in the evening our host imparted to me in confidence the distressing fact that the old man had been attacked by typhus fever, and lay now in a very precarious condition.

"The honest Thuringian well-nigh shed tears of chagrin; one would have thought to hear him, that the poor old gentleman had taken the fever out of sheer wickedness and spite, on purpose to give the house a bad name. There was some cause for this lamentation. The secret could not be kept long, and as soon as it became known that typhus was in the house, the visitors decamped with all speed. Only two or three, more reasonable than the rest, remained. I have no fear of infection, and when I told our host so I rose prodigiously in his estimation.

Digitized by Google

"Ten days after the beginning of the old gentleman's illness, I chanced to encounter the doctor, who was just descending the staircase.

"'Well,' said I, 'how fares it with our patient?'

"'Oh,' answered he, 'the symptoms are very favourable. The crisis is over—or all but over. We know, of course, that he is an old man, and his constitution is weak—extremely weak. If he pulls through, as I trust he will, he will have his wife and daughter to thank for it—especially his daughter. That girl is a born nurse; He is asleep now, and upon this sleep depends all.

"'If he awakes of himself in three or four hours' time, then humanly speaking, he will be out of danger. Everything depends upon this sleep! I have impressed upon Herr K., your landlord, the strict necessity of absolute quiet; he will give orders to the servants. Should the patient be frightened, startled out of sleep, there will be a catastrophe. His nervous system is so greatly depressed that the slightest noise in his proximity—such, for instance as the slamming of a door—would, in all probability prove as fatal as a bullet shot into his head or heart. I have warned his wife. Sleep is now everything—everything.'

"With these words the doctor put on his hat and departed. As I stood for a minute in the hall, thinking over what I had heard, Herr K. crept towards me on tip-toe.

"'Listen, Herr Kotelmann,' said he in an undertone. 'Fräulein von P., who was so brave at first, because she had been a Sister of Mercy, left my house early this morning. She took herself off because she was afraid of catching the fever. Are you, then, somewhat superstitious?'

"I laughed.

"'All right,' said he triumphantly. 'I came to tell you that, if you please, you can have the Fräulein's room. You will like its situation so much! It overlooks the whole valley, right away to the forest. You shall have it for the same price as you have been paying.'

"I was delighted.

"'Can I take possession at once?' I asked.

"'This very moment,' replied the landlord; 'the room stands empty. Ah!' he added, 'I forgot; it is next to the sick man's chamber. Will that make any difference to you?'

"I laughed and shook my head.

"'Very good! The room has been cleaned lately, and is quite ready for your reception.'

"I thanked him, and was ascending the stairs, when he softly called me back. 'Pardon me, Herr Kotelmann, I forgot again. The doctor has given orders that on no account may any sound be heard in the neighbourhood of the sick room. He says the old gentleman's life depends upon his sleep being undisturbed. Perhaps you will be so very kind as to defer moving your things until this evening?'

"I expressed myself perfectly satisfied with this arrangement; but as I felt curious to behold my new habitation, especially the belauded view from its windows, I—when the host had left me—stole with light steps along the corridor, opened the door with caution, and entered noiselessly.

"The room had a friendly look, and was large. The view was magnificent. After duly admiring this, I threw an approving glance over walls and furniture. I have already alluded to the fact that I am a keen observer of mankind. I may now add that I am an observer of things as well as persons. I possess the true detective's eye.

"This being the case, I very speedily remarked a weak spot in one of the walls. It was a tiny slit or hole, such as would have been discovered by most persons after a whole day's confinement in the room. A small nail just above it apprised me that the late occupant, Fraulein von P., must have been accustomed to hang some garment there.

"I approached this hole, and peeped through it into the sick man's chamber. The room contained three human beings. On the bed lay the old man in deep sleep. Beside the bed knelt his blind daughter, with clasped hands and bowed head, her whole attitude expressive of intensely earnest prayer. Behind the daughter I saw the wife; she alone was moving.

"In perfect silence, without producing the slightest sound, she was drawing along over the smooth surface of the wax polished floor a small table, whose marble top was laden with quite a dozen medicine bottles, and a number of glass vessels of various shapes and sizes.

"I did not at first comprehend her design. I knew very well that she had received strictest injunctions to make no sound. But when I caught sight of her face! It was the face of a fiend! Never could I have believed it possible that a human face could wear stamped upon it such a horrible expression of murderous hate! In an instant I understood.

"She was in the act of sliding the table into such a position that the least movement of the kneeling girl, absorbed in prayer for her beloved father, would be sufficient to overturn it with its fragile burden.

"I am, as you know, a somewhat cold-blooded fellow, but I can assure you that for the moment I was rigid with horror. I would have given the whole world to have been able to have warned that poor child. But what could I do? A call from me might be as disastrous in its consequences as the catastrophe itself.

"I stood dumb in terror, as if turned to stone. There was no time for thought. Before my whirling brain could suggest any expedient, the deed was done.

"The unhappy girl rose from her knees; with hands clasped, she stood up. I saw the table reel and totter, and as, half swooning, I averted my eyes, I heard the thud of the table and the awful crash of the breaking glass, followed immediately by an ear-piercing, blood-curdling scream."

Here Kotelmann made a pause. After a few moments of silence, he said:

"Give me a light, friend."

When he had lighted his cigar I asked him:

"Did the old man die?"

"He was as dead as though he had been shot through the head," he replied calmly.

Presently he continued:

"I had left the room before the commotion in the house began. It was never known that I was there. It was to me a terrible thought that I must spend the night in that chamber. I am not superstitious, but I must confess that it was long ere I closed my eyes that night.

"And when I did so! Ten times at least I started up from evil dreams with the crash and the fearful cry ringing in my ears. It was a full night before I could get any rest."

We walked on in silence until I spoke again.

"Have you ever heard what has become of the woman?"

"Oh, yes! She has married again; but the daughter, poor thing, died a year after her father." A. Hunt.

A Mother's Vengeance.

I HAD not been at Virelogne for twenty-three years. I went back there to shoot in the autumn with my friend Serval, who had built another cottage there, his first one having been destroyed by the Prussians.

One day I went on, watching my two dogs foraging ahead of me. Serval, a hundred yards away on my right, was beating a field of lucerne. I turned aside the bushes that formed the limit of the forest of Saudres, and I saw a cottage in ruins.

Suddenly I remembered it as I had seen it in 1869; clean, vine-clad, with chickens before the door. What sadder sight is there than a deadhouse, with its standing skeleton, dilapidated and forbidding?

I remembered also that a good woman had made me drink a glass of wine within one day when I was very tired, and that Serval had then told me the story of the inhabitants. The father, an old poacher, had been killed by the gendarmes. The son, whom I saw at the time, was a tall, bony fellow, who passed likewise for a ferocious destroyer of game. They were called the Savages. Was that a real name or nickname?

I hailed Serval. He came up with his long stride.

"What has become of the people who lived here?" I asked him.

And he told me this story:

"When war was declared, the son, then thirty-three years old, enlisted, leaving the mother alone in the house. The old woman did not receive too much sympathy, because she was known to have money. She stayed all alone in this isolated house, far from the village, on the outskirts of the wood. She was not afraid, for she belonged to the same race as her husband and son—a rough old woman, tall and thin, who did not often laugh, and with whom no one ever joked.

"Mother Savage continued her everyday life in her cottage, which was soon covered with snow. She visited the village once a week to get some bread and a little meat, then she returned to the hut. As there were rumours of wolves, she carried a gun on her back—her son's gun; it was rusty, and the stock worn from constant handling. She was a curious sight, this tall Mother Savage, a little bent, going with slow strides through the snow, the gun-barrel projecting above the black cap, which so effectually imprisoned her white hairs that no one had ever seen them.

"One day the Prussians came. They were distributed among the inhabitants according to the fortune and resources of each. With the old woman, who was known to be rich, they placed four.

"They were four big, light-haired, blue-eyed fellows, who had kept their flesh, in spite of the fatigue which they had already endured, and their good nature, although in a conquered country. Alone at this aged woman's house they were very thoughtful for her, saving her all the fatigue and expense that they could.

"All four were to be seen making their toilets round the well in the morning in their shirt sleeves, wetting their pink-white flesh, characteristic of men of the North, with an abundance of water, in the raw, snowy air, while Mother Savage came and went, preparing the soup. Then they were seen cleaning the kitchen, scouring the floors, chopping wood, peeling potatoes, washing linen, fulfilling all the household duties, like four good sons round their mother.

"But the old woman thought continually of her own boy, with his tall, thin figure, hooked nose, brown eyes, and big moustache. Every day she asked each of the soldiers installed at her fireside:

"'Do you know which way the Twenty-Third French Regiment went? My boy belongs to it.'

"They answered, 'No, not at all.'

"And understanding her pain and anxiety, because they had mothers of their own, they bestowed upon her a thousand little attentions. Besides, she was very fond of her four enemies, for peasants seldom feel the patriotic hatred that is monopolised by the upper classes. The humble—those who pay the most because they are poorest, and whom every new burden overwhelms; those who are killed in masses, forming, because of their numbers, real food for cannon; those, in short, who suffer the most cruelly from the atrocious miseries of war, because they are weakest and least able to resist—seldom understand the bellicose ardour, the excitable feeling of honour, and the pretended political combinations which in six months exhaust two nations—the victors as well as the vanquished.

"The neighbours said, speaking of Mother Savage's Germans:

"'There are four who have found a home.'

"But one morning, while the old woman was alone in her cottage, she saw at a distance over the plain a man coming towards her dwelling. She recognised him as the letter carrier. He handed her a folded paper, and she drew from their case the spectacles which she used in sewing; she then read:

"MADAME SAVAGE.—This brings you sad news. Your boy, Victor, was killed yesterday by a cannon ball that cut him in two. I was standing near, for we marched side by side in the company, and he asked me to notify you in case any misfortune should befall him. I have taken possession of his watch in order to restore it to you at the end of the war. I salute you as a friend.

CESAR RIVOT.

Soldier of the 2nd Class in the Twenty-Third of the Line.

"The letter bore date of three weeks before. She did not weep. She remained motionless, so struck and stupified that as yet she did not suffer. She thought—'There's Victor killed now.'

"Then gradually the tears rose to her eyes, and grief invaded her heart. One by one ideas came to her, frightening and torturing her. Never more would she embrace her child—her big boy; never more!

Digitized by Google

"The gendarmes had killed the father, the Prussians had killed the son. He had been cut in two by a cannon-ball. And it seemed to her that she saw the horrible sight—the head falling, the eyes open, while he bit the corner of his big moustache, as he had been wont to do when angry.

"But what had they done with his body? If they had only restored her child, as they had restored her husband with the bullet in the middle of his forehead!

"But she heard the sound of voices. It was the Prussians returning from the village. She quickly hid the letter in her pocket and received them tranquilly with her usual face, having had time to wipe her eyes.

"All four were laughing with delight, for they brought with them a fine rabbit, stolen, doubtless, and they made signs to the old woman that they were going to have a feast. She began directly the preparation of the breakfast, but when it came to the killing of the rabbit her heart failed her. Yet it was not the first. One of the soldiers hit it a blow behind the ears with his fist.

"She sat down at the table with her Prussians, but she could not eat a single mouthful. They did not heed, but devoured the rabbit. She looked at them side-wise, saying not a word, maturing an idea, her face so expressionless that they noticed nothing. Suddenly she asked:

"'Here we have lived a month together, and I do not even know your names.'

"They understood, not without difficulty, what she wanted, and told their names. That did not satisfy her; she made them write their names on a piece of paper, with the addresses of their families, then, resting her spectacles on her big nose, she considered the unknown writing, after which she folded the paper and put it in her pocket, on top of the letter which told of her son's death.

'When the meal was over she said to the men:

"'I am going to work for you.'

"And she began to carry hay into the garret where they slept. They were astonished at this act; she explained to them that they would not be so cold, and they helped her. They piled up the bundles till they touched the thatched roof, and thus they made a sort of large chamber with four hay walls, warmed and perfumed, in which they would sleep marvellously well.

"At dinner one of them became anxious on seeing that Mother Savage still ate nothing. She declared that she had no appetite; then she lighted a good fire to warm herself, and the four Germans went up to their lodgings by the ladder which they used every night.

"As soon as the trap-door was closed, the old woman took away the ladder, then noiselessly opened the outside door, and went to get some bundles of straw, with which she filled her kitchen. She went bare-footed in the snow, so softly that they heard nothing. From time to time she listened to the unequal snoring of the four sleeping soldiers.

"When she judged her preparations sufficient, she threw one of the bundles into the fire, and when it was well aflame, she scattered it over the others, went out, and watched.

"In a few seconds the entire interior of the cottage was illuminated with a raging light; then it became a frightful bed of coals, a gigantic glowing oven, from which gleams shot through the narrow window and threw dazzling rays upon the snow.

"Then a loud cry from the top of the house, followed by a chorus of human shrieks, heartrending appeals of anguish and fear. Then, having burnt through the trap-door, a whirlwind of fire burst into the attic, pierced through the thatched roof, and rose to the skies like an immense torch, and the whole cottage was wrapped in flame.

"Nothing was heard within but the crackling of the fire and the crumbling of the beams. The roof suddenly fell in, and the cottage's glowing carcase shot a great shower of sparks into the air, amid a cloud of smoke. The fields, lighted by the fire, shone like a sheet of silver tinted with red.

"A bell in the distance began to ring. Old Mother Savage remained standing before her destroyed dwelling, armed with her gun—her son's gun—for fear that one of the men might escape. When she saw that all was over she threw her weapon into the embers.

"A loud report rang out. People came hurrying up—peasants, Prussians. They found the woman sitting on a tree trunk, tranquil and satisfied. A German officer, who spoke French like a native, asked her:

"'Where are your soldiers?'

"She stretched out her thin arm towards the red mass of dying fire, and answered in a strange voice:

"'In there!'

"They pressed round her. The Prussian asked:

"'How did it take fire?'

"She answered:

"'I set it on fire!'

"They did not believe her. They thought that the disaster had suddenly made her crazy. Then, as all surrounded and listened to her, she told the story from one end to the other, from the arrival of the letter to the last cry of the men burnt up with the house. She did not forget a single detail of what she had felt or what she had done.

"When she had finished, she took from her pocket two papers, and, in order to distinguish them by the dying gleams of the fire, she again adjusted her spectacles, and then said, pointing to one of them:

"'That is the death of Victor.'

"Pointing to the other, she added, at the same time designating the red ruins with an inclination of her head.

"'These are their names, that their relatives may be informed.'

"She quietly handed the white sheet of paper to the officer, who took her by the shoulders, and she continued:

"'You will write them how it happened, and you will say to the parents that I did it, Victoire Simon, the savage. Don't forget.'

"The officer shouted some orders in German. They seized her and hurled her against the still hot wall of her dwelling. Then twelve men arranged themselves in front of her at a distance of twenty yards. She did not shrink. She had understood; she waited.

"An order rang out, followed immediately by a long report. The old woman did not fall. She sank, as if her legs had been mowed from under her. The Prussian officer approached. In her clenched hand she still held her letter."

My friend Serval added:

"By way of reprisal the Germans destroyed my neighbouring cottage."

As for me, I thought of the mothers of these four kind-hearted fellows burnt in this house, and of the atrocious heroism of this other mother shot against the wall.

L. B. KNIGHT.

Digitized by Google

The - Final - War.

BY LOUIS TRACY.

CHAPTER XLVI. (continued).

NEITHER guns nor reinforcements were needed, for the lava tide of men flowed back towards the fortifications, and pursuit only ended when an outlying fort took advantage of the yet clear light of a summer's day to send some shells into Sir Drury Lowe's division.

Horror-stricken, nerveless, voiceless, the Café Brigade, as they were cruelly termed by a French general, literally crawled into safety, and in broken fragments reached Paris by sunrise the following morning.

But they had left 12,000 of their number on the green slopes of the Seine Valley. M. Hanotaux mourned contentedly when he heard the news, and M. Rochefort wondered how his deputy colonel had comforted himself.

Harington was not missed until the ambulance had long been busy on the battlefield.

Fate controls coincidence at times, and fate ordained that the corps of nurses headed by Irene and Ethel should be on duty with the field hospital staff provided for that day's engagement.

Inured by this time to the dreadful testimonies of war's unutterable misery, these devoted ladies performed their trying duties with a thoroughness and care that won the praise of the surgeons, and evoked tremulous gratitude from the pallid lips of the sufferers they tended.

Suddenly there came an orderly riding in hot haste towards the Deputy Surgeon-General, who was engaged in probing for a bullet in the shoulder of a Rifle officer.

"Whatever your business, you must wait until the operation is over," she said.

"All right, miss," said the dragoon, saluting; "but I must find somebody to listen to me at once. The Commander-in-Chief wants immediate search to be made for an officer who is a-missing from his staff."

"What is the officer's name?" said Irene, whilst her heart beat painfully, and Ethel looked up from the package of lint she was unfolding.

"Major Harington, miss. Gawd's truth, lady, I didn't know he was a friend of yours!"

The man's ejaculation was natural enough. Irene became deathly pale, and Ethel dropped the parcel in her hands, whilst she gazed, wild-eyed and stupefied, at the messenger.

But Irene was not going to faint at this supreme moment of need.

Her voice was calm as she asked with an almost supernatural effort of her indomitable will: "Did his lordship give you any idea of Major Harington's whereabouts?"

"Yes, miss," answered the soldier, who was genuinely sorry for the manner in which he had blurted out his sad intelligence. "The Major accompanied Sir Drury Lowe in the cavalry charge along with the 17th Lancers, and it is feared he met with some mishap."

"We must search for him at once," went on Irene, in the same reliant tone. "Tell that party of bearers to come here to me, and see if you can get correct information as to the direction taken by the Lancers."

The dragoon remounted to perform this duty, and Ethel, who now clung helplessly to her friend, moaned through her fast-flowing tears: "Oh, Irene, I must come also."

"No, dearest," was the firm reply. "We cannot both desert our duties. This is my task, and mine only. Your work lies here. Bear up, my darling, or my heart will break too soon."

Ethel Harington felt, even in the midst of her grief, that Irene's was the more pitiable state, and she strove hard to comfort her with words of hope.

As the orderly approached with the ambulance bearers, he inquired from one of the men as to Irene's identity.

"That's Lady Vyne, and the other is Miss Harington," was the answer.

"Phew!" whistled the enlightened Tommy. "Hissweetheart and his sister, I suppose. Well, her ladyship's a rare plucked 'un, anyhow."

They found Teddy at last, laid beneath the body of a Frenchman whose skull had been fractured by a kick from the guardman's charger.

Irene, of course, was the first to see him, and she tenderly lifted his bloodstained head whilst the dragoon dragged the Frenchman's corpse aside. In an instant she knew that he still breathed, and then her long pent motion broke forth in a passionate cry of delight that startled the men standing near.

But she soon recovered from the thrill of joy that threatened to be more disastrous than the first shock of pain. Finding the wound, she deftly cut away the matted hair, and satisfied herself that there was no fracture. Harington was insensible from concussion, but the extent of the injury it was impossible to ascertain at the moment.

He was lifted into the litter, and the movement certainly seemed to restore animation, for his breathing quickened and grew stronger. Irene poured a small quantity of brandy into his mouth, and repeated it at slight intervals, meanwhile asking the orderly to ride off quickly and tell Miss Harington that her brother was alive and not much injured, only stunned.

At last Teddy opened his eyes and looked at Irene bending over him. A puzzled look came into his face, but a smile cleared it away, and he murmured weakly: "I know. That's all right."

She kissed him as she whispered: "Yes, dearest, it is all right, but you must not speak yet."

Again he said: "Can't we talk here?"

"No," she replied. "Not here."

Irene did not know what his words meant, but two hours later, when the Deputy Surgeon-General announced to the girls, that after a whiskey and soda and a sound sleep, Harington would want his breakfast, Teddy feebly explained.

He was sure that he had waked up in Heaven, and that Irene, transformed into an angel, was taking care of him.

* * * * *

Next morning there was unusual commotion throughout the British host.

No new attack created excitement, no specially dramatic event elsewhere had thus deeply stirred the troops.

At an early hour it was rumoured and afterwards confirmed that Mr. Thompson, the inventor, had arrived at Havre and was even now on his way to the front. Sure enough, at two o'clock he was driven from the nearest station to the Commander-in-Chief's quarters.

He remained closeted with Lord Roberts and the principal

"What is the officer's name?" said Irene.

members of the staff for a considerable time. Then the whole party drove to the station, where it was seen that the train which brought Mr. Thompson also carried one hundred large and heavy cases. Indeed, several big waggons were filled with them, and the engine-driver informed the officiating station-master that there were "lots more of 'em" on the way at Havre.

One of these cases was opened, and disclosed tier upon tier of Lee-Metford rifles, each with a peculiar-looking attachment mounted on the barrel in the place otherwise occupied by the backsight.

All the officers present were very anxious to examine and test the contrivance, but Mr. Thompson, a very quiet and self-possessed man, in whom one would never recognise the eager enthusiast who sprang to the door of the Prince of Wales' carriage on that memorable day in Hyde Park, said, with a smile: "Gentlemen, you must believe my word for a few hours longer. To-night I will ask you to accept facts, not theories."

CHAPTER XLVII.

THE GERMAN EMPEROR PAUSES.

THERE were now 600,000 British soldiers under arms on German soil.

At Stralsund, Sir Evelyn's force had suffered severely from sickness and the fortunes of war, but reinforcements sent to him in equal proportions from England and America had added 200,000 to his army. He had in all no less than 350,000 men under his command, and still held, beyond the power of dislodgment, the defences of Stralsund. General von Bremen, although in possession of a much stronger force, could do nothing except remain in disastrous impotence before him.

The main German power was established at Wittenburg, that hoary city over which once flew so defiantly the flag of the Reformation. Here, too, the German Emperor had come, eager and restless, to take supreme control. His 500,000 soldiers felt the electric presence of the gallant ruler, although General Grudenau could not conceal his own uneasiness.

"I don't say," he grumbled to one of his staff-officers "that consistency is a virtue; but I do maintain that in war it is well to remain of the same opinion for at least half-an-hour."

The fact was that the brave general lived a life of torment and perplexity. He was never certain what new whims or extravagances his impetuous sovereign might not indulge in next. And yet the veteran in his heart loved this fiery Hotspur of the Fatherland, in whose reckless courage and vehement enthusiasm was inspiration enough to inflame a dozen armies. So he endured in silence, and did his work as calmly as he could.

Twenty miles to the west, upon the banks of the Elbe, winding its way towards the great capital of German commerce, lay the British. Under the Duke of Connaught were 250,000 men, of whom 150,000 were English, and the remainder American. Already there had come rumours to the enemy that large additions might still be expected, or were already on their way. The whole Saxon race was now arming itself, and a ceaseless multitude might soon commence to pour through the German Ocean into the northern provinces. And for once the fanatic pride of the empire shuddered beneath the ominous warning, and there came a pause in the wild fury of her new-born militarism.

For far below this fierce surface spirit, this savage appetite which the whirl of national struggle had inflicted upon the German people, there lay the real Teuton character—deep, silent, strong. The true Germany was homely, peaceful, and domestic, firm in her faith in her own great destinies, and yet spiritual and poetic. She was still the land of Schiller and of Goethe, still the home of arts and sciences, still the calm haunt of philosophy. Her true empire was that of mind, her true necessity that of peace. If of her ancient blood she still inherited fierce passions, vehement in their fury when they were roused, there nevertheless had grown over them the gentler ties of home, of romance, of family, of quiet industry.

The German . . . to drink his innocent beer in scented gardens.

The German loves to do his work, and then in the evening to drink his innocent beer in scented gardens to strains of pleasant music, and he knew that his English cousin was such as he. There was no quarrel between them. The Berliner thought of the Londoner, and this savage war began at last to appeal to him as little less than homicide.

It was friend against friend. Why should he, for reason that was not apparent, lay a dagger at his neighbour's throat?

The reports that came to the Emperor's ears were not all quite reassuring. His people remained firm to the cause which he had made their own, but he grew troubled as he began to realise that they had no longer a blind implicit faith in its wisdom or its justice.

He was pre-occupied by these thoughts one beautiful August morning when, in company with General Grudenau, he rode forward to inspect the lines and assure himself of their disposition. The very glory of the day served to heighten his melancholy, and to give a new and strange direction to its anxieties.

For the Emperor himself, though he had given no sign of it, had begun to doubt. He was a bold, hot-headed soldier, given to sudden and impetuous resolutions, inclined to rush headlong into mistakes he afterwards regretted, but at heart filled with the spiritual fervour of his race, anxious to be just, harbouring no petty animosities nor idle jealousies. He loved his country as deeply as her lowliest son, and his devotion was too passionate not to be guilty of magnificent blunders.

By what had he been induced to take up arms against the English people? It was not vain glory or mere lust of personal aggrandisement.

"Germany must make her way to new continents and found new provinces," he had declared to his English mother when she had reproached him with tears. "It is stern necessity, and I cannot hold it back. Shall I be coward enough to shrink from my misson? No! I must be worthy of the sublime traditions of my family. The founder of our race made Prussia great. My grandfather gave Germany her nationality and her pre-eminence. For me the third and noblest task may yet remain—to give to the Fatherland its hope, a new dominion, another empire. I am thrilled at the thought that I too may add a chapter to our glorious history!"

"And if it be inglorious?" questioned the Dowager-Empress.

"Forgive me, mother!" exclaimed the wayward son. "I do not wish to hurt you. You are English too. But kings can have no kinship. They stand isolated from all the ties of blood. My country and her destinies are to me father and mother. I cannot refuse my duty to them."

This reasoning had intoxicated him. He was as a "prophet new inspired"—the dark and horrid prospect of war was glorified in the dazzling sunlight of a splendid purpose.

But now he doubted much, and his mission seemed less clear. As day by day he saw his brave soldiers fall in battle, as he made his visits to the hospitals and saw their sufferings, as he felt the shock beneath which the German artisan and villager were staggering, when he heard of suffering and privation from every part of his dominions, when, before all, he found the war dragging on its pitiless length, with no great meed of glory to himself, rather with his purpose obscured, and perhaps blotted out by the grim and terrible present, his heart sank within him and cruel perplexities tormented him.

A sharp and sudden conflict and then immediate peace—that had been his theory. For a great right to "do a little wrong." But he was not prepared for such heroic answer to his rude challenge. Here was his own country invaded, the British arms everywhere victorious, Paris threatened, Russia helpless and himself struggling with frantic effort to throw off this tireless foe, which daily increased in energy and cunning, and daily became more strong from an infinite empire without. His purpose was already lost, doomed, hopeless. Was he to wait and let the wretched tragedy play on to a disastrous close? He shuddered as he thought of the frightful blow that even victory would deal at his country and his people.

These thoughts surged through his mind as he rode along on that fateful morning in August. Grudenau, noticing his gloomy silence, did not venture to put in a word. At last they got to an eminence whence they saw the white lines of the advance division of his great army, gleaming in the sun, and could note the restless movements of the soldiers, as, like little dots of colour, they flitted about the green plain.

The Emperor gazed for a long time upon the scene and then, turning upon his companion, asked abruptly:

"General, tell me, shall we beat these English?"

Grudenau started at this singular question, then, recovering himself, said:

"Your Majesty, the national greatness of our race and the splendid destinies of the German people leave no doubt that —"

"Stop, sir!" said the Emperor harshly. "I asked you, not as a courtier, but as a soldier."

"Your question is not an easy one, your Majesty," replied the discomfited officer.

"I desire your opinion, General," reiterated the Emperor in determined tones. "And I insist that you shall speak with the utmost sincerity, no matter how unpleasant it may be."

An officer was awaiting him with dispatches.

"I will obey you, sire," was Grudenau's reply. "Germany has not exhausted her armies' strength. She can pour army after army into the field. But ——" here he paused.

"But so can England, I suppose you mean?" exclaimed the Kaiser.

"That is so, your Majesty. England and America can between them, especially now that France is so hemmed in, flood our shores. Great Britain controls and can continue to control the sea. Her supplies are inexhaustible. The fighting must always take place upon our soil, and so far I do not quite see how the situation is to be relieved."

"England will defeat us, you would infer?" asked the Emperor.

"I did not say that," replied the General.

Digitized by Google

"What then?"

"Merely that we cannot defeat her."

"It is not a very exhilarating view to take, General," was the Kaiser's comment. "But I thank you. Let us return."

On the way back the Kaiser thought much of his General's words, and he felt the bitterness of their cruel but inexorable logic. Germany might fight on and on, but to what end? At the best it simply meant endless struggles, endless loss, endless misery. And for a policy that was now dead, for ever dead! His generous heart was torn at the thought of all that his beloved land must endure, and endure in silence, through the dark days yet to come.

And then a dull rage filled him as he considered the collapse of his golden dream, that castle in Spain which he had built of hopes so airy. He had thought to do as his fathers had done, to compass a mighty deed that might raise his own name to theirs. But how pitiful it seemed now!

Frederick had spent his days on the battlefield, unweariedly wresting his country's very existence from the rapacious grasp of his enemies. The great Kaiser Wilhelm had united its disordered provinces into one great dominion. He had set out to do battle with the oppressors of Germany, to vanquish an insolent foe, to overturn a neighbour whose very energy was a menace to the integrity of the Teuton empire. And what was it he himself had sought to do? He was fighting with the country nearest his own in kin, with whom he was allied by blood. He had accepted the unholy alliance of a sworn foe. He was struggling with a people with whom he had no quarrel, and whose wise statesmanship had supported and sustained the German cause. He had forgotten ties of friendship and claims of mutual interest. Could any act be less blest, less glorious, less heroic? And this he had done against the settled theory of his country's policy: he had dismissed the founder of the German empire, shunned his warnings, and this was the first fruits of his self-will!

A resolve he had long been pondering quickened in his mind as he galloped along. William was headstrong, but he had one redeeming virtue. He could own a mistake as easily as commit one; and he could make a reparation as splendid as a sin.

When he reached head-quarters an officer was awaiting him with dispatches.

"Stay with me a moment," he said to Grudenau. "I may need you."

Then he opened his dispatches. His brow clouded as he read.

"General von Bremen has certain intelligence that there are considerable reinforcements expected at Stralsund," he observed quietly to Grudenau. "They will enable the English to strike out and make a general advance. More, it is believed that a junction of the two corps will be attempted, and that, on the east at any rate, it will be impossible for us to effectively oppose it—serious news."

Count von Hohenlohe was seen proceeding on horseback to the Emperor's quarters.

"What does your Majesty propose?" asked the General.

"I have decided," replied the Emperor, a trifle pale, but in firm accents. "I have decided to send for the Chancellor in order to discuss the advisability of treating for peace."

The Emperor had come to a singular resolution, one that could only emanate from a mind constituted as his was. It was one that would save his country from many indignities and possible catastrophes. To take the step he meditated needed a man of high-souled courage; and Wilhelm did not shrink from the burden of the responsibility. But first he desired the counsel of his Chancellor.

The camp was on fire with the news. Excitement found a vent in much loud guttural discussion, and many a labyrinthine sentence clamped with compound words was needed to express with ponderous adequacy the general emotion.

The feeling reached an extreme pitch of tension on the following morning when, scorning the ease and luxury of a carriage provided for him, Count von Hohenlohe was seen proceeding on horseback through the town of Wittenburg to the Emperor's quarters.

A sealed private letter from the Emperor William of Germany to Her Majesty the Queen of England.

The Emperor received the statesman at the door of his apartments and greeted him warmly; then, leading him within, proceeded to engage him in long and private conference.

The Count listened respectfully to the views that his eager master poured forth into his ears, and before replying, examined him narrowly on the condition and disposition of his armies. In particular he read closely and repeatedly the advices received with regard to the British movements and numbers.

"Germany, sire," said the Chancellor quietly, "has made a mistake; we must make use of the quickest remedy for the evil that has come upon us."

"Count," replied the Kaiser, "I am honest enough to own myself deceived. I have perpetrated a blunder which I repent with bitterness and self-reproach. I wish to repair my error. Let this fatal blunder not run out its terrible course. As I have explained, we can withdraw with something at least of honour from this war, if we act at once. The issue with us is still uncertain. England will gladly accept, on terms that must, I fear, be favourable to her, an armistice. Later on, we may be compelled to plead for what we can now treat on equal terms. Do you agree?"

The Chancellor looked steadily at his royal master.

"Your resolution, sire," he replied slowly, "is creditable to your heart and your judgment alike. Continuance of hostilities is disastrous to Germany, to her trade, to her commerce, to her happiness, and the lives of her citizens. It may prove fatal. I earnestly agree with your Majesty, and trust you will not delay your wise intentions. But the fault is ours as well as yours."

"I thank you, Count," exclaimed the Kaiser warmly, rising to his feet. "I now want your assistance and advice in drawing up the letter I propose to send."

"The letter?" asked the Chancellor in surprise.

"Yes. I cannot treat with the General of an hostile army. I must still regard my own position where I honestly can. It would be an admission of weakness, a tacit confession of defeat. The Duke of Connaught has no powers to make terms with me. I shall send a letter to London, to the Queen. She is my grandmother, and will gladly lay my proposals before the Council of War."

The Count bowed but made no reply. He followed the Emperor into an inner room.

That afternoon two German officers, approaching the English lines, demanded audience of the Duke of Connaught. On seeing him they asked the favour of transmission, unopened, of a sealed private letter from the Emperor William of Germany to Her Majesty the Queen of England. And that night the letter, intrusted to two English couriers, left on its journey to English shores.

(To be continued.)

Digitized by Google

ROBBING A CHILD.

JOHN DRISCOLL had not tasted food for forty-eight hours. He was absolutely penniless. As he walked up Oxford Street, clad in a fashionable suit of clothes, with a shiny silk hat on his head, few people could suspect that he was suffering for want of food.

He pursued his course up the great thoroughfare and finally reached Hyde Park.

Weak and faint, but still maintaining an indifferent mien, he entered the park.

He sat down at intervals and rested his weak limbs, but the act of sitting seemed to remind him more of his hunger.

It is a hard trial for a young, vigorous, and healthy man to go for any great length of time without food, and especially so in a rich, populous city. If he had been dressed in rags, he would have begged, but it was utterly impossible for him to do that with his present appearance.

After a time he found himself in a secluded part of the park. He seated himself on a bench. He reviled his fate—everything. "Oh!" he thought, "how I would like a morsel of food!"

He felt like committing a robbery, or any crime, or doing anything that would bring him food.

A light footstep near him aroused him from his reverie. There, before him, stood a fat, chubby, rosy-cheeked little child, gazing at him with wide, staring eyes. In his plump little hands he held a large home-made pie.

Driscoll started up. The sight of that pie was most tantalising in its effect upon him. How he would like to eat it!

There was no one in the immediate vicinity, no one to observe him. The child was fat and well-fed, and he (Driscoll) was starving.

He arose and approached the child.

"My little man," said he, smiling as graciously as it was possible for him to do, "come here."

"What have you there, my dear?" said Driscoll. "Pie?"

"Eth, thir," lisped the little one.

"Let me see it, baby," he said, but the little one shook his head and held the pie behind his back.

"Come," said Driscoll, "won't baby let me see its pie?"

The child gravely gave a negative shake of the head.

"Please let uncle see it," said Driscoll coaxingly, and at the same time making an effort to take it.

"No, no; me 'ant's it," said the baby.

"Let me have it," said Driscoll impatiently.

The little one made a movement as though to run away.

Tired of importuning the baby and fearful lest its mother or nurse should appear and spoil his opportunity, he suddenly bent his face close to that of the child. Assuming the most diabolical and forbidding expression it was possible for him to do, he hissed out: "Give me that pie; give me that pie quick, or I'll murder and eat you, quick!"

The child gave a terrified scream, let the pie drop at Driscoll's feet and scampered down a side path as rapidly as his short little legs could travel. Driscoll quickly picked the pie up, held it in one hand, which he placed within the breast of his coat, and sauntered nonchalantly away.

He wanted to find some quiet spot where unmolested, he could eat his stolen pie, but everywhere he went he found one or more persons. At length he reached an out-of-the-way corner, and sitting himself on the grass, drew forth his precious pie.

The ridiculousness of the thing now struck him, and he burst into a hearty peal of laughter. He held the pie at arm's length and looked at it. He was just about to place it to his mouth; but, alas and alack, "there is many a slip 'twixt cup and lip!" A large Newfoundland dog at this juncture jumped from a clump of bushes, snatched the pie from his hands and bounded swiftly away.

Poor Driscoll!

All the merriment fled from his heart at once. His pie was gone beyond recovery.

"Fate is against me," he muttered sadly as he arose to his feet and walked away.

"Have I got to starve to death surrounded by plenty? It is too hard. Well, I will hold up as long as I have strength."

When he turned out of the park, it was well on in the afternoon. He wandered aimlessly along the streets, scarcely knowing in which direction he was going.

As he passed a certain house he heard a childish voice exclaim:

"Papa, papa, there is the man that took my pie!"

Turning, he beheld the identical little child whose pie he had taken, clinging to the hand of a gentleman, evidently just returning from business.

The gentleman's face seemed familiar, and no sooner had he scanned Driscoll's countenance than he cried out:

"John Driscoll, how are you?"

And at the same time he held out his hand for the other to take. This Driscoll did, and as remembrances came to his brain he recollected an old college chum and a warm friend. "Charley Vaughan," he cried, "I am delighted to see you."

It was a particularly happy evening for Driscoll. After some conversation Vaughan invited him in, and ere long Driscoll related the whole story of the pie over a glass of wine. Vaughan was immensely amused.

He insisted upon Driscoll remaining with him until certain remittances arrived, and lent him a sum of money to tide him over his present difficulties.

As Driscoll remarked, however, it was a fortunate and opportune theft for him to rob Vaughan's child of the pie, for it was the sound of the familiar voice of the child that had caused him to turn involuntarily, which act had led to his recognition.

E. LINDSAY.

Digitized by Google

COMFORT, CLEANLINESS AND CURE
FOLLOW THE USE OF
Dr. PAUL'S WHITE PILE OINTMENT.
Gives ease at once and effectually removes Piles, Cracks, Fissures and Ulcerations. In boxes 1/- & 2/6 each. Post free 1/2 & 2/9
PENN & CO., 89, BLACKFRIARS ROAD, LONDON, S.E.

NOSE MACHINES as worn by Nobility. Shape altered permanently by few weeks' wear, from 9/9 each. Red Nose Cure, Medically Approved, 3/9. Pamphlet, "Cause and Prevention," 1/-; particulars for stamp. Mention Paper.
LEES RAY, Specialist, South Castle St., Liverpool.

TRILENE REGD. TABLETS THE ONLY CURE for STOUTNESS Registered by GOVERNMENT Price 2/6
ALL FAT PEOPLE
Readily Reduce Weight and Cure Corpulency Permanently by taking TRILENE TABLETS (Regd.) for a few weeks. They are very agreeable, harmless, and never fail to PRESERVE both HEALTH and FIGURE without change of diet. Reduction begins immediately.
An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."
SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.
Miss HEYWOOD, 77 Hindhill Street, Heywood, Lancs., says: "I am 2lb. lighter, and my rheumatism also seems cured."
Mrs. WEAVER, of Greenpits Villa, Station Road, Ross, Hereford, says: "Am reduced from 13st. 8lb. to 11st."
MR. CANHAM, 87 Alexandra Road, Norwich: "Tablets cured my wife of extreme stoutness; it has never returned."
LADY CONSTANCE CONRAD writes from Wiesbaden: "I am very pleased with the Tablets."
PRINCESS LIECHTENSTEIN writes from Landsberg, Austria: "Pray send your excellent Tablets directly."
COUNTESS G. FURSTENBERG, Stammheim, Germany, writes: "They act speedily and well."
MR. BUTLER, Surgeon, Hampton Manor, Evesham, says: "My patient lost more than a stone."
Send 2/6 to THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION, 66 Finsbury Pavement, London, E.C.

VARICOCELE.
Every man suffering from Varicocele and the allied troubles, or Varicose Veins, should send for treatise, describing their Causes, Symptoms, Results, and Successful and Painless Treatment without surgical operation or the use of cumbersome trusses and electrical appliances. Will be sent sealed, post free.
S. S. MURRAY,
7, Southampton Row, London, W.C.

Messrs. NICOLE FRÈRES'
REGINA AND POLYPHON
MUSICAL BOXES
PLAY YOUR OWN SELECTION OF MUSIC.
They render on steel combs the most exquisite music, with the compass and volume of tone equal to that of a piano. As a social entertainer they are unrivalled, Playing over a Thousand Different Tunes, including all the latest popular music, as well as classical and operatic selections. With one winding will run about 20 minutes. The tune sheets being made of metal are practically indestructible, while the mechanism of the instrument is very solid, yet of the simplest construction possible, with no delicate parts to get out of order, as in the old-time imported music boxes.
MAKE DELIGHTFUL PRESENTS.

MAKE DELIGHTFUL PRESENTS.
From 16s. 6d. to 100 Guineas.
All Dealers, or Complete Illustrated No. 3 Catalogue, Post Free, to readers of Short Stories. Repairs at moderate prices.
NICOLE FRÈRES LTD. (Dept. 3),
21 ELY PLACE, HOLBORN CIRCUS, LONDON, E.C. Estd. 1815.

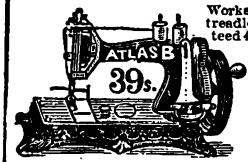
SULPHOLINE LOTION,
For clearing the skin from Spots, Blemishes, Redness, Roughness, giving a Beautiful Complexion and pleasing appearance.
SHILLING BOTTLES.

GIVEN AWAY
HUNDREDS OF POUNDS IN PRIZES - EVERY COMPETITOR GETS ONE OR A CHANCELLOR SOAPS 300 HOUSE
LIBERAL PAYMENT FOR WRAPPERS.
PARTICULARS WITH EACH 2½d AND 3d BAR.
Send 2 stamps for Sample to 13 Clerkenwell Road, E.C.

I BUY FOR CASH
LADIES' HAIR CUTTINGS
or Combings. Send with stamped address, or call on Wednesdays.
E. D., 46 Gower Place, W.C.

£20
Hairdressers fitted up. Estimates free.
Tobacconists Commencing. See Illd. Guide (250 pages) 3d. How to open a cigar store, £20 to £2,000 Tobacconists Outfitting Co., 186, Euston Road, London. The largest and original house (50 years a reputation. Mgr., H. Myers

ATLAS LOCKSTITCH MACHINE.



Works by hand or treadle. Guaranteed 4 years. Equal in quality and size to any machine To ensure satisfaction, we will send machine on receipt of 5/- P.O. for ONE MONTH'S TRIAL. Balance can be paid 5/- Monthly. Call or write for designs and Samples of work.
39/-
THE ATLAS SEWING MACHINE CO., 188B High St., Camden Town, London, N.W.; 63 Seven Sisters Rd., N.; 14 High Rd., Kilburn.

ESTABLISHED 1851.
BIRKBECK BANK
Southampton Bldngs., Chancery Lane, London, W.C.
Invested Funds, £10,000,000. No. of Accounts 85,094.
TWO-AND-A-HALF per CENT. INTEREST allowed on DEPOSITS, repayable on demand. TWO per CENT. on CURRENT ACCOUNTS, on the minimum monthly balances, when not drawn below £100. STOCKS, SHARES, and ANNUITIES purchased and sold for customers. SAVINGS DEPARTMENT.—Small deposits received, and Interest allowed monthly on each completed £1. The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with particulars, post free. FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.
Telephone No. 5, Holborn. Telegraphic Address: "Birkbeck, London."

PALATABLE SUBSTITUTE FOR COD LIVER OIL.
DEVONSHIRE CREAM
(Really Genuine.) In Patent Air-tight Tins. ½lb., 10d.; ¼lb., 1/4; 1lb., 2/4; including Tin and Postage.
MRS. CONYERS, MORCHARD BISHOP, DEVON.

KEATING'S LOZENGES
THERE IS NO BETTER REMEDY IN THE WHOLE WORLD FOR ALL COUCH AND THROAT TROUBLES THAN KEATING'S LOZENGES. ONE GIVES RELIEF. THEY WILL CURE, AND THEY WILL NOT INJURE YOUR HEALTH. THEY CONTAIN ONLY THE PUREST DRUGS.
Sold everywhere in 1/1½ Tins.

PIANOS. UPRIGHT IRON GRAND.
Complete Iron frame, Brass Pin Plate, Nickel-bolted Wrest Plank, Check Action, Full Trichord, Full Compass, Rivetted Hammers, Handsome Walnut Case, Inlaid Marqueterie Panel, Sconces, Trusses, etc. Tone and touch perfect. Guaranteed 25 years. 23 guineas, at 10/6 per month. Delivered free on payment of 10/6. Approval. Catalogues Free.
ORGANS. GENUINE AMERICAN.
Imported Direct. Solid Walnut Case, Mirror Top, Music Case, 2 Knee Swells, Mouse and Dust Proof, 8 Stops, 3 Sets of Reeds, 14 Guineas, at 6/- per month. 10 Stops, 3 Sets of Reeds, 2 Octave Couplers. 15 guineas, at 7/- per month. Illustrated Lists Free. Kindly mention this paper.
THE LONDON AND LIVERPOOL PIANOFORTE CO.
Granby St. & Selborne St., LIVERPOOL.
Agents wanted where not represented.

ZOX
CURES
NEURALGIA
Toothache, Headache, Sciatica, and all Nerve Pains.
PURE, HARMLESS, AND NON-APERIENT.
Do not be persuaded to take a substitute, there is nothing as good as ZOX.
Of all Chemists, 1s. and 2s. 6d. per Box.
ZOX Co., 11 HATTON GARDEN, E.C.

Digitized by Google

NOTES OF INTEREST.

RESULT of Jumble Story and Puzzle Picture competitions will appear next week.

G. N.—A boy born on French soil of parents, one of whom may be English, but born in France, is regarded as French, and is liable to conscription. He might, perchance, have to fight against his own brother, if England and France ever went to war, for if the brother was born in England, not even an Anglo-French father could make him French. I trust this explanation will clear up the difficulty for you.

T. N.—You are mistaken; the Cubans are very sober people. They have cafés, but drunkenness is very rare. One of their favourite drinks is composed of white sugar, water, and the white of an egg. If they were fond of alcoholic beverages they would not patronise the one just described to the extent they do.

L. J.—Your friend is right; the famous pear tree near Toulon was destroyed in a gale about two years ago. Its trunk was twelve feet in circumference, and the tree had an authenticated history of six centuries. The proprietor of the ground on which it stood corresponded with all the botanical societies in Europe in order to discover another that could compare with it in age and size, but he could hear of none.

G. M. writes: "Can you tell me the reason why grooms almost invariably make a hissing sound, as if they were blowing through their teeth, when grooming a horse or cleaning a carriage?"——Why, to keep the dust out of their mouths, of course. The groom is a particular man; the horse's coat is dusty after a day's work; the wheels of the carriage are caked with dry mud. Think what a lot of dirt he would swallow in a lifetime if he didn't take care to prevent its entering his mouth.

H. D. B.—The passage of a funeral procession down any road immediately makes that road a public thoroughfare for good and all.

PLAYER.—Yes, golf is certainly increasing in favour in this country, and in others, too. There are no fewer than twenty-two golf clubs in India, five in Egypt, four in Melbourne, eight in New Zealand, and fourteen in Canada. In 1888, the number of well-known clubs was 195, now there are something like 1,500.

B. W.—You are not quite right. Certainly sugar is made from beet-root, but not from the red variety you are acquainted with, but from the white only—that with the green leaves, sometimes called the Sicilian beet.

"WHY do people shrug their shoulders in cold weather?" writes T. P. ——This is the relic of primæval days, when, according to Darwin, the human frame was blessed with a hairy epidermis. All animals with long hair or feathers erect their coats in cold weather, for the warmth of such a covering depends upon its thickness and the amount of air it contains, rather than its bulk.

C. L. G.—The engine of an express train consumes twelve gallons of water for each mile travelled.

R. S. T. writes: "Some time ago I read in one of your publications that it was possible to obtain a male nurse. Can you tell me where I should apply for one?"——I should advise you to write to either of the associations at 69 Wigmore Street, London, W, or 10 Thayer Street, Manchester Square, W.

P. D. N. wants to know the distinction (if any) between a road and a street. ——Strictly speaking, a main thoroughfare should be called a road, and a side turning, whatever the size, a street.

ETHEL G. writes to ask at what age does a woman become an old maid.——So far as I know, there is no recognised boundary line in this country between girlhood and old maidenhood. In France, however, an unmarried woman is an old maid at thirty. She is still a young maid at twenty-nine years, eleven months, and twenty-nine days, but twenty-four hours later she has reached old maidenhood.

C.—The Cabinet was at one time merely a Committee of the Privy Council, and is, according to a legal authority, "unknown to law." But the Privy Council has ceased to meet for purposes of deliberation, and is now really a ceremonial body. In proof of the complete dissociation of the two bodies at the present time, it is pointed out that, whereas the Privy Council cannot meet except under the presidency of the Sovereign, the monarch cannot constitutionally preside at the meetings of the Cabinet.

W. M.—The best gloves in the world are made in Belgium.

MISS G. H. was recently informed that if she really desired to gain any benefit from the wearing of fur on her garments the fur should be on the inside instead of out. She does not care much about this idea, as fur worn in this manner would not be nearly so becoming as it is when worn on the outside, and wishes to know whether this notion is a true one.——You're all right. Actual experiments have been made and have proved that furs conserve far greater heat on the body when the fur is exposed to the air than when the reverse is the case.

ROB.—The largest bog in Ireland is the bog of Allen, stretching east of the Shannon, which covers something like 200,000 acres. Altogether, about one-sixth of the area of the country is bog.

E. W.—So far as the most recent statistics go, the known proportion of mankind who are blind is about one in 1,500, which would give a total of 1,000,000 blind in the world.

T.—There are about twenty metals more precious than gold, but, naturally, we hear very little about them. Iridium, one of the best known of these precious metals, was worth £65 an ounce at one time, but the value decreases as the metal becomes more plentiful. About seven years ago the value of platinum increased to £4 10s. per ounce, and a jeweller offered me a pair of solid platinum sleeve-links at a price that was about a third of the then value of the metal. He did not believe me when I mentioned the price of platinum. Soon after the price fell, and a year later it was selling for less than half. Since then it has been under thirty shillings; but the price fluctuates.

W. E.—The robes of the Speaker of the House of Commons are identical with the official costume of the Master of the Rolls. In former times the two offices were often united.

P.—The water of the River Tinto, in Spain, has the property of hardening and gradually petrifying the things that fall into it. If a stone is thrown into the river and alights upon another stone at the bottom the two gradually become one. Fish cannot live in the water.

SHORT STORIES' ADVERTISEMENT RATES.

Single column, per inch, per insertion	£0 10 0
Double ,, ,, ,,	1 0 0
Full page inside, facing page of matter, either white paper or 2nd or 3rd page of cover, or back page, per insertion	10 0 0
Half-page ,, ,, ,, ...	5 0 0
Quarter-page ,, ,, ,, ...	2 10 0
Eighth-page ,, ,, ,, ...	1 5 0
Front page, whole ,, ,, ...	12 10 0
,, half	6 5 0

All spaces above one-eighth of a page are charged at per page rate.

Series discount: 5 per cent. for 13, 10 per cent. for 26, 15 per cent. for 52 insertions.

Black blocks are charged 25 per cent. extra. All advertisements are subject to approval. All copy must be sent in by Noon on Tuesday, Jan. 17th, if intended for the Issue on sale Jan. 31st, and dated Feb. 4th. The Proprietors reserve the right to hold over or suspend the insertion of any advertisement without prejudice to other insertions on order. All communications should be addressed to the Advertisement Manager, "Pearson's Weekly" Offices, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Printed and Published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON LTD., at Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

ALL FAT PEOPLE

Can be CURED by taking

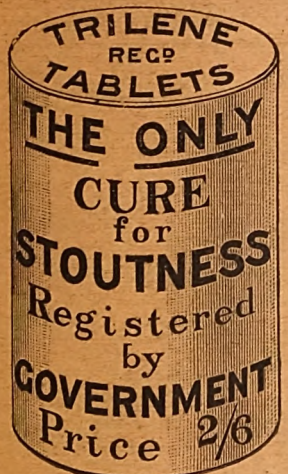
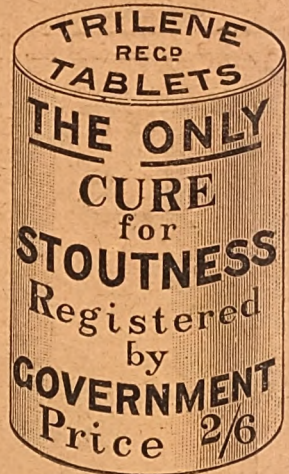
TRILENE TABLETS Regd



For a few weeks. They will safely REDUCE WEIGHT and CURE CORPULENCY PERMANENTLY, whether Abdominal or General. They are small, agreeable, harmless, sent privately, and never fail to Improve both HEALTH and FIGURE without change of Diet.

An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."

Send 2s. 6d. to THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION, 66, Finsbury Pavement, London, E.C.



SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

"87 Alexandra Road, Norwich, October 19th, 1896.

"Gentlemen,—In reference to Trilene Tablets, I may say that my wife found the greatest possible benefit from the use of them; their action was rapid, and exceeded our utmost expectations, as they were also most beneficial to the respiratory organs. My wife was many years growing so stout, but although the disease was, I consider chronic, the Tablets soon reduced the same completely. You have our united thanks, and if I can do anything to promote your interests I will freely use my utmost endeavours to do so.

"Yours faithfully, J. R. CANHAM."

Mrs. DARNLEY SMITH, Landscove Vicarage, Ashburton, writes: "Trilene Tablets have reduced my weight very much. I am so much lighter in every way, and better in health."

COUNTESS SECKENDORFF, of Berlin, writes: "The Tablets greatly benefited me personally, and I am recommending them to friends."

Miss CHATTERTON, 7 Salisbury Villas, Banstead, Surrey, says: "I weighed 12st. 8lb., but am now 11st. and getting much better."

Nurse CROUCHER, at Mrs. Bennett's, 14 Buckleigh Road, Streatham, says: "I lost 9lb. from the box I took."

"77 Hindhill Street, Heywood, February 5th, 1898.

"Gentlemen,—I have not quite finished the box of Tablets and am 2lb. lighter. The change is great, and several friends are beginning the treatment, which not only reduces fat but strengthens rheumatic joints—such has been the case with me. "Yours sincerely, M. A. HEYWOOD."

Mrs. D. BURTON, of Silverleigh, Tunbridge, writes: "I am very pleased with difference in size, my friends all telling me how much thinner I am getting."

Miss NORTHLEDGE, The Laurels, Risceholme Road, Lincoln, says: "The Tablets reduced me 1st., so that I am cured."

West Cornforth, Ferryhill.

Mr. WM. USHER says: "A sister of mine, who was 17st., was greatly reduced by your Tablets to 15st."

Extract from The Lady, September 3rd, 1896: "Many stout persons have suffered untold agonies in unavailing efforts to reduce their bulk, either by means of severe dieting, or by taking more or less deleterious drugs; but all these pains would have been saved if they had only invested in a box of the wonderful Trilene Tablets which are quite harmless, containing neither mercury, arsenic, nor any other mineral poison, and which are an unfailing cure for obesity."

FATHER T. M. BYRNE, of Holy Cross Abbey, Sligo, writes: "When I began your Tablets I was 12st. 5lb.; I now scale at 10st. 11lb.—my case, too, is hereditary."

Mrs. T. BOSTON, Cambridge Villas, Clifford Street, South Wigston, says: "I congratulate you on your wonderful Tablets. My weight at first starting them was 11st. 7lb., and I now weigh 9st. 11lb."

Mr. McLEOD, 44, Calside, Paisley, writes: "I have been cured. If you want to know my weight now, it is 10st.; reduced 1st. 8lb., and I am quite content."

A. M. PRATT, of Ongar House, Ongar, says: "My weight is so much reduced it is unnecessary to take more. The reduction of weight was from 12st. 6lb. to 10st. 4lb."

Mrs. WHITEHOUSE, of Poplar Avenue, Edgbaston, writes: "My husband is in splendid health, and has lost 15lb. in weight since taking the Tablets; I am sure I thank you on his account."

Mrs. H. COX, 28 Watnall Road, Hucknall Torkard, writes: "The box of Tablets has reduced my weight 1¼ stones."

Mr. WALKER, 236 London Road, Hazelgrove, Stockport, says: "I have used one box and am 14lb. lighter. Send another soon as possible."

Col.-Sergt. WHITTLE, of East Lancashire Regt., Burnley, Lancs, says: "A man in our regiment in 1891 lost several stone from taking your Tablets."

Mr. BUTLER, Surgeon, M.R.C.V.S., of Hampton Manor, Evesham, says: "My patient has lost 1st. in weight whilst taking your Tablets."

Miss B. McKENZIE, of Greenhall, High Blantyre, N.B., says: "Completely cured, being reduced 2st."

Mrs. W. A. RADFORD, of High Street, New Brinsley, Eastwood, writes: "Before taking Tablets I was 46 inches round waist, now I am 32 inches. I hope soon to be 23. I could hardly move or get up, now I get about easily. Please use this as you wish."

Countess G. FURSTENBERG, of Stammheim, Germany, writes: "They act speedily and well."

The Princess LIECHTENSTEIN writes from Landsberg, Austria: "Pray send me your excellent Tablets."

Mrs. WEAVER, of Greenpits Villa, Ross, Hereford, writes: "I am reduced from 13st. 8lb. to 11st. You may use this if you like."

Mrs. CROSSLEY, of Rose Hill, Torver, nr. Coniston, says: "There is a very decided diminution of fat. I am delighted, and cannot speak too highly in praise of Tablets. My heart is better, and I can breathe so much easier. You may refer to me as often as you like."

Lady C. CONRAD writes from Wiesbaden: "I am very pleased with your Tablets."

Mrs. TAYLOR-ROBINSON, of Tweed Green House, Whalley Range, Manchester, says: "I feel so much lighter and better since taking your Tablets, and am so much thinner that I hardly recognise myself."

Miss A. LONG, of 9 South Parade, Waterford, writes: "Your Tablets have reduced me 14lb."

Miss A. DAWSON, 62 Orchard Street, Weston-super-Mare, says: "Glad to say the Tablets have sufficiently reduced me. I shall always recommend them."

THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION, 66 FINSBURY PAVEMENT, LONDON.

Digitized by Google

MATCHLESS METAL POLISH

CONTAINS NO ACID

WONDERFUL IN EFFECT

WILL NOT TARNISH

JAXON, CALVERT and Co. MANUFACTURERS, LIVERPOOL

"SIMPLE TEST."
Dab a small quantity on a penny and leave it overnight. If it sets up acid the surface will become green with that poisonous compound known as verdigris "MATCHLESS" METAL POLISH will not turn any metal green.

"WARNING TO LADIES."
Beware of Polishes that set up injurious acids when brought in contact with the metal. They impregnate your cloths with verdigris and spoil your hands.

"LOUIS" VELVETEEN

See that the name spelt L.O.U.I.S is stamped on every Yard.

TRADE MARK

NOS ASPERA JUVANT

LOUIS XI KING OF FRANCE 1461-1483.

RED WHITE AND BLUE

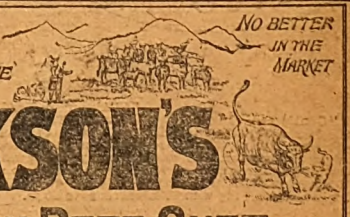
SOLD EVERYWHERE

FRENCH COFFEE

DELICIOUS FOR BREAKFAST OR AFTER DINNER.

EXTRA REFINED THEREFORE NO WASTE

NO BETTER IN THE MARKET



DICKSON'S SCOTCH BEEF SUET

GAINED HIGHEST REWARD AT COOKERY EXHIBITION 1897.

One lb will go as far as two lbs of ordinary suet.

Sold at all stores &c throughout the United Kingdom.

THOS. DICKSON & SON, LTD. EDINBURGH.

ZEBRA Grate Polish.

In Packets or as a Paste in Tins.

Digitized by Google

THE BIG BUDGET. THE BEST OF PENNY COMIC PAPERS. 1d.

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY G. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

No. 525. FOR WEEK ENDING JANUARY 21ST, 1899. [ONE PENNY.

CADBURY'S Cocoa

The Medical Magazine says—

"CADBURY'S is, without question, the favourite Cocoa of the day. For Strength, for Purity, and for Nourishment, there is nothing superior to be found."

"Kola is not harmless."

Medical World.

Absolutely Pure

Absolutely Pure

Absolutely Pure

Absolutely Pure

Absolutely Pure

Absolutely Pure

Absolutely Pure

Absolutely Pure

Absolutely Pure

Absolutely Pure

Absolutely Pure

Absolutely Pure

Absolutely Pure

"The standard of highest Purity."—THE LANCET.

NO ALKALI USED TO DARKEN THE COLOUR.

CADBURY'S COCOA

The best Beverage for Breakfast, Supper, and all times.

NO DRUGS USED to produce an unnatural stimulant and consequent INSOMNIA.

CADBURY'S Cocoa

Absolutely Pure, Therefore Best.

The Lancet says—

"CADBURY'S represents the standard of highest purity."

The Analyst says—

"CADBURY'S is the typical Cocoa of English Manufacture"

It is "A Perfect Food," Therefore Best.

Digitized by Google

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

COFFEE WITHOUT DREGS.

GOOD! ITS MASON'S

MASON'S ESSENCE OF COFFEE AND CHICORY

An agreeable, stimulating and sustaining beverage. Instantly prepared and most economical. Equal to the very finest coffee. Highly recommended by the Medical Profession.

Of all Grocers and Stores, or a Sample Bottle post free for 9 stamps.

ALSO TRY

MASON'S WINE ESSENCES

AND

MASON'S EXTRACT OF HERBS.

Sample Bottle of either sent free for 9d.; two assorted 1/3; three assorted 1/8.

Agents Wanted.

Manufacturers—

NEWBALL & MASON, NOTTINGHAM.

HOMES BRIGHTER. AS SUPPLIED TO THE QUEEN

FOR ALL CLEANSING PURPOSES—

THE GREAT DIRT EXTRACTER

IS "PERFECTION"

MAKES LINEN WHITE AS SNOW AND ALL CLOTHING SWEET AS NEW MOWN HAY.

SOLD BY GROCERS EVERYWHERE.

LABOURS LIGHTER.

ZOX

CURES

NEURALGIA

Toothache, Headache, Sciatica, and all Nerve Pains.

PURE, HARMLESS, AND NON-APERIENT.

Do not be persuaded to take a substitute, there is nothing as good as ZOX.

Of all Chemists, 1s. and 2s. 6d. per Box.

ZOX Co., 11 HATTON GARDEN, E.C.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK

Southampton Bldngs., Chancery Lane, London, W.C.

Invested Funds, £10,000,000. No. of Accounts, 85,094.

TWO-AND-A-HALF per CENT. INTEREST allowed on DEPOSITS, repayable on demand. TWO per CENT. on CURRENT ACCOUNTS, on the minimum monthly balances, when not drawn below £100. STOCKS, SHARES, and ANNUITIES purchased and sold for customers. SAVINGS DEPARTMENT.—Small deposits received, and Interest allowed monthly on each completed £1. The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with particulars, post free. FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

Telephone No. 5, Holborn. Telegraphic Address: "Birkbeck, London."

ATLAS LOCKSTITCH MACHINE.

Works by hand or treadle. Guaranteed 4 years. Equal in quality and size to any machine To ensure satisfaction, we will send machine on receipt of 5/- P.O. for ONE MONTH'S TRIAL. Balance can be paid 5/- Monthly. Call or write for designs and Samples of work.

39/-

THE ATLAS SEWING MACHINE CO., 186a High St., Camden Town, London, N.W.; 63 Seven Sisters Rd., N.; 14 High Rd., Kilburn.

VARICOCELE.

Every man suffering from Varicocele and the allied troubles, or Varicose Veins, should send for treatise, describing their Causes, Symptoms, Results, and Successful and Painless Treatment without surgical operation or the use of cumbersome trusses and electrical appliances. Will be sent sealed, post free.

S. S. MURRAY,
7, Southampton Row, London, W.C.

PALATABLE SUBSTITUTE FOR COD LIVER OIL.

DEVONSHIRE CREAM.

REALLY GENUINE.

In Patent Air-tight Tins. ½lb., 10d.; ¼lb., 1s. 4d.; 1lb., 2s. 4d.; including tin and postage.

MRS. CONYERS
MORCHARD BISHOP, DEVON.

"WORTH A GUINEA A BOX."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

FOR ALL

BILIOUS & NERVOUS DISORDERS,

SUCH AS

Sick Headache, Constipation, Weak Stomach, Impaired Digestion, Disordered Liver & Female Ailments.

SALE NOW OVER SIX MILLIONS YEARLY.

In Boxes, 1s. 1½d., and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.

Prepared only by the Proprietor,

THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.

Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

No. 525. ONE PENNY.

For the Week ending January 21st, 1899.

CHECKMATE.

"A MAN is an idiot to submit to the lashings of a woman's tongue!"

With this exclamation John Gleddon snatched his hat from the hat-rack, slammed the door behind him, and walked away rapidly down town.

Deprived of the chance for another word, Mrs. Gleddon flew into a passion which it is difficult to describe. She rushed to and fro about the house, with hands outstretched, as if clutching at an imaginary foe (her husband, no doubt), and muttering incoherently. Evidently, the domestic machine was very much out of joint.

At last she was struck with a novel idea. She would pay him out for his cruelty; she would teach him to insult her; she would humble his pride and fill his heart with remorse.

Sitting down at her desk, she penned the dagger which should pierce his soul!

* * * * *

It was late when Mr. Gleddon returned for dinner. Business had detained him, but it had been profitable and his humour was greatly improved. His wife would be sorry, no doubt, for what had passed, he thought, and perhaps would drop a tear or two as evidence of her penitence. He would be generous and forgive her, and allow her to dry her eyes upon the lapel of his coat. Yes, she should have his unconditional pardon.

However, Mr. Gleddon was doomed to disappointment. No penitent eyes met him at the door.

He stepped into the hall and passed on into the dining-room. She was not there, and no dinner awaited him.

On the table was a note. It read as follows:

JOHN GLEDDON.—In the presence of a whole churchful of people you vowed to love, cherish and protect poor little Gladys. Have you done so? No! you have trampled upon my love! You have crushed me with your tyranny! You should have married that red-headed Jones girl, who would have scratched your face and cracked your skull with a rolling-pin. But I will not upbraid you; your conscience alone shall be your accuser. Believe me, there is no malice in the heart which has borne your persecutions. It may console you, in the lonely years to come, to know that you have my pardon for your perfidy—your inexcusable treachery and neglect. If it is not too much trouble you may come down to the foot of Old Graniteside to-night, and rescue from the cold, heartless waters all that remains of little, broken-hearted,—GLADYS.

All rights reserved.]

As Mr. Gleddon reached the end of the note, his face paled and his hands shook perceptibly.

"Good Heavens!" he gasped, "does she contemplate suicide?"

He was about to rush from the room, when a second thought flashed across his mind. He picked up the note and perused it again, his countenance changing from fear to anger. Making a roll of the note, he struck a match, lighted the paper, and threw it, blazing, into the grate. He then mounted his bicycle and rode away.

* * * * *

Two ladies were sitting in the shade, partially concealed by a thick growth of shrubs and trees which crowned the brow of Old Graniteside. They were enjoying the exhilarating breezes and chatting rapidly.

They were Mrs. Gleddon and her friend Miss Fannie Wagner.

"Isn't it strange that he doesn't come, Fan?" asked Mrs. Gleddon, glancing anxiously in the direction of the town.

"Perhaps he is going to bring a body of men, with drags and an ambulance," replied her companion laughing,

"No doubt; but even then he or they ought to be here before this time. John will not leave my body in the water longer than necessary," said Mrs. Gleddon, shuddering in imagination of such an unpleasant condition.

"What a mean thing you are, Gladys, to frighten him so! He will be nearly distracted."

"Well, I don't care much if he is. It will teach him to treat me with more regard in the future."

"On the contrary, he may never forgive you for treating him so shabbily."

"Oh, no! He will think that I really and truly meant to jump into the water; but that I met you and was persuaded otherwise. It will be easy enough to deceive him. 'Love is blind,' you know. Ha! ha!"

"Then you believe he loves you?" asked Fannie.

"Why, of course, he does; he adores me! That's what ails him. He is so jealous of me that he wishes me to be always petting him, for fear my love will wane. If he loved me less he would not be so peevish."

"And you?"

"Oh, certainly, I like him fairly well. But then, you know, a woman should not be so lavish with her affections; she must be master of herself and her temper. It is the man who is continually betraying himself by his actions, and making a stupid of himself."

"Then you think a woman should not allow her love to manifest itself?"

"Hardly ever. It is always best for a woman to guard her passions and emotions, for once let her take the initiative and sue for favours, and that moment she makes herself a slave to his tyranny."

"Would you have the wife sacrifice her husband's pride?"

"Yes; rather than her own."

* * * * *

At that moment, Mr. Gleddon, tired of eavesdropping and stung by the foregoing conversation, mounted his bicycle and rode away, taking good care that his course should be out of sight of the ladies.

A half-hour later, Mrs. Gleddon despairing of her husband's coming and almost hoping that he had in some manner missed seeing her note, arose and, with her companion, was soon cycling homewards. They had made about half the distance to the town, when they came to a deep hollow of considerable width, and spanned by a rustic bridge.

"What a picturesque scene this is, Fan!" exclaimed Mrs. Gleddon as their machines were gliding over the bridge.

"Yes, it is! But look, Gladys! There is a man down there! Who can it be? What has happened to him?"

Glancing in the direction designated by her friend, Mrs. Gleddon saw a man lying at the bottom of the ravine on a patch of greensward, with his face turned upwards. Not far from him lay his machine.

"Heavens!" she exclaimed, "it's John! He has ridden off the approach to the bridge and is killed!"

The ladies dismounted from their machines and Mrs. Gleddon, in her excitement, made a movement as if she contemplated following the course taken by her husband, but was restrained by the hand of Miss Wagner.

"Compose yourself, Gladys," she said. "Would you jump to certain death? Perhaps he is not killed after all."

"I tell you he is dead! Look at his white face!" exclaimed the frightened woman. "Come, Fan, let us go to him!"

In a few moments Mrs. Gleddon was kneeling beside the still form of her husband, with her hands placed over his heart.

"He is not dead, but only stunned. Bring some water, Fan! Quick! please!"

Miss Wagner hurriedly soaked her handkerchief in the stream close by, and placed it on the man's forehead. Then they both set to work rubbing his hands, face and chest, while Mrs. Gleddon forgetting her pride and self-restraint, gave vent to her excitement in tears and sobs.

"Oh, my poor hubby! You did come to save me and have lost your own life, perhaps, in the undertaking! See! Fan! How still he lies! Oh, he will never come to, and I have murdered him!"

But Miss Wagner was busily applying the water, and paid little heed to what her companion said.

At last there was a slight jerking of the muscles and something like a moan escaped the man's lips.

"He is coming to, Fan! More water!" exclaimed the excited wife, bending over and pressing her lips to those of her husband.

Another supply of water drenched his head. He sprang to his feet, snatched a handkerchief from his pocket and began mopping the water from his face and neck.

"What on earth are you two simpletons doing with me?" he asked, half in anger.

"Oh, John! are you badly hurt?" asked his wife, with much anxiety.

"Hurt? Well, I should think not!"

"But you know, you rode off the approach, and——"

"Don't you believe it! Just came down here to enjoy a nap in the cool shade, and was pounding away amazingly when you came and woke me up in such a heathenish manner."

"But, I don't understand—the note—didn't you come to the rescue——"

"Indeed not!" said he. "You see, I thought a bath in the cold, heartless water would be just the thing to cool your temper, and——"

But Mrs. Gleddon waited to hear no more.

"You mean thing! Come, Fan," she said.

And away they sped, leaving Mr. Gleddon to follow at his leisure.

GUY LESLIE.

Digitized by Google

A NOCTURNAL DRAMA.

As I had expected, the back door was unfastened. I have found that I can nearly always rely upon the inherent carelessness of people for such favours as an unlocked door or an open window.

Pushing open the door I soon gained the hall on the ground floor; I had brought no lantern with me, since I did not anticipate requiring the services of one. Three days previously I had, while ostensibly reading the gas meter, familiarised myself with the plans of the house; and had departed, openly making memoranda in a note-book, presumably as to the amount of gas consumed during the last quarter.

The lights in the lower part of the house were out, except one, and the servants were no doubt in bed. A swinging door, containing a pane of glass set in at a level with my shoulder, opened into the front hall. Through it I saw that the lamp near the door was burning dimly; a precautionary measure, evidently, since I was well aware that all the family were in their rooms.

The occupants of the house were but six in number, and consisted of the master, Mr. Joseph Lodge, a wealthy and liberal manufacturer, his wife, a charming woman, so report had it, whom I had not had the pleasure of meeting, and the servants. Of the latter there were but four, a cook, two maids, and a youth of twenty-two, who looked after the one horse belonging to the family, and had various other duties.

From the vantage of a large shrub, only a few yards from the hall door, I had seen the master and his wife return in the carriage at eleven, alight, and enter the house. Later, I had seen the lights in the two front rooms of the second storey, and later still, at about twelve, I had seen the lights go out. I had kept my post until a quarter to one, and as up to that time no one had left the building by either the front or side doors, I felt very certain of finding Mr. and Mrs. Lodge in their rooms, but whether asleep or awake remained to be determined.

Gentlemen of my profession have a natural antipathy to light while following their vocation, so, with a glance of suspicious enmity at the low-burning gas-jet, I started up the broad staircase, stooping low and steadying myself with my hands on the steps above. At the sixth step I paused and listened attentively. I heard no sound save the loud ticking of a clock close by, and the howl of a dog at a distance. Well content, I started forward again, when — a quick, shrill shriek sent my heart leaping into my throat, and caused me to catch the banisters in fear and trembling.

My first thought was of a burglar alarm; then my nerves quieted down and I realised the meaning of the sound; it was a cuckoo clock hanging on the landing above me. It had struck one o'clock.

With my nerves somewhat unsettled, I crept on again past the clock, and so reached the head of the stairs in the second floor.

All was darkness. To the right of me another flight of stairs led on up to the third storey, where in front of the house was situated a billiard-room, and in the back a garret. With these rooms I had nothing to do, so I turned my attention to Mrs. Lodge's room. From this no light shone anywhere, neither through the key-hole nor from under the door. I stooped and laid a practised ear at the key-hole; not a sound reached it.

I turned to the door opposite. Here, as there, shone no sign of light, but I heard distinctly from within the sound of subdued snoring. I tried the handle. Eureka! I was in luck; the door opened.

Pushing it gently, I crept through and closed it again, all but a few inches.

Crossing the room, with a glance at the bed and its inmate, I reached the window on the side of the house, and undoing the fastening, raised the sash a few inches to make sure that egress, in case of hurried flight, was possible there. A pipe would enable me to reach the balcony, and from that escape was easy.

Heavy curtains draped the window at each side. Behind one of these I stepped and looked out.

Below me were the grounds, beyond that the road, with a few scattered residences in sight. The night was cloudy, but not perfectly dark. There was prospect of moonlight later on, for even now the moon was struggling with the black clouds overhead.

I stepped into the room again.

The bed, with its sleeping occupant, was plainly discernable, a great blotch of grey in the half light. I could see no sign of a cupboard or wardrobe in the room, but a door near at hand opened into a dressing-room where, since it was lighted by a window on the side of the house, I could plainly make out the forms of a wash-stand, a chair or two, and what, on investigation, proved to be a cupboard door.

I had reason to believe that under the foot of the bed I should find a basket containing the table silver of the house, and on running my hand along the floor thereabouts, I was not disappointed. The basket appeared to be nearly full of knives, forks, and such like utensils. But I left it in its place for the present, as I wished first to examine Mrs. Lodge's jewellery case, which I had been informed contained some few diamonds really meriting the attention of such an experienced collector as myself.

The ticking of a watch attracted my attention, and I soon located it on the wash-stand in the dressing-room. From the feeling of it, it appeared to be an ordinary gold watch, with some inscription on the back, and so, perhaps scarcely worth the trouble of disposing of it. Still, business had not been particularly flourishing with me of late, so I dropped the watch into my pocket, resolving not to be too nice in my tastes.

At that moment a slight sound fell on my ears. I paused and waited, but heard nothing more. Then I looked carefully round the corner of the door-post. I could see nothing to account for the noise. The sleeper lay in the same position and snored quietly. I advanced into the room, keeping well in the shadow. Everything was as before. Stay! Surely, there lay a faint line of light under the door across the hall.

I stole to the door of the room, and increased its opening sufficiently to allow my eyes a fair view of the one opposite. There was a light in the woman's room which had not been there when I looked before. It was not strong, and I surmised that she had lighted a night-lamp which would also account for the small noise I had heard. Hesitating whether to remain where I was or to retreat to the convenient darkness of the stairs, I listened for sounds from the room. Presently they reached me—the sounds of footsteps! And coming towards the door.

Even as I drew myself together for a retreat, the light under the door increased in brilliancy, and then suddenly the door was opened and I caught a glimpse, ere I abandoned my position, of a woman in a light coloured gown, holding a night lamp in one hand.

Quickly and noiselessly I stepped behind one of the draperies of Mr. Lodge's window. I preferred to be there rather than in the dressing-room, in case of discovery, since in the latter place I should be cut off from retreat save by way of the window, which I had neglected to examine.

Scarcely had I gained my hiding place when the door of the room was opened, the woman entered, and the door was closed again and locked. I inwardly abused her for a meddling fool, while observing with relief that she had left the key in the lock. She passed where I stood, and I was obliged to draw back and so lost sight of her for a moment.

When I looked again she was at the side window. Putting aside the draperies she raised the lower sash to its full limit. That was the one I partly opened. I thanked her fervently for that; I had preferred, when hurried, a window to a door, and with this one wide open, I could leap to the balcony, if necessary.

She stood looking out for nearly a minute; then she turned and came back to the foot of the bed opposite to where I stood concealed, and I held my breath lest she should hear the sound of my breathing.

Once she started towards me, possibly to put up that window also, but changing her mind, went to the bed and examined the sleeping man, holding the lamp over his face.

His low, regular respiration seemed to satisfy her, for I heard a sigh of evident relief as she placed the lamp on a chair and let her gaze travel about the room.

As she stood there, I found my first good opportunity for observing her. She appeared to be about thirty years of age, tall, erect and with a superb carriage of the head. Her gown revealed in it clinging folds a perfect form. Her hair, black and lustrous, hung unconfined over her broad white shoulder, and her face—but as I looked at her face my heart stopped its beating for an instant.

She was undeniably handsome, with regular features and deep-set, dark eyes, but on her face was such a terrible, inhuman look of repressed agony and dread, that for the moment I thought her insane. Her next actions were but little conducive to a change of opinion.

With a shrug of her shoulders, as though throwing off some qualm of an opposing conscience, she crossed the apartment to the side window, and pulling softly at one of the draperies, soon tore it from its fastenings. This she laid on a chair. Then she took from the pocket of her gown a tiny phial and a cloth. Again she approached the sleeping man and bent over him; he stirred uneasily in his slumber, and I saw her hand cross to her bosom and linger there until he breathed quietly again.

For a time my nerves had played me false, but when I realised that murder was to be done, unless I speedily thought of a way of preventing it, my ordinary composure returned, and I set my mind busily to work.

Quickly but carefully, she applied a portion of the contents of the phial to the cloth and laid it over the sleeper's face; in a moment the sweet, nauseous fumes of chloroform filled the room. The threatened man stirred not. Laying down the phial, after replacing the stopper, the woman seized the drapery from the chair and tore off about a yard of its length. Again she approached the bed; turning down the bed clothes and undoing his night-shirt, she laid her hand over the man's heart.

Already I could perceive a difference in his breathing; the drug was taking effect. I have had some experience with chloroform, and I knew that the quantity already administered would produce no worse effect than a severe headache on waking. But the drug, I was sure, was but the first step; the real drama was yet to be played.

The woman's hand travelled slowly over the bared breast; the other hand went to her bosom; this one I watched. In a moment the hand at her bosom fell to her side. It was her left hand and I could not see it. She bent silently over the bed and listened intently. The house was still. I held my breath; my mind was already made up, and I only awaited the moment to act. Already her hands drew together, when again that clock on the landing below shrieked out the hour! I started violently and the curtain folds undulated. I feared to look out lest she had seen it. Again the clock shrieked. Two o'clock.

I gathered my nerves in hand and peered out. The woman was on the floor; the hand clutching at her heart held a small jewelled dagger; plainly could I hear her laboured breathing; she, too, had been startled by the sounds. For a moment or two she sat there motionless, leaning against the foot of the bed. Then she arose. The dagger was clutched in her right hand now; with the left she sought the opening between the ribs over the heart of the unconscious victim.

She raised the knife; three blood-red gems in the hilt sparkled wickedly in the light. Slowly she lowered it until the point touched the man's breast over his heart. Again and carefully she raised the dagger.

Her back was towards me and I could not see her face, for which I was rather thankful; it could not have been, just at that moment, a pleasant one to look upon. The upraised hand never trembled as it was poised to strike. I thrust the drapery noiselessly aside and stole forward, just as a loud hiss burst from her lips and the knife swiftly descended.

But I had thrust my right arm forward, and as hers struck it the dagger dropped harmlessly from her hand and fell flat on the man's naked breast.

She uttered no sound, but while I might have counted ten, stood erect and rigid. Such moments as those kill, and I, in turn, heaved a sigh of relief when she fell quietly back against me in a swoon.

I half dragged and half carried her to the nearest chair, where she lay inert and lifeless, while I went back to the bed and examined the saturated cloth over the man's face.

As I had thought, the amount of chloroform inhaled was too small to do more than produce profound slumber, so I replaced the cloth lest the sleeper should throw off the effect and wake before my visit was over. The dagger I picked up and examined. It was of foreign workmanship. Six large rubies adorned the hilt, and despite the fact that the thing was intended to serve only as an ornament, the steel was of such quality that I could not bend the blade from its shape. Had it struck a rib, the man's life would not have been spared through the intervention of a bent blade. It was a pretty thing, and I dropped it into a pocket after the watch.

Then I unlocked the door and peered out, listening carefully for sounds of persons moving in the house. All was silent. Our little drama had passed off unheard.

I closed and locked the door again, and seated myself on the edge of the bed facing the unconscious woman, and filled my pipe and lighted it. The odour of the chloroform was still sickening, although the opened window had done much to dissipate it. For several minutes I sat there and thought, watching the smoke clouds float upwards, and keeping an eye on my fair neighbour. Then I went to the window and knocking the ashes out against the sill, placed my pipe back in my pocket, and drew a chair to the small table which stood against the wall.

I had a pencil in my pocket, but I preferred to use a fly leaf from a book lying at my elbow, than to tear a page from the little memorandum book which I carried.

Take a burglar's advice; never sleep again with your door unlocked; danger threatens from within.

I folded the message, and searching under the clothes, folded it firmly in the sleeper's hand. Then I turned again to the woman. A faint colour had returned to her cheeks and an instant later her eyes opened and fell on me.

She gazed at me in silence; then her glance wandered to the bed and its occupant, and she looked long at the latter. His breathing had grown less laboured now. Her gaze travelled back to me, where I sat on the bottom of the bed.

"You—saved him?" she asked quietly. I nodded my head.

"Why?" The question rather staggered me, and I hesitated.

"Why?" she repeated. "What is he to you that you should have interfered? I would have paid you well. I would have given you all that you could have asked; half his fortune would be little enough to pay for his death! He is rich, far richer than even I know of; but I do not want his money."

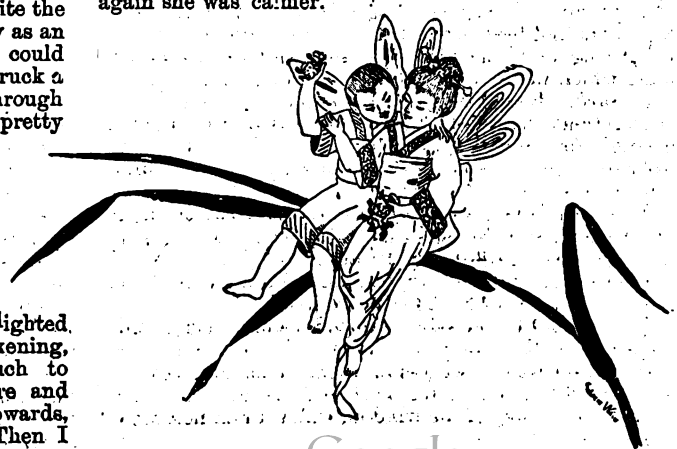
She started from her seat and fell on her knees before me, her arms held out to me in supplication.

"See, there is yet time!" she whispered hoarsely. "The knife! Where is it? What have you done with it?" Her eyes searched rapidly the bed, the floor, my hands. "Kill him! I will make you rich—rich—rich!"

She sank to the floor in exhaustion and looked into my face beseechingly. I shook my head, and I suppose something of the horror I felt found its way to my countenance. She rose unsteadily to her feet.

"You coward! You fool!" she hissed. "What is his life among so many? Are there not thousands of fiends left in the world? Let this one die! Where is the knife? Give it to me!"

Again I shook my head. She dropped her hands and went back to her chair and sank into it wearily, with a look of hopeless misery on her face. When she spoke again she was calmer.



Digitized by Google

"Who are you?" she asked.

"My name matters little," I replied; "call me the Hand of Providence."

She took no notice.

"You are a burglar?"

"I have that honour," I said.

"You came for——"

"Your jewels."

"They are in my room; in the second drawer; all save these."

She held out a hand, on the fingers of which blazed three diamonds of immense size and beauty. I looked at them with interest. The sleeve of her loose gown was drawn back from the outstretched wrist, and my gaze fell on something that startled me more than the stones; a white, firm arm, carrying a wheal an inch wide, and purple as though marked with ink.

"What is that?" I asked.

For answer she drew her sleeve further up her arm. Two other similar marks discoloured the fair surface. I looked from them to her face, doubting the evidence of my senses.

"They are nothing," she said, her lips curling with scorn, "only marks of affection from my husband." I shuddered and glanced at the quiet figure on the bed. "They are the least of all; look!"

She tore the gown away from her shoulder. Purple and blue and yellow marks crossed and recrossed there.

"A whip?" I asked.

"A cane," she answered.

"Why?"

"Because it is his pleasure."

"But why do you not get a separation? Surely——"

"He is a devil incarnate. No one knows, not even the servants; he is so careful." She laughed mirthlessly. "Our friends, acquaintances, everyone, think us a model couple. Neglected wives hereabouts hold that fiend up to their husbands' gaze as an example of marital perfection. For months I have laboured to provoke him to strike me before the servants. But no; he is only 'grieved at my conduct.' Once when I expected blows I hid my maid in the cupboard of my room. When he came in he went straight to the door and sent her away; and then I—suffered."

We sat in silence for a moment. I thought of nothing to say, for my blood was hot within me. The clock on the stairs shrieked thrice.

She arose.

"I must go back," she said. "Will you come and take the jewels? They are nothing to me!" I shook my head.

"No," I answered roughly.

I was thankful when she arose and her sleeve fell over those marks; the dagger burnt in my pocket and my fingers itched to have it out; and were it in my hand and those cruel stripes before my eyes, I think, nay, I know for truth, that in another moment I should have buried the knife where it belonged.

"One minute, please."

I arose.

"These things must be put away."

I took up the phial, still half full of chloroform, and hurled it far out of the window.

"A burglar does not leave such things about."

I picked up the torn drapery.

"I suppose you would have bound your hands with this?"

She nodded.

"And gagged yourself with this?"

Again she nodded.

"And how could you have tied your own hands?"

She shrugged her shoulders.

"I should have done the best I could. In the excitement of the morning no one would have noticed whether the knot was tight or loose."

"I don't believe they would." I laid down the curtain again. The smaller pieces I folded and put in my pocket. I moved the chairs out of their places.

"That is all I think."

She moved to the door. I took the dagger from my pocket.

"And this?" I asked, holding it out to her.

"Keep it," she said. "The stones are of value."

"I will keep it," I answered, "but not for the stones."

I unlocked the door and held it open for her. With lamp in hand, she paused on the threshold.

"Are you proud of what you have done?" she asked wearily.

"No!" I answered under my breath. "I am sorry."

A softer look crept into her face.

"No, do not be. For a while longer my soul is without crime. For that I should thank you."

Impulsively she stretched her hand to me. The sleeve fell away from her wrist. Something came before my eyes like a dim red veil. Dropping to my knees, I pushed back her sleeve and pressed a mad kiss on her arm over one disfiguring wheal.

Then I staggered to my feet and stood before her with lowered eyes, muttering: "Forgive me—forgive me!" over and over again.

She made no answer, and presently I gathered courage to lift my eyes, expecting to find her gone. Instead, my gaze fell on her face, whereon I saw no sign of anger, only a troubled smile, and I think—a faint flush in her cheeks.

"It was nothing," she said simply. "It is only that you are sorry for a woman, and"—a sob crept into her voice—"I am not used to it."

I made no reply. She went out and across the landing and in at her door, and when it had closed upon her I was left in darkness.

For some time I stood there motionless. Perhaps it was a minute—perhaps an hour—I do not know. Then I shook myself together and closed the door and locked it. From the man's face I took away the cloth and put it in my pocket.

Then I remembered his watch, which ticked away in the folds of my coat, and I took it out and threw it on the bed by him. At the window I paused and looked out as I had done nearly two hours before. To the left of the house the sky was growing pink with the first pearly light of the new day.

With one foot on the sill, I hesitated, and then went back into the room.

When again I was ready to depart, I stood outside on the ledge and drew down the window after me. Then I dropped to the balcony and thence to the ground safely, and without noise, and hurried away over the silent road.

And as I went I tossed some bits of torn paper to the roadside.

L. P. HARNEY.

BARBER: "You are getting quite bald, sir. Can't I recommend something for your head?"

Mr. Hurry: "Why, yes; I'd like my hat as soon as possible!"

BOOK II. CONCERNING THE - - VOYAGE IN THE SOUTH SEAS.

SUMMARY.

A MAJOR and a cornet of Sheridan's Horse seek refuge in the wilds of Lochaber after the battle of Culloden Moor. They are joined by another refugee, Murtagh O'Neill. The major succumbs to wounds received in the engagement, and a troop of heavy cavalry discover the hiding place of the remaining two fugitives, and give chase to them.

They manage to get away safely and reach St. Peter's Strait, where they discover a trading cutter standing apparently empty They take possession and make off with their prize before the owner's return. A boy appears out of the forepeak and volunteers to act as pilot, and they decide on a cruise to France.

The cutter is run down in a fog by a British privateer, giving the fugitives only just time to escape on to the larger vessel as their own goes to the bottom.

The Governor of Lima observes a strange craft cruising in his waters, and orders it to take its departure. The crew defy him, however, and he sends the Santa Theresa to punish them for their impudence. Unfortunately for him his own men get the worst of it, and Sneyd, attended by Sandy Carmichael, lands and interviews the Governor, demanding an enormous sum as compensation money. This His Excellency reluctantly agrees to pay.

CHAPTER II.

How the snow Fortune's Favourite of Bristol, proved to be laden with more firearms than a simple trader generally carries: how she cruised on the Spanish Main: and how she manned and dispatched a prize in search of fresh adventure and reward.

To retrace our steps a little.

It will be remembered that when the little Scotch cutter was run down off the mouth of the Bristol Channel, her crew scrambled on board the vessel that did the mischief, without so much as wetting themselves. It was a touch-and-go case, certainly; but such things are little thought of at sea, provided they turn out prosperously.

The three found themselves on the forecastle of a snow of some three hundred and fifty tons, possessing exactly the weather-stained clothes they stood up in, and, of worldly goods, absolutely nothing besides.

The chief mate of the snow, a squat, grizzled old seaman with a great birth-mark running across his forehead, over the lid of his left eye, and ending abruptly in mid-cheek, accosted them.

"Umph! got aboard safe, 'ave yer? Sarve yer bloomin' well right to bin drownded. Oughter kep' a smarter look-hout, an' showed a flare when ye saw us a-comin'."

"How could his honour see yez?" retorted O'Neill. "The night's as black as the pit, an' as thick as hedge wid dhrivin' rain. If the lubber that's steerin' had shifted his hellum when his honour sung out, you'd a slipped by under our starn aisy enough."

"The chap as was steerin' did bear away all 'e know'd,' grunted the mate, "but she don't answer as easy as hall that. Guess it's nobody's fault. Might 'a' run foul o' hanybody or hanything that's 'andy, night like this. But give us that glim"—a sailor standing by handed him a horn-windowed lanthorn—"and let's see yer. Oo's this ye're callin' ''is honour'? Strike me, but we've got a bloomin' swell aboard!"

He gazed at the tarnished lace on Sneyd's much soiled uniform, with an odd mixture of surprise and annoyance.

"Are you a King's officer, squire?" he asked.

"That depends which king you are talking about," Sneyd answered.

"Don't split hairs now. Are you are a officer of King George, or are you not."

"Emphatically I am not."

"Then what in thunder are you?" asked the fellow, bringing forward the lanthorn again, and looking him up and down afresh.

"One of King James's officers. I was in Prince Charles's army."

"Whew!" whistled the mate; "that's not so bad. I thought you was one o' the hother sort."

"And if I had been?" inquired Sneyd.

"Well, you'd a' found yerself in the wrong shop, that's all."

"I wish," said Sneyd, testily, "you wouldn't be so mysterious. Tell us what the ship is, can't you, and where she's bound to. I've been open enough with you."

"You're aboard the snow Forchun's Favooryte, port o' Bristol, Reuben Grum, master, bound for the West Injies, an' per'aps on a bit along the Main—tradin'. That's enough for you. Now tumble down below and turn in. The skipper 'e takes the mawnin' watch, an' 'e'll see ye then. 'E won't want to be disturbed before."

A seaman led them into the forecastle. A single slush lamp swinging from a blackened beam threw out a dull, smoking, reeking flame, which served to do little more than accentuate the darkness beyond its immediate neighbourhood. The air was close and heavy; and there was a mingled odour of bilge-water, oilskins, unfragrant humanity, and newly-greased sea-boots, that would have been very trying to any but a well-hardened stomach; and what with the hammering of the seas without, the snores of many sleepers, and the rattling and sliding about of one thing and another, there was din sufficient to make ordinary conversation inaudible.

It was not a tempting bedroom, thought Sneyd, but not being in a position to find fault, wisely held his tongue, and climbing into the narrow box of a bunk that was assigned him, pulled the coarse rug he found there up to his chin, and quickly fell asleep.

"Strike me, but we've got a bloomin' swell aboard!"

It was day when he woke, and the forecastle was illuminated with a dusky sort of twilight, that eyes accustomed to the darkness were able to see in with tolerable facility. Several hammocks were still freighted with human occupants, and many of the bunks at the vessel's side were still tenanted. There must have been the best part of sixty men there. And yet this would represent less than half of the crew. The other watch was on deck, and of course there would be a tidy sprinkling of officers aft. Sneyd was tolerably unversed in such matters, but it struck him that the crew was a remarkably heavy one for a vessel of the size; and he began to wonder how a simple trader could find occupation for so many men, when a summons to go aft and be interviewed by the captain, cut short his ruminations.

Accompanied by O'Neill and the boy, Sneyd passed along the waist, where the men were busily employed in scrubbing down decks, and mounted the poop, which was gained by means of ladders leading up from the waist.

Sneyd had pictured to himself the captain of the Fortune's Favourite as something like her chief mate, whom he had met over night, and was somewhat agreeably surprised to find himself mistaken. The commander was a short, slight, nattily-dressed little man, in silk stockings, knee-breeches, white kerseymere waistcoat, cut-away coat and gold-laced cocked hat.

He wore diamond buckles on his shoes, and point-lace ruffles showing from out the sleeves of his coat. In fact he was quite a nautical dandy. Sneyd learnt afterwards that "Reuben Grum" was merely the little man's nom de guerre—a "purser's name," as it is termed at sea. A cadet of a good English family, he had, as many young men of small fortune did in those days, adopted the sea as a profession; which was to them what Australia was to their descendants a century later.

It meant hard work and rough associates. It might produce nothing more than an arduous livelihood. There were countless contingencies of battle, murder, and sudden death. But to the lucky few, the sea gave ample fortune; and this tempted the ambitious many to try their luck on its hazardous bosom.

"We ran your craft down last night, my men," said Captain Grum, "and I'm sorry for it. The night was thick, and on making strict inquiries, I don't find that my lookout men were to be blamed. It was the fortune of sea, which no one can alter. Now, about your future. I cannot put you ashore, and, from a hint that has come to my ears, I should judge that you would not wish to be landed either in England or Ireland. So you must stay aboard. But as I do not carry passengers, and can allow no idlers on this ship, your names will be entered amongst the crew. I do not know your past experience, but, to concede the benefit of the doubt, you Sneyd, and you O'Neill, will be rated as able seaman, and will receive pay and prize-money as such. Carmichael, you will be entered on the books as boy. You will help the doctor, who tells me that the lad he has at present is a fool. I should tell you that this vessel carries a 'letter of marque,' and you two, Sneyd and O'Neill, will have to drill with pike, cutlass, small arms, and great guns, along with the other men.

"One word more. My list of officers is complete at present, but before the voyage ends it is very likely that there will be casualties. I promote from my own crew; remember this.

"O'Neill, go forward; Carmichael, go to the doctor's cabin; and the pair of you set about your duty.—Mr. Sneyd, you have come in through the hawse-holes. So did I, and I am on my own quarter-deck now. I trust I may be able some day to bring you up the poop-ladder. But that depends entirely upon yourself. I make no distinction amongst my men, gentle or simple, save such as they carve out for themselves. You are in the second mate's watch. Go and report yourself to him as ready for duty."

Digitized by Google

Captain Grum was a martinet, strict with his men, and unbending with his officers. But though he was undoubtedly severe, and visited any dereliction of duty with heavy-handed severity, he was undeniably just, and so his discipline on the whole was not unliked. Our trio philosophically determined to endure a fate which they had no option of altering; and not perhaps on the whole dissatisfied with their chances, settled themselves down steadily and soberly to work.

Sandy Carmichael, whose nationality was unknown even to himself, found himself loblolly-boy to a Scotch surgeon. Dr. Menteith took a fancy to him, first from his name, and then for himself. The bottles and jars of drugs in the cramped little dispensary had each its name written on to a piece of paper which was tied on to the neck, and by studying these Sandy taught himself to read. His letters he knew—they had been instilled into him by some instructor in the forgotten past—and in a week he could tell the name of every drug in the place at a glance. The doctor noted this, and finding him a sharp, handy, useful lad all round, gave him regular instruction for half-an-hour every day. Sandy profited by this to the full, and employed his leisure time in reading and re-reading the doctor's slender library. There was little medical knowledge in those days; but Menteith was quite up to his date, and took a pride in imparting all he knew.

He was quite a nautical dandy.

"Ye'll have a chance o' lairning yer anatomy, Sandy lad, before many days are over," he would say, as he was explaining the use of one or other of his instruments. "A cannon-shot is a rare tool for cutting sections with." At which gruesome suggestion Sandy would nod solemnly and go on with mixing his powder, or rolling up pills, or whatever he was engaged upon. "Ye're just the stolid, steady-fisted, wooden-faced sort o' chap to make a successful operator out of," Menteith would continue, "an' wi' good luck ye should be full-blown ship's doctor after this cruise is done. And mind ye, a ship's a graund school for a young fellow to practice in. There's no second opeenion to call in an' say your treatment's erroneous. Ye're lord an' master o' all the sick and wounded. An' when ye're five-an'-thairty ye may go ashore, powder yer queue, marry, and set up as a respectable general practeetioner."

To which vision of comfort and prosperity, Sandy Carmichael steadily looked forward, and strove earnestly to attain.

Of his companions, the Irishman soon established himself as a general favourite throughout the ship. He knew how to do the work that was required of him, and did it well and when off duty he could sing a good song, and dance jig or hornpipe with anybody.

Sneyd at first was looked rather askance at. The rough fellows who were his shipmates saw that he was their superior by birth from the first glance, and for a while distrusted him accordingly, "We don't want no quarter-deck swells down here," growled one. "The snow's got a full complement o' them, aft." But when they saw that Sneyd gave himself no airs, that he neither pressed into their society nor appeared to disdain it, but spent his leisure hours for the most part in trying to improve himself in a sailor's duties, then they changed their opinion of him, and endeavoured to atone for the first cold suspicion, by aiding and instructing him by every means in their power.

The surly first mate, too—he of the dark red blotch on the face—gruffly volunteered one day to show him how to "take the sun" with a quadrant. "You don't seem as big a thick-'ead as some," that squat little officer informed him, "so you can try yer hand with the quadran' if yer like, an' then see me cypher out the reck'nin' on the slate after. There, don't answer me, but come along and watch."

Nautical instruments were crude in those days, and experience as well as calculation was necessary to tell a ship's whereabouts on the trackless ocean. But the voyage across the Atlantic was a long and tedious one, and before they had made their first landfall, Sneyd, who proved himself an apt scholar, had mastered the working of log-line, compass, and quadrant; knew how to set a course from the chart; and understood how to deal with that delicate instrument, the chronometer.

A sound education stood him in good stead, and in the time it would have taken an unlettered man to master the very first rudiments of the art, he had become a very average navigator.

* * * * *

One day, when they were some two hundred and fifty miles west of Cape Clear, Sneyd was sitting on the lofty forecastle-deck, rope and marlinespike in hand, receiving instructions from O'Neill in the method of manufacturing that nautical mystery known as a Turk's head.

The snow had met with dead head winds during the last week, and was ratching industriously north and south, but making very little headway against them. Those old barrel-shaped craft, with their towering poops and forecastles, with their square bows, and still squarer sterns, with their bellying square sails and general clumsiness, could make very little progress without a wind that was more or less fair. Given the breeze well aft of the quarter, they would surge and wallow along their four or five, or even six knots the hour, but when the breezes headed them, they were philosophically content with not losing ground. Gain it, of course, they didn't, for leeway always counteracted the little they did of eating up to windward. Scurvy would very likely break out—in fact, it would be very odd if it didn't—but then they expected it. Salt victuals and a long voyage were sure seeds to grow it from. But then, as I say, if it did come, no one would be particularly surprised or alarmed. Men shipped in those days with a foreknowledge of what was before them, just as they do now.

As I have said, Sneyd and O'Neill were sitting on the forecastle-head, the one learning, and the other teaching, the mysteries of a certain knot, which appears, amongst other places, on the foot-ropes beneath the yards.

"Murtagh O'Neill," Sneyd was saying, marking his periods with the marlinspike, "for the fortieth time, I tell you I've dropped the gentleman."

"An' I say yer honour couldn't dhrop it any more than yez could yer head."

"I have dropped it, I tell you. We are both sailors before the mast, and equals——"

"Aquals! Hear him!" cried the Irishman, in tones of fine scorn.

"Well, if there is any difference, it's you who are the superior. Aren't you teaching me now? But anyway I must ask you to call me Sneyd—simply. It only brings me into bad odour with everyone on board, if you persist in using the handle. The men think I want to hold my nose up in the air, and the officers don't like it either."

"Well, your honour——" said O'Neill, scratching his head.

"You are obstinate."

"As a pig being dhruv to Enniskillen fair," replied the Irishman, with a grin. "But what I was goin' for to say's this: that fornenst the other bhoys I'll do as yez bid me, but when we'se alone, I shall just take leave to do as I plaze."

"That's a bargain, now; so remember. There, will this knot do?"

"The bo'sn himself couldn't have turned a nater. Pity that for practice there's not more work of the kind to do. But she's that well fitted there's little of the kind on hand, batin' the twistin' up o' spunyarn and those sort of jobs."

"Yes! I didn't know that traders were as well found as this."

O'Neill's eyes twinkled. "Trade, is it? An' what did yez think we'll be afther tradin' in?"

"Why, what's in the hold?"

"Limestone—ballast. But there's a big powdher room choke full to the beams; lashin's o' shot, round, bar, and grape; half-a-dozen more heavy guns down below; an' as many stand o' small arms, as there are hairs on the back of yer honour's hand."

"Then what's going to be done?"

"We shall run into some snug little bay in the West Indies, have a short spell ashore, then fill up the wather-casks and revictual with bucan.* Perhaps the skipper will careen her first. That depends. Anyway, when we're fitted out afresh, we shall set out to cruise. When we meet a Jack Spaniard or a Johnny Portingale, why, then we shall trade round shot and powder smoke for whatever he's got aboard him. And, from what I've heard o' the skipper, there'll be precious few craft on the seas that'd be too big or too ugly for him to tackle."

It turned out much as O'Neill said. After a long and tedious passage, the Fortune's Favourite ran into snug anchorage in a little-known harbour in the West Indian islands. Save for a few who were kept to guard the ship, her crew were all given shore leave, and enjoyed it according to their own lights. Some of them were noisy, and when they had got a pint or so of poisonous white rum on board, inclined to be quarrelsome; and there were one or two brawls in which blood was drawn. They were a somewhat unpolished set, these old-time warrior-mariners I do not mean to say that they were brutal ruffians, as were the pirates of a later date; but they were hard, and tough, and coarse-fibred; ready to take shrewd blows or to give them at a moment's notice. They were the outcome of the times they lived in. Our respected great-great-grandfathers who lived ashore were just as bad.

Save for those who were down with scurvy—and these were allowed to remain on shore under Dr. Menteith's and Sandy's care—save for the sick, Captain Grum had all his crew aboard again after they had enjoyed a three days' run; and, sooth to say, most of them were glad enough to set about their duty once more. The chief mate went off with the long-boat, strongly manned, to purchase a supply of cured beef from bucaniers in one of the adjacent islands, and the remaining hands set about refitting the snow.

There was plenty to be done. The holds had to be white-washed, and the ballast retrimmed. The boatswain and his mates were engaged in re-setting up the standing rigging and overhauling the running gear. Then the spare anchors, cables, and heavier guns were sent ashore or lowered into the boats, and the snow was run aground and careened, by strong tackles to her mastheads, so that the long trailing weeds and barnacles might be scraped away, and her bottom left as clean and smooth as possible. Then there was heaps of painting to be done; the water casks to be filled ashore and floated off; the bucaned meat to be headed up in tierces, and struck below; and a thousand and one other jobs which need not be enumerated.

Every man on board had an interest in the prospective prize-money, and worked with might and main, but it was not until three weeks after she had come to her first anchorage that Captain Reuben Grum gave his crew a final half-day's shore leave preparatory to beginning his cruise.

This book is not intended as the chronicle of an eighteenth century privateer's cruise. The work was laudable enough from a patriotic point of view, for the Royal Navy was weak; and had it not been for the warships of private individuals, we might never have broken the naval power of Spain, and the history of Europe would probably be very different from what it is.

So I shall not follow out the various features of the cruise seriatim. Suffice it to say, that the Fortune's Favourite did not on the whole belie her name. She captured two vessels of her own tonnage, two of slighter burden, and one big fellow of twice her size, who proved after a very tough fight to be laden with crockery, and not worth the powder and shot expended, let alone the human lives. She chased several craft which proved to have the heels of her; she had to run once from a couple

* A word of explanation is necessary here. By an old edict from the Papal See, the King of Spain considered himself sole possessor of the continents and islands of the western hemisphere. Acting on this principle, he strenuously closed his ports to the ships of aliens. The wealth of the new world was notorious, and the men of other nations wished to share it. Of these, the French to a certain extent, and the English more largely, seconded their wishes by vigorous effort. They sent out their ships and sought to take by force of arms what they were not allowed to try for by honest trading. The crews of their ships were drawn from all grades of society, but, once in western seas, their manners were not altogether lamb-like. The Spaniards and the Portuguese treated them like rabid dogs when they got the upper hand; and, somewhat naturally, the English were not over tender when chance or strength gave them the upper hand. Yet little enough was thought of it then. Society now is not what it was in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. Tempora mutantur, nos et mutamur in illis.

The question of victualling was of course a serious one. However, demand is always met by supply. To provision these free-lances, a race of men of mixed nationality sprung up amongst the West Indian islands notably on Cuba. These hunted the wild cattle, and bucaned their flesh—that is, smoke-dried it. They themselves were styled bucaniers. In time the word got misapplied, and those who consumed the bucaned meat—to wit, the seamen-soldiers, who preyed on Spanish commerce—were called "buccaneers."

Just before the time of which I write—in the year 1711—certain of the colonial Spanish ports were thrown open to English shipping by the treaty of Assiento; but the privilege was shortly afterwards withdrawn. The treaty was restored at Aix-la-Chapelle in October 1748, and, in addition, the right was given to send a periodical vessel to the South Seas.

So be it understood:—After 1748, any English vessel which molested a Spanish or Portuguese vessel in time of peace was nothing more or less than a pirate; but before that date, the English vessel was held, by arguments which need not be cited here, perfectly within her right to capture or take a Spaniard in the western seas—if she could.

of frigates; and once, after a tough fight with a schooner and a big new brig, she was beaten off with one third of her crew hors de combat.

It was to this engagement that Sneyd owed his elevation to the quarter deck. Captain Grum, as unruffled as if he had gained a signal victory instead of suffering something very like defeat, called him up, complimented him on his day's work before the whole crew, and rated him as third mate there and then on the spot, vice the former third mate promoted in place of the second mate killed.

Some of them. . . . were inclined to be quarrelsome.

O'Neill, too, filled a death vacancy, and found himself, much to his satisfaction, a petty officer, to wit, boatswain's mate.

That night, as they shared the same watch and shared the heavy toil of putting the snow to rights again after the heavy dusting she had received, O'Neill said, "It's capt'n of yer own ship I'll be seein' yer honour before another couple of years are over."

"Maybe," returned Sneyd, "but not commanding a professed privateer. I don't care for the work overmuch. It's exciting and all that, and it's openly winked at by the authorities at home. But we aren't regularly at war with the Spaniards. If we were, I'd fight 'em willingly to the last drop."

"Yer honour is over scrupulous, to my way o' thinking. As for the authorities at home, they'd ha' hanged the pair o' us a few months agone av they could ha' caught us."

"I know that, and I begin to think they were quite right. That rising was a foolish thing. If I had the choice again, it isn't in Prince Charlie's army I should elect to fight."

"For me," remarked the Irishman, "it was a toss-up. I didn't much care which side I was on so long as there was a scrimmage, an' when Sir Thomas Sheridan comes up and says he, 'Murtagh, yez'll bear us a hand; we're agin the Government;' says I, 'Sir Thomas, it's meself's the bhoy to help yez.'"

Sneyd laughed at this naïve political choice, and continued: "I don't mind fighting the Spaniards once in a way, but I can't say I like the idea of making a regular business of it. It demoralises the men; you know that as well as I do. Why, only the other day, when that French brig spoke us off Carthagena, there were a whole lot of them grumbling because Captain Grum didn't have a slap at her. No; what I'd like, and what I intend to do some time, is to start round and go up to the Pacific coast as an honest, respectable trader. If one took out a general cargo, there should be, from what I've heard, a splendid price to be obtained for it. The Spaniards have kept the monopoly so far, and European goods would fetch fabulous amounts in specie and hard dollars. We'd go for honest trading, as I've said, the King of Spain and his confounded withdrawn Assiento Treaty notwithstanding; and then, if they interfere with us, why, it's their own look-out, and the best man licks the other."

"When yer honour tries that thrip, here's me that'll come along wid yez under any ratin' from ship's cook upwards."

It was not long after this conversation that chance threw in Sneyd's way the very opportunity he was looking for. The sturdy bow of the Fortune's Favourite was turned towards home. Her hold was full of rich merchandise, and richer rixdollars and specie, and her captain was satisfied with the gleanings of his cruise; when, lo! one night a smart schooner of some two hundred tons ran almost aboard of her. The smaller craft saw her mistake when it was too late, and tried to slip off; but an eighteen-pounder shot which sung through the leach of her mainsail, hinted to her that the snow was not to be trifled with, and so without more ado she made the best of a bad bargain, and hove-to. A boat which went over to take possession sent back word that the cargo consisted of what a Yankee would term "notions"; that is, it was "assorted."

Such a load would certainly not be worth carrying back to Bristol. Captain Grum's face was perplexed. Sneyd went up to him and asked for a few minutes' private conversation. He and the Captain retired to the latter's cabin.

After the lapse of some fifteen minutes, the chief mate was sent for, and the trio of them were closeted together for half-an-hour. Then they came on deck again, and the captain called for all hands. The men came trooping aft, wondering what was in the wind, and Grum addressed them as follows:—

"My lads, this cruise has turned out pretty profitably and you'll all have a tidy amount of prize-money to finger when we square up accounts at Bristol. Still, each man's share will have its limits, and I will confess that I should like to add to mine. So I intend to fit out the schooner yonder with a couple more heavy guns, some more small-arms, and a number of other things we can dispense with, and send her to cruise round the Horn, and up the Chilian and Peruvian coasts. My first mate here will go in command; Mr. Sneyd will be second officer; Mr. O'Neill, third; and Mr. Carmichael (who Dr. Menteith asserts to be thoroughly qualified for such a post) will join as surgeon. You know what the country there is as well as I do. The schooner will probably be back in Bristol river about a year after we get there.

"Now, from here home is clear sailing. We shall meet no enemy, and the snow does not require many hands to sail her, if those few hands put their backs into the work. So now fall into line, men, and take a pace forward those who will volunteer for the schooner."

Nearly nine-tenths of the snow's crew stepped forward with eager stride.

"That's too many. I can't have you all desert me,"

Digitized by Google

quoth the captain, with a gratified smile. "Some of the married men had better stand back."

No one stirred; and a voice from the crowd exclaimed, "Faith, sor, av some of us wasn't married 'tisn't here we'd be at all at all;" at which there was a general laugh.

"Well," said Grum, "I leave it to the officers to choose their crew. Captain Gauntlett, you may have ninety men all told, and though I say it, who am not given to praising, you have a rare good batch to pick from."

There was a cheer at this, and then Gauntlett set about making his selection.

All hands worked with a will to tranship to the schooner the heavy guns and their carriages, the ammunition, and the other war like stores with which it was intended to replenish her, and by midday on the morrow the two vessels had separated, after an interchange of frantic cheers, and stood away on their respective courses. The snow headed for England. The schooner bore up for the West Indies, where she could get rid of her prisoners, and lay in store of water, bucan, and other necessaries for the long trip round the icy Horn, into the then comparatively unknown waters of the Southern Pacific.

Captain Grum. . . . complimented him on his day's work.

CHAPTER III.

How it was decided to turn for home: how the ambergris was seen: how the black squall came down: how the jolly boat rode it out: and how she fared afterwards.

It was the day after their successful coup at Callao, and the officers of the schooner were sitting on their quarter-deck talking and smoking. No shore was in sight. The limitless blue of the Pacific stretched out in all directions, with scarcely so much as a breath of wind to tarnish its polished surface. The schooner had just steerage-way, and the bronzed, bearded fellow at the tiller was guiding her with one lightly placed hand. His other hand every now and again wiped the perspiration which beaded out on to his forehead.

The day was baking hot. There was not a cloud overhead. The vast hemisphere of heaven was blue, blue, blue everywhere, save in one spot almost at the zenith, and there trembled a piercing ball of white light, with a blazing halo round it. The sun's rays reflected off the lazily swelling water, and burnt the skin off one's face into ragged strips. The zephyr did little to temper the heat. Even under the quarter-deck awning, the officers found it almost unendurable. They were lying listlessly about, and every now and again one got up, and drawing a bucket or two of water, drenched himself and his companions.

It was after one of these douchings that Captain Gauntlett spoke.

"No place like 'ome, is there, lads? There's some as say England's a 'ole—hall fogs, an' rain, and general uncomfortableness. But gimme the thickest fog that London hever brewed, rayther than this bloomin' bake-'ouse."

"Will I give yez another souse?" inquired O'Neill who was standing by, canvas bucket in hand, himself dripping like a sea-god.

"No, 'vast for a spell. I'm wet as a fish, an' the water's hot enough to——"

"To bile spuds in," suggested the Irishman. "'Tis meself that 'ud gladly give ten dollars apiece for a dozen big maley ons, an' the schniff of a dacent turf fire to bake 'em over."

"The atmosphere of the British Isles might prove unhealthy for you and me, O'Neill," observed Sneyd thoughtfully.

"Sorra' bit of it, yer honour. We may go home now, and be as quiet as we like, so long as we don't go and make a noise of ourselves,"—after delivering which brilliant opinion, he laid himself down on the hot white deck-planks and joined the rest of the group in endeavouring to doze.

But Morpheus would not be wooed. Phoebus had command of the day, and did not brook divided attention. And so one or other of the group kept getting up and having recourse to the canvas bucket and the tepid sea-water.

"We reckoned this yere cruise to last a year," observed Gauntlett, raising himself on one elbow, and pushing his long grizzled locks back from his face with the other hand, "an' now it's just four months since we parted comp'ny with the snow. Just four months, but we've crammed a deal into them in the way o' tradin'. 'Tisn't me that thought we'd 'a 'ad the twentieth part o' the luck. Why, she's reg'lar ballasted with dollars, an' bars, an' ingots."

"Had better pay than a bhoy gets turf-cuttin' in the bog," allowed O'Neill.

"But," contended Sneyd, who did not wish the cruise to come to a rapid end, "we haven't got rid of all the cargo. There's some woollen stuffs left and a score or so ot those bells, and a whole lot of cutlery."

"I know," rejoined Gauntlett crustily. "Don't take me for such a fool as to 'ave forgotten that, did yer? I know we could go on. There's a tidy lump o' trade stuff left, and we've height months' vituals at the least, not to mention that Doctor Sandy there 'as enough o' his beastly physics on hand to stop all our hap|etites by one-'arf. But that ain't what I was thinkin' about. Ye see that Callao biz, when all's said an' done, was a bit beyond our size. We 'ad luck, and we 'ad cheek, an' we scooped what we wanted. But that peppery old governor cove hain't agoin' to forget the way we paid our call in a nurry. 'Is blessed dignity was 'urt badly, an' you can lay all you're worth 'e'll be heven with us if 'e can. That blessed T'resa 'll be put into commission agin, sailor-fashion this time, 'stead o' soldier-fashion like she was before; an' she'd be a toughish mouthful if she was properly handled. An' besides that, word 'll be sent up and down the coast for other craft to look out for us; big 'uns they'll be too, for, mind you, the Dons have got some heavy vessels in them seas, an' they're not chary o' usin' 'em too, if they're put to it.

"Now, you're wantin' to hear what I'm drivin' at. Well, it's this. You all know old Isaac Gauntlett ain't afeered of a bit of a brush. You all know that 'e'll fight anything that floats if 'e's cornered, and hammer away small arms and great guns, board and repel boarders till the matter's squared one way or t'other. An' when 'e's poor, there's no man sets smaller value on 'is 'ide. But when Ike Gauntlett's got a holy sight of dollars to fall back on, as 'e 'as now, why, then the price of 'is pelt goes up to more for the square inch than many blokes 'ud even guess at. So there, lads; we'll call this a capstan-'ead council, and that's the side my bean's fallin'."

There was a silence, which Gauntlett broke by saying:

"Every man 'is say. Come, Surgeon Sandy, being the youngest, do you begin. If a solemn phiz means brains, you've the levellest 'ead o' the lot of us."

"Personally," said the surgeon, "I'd be for seeing it out here. I've a snug berth, and am not likely to fall into a better. But still I think Captain Gauntlett's proposal a wise one, and for this reason. The crew isn't so strong as it was. We've lost eleven men. Four were killed, two died of their wounds, five have succumbed to sickness for which I could make no cure. And the rest, there are quite twenty who are far from sound. It is my fault to a large extent, I daresay. I have done my best, but with so little experience——"

"Belay that, Surgeon Sandy," said Gauntlett, with rough kindness. "Without you we'd 'a 'ad nobody; an' besides, you may lay to it I'd never 'a let you go a-meddlin' with my crew if Doctor Mentieth hadn't said you was competent to do it. Sakes alive! Look what a stump you gave Bill Maitland. Took 'is starboard leg hoff at the knee-joint, you did, scare a month agone, an' there 'e is skylarkin' about just as hactive as a nape. Ain't got a tail, o' course, by way o' an extry warp, but uses 'is teeth as good as one. No; you write me out a flamin' Ha-1 certificate for yerself at the end o' this cruise, an' Ike Gauntlett 'll clap a cross 'is mark, below to show hall and hevery that you're the best surgeon 'e'd ever want to ampitate, sear, or physic 'im."

At which eulogy Sandy Carmichael was constrained to blush through his copper-coloured skin, and O'Neill to ejaculate "Brayvo!" encouragingly.

Sneyd took up the tale. "I'm beginning to think you are right, Captain. My own wish to stay longer in these seas was a purely selfish one. The romance of the unknown waters, and the glimpses of a country that one had only learnt about from sailors' hearsay, fascinated me. But every argument points out that the fascination would probably be brought to an abrupt conclusion, were any endeavour made to spin it out further. To stay longer would be folly—foolhardiness—madness. José de Lato is not the man to forget the way we had him on the hip. The coast will bristle with his war-vessels. And we can't hope to play the Santa Thérèsa game again. If we sail now, we shall have a clear course. If we wait, we shall find a couple of hungry eagles standing on and off the entrance to Magellan's Straits, ready to pick us up whether we try that way or the Horn."

"And you, O'Neill?" asked Gauntlett.

"Let's cut an' run as hard as we can go, Capt'n. There's stuff on board worth takin' care of, an' once ashore at Bristhol, it's meself that sees a great piece of divarsion on ahead. An' then, when the money's well nigh spent, why we'll refit the schooner wid the balance, an' stand out here again an' grab some more. For mind yez, barrin' the heat, an' barrin' the unmannerliness o' thim dons in never lettin' yez paceably ashore to say so much as a good-morrer to the ladies, 'tis the foinest cruisin' ground a bhoy wid a taste for a scrimmage could wish for."

"Then," said Gauntlett, "that's decided; an' I'm glad of it. By our articles you'd all a voice in the matter, an' I was rayther feering that with yer taste whetted for the dollars, you'd never rest till ye tried for more, and then very like lost the lot."

So saying, he gave the requisite directions to the helmsman for change of course, and then leaving Sneyd, who was officer of the watch, on deck, the rest went below for supper.

The announcement, "Homeward bound!" was received with acclamation forward. To most of the foremast hands, the prize-money they would have to share seemed a very mine of wealth, and although the majority of them would run through the greatest part of it during a week's jaunt on shore—as was the time-honoured custom of that day—they were eager enough to begin spending.

Sailors earned their money like horses then, and spent it like asses.

The wind was very light, but steady and favourable, and, under every stitch of cloth she could show, the schooner reeled off a fair number of knots. She was not doing her best speed, it is true, for there were thousands of barnacles sticking to her bottom, and a whole forest of long ribbony weeds, some of them as much as twenty feet long, streaming along her sides. But this was neither the place nor the time to careen, and the retardation had to be put up with. Once on the eastern coast, they hoped to find a convenient river where she could be put to rights again for the long passage across the Atlantic.

But some of the little schooner's complement were not destined to see their native shores again yet awhile; and this is how it came about.

(To be continued.)

FRIEND: "Do thoughts that came to you long ago ever return?"

Scribbler: "Oh, yes—if I inclosed a stamped envelope."

JOHNNY and Mary were both riding the hobby-horse. Johnny felt his limitations, and presently observed: "Sister, if one of us would get off there would be more room for me."

SHE: "How is it that you sometimes show such masculine energy, and again such womanly indecision."

He: "Oh, I suppose it is a matter of inheritance. You see, half of my ancestors were men and half were women?"

Digitized by Google

MY PATIENT'S GHOST.

THE duties of my calling as a professional nurse have taken me frequently, during the past ten years, into peculiar surroundings, and I have had many odd and not a few uncanny experiences in my ministrations.

It was about eight o'clock one evening in late December, 1872, that I received a summons to attend a gentleman who had been for some days suffering from an internal malady, and upon whom the attending surgeons had decided to operate that night. They had hoped to avoid this course, but, all other means of relief having been exhausted, and the patient slowly sinking, the last hope was an immediate operation.

Snow was falling gently in great feathery masses as I alighted from the train at the suburban station, and entering the carriage awaiting me, was driven rapidly and silently along the broad, smooth street toward the mansion occupied by the patient.

Mr. Boland was an eccentric bachelor, who lived all alone, save for a retinue of male servants, in the great house which loomed grim and imposing before me, as the carriage, passing under a huge stone archway, rolled up the broad drive and stood beneath the "porte cochère." The front door was opened by an austere looking person in sombre livery, who stood respectfully aside as I entered, while a footman, of equal soberness of dress and mien, approached, and taking my hat and coat, at once conducted me along the great hall to a small room. A cheerful open fire and smoking tea-kettle gave the apartment an air of homely comfort, and as I threw myself lazily into a big leather chair near the table, on which stood the tea-set, the silent and dignified servant poured some water into the tea-pot and silently took his leave.

I was soon restored to my normal condition of warmth through the magic influence of the tea, and sat pleasantly contemplating the fire, and wondering when I should be called to the business for which I had been summoned, when a footfall behind me caused me to turn my head, and I beheld, standing in the doorway, a third individual, who at once spoke; and though his tones sounded hollow and far away, I was thankful to hear even this distant semblance to the human voice in such a preternaturally silent house.

"I am instructed to inquire if Mr. Washburn is prepared to attend the bedside of Mr. Boland."

He stood like a statue carved from ebony, and as I inclined my head affirmatively, turned as if on a pivot and led the way along the hall and up the broad, gently rising staircase, at the top of which he threw open a door and bade me enter.

The bed-chamber into which I stepped was a large and lofty apartment lighted by two windows. A huge old-fashioned bed stood with its head against the north wall, while directly opposite was a fireplace, in which glowed a mass of coals, and above, a very fine Venetian mirror extending to the ceiling and occupying the whole of the chimneypiece. Between the windows in the east wall was a small, well-fitted book case, while a green-covered table on which stood a student lamp and a pile of periodicals, half-a-dozen easy chairs; a wash-stand and a small table containing a night-lamp and an assortment of medicine bottles, completed the furniture.

One of the four surgeons present informed me that the exigency of the case had demanded immediate action, and that they had been obliged to perform the operation about half-an-hour before my arrival, but that it had been so far successful, and that the subject's unusual vitality promised to carry him through safely. He was still under the influence of the anæsthetic, a condition which his stertorous breathing plainly indicated, and was resting quietly in the bed to which he had been transferred from the improvised operating table.

After some few minutes, the surgeons retired from the room, leaving me alone with the patient, but with instructions to call them upon his regaining consciousness. Seating myself near the bedside, I took the man's hand in my fingers and closely noted the action of the pulse. The great house might have been deserted by all save the sick man and myself, the only audible signs of habitation being his laboured breathing.

In the course of half an hour consciousness returned, and I at once pulled the bell-cord, thus summoning the physicians. Mr. Boland was soon made as comfortable as his condition admitted of, and bidding me good-night, three of the physicians took their leave, one, Dr. Morton, deciding to remain for the night, in order to assist me in any possible emergency. He soon retired from the room, going to a small apartment on the floor below, in which was a comfortable sofa where he could obtain a much-needed rest, and from where he could also be quickly summoned by a bell-cord communicating between that room and Mr. Boland's.

For some time I sat at the table, reading here and there from the magazines, interrupting myself only to administer medicine to the patient.

The house was as silent as the grave.

About midnight the snow had ceased falling, and the moon came out from her screen of clouds, lighting up the wintry scene in weird radiance. Not the faintest breath of air stirred the gaunt branches with their soft white covering. Standing by the window the picture was, to me, deeply impressive of Nature's poetic handiwork, and it moved me to a deep reverence for the great Mystery of Life.

As I silently and gravely contemplated the scene before me, a peculiar, fluttering sigh came to my ears, and I hurried to the bedside. The sick man was lying on his side, his face towards me, and as I looked into the expressionless eyes, my professional instincts, sharpened by the memory of many scenes, told me at once that the climax had been reached, and that the end was near.

Stepping quickly across the floor, I pulled the bell-cord sharply. Hurrying back, I administered a hypodermic injection and had replaced the syringe when Dr. Morton entered the room. He simply opened wide the now drooping eye-lid, and regarded the pupil, shook his head and sat down.

"There's nothing to be done; he will be dead in five minutes. I suppose you know the pain has entirely subsided?"

I replied in the affirmative, and took my stand at the foot of the bed, while, in the calm and solemn stillness of that December midnight, the spirit of Christopher Boland took its flight.

After saying that he would leave word at the undertaker's to call at eight o'clock in the morning, Dr. Morton took his departure, and there being no reason why I should lose the remainder of the night's rest, I prepared to retire. No superstitious dread of a dead man had a part in my composition, and throwing off my coat and shoes, I drew the sheet over the entire body, and extinguishing the lamp—the moon shone brightly enough for any ordinary purpose—lay down on the bed, and drawing the blankets about me, was soon asleep by the side of the late Mr. Christopher Boland.

A feeling of restlessness followed a brief interval of disturbing dreams in which a pair of penetrating eyes were the predominant element, and I awoke with a start.

One can seldom gauge accurately the time passed in sleep, but, judging from the positions of the shadows cast upon the floor by the moon, I presumed the hour to be about three. My first glance was at the body beside which I lay. It was, of course, in the position in which it had been last placed, the sheet which alone covered it falling in at the eyes and again midway down the trunk, leaving two sharply defined prominences at the nose and feet, and provoking in my newly-awakened brain that uncanny sensation with which many are so disagreeably familiar.

At almost the same instant I detected the strong smell of tobacco smoke. Not being myself a user of the soothing narcotic in any form, and no one having smoked in the room since my arrival, I instantly cast my eyes about in search of the intruder, who, I thought, must have entered during my sleep.

The moon had passed beyond the edge of the roof, and its rays were less brilliant than when I had retired. As my searching glance reached the east wall, it met an object which caused me to spring from the bed and stan gazing in stupid horror!

The Thing, whatever, it was, was of human shape as far as erect stature is concerned; it was enveloped in white from head to foot no sign of flesh showing, save the face, and as it glided to and fro before the windows, a cigar, from which arose great blue-white clouds of smoke, was held between its teeth.

As it slowly turned, my blood grew cold and creepy, for, as I gazed, the face met mine, the eyes glowed like two phosphorescent globes as they looked straight at me and—the features were those of Christopher Boland!

The awful sight of the spirit of the man whom I thought lying dead beside me, pacing about the room smoking a cigar as in life, utterly unnerved me, and I stood, half crouching, by the bedside, my gaze riveted in horrified fascination upon it.

By a supreme effort of will, I reached towards the corpse, at the same time keeping my eyes upon the apparition, and quickly drew the sheet from the face. For an instant I looked at the features, calm in death, but that instant was enough to have driven many a man stark mad, for the last doubt as to my half-awakened senses, had fled—the body in the bed and the Thing were of feature identical.

Although my memory is perfectly, in fact painfully clear on the whole night's events, yet at that moment I think my mind must have wandered, for, without exactly knowing how I did it, I found myself stealthily approaching the Thing, as if to grasp it. I had almost reached it, when it turned, and those two fearful burning eyes seemed to pierce me and look onward into interminable space! And even as I paused, it slowly approached me, its frightful gaze throwing me into a condition of hypnotic helplessness; the fire from the burning cigar producing the effect of a third terrible eye.

I was between it and the bed; flight was impossible, but even had the way been clear before me, escape would have been equally hopeless, my legs shaking, my every nerve trembling, while I could not take my eyes from those others that seemed to pierce my very soul.

Straight towards me it came, neither looking to right nor left, but through and beyond me. I drew myself close to the wall; closer, closer, it came, the deathly pale features striking terror through and through me, the awful eyes burning into me. I could feel the grave-damp mist surrounding it, so near was it. Time was no more, a second and a year were alike to my stricken, palsied nerves; in a moment more, one single move, and the awful thing would be upon me. Heavens! It turned in its course, and with increasing speed, glided past the bed, and in an instant more a wreath of smoke came backwards over its head as it vanished through the open door.

With returning reason, I staggered towards the bell-cord to ring for help, but even as my shaking arm reached upward, the awful thing returned and rapidly approached me. A sudden and complete revulsion of feeling overcame me, and with the frenzy born of mortal terror, I rushed at the Presence and threw myself at its throat.

Instantly I found myself in the embrace of a pair of icy arms, for which my strength was no match, that tore my hands away and flung me violently against the table, upsetting it and throwing the lamp and books to the floor in crashing confusion. I was struggling to regain my feet from amidst the mass, when, with a wild, unearthly, echoing scream that rang throughout the house it turned and fled like a wraith from the room.

This move on the part of my recent antagonist lent me growing courage, and I rushed after it. Even in that moment, so vividly are trifles sometimes impressed upon one's sharpened wits, I recall seeing the still smoking cigar lying on the carpet where it had been dropped in the scuffle.

As I emerged from the room into the broad hall, a sound of a heavily falling body came from the bottom of the stairs, and I saw in the dim light cast by the swinging lamp above me, a white form lying on the landing below: at the same time there was the pattering rush of stockinged feet, and three forms threw themselves upon the recumbent figure, while I sprang down among them.

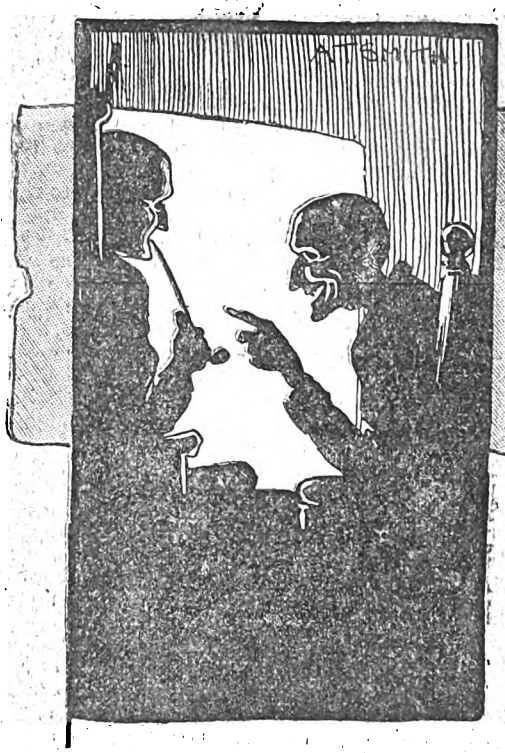
The three additions to the melée were the butler and two footmen, and in their arms they held the half fainting form of another man.

Explanations were at once in order. The fainting man was a somnambulistic servant, whose close physical resemblance to his master had been the cause of one or two previous complications; the effect of this similarity to the dead had been intensified by the uncertain reflection of the moon's rays from the snow. The glowing eyes were the result of my fevered imagination coupled with my concentration of gaze upon the lighted cigar, after having once seen those eyes glisten for an instant in the weird light of the room.

The violent awakening of the somnambulist proved nearly his death, though he finally recovered after a severe attack of brain fever, while my own premature white hair attests the awful agony of those few brief but frightful moments with the smoking ghost.

ELMAR END.

Digitized by Google



A Peruvian Millionaire.

JABEZ HEATH THORNTON was his full name. He was called Jay by his cronies, Thornton Heath by wags, and Mr. Thornton by the various dukes, baronets and knights who were able to squeeze gold out of the "Peruvian Millionaire."

His face was almost saintly in aspect, owing to a peculiar benevolent smile which continually hovered round his mouth. In figure he was tall, rotund, and possessing that characteristic popularly supposed to belong to members of British corporations.

Jabez H. Thornton had done every thing as became a millionaire. He owned race horses which always came in last when he backed them, or romped home when he laid heavy odds against them. He owned a paper, universally run down, which was known under the sobriquet of Intellect but which was in reality an outrage on that gift; therefore, when a facetious "comp" slipped in "Rats" beneath the title, the world echoed the sentiment and Intellect expired.

He had presented a drinking-fountain to Camden Town, an obelisk to the inhabitants of Cobham-in-the-Marsh, and three hospitals and a deaf and dumb asylum owed their existence to him.

Having done everything that was expected of him, Jabez proposed and was accepted. Perhaps his millions influenced the lady of his choice, or perchance, being above such sordid considerations, she had been attracted by Jabez's beautiful expression.

This was the tale she cooed to Jabez, and Jabez credited the statement.

So overjoyed was he by the avowal, that he straightway gave orders for a grand ball to be given in honour of the engagement, and in his lordly style proceeded to make the fortunes of some dozen tradesmen.

Royalty was invited and accepted the invitations. France, Italy, Russia and Peru were represented, and Thornton, overjoyed at the way he had managed to wriggle into society, was everywhere greeting his guests with effusion—the male portion—and welcoming the ladies with complimentary glances, well-chosen phrases, and with as much bowing and grace as his somewhat rotund person would allow.

"I must compliment you, señor, on the magnificent entertainment you have provided for our amusement," exclaimed Don Pervibelli del Igo Juera, shaking his host cordially by the hand.

"Yes, it's fairish," replied Thornton, beaming, as he mopped his forehead. "I'm glad you like it; the electric lights in those orchids are my own idea."

"Charming, my dear sir," answered Don Pervibelli, toying carelessly with the cross of St. James, his sole decoration. "Truly charming, à propos I must congratulate you on your engagement with the bella senortta Violet McKay."

Again Thornton beamed, twirled his fingers nervously, and finding nothing appropriate to say, mopped his face vigorously.

"I have taken the liberty, amigo mio, to bring a Peruvian friend with me, to see the magnificence of your ball. May I trust I stand forgiven?"

The well-turned compliment sank into the credulous heart of the millionaire, who replied with a sudden burst of generosity:

"Señor, treat my house as if it were your own. I am only too glad to welcome any friend of yours."

Don Pervibelli smiled an unfathomable smile, which, had Thornton been able to read it, would have made him regret his last sentence.

"The señor Americano is too good."

"Shucks; that is bosh!" retorted Thornton giving the attaché a familiar pat on the shoulder. "And where is your friend?"

"Ah, señor," replied Pervibelli, deprecatingly. "Mi amigo, as he entered, saw a lady—you comprehend?" he elevated his shoulders and spread out his hands, palms outwards. "Mi amigo is what you call a sad flirt."

Thornton laughed gaily, then advanced to greet more guests with his sister, and failed to note the peculiar glimmer of malice which lurked in Pervibelli's eyes for a moment or so.

"I wonder what Svenela would say to be called a flirt? Well, perhaps he is, when he has other things on hand!" muttered the Peruvian attaché sombrely.

To say that the affair of the season hung fire, or dragged in any one way would be a gross calumny! Never had anything started with the swing of Jabez H. Thornton's ball.

The proud Peruvian attaché even became affected by the surrounding gaiety, and, forgetting his long series of names, joined in the cotillon.

Perhaps it was for the sake of the pearl and ruby breast-pin he obtained, or to oblige the society belle he was dancing with, that he entered the cotillon; be it as it may, the Señor Don Pervibelli del Igo Juera so far forgot his dignity as to dance.

He smiled peculiarly the whole evening, and when he took his partner to supper the smile became more pronounced.

As was expected, the supper proved a feast that would not have disgraced the Board of Crœsus, and the good things commenced to vanish in the customary way amid a buzz of conversation, till Jabez H. Thornton rose, and, holding a silver goblet of champagne in his hand, exclaimed:

"I believe that at every gathering the health of Her Most Gracious Majesty, Queen Victoria, should be proposed, therefore I do the same."

The toast was drunk; then Thornton exclaimed:

"It is a great pleasure to me to welcome my friends round my humble board to-night! And I am about to ratify a promise I made to several of you, as to the mode in which I made my pile, to-night—It has been my very proud boast that when I set foot in Peru, I had not what you Britishers call a "stiver" in my pockets.

"I hadn't enough to buy a dinner, let alone pay my fare to Lima! I remember at the time I anathematised my luck, but now I have every reason to bless the providence, which ordained that I should tramp to the capital of Peru!"

He paused, and glanced amusedly round at the expectant faces bent on his, then continued:

"I had gone, by accident, some twenty miles out of course on the Cordilleras; and being thoroughly worn out, I flung myself on the rocky ground. I slipped, and to save myself from falling down a somewhat steep declivity, clutched at a small rock. The jerk wrenched it out of the parent earth. It was at its base that I discovered my first aid to wealth—It was there I found "The Eye of Peru Ruby," I bought the land with the money obtained by the sale of the stone, and became what I am!"

"The señor is to be congratulated on the way he made his fortune, and also for the manner in which he relates the story of his road to wealth," remarked a quiet voice from the end of the table.

Thornton glanced in the direction whence the voice came, and noticed a face which was strangely familiar to him.

Jabez started guiltily.

"I also know a story of how an American señor made his fortune near Lima. With the permission of the hidalgos and señoritas present, I will relate the tale."

"Come, come, señor!" cried Jabez H. Thornton, turning oddly pale, "this is not a time for anecdotes! We shall doubtless be very pleased to hear your tale of the way in which the American made his pile—on another occasion."

"As the señor desires!" replied the other, rising and bowing courteously. "For another time let it be! I can assure you it is very interesting!"

"No, let us have it now!" cried Violet McKay impulsively, a sentiment which was generally echoed.

"I bow to your wishes," replied the guest, deprecatingly. "If I go wrong I trust to the Señor Thornton to put me right. I forget places after I have left them," he added apologetically.

"I fail to see how I can put you right over detail, if I don't know the place you mention," replied Thornton irritably.

"Still I think the señor will know the place I mention," replied the other in an odd voice.

Thornton shivered at the sinister intonation; he had a presentiment that some evil was about to befall him.

"If that is the case," replied Thornton, with a bad attempt at ease of manner, "rely on me to help you."

The Peruvian bowed, then said:

"About twenty miles from Lima, in the direction of Paseo, there is a deep ravine, It is called the Cañon del Demonicos. It is a wild and erie spot, the home of the vulture, condor and frigate bird. Its high scarped rocks tower heavenwards, to be tipped with everlasting snows. The solitude which reigns in this gloomy cañon is awesome, but when a storm rages nowhere could there be more tumult! Am I not correct, señor?"

Jabez H. Thornton bowed.

"I was positive the señor would aid me with his recollection," said the Peruvian blandly.

Thornton started, then pouring himself out a glass of champagne with trembling hand, exclaimed:

"I have seen the place you mention, that is all."

"I imagined so," replied the Peruvian drily. "Along the side of this ravine runs a twisted path—let me see, it leads to a cavern, an ancient fane of the fireworshippers, does it not, señor?"

"How should I know?" retorted Jabez angrily.

"I apologise! Well about seven years ago, within this cavern dwelt a priest and his daughter Thaide. She was very beautiful—very beautiful," he added abstractedly. "She was also young—some eighteen years of age. Had she not been so youthful," continued the Peruvian reflectively, "she would not have committed the error she did, an error which debarred her from entering the world to come."

He paused to glance at Thornton, who, ashy pale, was regarding him with a terror-struck stare.

"Thaide was credulous, and thus became a willing dupe of an American hidalgo whom ill luck brought one day down the ravine path, leading to the ancient temple of Fire, and caused the priest to anathematise his daughter, the man, and the day he was born.

"Thaide was at the cavern mouth when the Americano passed along. He saw her, and spoke. Days flew by, the stranger was always near to whisper his poison in the priest's daughter's ear, and she—believed and loved the American hidalgo."

Google

Once more he paused to glance at Thornton. His ghastly pallor had increased. He was gulping down raw brandy.

"The hidalgo wooed and won her heart; to him she communicated the mystery of her faith, the place where the 'Eye of Fire' lay hidden, and showed him the temple's treasure. The greed of the man was awakened, the scoundrel proposed that they should elope and take the Fire treasure with them."

"Well?" hissed Thornton. "Well?"

"Thaide at first demurred, the scoundrel urged his love, and she, unhappy maiden, agreed. In the dead of night the guilty pair stole into the inner temple and wrenched the 'Eye of Fire' from its fastenings, abstracting the sacred jewels from their cases and vessels of worship. Then came a tragedy to add to the horrors of the night."

Pallid to the very lips, the millionaire poured himself out a glass of port, which he raised to his lips with palsied hand.

"Blinded by the lust of gold, the American hidalgo dresolve that there should not be two to share the ill-gotten wealth. In the outer cave, on the plea of not allowing her to carry any weight, he transferred the booty to his own person, and, as with loving hand she placed the last jewel in the bag he carried, he shot her twice in the breast and fled!

"The reports brought the priest on the scene, only in time to catch her last breath. With voice full of anguish he reviled his child, as dictated by his religion; then pressing his lips to the blood-stained face of his child, prayed as only a broken heart can pray, for the revoking of the awful malediction. Then, rising, he swore to avenge the child he loved better than life!"

"And the American," gasped the millionaire, "what became of him?

"All in good time, señor," replied the Peruvian, in even tones. "He first went to New York City, then came to London——"

"London? London?" gasped Thornton, his eyes nearly starting from their sockets.

"Si—London, why not?" replied the Peruvian, his eyes gleaming strangely. "For six years the priest has waited in vain for an opportunity to strike the murderer of his child, when it would hurt him most. Shall we wish him success in his hopes, Señor?"

"Yes—er—by all means!" faltered the millionaire.

"Even when I say the American hidalgo's name is Jabez Heath Thornton?" cried the Peruvian mercilessly.

Thornton became livid. By a violent display of will, he collected himself and leaping to his feet, shouted hoarsely, as he flung his glass down on the table:

"You lie!"

The Peruvian flushed, his eye danced with fire as he almost hissed:

"Murderer and thief, do you dare call the Fire priest Svenela a liar?"

"Svenela?" shrieked the millionaire, panic-struck. "Oh, Heavens! I recognise your face! Help me, friends, he'll murder me!—Help! Help——"

Three shots fired in rapid succession across the table, silenced the shrieks of the guilty man, then the Peruvian, throwing down his smoking revolver, cried:

"I know the law of England relative to killing your fellow man. Call an officer. I surrender."

The next day the newspaper boys made a lot of money with special editions.

TRISTRAM K. MONCK.

£50 OFFERED EVERY WEEK. £50

Every week the Editor of SHORT STORIES addresses 50 envelopes to 50 people in various parts of the country. Inside each envelope he places a sovereign and locks them away in his private safe.

SIMPLY TAKE A POST-CARD

and address it to the Editor under the following conditions: Ask if a sovereign has been addressed to you, giving your full name and address clearly written in ink.

Fifty names and addresses have been picked out at random from directories, etc., etc.

No sovereign, however, will be awarded unless it is applied for, so it would be advisable for you to tell your friends to drop us a post-card, whether they are readers or not.

All applications for No. 16 distribution must reach us by January 23rd, addressed to The 16th Sovereign Editor, "Short Stories" Office, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Each application must be made separately.

Result of 13th Sovereign Distribution.

Sovereigns have been sent to:

W. E. Keyte, 7 Promenade, South Street, Rochdale, C. Grey, 16 Chapel Street, Gosport, Hants, both having applied for them under the conditions of the Distribution Scheme.

The unclaimed sovereigns were addressed to the following people:

W. Doig, 7 Roxburgh Street, Galashiels; Thos. Abel, 3 Blackfriars Street, Here ord; John Cottam, Caxton House, Oswestry; Geo. Bell, Castle Street, Dornoch, N.B.; Mrs. Edwards, 159 Gray's Inn Road, W.C.; H. Hammond, 158 Euston Road, N.W.; J. S. Harrisson, 8 Foster Lane, E.C.; Chas. Field, 16 Unicorn Hill, Redditch; J. Groves, 9 Belle Vue Crescent, Cockington, Devon; Thos. Bickford, Atlantic Hotel, Hugh Street, St. Mary's, Scilly Isles; W. James, Market Street, Penryn, Cornwall; R. Kirkham, 5 Hyde Lane, Hyde, Cheshire; W. Pasher, Brook End, Catworth, Hunts; John Letts, Irchester, Northants; W. McCague, Lynn Road, Ely; H. Newson, Market Square, Fakenham; J. C. Taylor, Hall Farm, Drinkstone, Bury St. Edmunds; Jas. O'Flanagan, Nesham Place, Houghton-le-Spring; Miss Pringle, 3 Clive Terrace. Alnwick; Jos. Savage, Townhead, Ousby, Cumberland; J. W. Rowlandson, Kiln Head, Lambrigg, Grayrigg, Westmoreland; F. Uden, 9 Grace Hill, Folkestone; Chas. Voase, 121 Freeman Street, Great Grimsby; W. West, 135 Wincolmlee, Hull; ohn, Wright, King Street, Alfreton; C. Yorke, Weston Lodge, Lenton Road, Nottingham; Geo. Abbott, 1 West Street, Leicester; J. W. Ball, Post Office, Edith Weston, Rutland; W. H. Cox, Sunnyside, Peckridge, Staffs; E. Buchanan, 36 Mitchell Street, Clonmel; Jas. Donald, Irish Quarter West, Carrickfergus; G. E. Eagle, Medler Cottage, Shrivenham, Berks; W. Fleet, 78 High Street, Newport Pagnell; Mrs. Gardner, London Road, Chipping Norton; B. Hall, Greenfield Road, Scarborough; R. Jenkins, 5 Charles Street, Milford Haven; Mrs. Kingston, St. Ewins Bridge Street, Chepstow; W. Leach, Ivy Lodge, Martock; Chas. Morse, High Street, Lydney; Geo. Nicholls, 13 Pembroke Road, Clifton, Bristol; E. Otto, 4 Highgate Hill, N.; G. J. Thomson, 385 Romford Road, Forest Gate, E.; W. Reeves, 280 Dalston Lane, Hackney, N.E.; W. Brown, 33 Bay View Terrace, Penzance; C. Crosskill, 7 Oxford, Street, Wellingborough; Mrs. Kirk, 494 Glossop Road, Sheffield; J. Young, 24 Marshall Place, Perth; R. J. Ussher, J.P., Cappogh, Lismore, R.S.O., Co. Waterford.

AN HONOURABLE DESERTER.

In the course of my wanderings I have met a good many men who fought in the American Civil War, some on one side and some on the other; but I have only met one who fought on both sides, and it is his story that I am going to tell here as nearly as I can as it was told to me by one of the chief actors in the tragedy during a run from New York to the Bermudas on one of the summer boats.

He was what the Autocrat at the Breakfast Table has aptly described as a "pitch-pine Yankee," a tall, lank, loose-jointed, leather-skinned New Englander, strong as a horse, gentle as a woman, and in worldly matters practical down to the soles of his broad, flat boots.

It was a remark of mine about the difficulty that a good many men must have had in choosing sides when the shot from Fort Sumpter roused the continent to war that drew the story from him, and this is how he began:

"I never wanted to go into the war at all for my own part, and I don't think I ever should have done if it hadn't been for Arthur Wolstan's old man being clean jumping mad on abolitionism, and fairly driving him into the battle-field. Arthur and I had been chums ever since our first fight, and that took place pretty soon after we could stand. I came out top, and two or three days afterwards I licked a bigger boy who was putting upon him, and then we swore everlasting friendship, and friends we remained to the end.

"Arthur's father was a big man in our little New Hampshire town, a good deal bigger than mine, who was only a small farmer and store-keeper, but for all that we got to Harvard together from school, and there we became greater chums than ever, probably because our wider look at the world showed us the need of friendship in such a wilderness.

"Next to myself Arthur's greatest friend at Harvard was a man of about his own age, named Stanton Mouatt, a strong Southerner, and the cousin of the prettiest girl I have ever set eyes on. This man in the course of a few months got a very great influence over Arthur, but I never could cotton to him, and there was very little love lost between us.

"Mouatt was very much in love with his pretty cousin, but there was no formal engagement between them, and when Arthur met her one Thanksgiving time, he fell in love with her too, and, like the man that he was, told Mouatt so, and they arranged it between them that the one who could get her should have her, and the other one should be best man at the wedding to show that there was no ill-feeling.

"When the war broke out, Stanton Mouatt went South as a matter of course, and got a commission in a South Carolina regiment. Arthur and I didn't want to go blowing holes in our fellow creatures at all. We had gone into the question more from the student's point of view, and we knew how much commercial trickery and political wire-pulling there was beneath the big talk of the Northern men, and if anything our sympathy was with the Southerners; but, as I have said, old Wolstan was a hopeless crank on the subject of anti-slavery, and after a few pretty wild scenes between them he told Arthur, in a blazing rage, that he was either a Secessionist or a coward, and that anyhow he could choose between putting on the Federal uniform or being disowned and disinherited right away.

"If it hadn't been for his mother and sisters I believe the lad would have gone south there and then, for he was a high-spirited and sensitive young chap, and the slight on his character made him madder than I had ever seen him before. Then, too, there were Lilian Mouatt's pretty brown eyes looking at him out of Carolina, and he knew how they would welcome him when they saw him in the grey and silver.

"However, his women-folks over-persuaded him, and the end of it was that he allowed himself to be commissioned to the New Hampshire Regiment, and I went into the ranks, not because I cared a shuck about North or South, but because I wanted to follow the only friend I ever had in the world. You will see from this that neither of us had any very great heart in the game when we started at it.

"We got to work, smelt powder and blood, and after a bit got the savage in us roused enough to like them both. I was in Arthur's company, and though we had been through Bull Run and many another sharp tussle together, neither of us had got more than a few scratches to show for it. This good luck lasted down to the fall of '61, when the 5th New Hampshire were doing outpost duty down in East Kentucky, in rather a lonesome bit of country.

"I suppose you know that when the two armies were not actually at hammer and tongs, the pickets on both sides often hailed each other and had a friendly chat for a bit, and plenty of times I have known old friends meet in this way and talk over old times a few hours before they would be doing their level best to blow each other's brains out, or ride each other down in a cavalry charge.

"It was in this way that Arthur Wolstan and Stanton Mouatt met about twelve months after they had parted at Harvard. They recognised each other at once, and rode up and shook hands as cordially as though neither of them considered it his patriotic duty to shoot the other on sight the next time they met in battle. If you wanted to see the pure foolishness of war, just after one of the outpost meetings was the time to think the subject over.

"Well, Arthur and Mouatt had a long chat quite apart from the rest of us, and as we parted at last to go on our respective rounds they shook hands again, and as Arthur turned his horse he said:

"'So long, old man. See you again, I hope—when the war is over.'

"It was a foolish thing to talk apart to the Confederate at all, and still more foolish to shout such a farewell as that and only mutter the last few words. Arthur had more than one enemy in the troop, and through a sergeant that he had once reported and had severely punished, a mixed-up, exaggerated report of what he had said and done got to the ears of the major, who was the best hated man in the regiment, and well deserved to be so, for he was as big a brute as ever wore a uniform.

Digitized by Google

"If he had really thought there was anything in what Arthur had said or done to give reason for suspicion, it was his place to have made a formal inquiry in the proper way, but instead of doing that he gossiped about it to the other officers, and at last openly insulted Arthur before his own comrades, by sneering out his opinion that it wouldn't cost the other side much to buy over Lieutenant Wolstan's valuable services and all the information he could remember.

"I never knew what Arthur had done to make this man hate him enough to do such a scandalous thing as this, but anyhow it was too much for hot blood like his, and the next day Major Beale received a challenge with an intimation that if it was not accepted he would be publicly kicked on the first favourable opportunity. Of course duelling on active service is punished with death if it is found out, but for all that it is done on extreme occasions like this. The Major, however, acted up to his character and sent the challenge to the Colonel, and the result was that poor Arthur was court-martialled, degraded to the ranks, and sentenced to six months' fortress duty.

"The night before he was to be removed a sharp attack was made on our position, and in the confusion I managed to knock over the sentry on guard at his hut and to get him out. That doesn't sound right to you, I suppose, but my friend was a lot more to me than North and South rolled up together, and I thought that he had been badly enough treated for someone to get hurt for it. I may mention just here that Major Beale did not survive the next battle.

"The Confederates drove our out-posts in after about three hours' hard fighting, and then drew off, as it was the object of the attack only to feel our pulse prior to a big battle that everyone felt would have to come off before very long. The treatment that Arthur had received had changed him from a lukewarm supporter of the North into a mad, unreasoning enemy, and as soon as the scurry of the attack was over he and I got out of the ditch where we were hiding and walked openly into the Confederate lines. The sentry challenged us, and half an hour later Arthur was in Captain Mouatt's tent discussing ways and means, and I was looking for a grey uniform to fit me.

"Desertion? Ye-es, I suppose it was, though at the time we called it changing sides, and we saved our consciences a bit by obstinately refusing to give the slightest information that could be of any use to the Southerners. It was this refusal that brought Stanton Mouatt out in his true colours, and led to a row that ended in two funerals, and very nearly in three.

"It was about a week after we went over. A biggish battle had been fought, and we had got the worst of it. The night after the fight Mouatt took Arthur away down a little valley with a stream in it called Maddox Run, to pump him about the strength of a position on which a night attack was to be made. I never had much faith in Arthur's Southern chum, and so when I saw them going off towards the glen I took it into my head to follow them at a respectful distance so as to be handy in case anything unpleasant happened. When they stopped in a sheltered little nook, I crept up close enough to hear them talk.

"Things went just as I thought they would. Mouatt did all he knew to persuade Arthur to give him the information. At last when all persuasion had failed, he lost his temper and tried threats. Then I heard Arthur say, as if to stop the discussion.

"'I would rather give myself up to the Federals and be shot for what I am—what your evil counsel and my own mad temper have made me—than be guilty of such treachery as that, so you can spare your breath. As for your threats I will only say that if you push the matter any further I shall take it as a personal insult and act accordingly.'

"I saw Mouatt's pale face flush a dusky red and his lips curl under his dark moustache, as he sneered out his answer:

"'My only objection to your going back to the Johnnies would be the fear that you might give them what you won't give us. There's not much use in a deserter, anyhow, if you can't get information out of him.'

"The words were hardly out of his mouth when Arthur's fist flew straight out from his shoulder, and sent Mouatt down like a felled ox with his mouth half full of blood and teeth. As soon as he realised what had happened he put his handkerchief to his mouth with one hand, and with the other he drew a revolver, and was just drawing a bead on Arthur when I jumped out on him, and got the bullet through the roots of my hair trying to screw the pistol out of his hand.

It was only a flesh wound, for the bullet grazed my skull without breaking anything, but it knocked the senses out of me for two or three hours, and when I came to myself it was moonlight, and clear enough for me to see the body of my old chum lying on its back within ten paces of me.

"I struggled to my feet, and went to him. There was a bullet hole just over his heart, and his pockets had been completely rifled. It was as foul a murder as had ever been committed, and as I dug the best grave I could for him with my cavalry cutlass, I swore that his murderer should pay the penalty for it as suddenly as I could make him. I saw through the whole plan now. Mouatt had tempted him to desert, and tried to disgrace him for good and all by making him a spy into the bargain, so that the question who should marry his cousin might be settled in his own favour right away. Failing in this he had provoked the quarrel and shot him in his tracks like a dog.

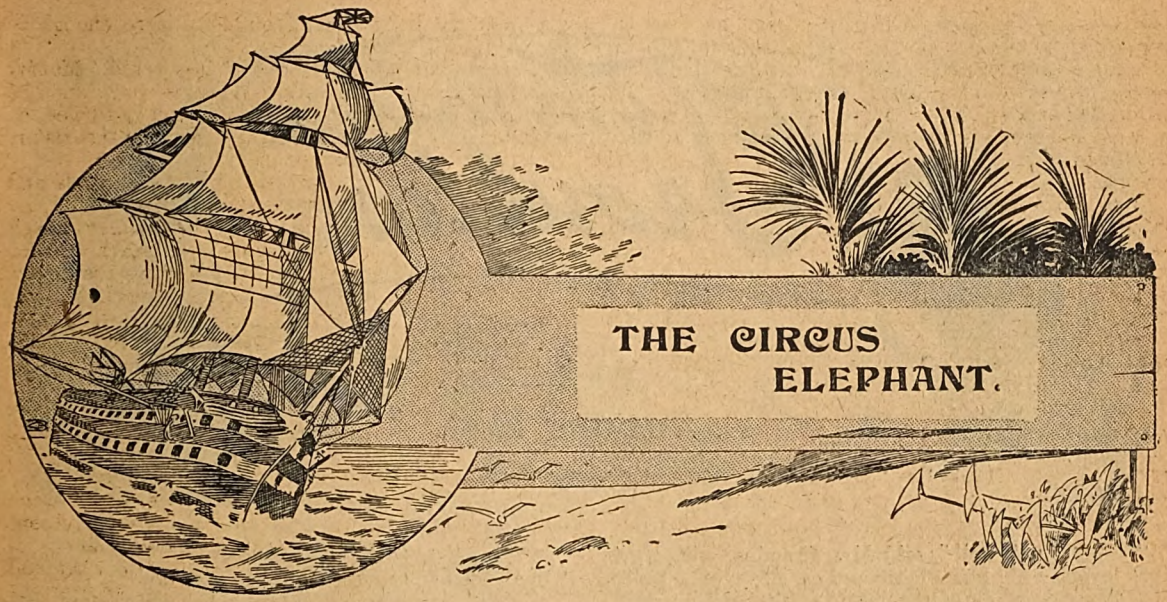
"That let me out on regular soldiering, and when my scalp was healed up I joined a troop of Confederate scouts and raided around impartially until my chance came."

"Then," said I, "I presume that Captain Mouatt did not marry his cousin after all?"

"No, sir, he didn't live long enough. He survived the chances of war a lot better than he deserved to do, but just before Lee got himself shut up in Richmond. Mouatt took his troop out foraging in the same district that our irregulars were working. I got the drop on him over my horse's back at long range, and did what the hangman couldn't have done under the circumstances. After the war was over I hunted up the pretty cousin and told her the whole story. She agreed with me that justice had been done, but she couldn't bring herself to marry me, though I tried very hard to persuade her. I believe she liked me, but she couldn't get over the shooting. Some women object to it, and she was one of them."

T. MASON.

Digitized by Google



THE CIRCUS ELEPHANT.

THE small town of Little Peddlington had for some time been liberally placarded with announcements that a circus was coming, and that a grand street parade would be given on its entrance. When the event so long foreshadowed and anticipated came to pass, all the inhabitants, as a matter of course, turned out to witness it, and the procession duly took place. It was not as imposing a pageant as Sanger's; still, it was considered a very gorgeous affair in Little Peddlington.

There were live lions in cages, but they were old and feeble monarchs of the forest, and allowed the little boys to poke them through the bars with impunity. Still, they were real lions—or had been before they became so reduced in spirits and circumstances as to be compelled to take to the show business—and that was something.

The lions might have passed muster in little Peddlington, but the "magnificent trained elephant, purchased at enormous expense from his Imperial Highness the Maharajah of Seringapatam," was a dead failure. This was a sad blow to the inhabitants of Little Peddlington, for they had looked forward to the elephant as the chief attraction of the circus parade. What made their disappointment all the more severe was the fact that at starting the "magnificent trained elephant" was the greatest success in the procession.

Punctually at the hour advertised the elephant led off the parade, and the delighted spectators applauded enthusiastically.

True, the elephant was rather smaller than the public had been led to believe, but what it lacked in size it evidently made up for in intelligence, for as it bounded along majestically leading the procession, it waved its trunk gracefully and bowed to the spectators, first on the right hand and then on the left.

"How wonderfully trained!" exclaimed some.

"Could almost believe that it was gifted with reason just like a human being!" cried others; and there was no doubt that the late property of the Maharajah of Seringapatam was installed first favourite in the public opinion of Little Peddlington.

Unfortunately, however, a slight incident now occurred which speedily deprived it of its pride of place in popular favour, and tended seriously to lower Little Peddlington's opinion of elephants in general, and the Maharajah of Seringapatam's in particular.

It appears that one of the mischievous urchins of the town, who formed one of the great crowd that walked beside the centre of attraction, took it into his head to prick one of the hind legs of the elephant, whereupon the animal directed a vicious kick at his tormentor.

This in itself would not have surprised the beholders, but it did surprise them to hear a particularly distinct human voice from the animal's interior, crying:

"Now, then, drop it, will yer?"

Slowly it began to dawn upon the spectators that there was more in the elephant purchased from the Maharajah of Seringapatam than met the eye, and they urged on the little local arab to repeat the pricking process, which he did with increased vigour.

"Great Christopher!" shouted the voice from within, "I ain't going to stand this for no blessed circus show in creation!"

Up went the rear of the elephant in the air, and the hind-legs, carrying on them the head and body of an overgrown boy, squaring up in fighting attitude, hurled defiance at the crowd.

"I knows as I've come down to be the hind-legs of a helephant, but I won't be insulted by any idiot in this town, anyhow."

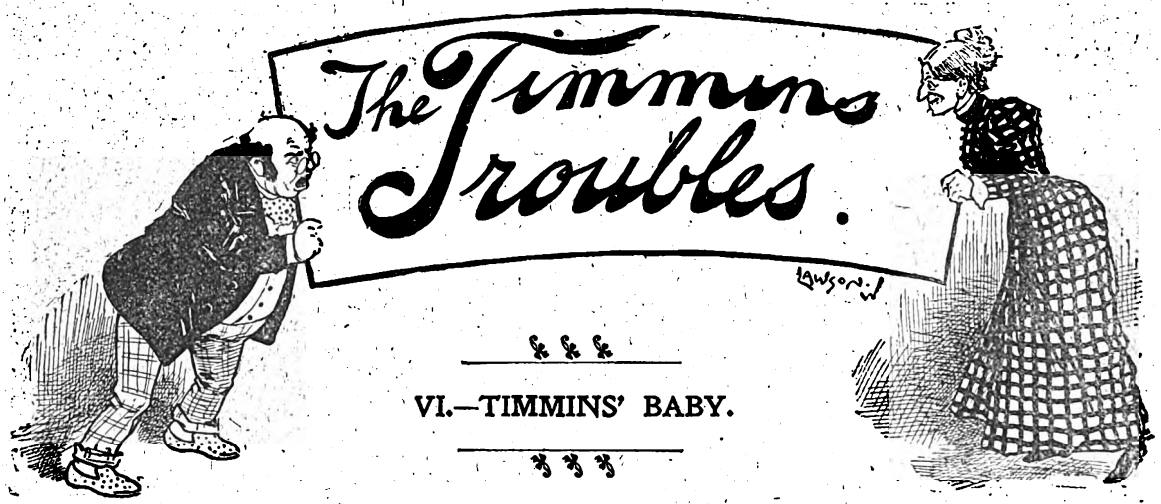
The front legs of the elephant were meanwhile struggling gamely on, but the elephant's centre of gravity had not been regulated for it to go as a biped. The result was that after a few ineffectual struggles the hind portion settled down like a ship at sea, and the front legs went up in the air, while a piteous voice screamed:

"Let me outer this, or I'll be choked!"

The people pulled the front legs out of the animal, and thus saved another human being from an untimely end. The circus proprietor rode up in a fearful state of mind, and commenced lashing the elephant's front and hind legs with his whip, but the damage was done. The show was a dead failure, and the residents of Little Peddlington lost their faith in elephants for evermore.

G. A. P.

Digitized by Google



VI.—TIMMINS' BABY.

"Well, well, well," said Mr. Timmins, with a grin that involved his whole head, and an effort at a tip-toe that shook the whole house. "And so it's a girl, my dear."

Mrs. Timmins smiled faintly, and Mr. Timmins picked up his heiress.

"It's the image of you," she said, regarding with some trepidation Mr. Timmins' method of handling the infant.

"I don't see how you can make that out," said Mr. Timmins gravely. "I don't know when my nose looked like a dab of putty. Do I understand you that my eyes bear any resemblance to the head of a screw?"

"I mean the general features," murmured Mrs. Timmins.

"The general features seem to be all mouth," retorted Mr. Timmins, examining his acquisition. "If our general features are all alike, my visage must remind you of an earthquake. Hi! kichee! kichee! What makes her fold up her legs like that?"

"She can't help it," reasoned Mrs. Timmins. "They'll straighten out in time."

"No time like the present," quoted Mr. Timmins; and he took his daughter's feet and commenced pulling her limbs. "I don't want any bandy-legged first in this family, while I'm at the head of it."

Naturally the baby began to cry, and Mr. Timmins essayed to soothe it.

"Hi! kichee! kichee! kich-ee-ee!" he chirruped. "Great Scott, what a cavern! Have you any idea how much this mouth weighs? Hi! kichee! kichee-e! You'll have to get that mouth roofed in before next winter. What's the matter with her?"

"Perhaps you hurt her. Let me take her, please," pleaded Mrs. Timmins.

"She's doing well enough. Hi, you! Hold up. Haven't you anything to catch this mouth in? It's spilling all over the neighbourhood. Hi! Topsy, Genevieve, Cleopatra! I'm going to have trouble breaking this young one's temper, I can see that. Here bend the other way at once!" and Mr. Timmins tried to straighten up his offspring without avail.

"Let her come to me, do, please," moaned Mrs. Timmins, and Mr. Timmins was forced to hand her over.

"Well, that's a fine baby," said he, nursing his knee and eyeing the infant. "What're those bumps over its eyes for? What preponderance of intelligence do they represent?"

"You mustn't talk so," remonstrated Mrs. Timmins. "She's the handsomest child you ever saw."

"Well, she's got to stop biting her nails before she's much older. Here, take your hands out of your mouth, can't you? Why don't she put her hands down?"

"Why, all babies do that," explained Mrs. Timmins. "You can't stop that."

"I'm going to try," said Mr. Timmins, "and I don't want to be interfered with in bringing this child up. Here, put your hands in your pockets! Don't you let me see any more nail biting, or you and I'll have an argument. She gets that from your family, Mrs. Timmins."

"I say, dear, don't you want to go and order some things?" asked Mrs. Timmins.

"No," rejoined her husband; "I want to see this youngster. Where's her chin? Do babies always have their upper jaw set right on their shoulders? Kichee, kichee! I don't believe she's quite right. Where's her forehead? Great Moses! Her head is all on the back part! That baby's got to be pressed. It's got no shape."

"Get away," exclaimed Mrs. Timmins indignantly. "She's a perfect angel. There's nothing in the world the matter with her."

"Of course you know," growled Mr. Timmins. "You don't want anything more than a hundred yards of grey holland, and an exceeded income to be an orphan asylum. If I had your faith and the measles, I'd make a living as a foundling's home! She'll be old enough to spank in a week, won't she?"

"No, she won't," said Mrs. Timmins. "She'll never be old enough for that."

"She will," grunted Mr. Timmins; "if she isn't, she'll get it before she matures up to that period. That's all. Let me take her. Here, let's have her."

But Mrs. Timmins flatly refused.

"Keep your baby, then!" roared Mr. Timmins. "If you know more about babies than I do, then keep her. The way you coddle her one would think she was a new paste for the complexion. Fit you up with a broken sofa and a grease spot, and you'd do for a nursery."

And Mr. Timmins started off to find his friend Speckwick, who congratulated him, and started off with him to assist him in the selection of some things for the household.

Digitized by Google

THE DOCTOR'S DOG.

DR. PETER LAURVIG was a native of Norway resident in Naples, where he was well known. He had taken his degrees for the simple love of science, and he practised medicine as an amateur among the poor, without fees, for the love of humanity, it seemed. But for those who penetrated more deeply into his idiosyncrasies, this opinion was difficult to reconcile with the thorough misanthropy of the man.

Dr. Laurvig was rich, a widower, and the father of a daughter whom he adored. He had left his own country in order to warm up the blood of this sickly child in the sunshine of Italy. The consumptive girl, however, had surrendered to her disease, and died in Naples. Her father remained in the place where the world was emptied for him of every joy.

After a period of overwhelming dejection, he resumed his old studies and began again his researches as an herbalist. Every day he wandered in the country or on the beach; bent with passion over the wild flowers, and the weeds floating in the sea-wrack.

A man who picked up simples must know how to cure. The superstition of the humble folk never varies as to the solidity of this deduction. The poor of the Vomero on the slope of which he lived, besieged the foreigner who came among them, in order to obtain consultations or remedies, and wearied with importunity, he yielded to their clamour. Soon he even sought occasions to apply his medical knowledge.

When his good deeds were lauded Laurvig shrugged his shoulders with an incredulous smile. He had examined himself; he knew what stimulus stirred him in that struggle against death. Then he tasted the pleasure of a revenge—the intoxication of the duellist who fights his adversary with the very weapons by which he has himself been conquered. Each victory thrown back on the spoiler had the savour of a personal avenging.

A large Danish dog, a fine animal, answering to the name Rampollo, constituted the habitual society of Doctor Peter. The man with the closed heart had intimate companionship only with this creature; his bitter sorrow sometimes solaced itself in the unfathomed tenderness of those great black eyes, and smiles responded to their mute prayer; then those shining pupils sought humbly for a sign of affection on the face of the master, and the dog received a caressing pat.

Rampollo followed Laurvig in his visits to his patients, carrying on his neck the basket containing the medicines gathered in the fields by the herbalist. From Capodimonte to the wharves, all the lazzaroni knew the inseparable couple. When the black dog appeared, the physician's humble clientèle—cripples and fever-stricken alike—struggled to the windows to hail without ceremony "the good doctor."

Laurvig had led for several years this kind of life when, in 1884, the cholera broke out in Naples. The awful scourge had hardly declared its presence before it was raging in the pestilential older quarters of the city, that network of dark malodorous alleys, lined with the damp stalls of fishmongers and fish-friers, deprived of air and light by the high leprous houses fronting on the pavement, with dingy tatters hanging from every window.

They live in the street, in Naples; they may die there also. From the early morning these gloomy dwellings empty themselves of their unwashed occupants; this human swarm seems to push forward to meet such sinister visitors, and to await their poisonous breath on the sills of their own doors.

The natural and general depression had the effect of an excitant upon Doctor Peter. The robber that had crushed his heart, the enemy whom he followed from habit into its hidden ambuscades—Death—now offered him open battle. He could strike the monster at once with redoubled blows. He gloried in the conflict, and counted proudly the prey that he would snatch from the grim destroyer.

Laurvig scarcely seemed to rest. Unfailing energy arose from his hatred and bitterness against the all-powerful slayer, to whom his imagination sometimes lent a form—a chimerical reality—so much he wished to hold its throat in his grasp. Every morning the dawn found him at work in those miserable quarters, amid that plague-stricken population which implored his aid. He regained his lodgings only after a long day's fight in the streets against the terrible scourge.

One evening as he took the road to the Vomero, a man stood before him at the entrance of the Calata San Sebastiano—one of those narrow alleys bordered by decaying old buildings, where the worst classes lodge and sleep.

"Doctor, for the love of Heaven, come up to my rooms. A girl is dying there," pleaded the man.

Laurvig was very tired; the day had been a hard one, and he had fasted since the morning. His body demanded rest. The medicine basket shook about, absolutely empty, on Rampollo's neck. The doctor tried to pass on.

Digitized by Google

Resolutely the man barred his way. He appeared to be mad with his trouble; there was no affectation, as the gas-jet which shone upon him revealed. He was clad in tatters, with a sailor's red cap on his head, and feverishly turned a bony face toward Laurvig—a face browned by the sun, and shaded by a black beard. A glance of fright seemed to revolutionize its expression—the glance of a tiger-cat caught in a snare while marauding for prey.

"Doctor, you must come! It is my daughter. She will die, if you do not save her!"

The cry of the father awoke a sad echo in the heart of Laurvig. Without another word he followed the man, turned into a steep alley, and climbed a long dark staircase up to the attic into which his guide led him. By the light of an iron lamp which stood on one of the two chairs composing the chief furniture of the room, the doctor saw the sick girl—a beautiful creature of twenty years—huddled up in two short skirts, upon a mattress.

At the noise which they made in entering the wretched apartment, she pushed away the fragments of a red handkerchief knotted round her head and the long thick hair which had fallen over her face.

Her large black eyes alone seemed to be alive. Brilliant with a feverish sparkle, they wandered alternately, with a suppliant expression, from the Doctor to her father.

It was, indeed, the awful plague which had stolen into the life of that beautiful body. The skilled practitioner detected its presence at the first glance. He dispatched the father of Teresa to a druggist, ordering him to bring the needful revulsives, while he descended in haste to buy warm coverings of wool.

Never had he felt a more intense determination to baffle the enemy. He leant long over the young sufferer, the father crouching near him, mechanically watching his movements, while the weary physician practised on those cold limbs the violent reactions which possibly might recall them to life. He waited hours for signs of its return, and withdrew from his patient very late in the night, when the tranquility of the sick girl gave him hope.

An early hour the next day found Doctor Laurvig at the side of his patient. Deaf to the supplications of the miserable creatures who clamoured for his care, he fought two entire days for Teresa, against the inroad of the obstinate disease. The third day he was victor. Teresa was saved. His practised eye was certain of it, when he saw again the young life reassured in those great black eyes, in the supple movements of the beautiful limbs, and the carmine of a ripe pomegranate suffusing the lips while she tasted the food he had brought.

He left the grateful father, promising to return, and, as he turned the corner of Clata San Sebastiano, he whistled for his dog. As the animal did not appear, the Doctor mounted the stairs again, searched for him in the sick girl's garret, and afterwards questioned all the shopkeepers of the little street. Certainly, they knew Rampollo well; they had seen him that very morning; still, they could not give his master any news of him.

After vainly seeking him for an hour, the Norwegian took the road to his home, anxiously hoping that the dog might have gone there before him. But Rampollo was not to be found, and his master vainly looked for him all the day. In the evening he went to the police-station, related his story, and offered a large reward for the recovery of his faithful companion.

The chief of police had often met the Doctor in the populous flats which they frequented, for different purposes. He interested himself in the matter, and asked for circumstantial details.

Hardly had Laurvig finished his story, when the officer said:

"You have told me enough. Go to the house of Agostino Greco and leave something in his hand. This Agostino, the father of Teresa, is one of the worst of knaves. He is a porter on the quay; in his idle moments he lives by some trades that can be acknowledged, and by many that are usually kept secret. We have had our eye on him for a long time, and on his beautiful daughter, who is not much better than he.

"You have done them a great kindness, and they have stolen your dog; that is the order of things. He would steal anything. Do not seek elsewhere."

Laurvig mounted once more to the garret in the Calata San Sebastiano. By his glance and by his words he severely stirred the conscience of the old thief without too much disguising a suspicion, at which Agostino did not seem surprised. The Doctor went on with his talk, and then the man replied:

"Listen. You have saved my daughter. I would give my right hand to restore your dog. I will make it my business to find him. The policeman! Bah! With him you might search for the dog until the judgment day! As to myself, I know all the fellows that steal dogs. If they have already killed him, there is no remedy. But, if he is still alive and in Naples I will bring him to you before the end of the week, as sure as my name is what it is!"

Little convinced and less assured, Dr. Peter went back to his house, where he was now quite alone.

He forced himself, with difficulty, to leave it the following day to visit the sick. Death had taken his child; men had taken his friend; why disturb himself to succour the latter?

Saturday evening, as he sat musing at his window, throwing his small human trouble into the great sadness of the sea, a strident bark resounded on the road and set his heart beating. A few minutes later Rampollo bounded to the knees of his master with every demonstration of joy and tenderness that could be expressed by his tongue and the wagging of his tail. Behind the animal in the open door stood Agostino, twisting his red cap, with a smile of modest triumph.

"I told you that I would bring the dog back to you," he said. "Did the police find him? I found him. I know all dog-stealers!"

Recalled by that voice to his obligation of gratitude, Laurvig stopped caressing Rampollo. He went to his secretaire and took from a drawer several gold pieces and carried them to the man. Agostino drew back, and his face grew darker with an expression of displeased astonishment. As the Doctor's countenance indicated insistance, Agostino stopped him with a gesture of decision.

"No, none of that! You have saved my daughter; I have saved your dog. Everybody must have something to love; that is understood. We are even. Keep your money!"

Laurvig threw the money on the table, and returned to Greco with both hands cordially held out to him. "Pardon, and my thanks," he said. "Give me your hand."

"No, not that either. The hand of an honest man like you ought not to clasp the hand of a man like me! Addio!"

Digitized by Google

He closed the door and disappeared. The next day an instinctive impulse carried Laurvig to the Calata San Sebastiano. Teresa was alone in the wretched garret. With a grave and pensive face, she coldly welcomed her benefactor.

"And your father—where is he?" inquired Laurvig.

"In prison," she answered. "They have just arrested him. A stab with his dagger, it appears."

The Doctor could not draw any further information from the poor girl. Obstinate in her silence, there was reproach in her glance. He repaired immediately to the police station, called for the chief, and questioned him regarding Agostino.

"Ah! that fellow!" replied that high functionary. "Yes, we have him at last! A good blow with his knife following a scuffle with one of his pals, the cobbler Girolamo, who follows, among other special pursuits, that of stealing dogs. As nearly as we can make it out by the lies of those knaves, they had stolen a fine animal belonging to you, I believe.

"Without doubt Agostino demanded his share. Girolamo refused to pay. Agostino tried to take off the dog by main force. In short, daggers were drawn, and the shoemaker has been accommodated by the hand of a master at the business. It will finish him up. By my faith! That was a good stab which delivered to us the wickeder of the two rogues, and rid us of the other."

Laurvig timidly advanced his version of the story. He succeeded only in making the chief smile, and understood that it would be useless to press the case. The officer had constructed the scene of the crime in his own imagination. Now, when a functionary has arranged the details of a crime according to his views, everybody knows that it is useless for meddlers to attempt modification.

The physician found his protest useless, and went away repeating to himself mechanically the phrase he had just heard—which was filled for him with a profound sense of tragic truth and cruel irony—a good stab!

He sought the magistrate, who told me this story. In the hope of throwing some light, he narrated the incidents after his own manner.

* * * * * *

"And what did you do with Agostino?" I demanded of my friend.

"What would you have had us do with him? We sent him to the galleys. Bless me! a dagger-thrust like that? And the beneficiary, the cobbler, is dead."

"Meanwhile, the justice of it," I began.

"Ah! there you are!" interrupted the magistrate. "If we listened to you, if justice split hairs, she would not cut off another head. Psychological analysis is one thing, my dear sir, and justice is quite another—a simple thing, mechanical, nothing more. Our clear Roman justice would trip at every step, if she embarrassed herself with sentimental subtleties.

"Besides, Laurvig was a strange character, and became more so after that adventure. He associated only with the rascals. One fine day he started for his own country with his dog and Teresa into the bargain. They say that he adopted her, and has married her to some savant at Bergen, and that he will leave her his fortune. Poor girl!

"But we intend to get a pardon for Agostino," the magistrate added in a lower tone.

"He deserves it! It was a good stab!"

JACK ROGERS.

The Gallant Hundred.

ONE of the chief characteristics of the Britisher is that he knows a good thing when he sees it, and seizes it when he gets the chance.

Never was that maxim better applied than in the case of the hundred volumes we are offering for an initial payment of ten shillings. The announcement had not been before the public an hour before orders began to drop in—intermittently at first, and finally in a perfect avalanche.

The demand has so far exceeded our expectations that many applicants, we are sorry to say, will have to wait a few days before receiving their sets. More than twenty extra hands have been taken on the work of binding alone to meet the enormous pressure of work.

And now we come to

AN IMPORTANT ADDITION TO THIS OFFER.

So many people wish to get the books in a superior binding that we are prepared to supply

100 Books, in Elegant Half Morocco Binding, for £10, cash down.

50 Books, in Elegant Half Morocco Binding, for £5, cash down.

In paying for these volumes in instalments (100 books, £10 10s.; 50 books, £5 5s.) the conditions will remain as for the cloth-bound books, with the one difference that the payments will be continued for a longer period, until the full amount is paid off.

The all-important fact to bear in mind is that, if you have not £7 or £10 to spare you at least have ten shillings. A postal order for this amount will bring along the hundred handsome books, and the balance may be paid off at your convenience once a month on the date agreed upon.

What People are Saying about the Books:

H. Bronson, Sheffield:

"I was very sceptical about the books until I received them. Now I cannot sufficiently express my surprise and admiration. They are splendid."

M. M., Liverpool:

"What splendid type for reading. I had half expected to find them printed in very small type, but both paper and print are really excellent."

A. S. P. M., Bristol:

"I inclose you orders for ten sets of 50 each. I am thus entitled to a free set, which please forward at your earliest convenience. I may say that I had very little trouble in getting the subscriptions. It only wanted a little explanation. I asked altogether only twenty-five people, so that wasn't a bad proportion, was it?"

This gentleman is the first recipient of the free set. The task of obtaining subscribers is, as he says, not a very great one. Why don't you try?

PEARSON'S BEST BOOKS.

A List of the Volumes may be had Post Free on Application.

	100	50
CLOTH BINDING	Cash down, £7 0s.	Cash down, £3 10s.
	Instalments, £7 10s.	Instalments, £4 0s.
HALF MOROCCO	Cash down, £10 0s.	Cash down, £5 0s.
	Instalments, £10 10s.	Instalments, £5 5s.

ORDER FORMS APPEARED LAST WEEK.

All communications to be made to "Best Books Department," C. Arthur Pearson Ltd., Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

THE FINAL WAR

BY

LOUIS TRACY.

Author of "The Shadow Hand," "An American Emperor," "The Lost Provinces," etc.

CHAPTER XLVIII.

DR. JIM'S SECOND RAID.

DR. JAMESON had long since expiated the mad enterprise that ended so disastrously at Krugersdorp. He now commanded a fine body of South African horsemen, largely composed of the troopers who rode with him in the ill-fated Transvaal raid, and as the United States army was short of cavalry, "Dr. Jim's Regiment" was detailed for duty with General Smithson.

And these Afrikanders had a score to settle with the German Emperor. His unnecessary sympathy with the Boers, his unsought telegram condemning them, did not help to endear him to a gallant corps which, whatever the action of its leaders, at least tried to do that which it conceived to be its duty.

Dr. Jameson and his followers had entered upon the campaign with eagerness. Their daily hopes, their nightly dreams, centred upon the one object of their lives—they desired above all else to get even with the Kaiser.

And now, if this talk of approaching armistice were true, the chance was remote of balancing the account.

"He is only twenty miles away," growled Sir John Willoughby; "but he might as well be in China. Perhaps to-morrow we may be told off to act as his escort during a grand palaver."

"Perhaps to-night," said Dr. Jameson, who had been deep in thought for an hour after the transmission of the mysterious letter was noised abroad.

The other men in the mess tent were surprised at his serious tone, though they shared his keen annoyance at the threatened cessation of hostilities.

"To-night!" exclaimed Major Coventry. "Impossible. The letter, whatever it contains, cannot reach Her Majesty before eleven o'clock to-morrow, and it will take at least another hour to get to Lord Salisbury. Even a cable message will not enlighten the Duke until two p.m., at the earliest. That is what one of his staff told me just now."

"He was right," observed the Colonel, in his grave, preoccupied tone; "but Her Majesty and Lord Salisbury may be called upon to deal with a cable first."

None of the few officers present could longer doubt that their leader had some serious purpose behind his words.

Sir John Willoughby went to the door of the tent, walked round the outside to make sure there were no eavesdroppers and returned. Planting himself squarely before Dr. Jameson and said:

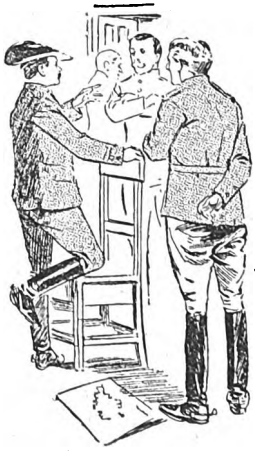
"Now, what it is?"

"It is this," was the reply. "I believe that by properly formulating our scheme and carrying it through regardless of personal consequences, we can capture him some time about 2.30 a.m."

Not a man needed enlightenment as to the individuality indicated by the personal pronoun. Comment was out of the question.

They simply waited for further explanation.

"The German officers who brought the letter," went on Dr. Jameson, "had some refreshment at the headquarters mess before they returned. They sat together unattended for a moment, and as I speak German well I could not help hearing their remarks to one another.



"I believe . . . we can capture him some time about 2.30 a.m."

"And this is the actual text of their conversation.

"The younger one said:

"'These English cannot conceal their astonishment.'

"The other answered:

"'Nor can the Emperor conceal his anxiety. He sleeps to-night at the headquarters of the 4th division, in the village of Westhausen, so as to be able to receive the reply at the earliest possible moment.' That is all."

"It's a lot," observed Sir John Willoughby thoughtfully.

"I don't see it," exclaimed a young captain, noted for his hard riding, his utter contempt of personal danger, and his thick head.

"No, old chap, I didn't think you would," said the Colonel with a quiet smile. "But you probably will see it before to-morrow morning."

The other men laughed, and Dr. Jameson continued:

"This is my plan. We select 300 of our hardest men and best horses—men and animals up to forty miles with some hard knocks thrown in. I get permission from General Smithson—the Duke would refuse it—to conduct an extended reconnaissance, starting about eleven o'clock. Westhausen is exactly eighteen miles from here, and the country is practicable either by road or field. We walk the first ten miles, say 1.30 a.m.; we gallop the remaining eight, say 2.30; we stop for nothing; and when we reach Westhausen we surround the largest house where horses are picketed outside, and lights and orderlies knocking about show signs of an important occupant. We ourselves should carry the first explanation of the firing at the outposts. We enter the house, and if the Emperor is there, tie him on to a led horse and carry him off. If he is not there, well, we do the best we can. This time, gentlemen, there will be no dispatch-box.

"Always ante before the draw, boys," said a deep voice at the entrance. "If there's a strong game on deal me a hand," and Colonel Ritchie strode into the tent, looking quizzically at the startled group of conspirators, who were so engrossed in Dr. Jameson's words that they never heard the approach of the American cavalry leader. Much as they liked him they were annoyed at the interruption.

"A gentleman——" began Major Coventry angrily.

"A gentleman always knocks," laughed Ritchie, "but he can't if there ain't a door. You were all so interested that I thought someone was raising the crowd a hundred. But you're busy. Shall I quit?" and he turned to go.

"No, Colonel Ritchie," cried Dr. Jameson. "You shall stay. We can trust you, at any rate. If you decide against our proposal, promise that you will forget it."

"Shake!" said Ritchie, extending his hand. "But it will be a cold deal that leaves me out."

When he heard what was in the air he whooped in the most approved style of the Sioux nation.

"Great snakes!" he yelled. "I'd ride all the way on a circus horse. But my boys will lynch me when they hear I went without them."

"Select fifty whom you can trust absolutely, and we will reduce our contingent to make room for them. I can be sure of my men, but I am not so sure of so many horses, as that last dust-up with the Uhlans tired a lot of them."

Arrangements were now rapidly discussed, and the party broke up shortly afterwards, each officer having his clear and well-defined duties to perform. Above all else, every man taken on the expedition must thoroughly understand its desperate nature. Those who fell could not be cared for, those who were dismounted could not be carried, those who reached the goal must rigidly obey orders at all personal risk and sacrifice.

Not a man backed out who was asked to volunteer.

Colonel Ritchie was entrusted with the task of gaining General Smithson's permission for the "reconnaissance." The conversation between the two is worth reproducing.

"What's afoot?" said the United States Commander when the request was preferred.

"Well, General, it's this way," explained Colonel "Gu." "These Afrikander boys think they can ride a few. It's a fine night, with a weak imitation of a Californian moon, and perhaps we might find a stag grazing in the lowlands. It's a sort of deer hunt, with Uhlans in the background. Venison is in season just now, and our menu of roast beef, and boiled beef, and potted beef, and beef——"

"There. That will do," was the dry answer. "You're not lying so artistically as usual. If it wasn't for this confounded rumour of peace negotiations stopping all the fun I would not sanction this affair. You're up to mischief of some sort. When Jameson and you hunt together there's trouble brewing. But listen. Don't get yourself hurt."

With this grudging assent Ritchie thought it best to depart.

By some occult means the circle of conspiracy widened. Several officers in British regiments suddenly obtained a night's leave "on urgent private affairs," chargers were borrowed, when they happened to be well-known hunters, "just for the evening, old fellow," girths were carefully examined, surcingles scrutinised, stirrup-leathers tested, revolvers cleaned, swords sharpened, and huge suppers eaten.

Each officer and private carried a large supply of weak whisky and water—not for himself, but for his horse.

At eleven p.m. they mustered in two's and three's at a quiet rendezvous. They formed up rapidly in four troops, 320 of the finest cavalry soldiers that the world could produce, and mounted as no regiment of horse was ever mounted before.

There was no delay. "Fours right. Left wheel. Trot." Were the commands in rapid succession, and they left the precincts of the lines on the right wing occupied by the United States army.

Dr. Jameson, of course, was in command, with Sir John Willoughby as second, Colonel Ritchie and Major Coventry as squadron leaders, and the rest of the officers concerned in the Transvaal raid, assisted by a sprinkling of volunteers from British regiments, distributed among the four troops.

Once well beyond the outposts, and safe from interference, a halt was called.

Dr. Jameson briefly addressed his followers, fully and lucidly explaining his project, and finally calling upon anyone who did not care for the onerous personal conditions of the enterprise to turn back.

His speech was received with dead silence, for any combined testimony of approval was out of the question.

But somebody softly whistled the air, "We won't go home until morning," and there was a general snigger. Dr. Jameson himself joined in the laugh.

"I suppose I have been answered," he said. "Now, these are my final instructions. We walk for about nine miles. You can dismount and lead your horses, if you like, except the advance guard who will be relieved each half hour. You may smoke and talk quietly, but be momentarily on the alert for orders. I need hardly say that all orders must be instantly and absolutely obeyed."

Then the march commenced.

The way was easy to find, and a bright moon lit up the landscape for a considerable distance, so progress was rapid and uninterrupted.

At half-past one the force halted for five minutes for a general tightening up of girths and accoutrements. The muster roll was gone through and no one reported missing.

Then the whole party remounted and advanced, still at a walk, as they were only seven miles from Westhausen, the distance being somewhat less than Dr. Jameson had calculated from the map.

At six miles from the village they broke into a sharp trot; at five miles they were mistaken for scouting Uhlans, and allowed to reach the first outpost without being fired upon; at four miles they had a sharp tussle with a squadron of dragoons, whom they surprised in a small hamlet.

The pace then became a steady gallop, and they swept unimpeded through a brigade of infantry who wholly failed to realise the fact that a detachment of the enemy was riding through the shaded road that intersected their lines.

The church clock of Westhausen chimed the half-hour past two when the leading troop dashed into its only street, with its clusters of cottages and isolated residences of more pretentious character.

Right in the centre of the village stood a large house, usually occupied by the principal local landowner. In front and in the meadow at the rear were picketed over a hundred horses, and the moonbeams glinting from cuirass and helmet worn by several orderlies standing near the open door, revealed members of what was surely the Emperor's bodyguard.

"We've got him, by Jimini!" yelled Dr. Jameson, whose self-contained calm had now vanished beneath the spell of ungovernable excitement. There was no need for instructions. Nothing had been forgotten beforehand. Whilst the first troop knocked down the practically unarmed soldiers on duty, half of the second troop dismounted and rushed towards the building, their comrades holding their horses. No. 3 troop busied themselves in cutting the halters and heelropes of the tethered animals, and smacked them with the flat of their sabres to start them off in wild career, and No. 4 passed on up the street for a hundred yards, to prevent any interruption from that side.

Digitized by Google

The sentry at the door shot and killed the first trooper who ran up the steps, but a second later he was run through the heart, and a score of men were in the building. Some diverged right and left, others raced upstairs, and they found the Emperor in the first-floor front room, standing in bewildered attitude as he had risen from the camp bed, where he had laid himself, fully dressed, to snatch a brief rest after the fatigues of the day.

There was a lamp burning on the table, and to his practised eye no second glance was needed to explain the turmoil in the street and the sudden entry of these brown-coated armed men into his chamber.

He sprang to his sword, but before he could reach it a dozen hands held him fast, and his arms were rapidly pinioned behind his back.

Startled and utterly amazed, pale with weariness and anxiety, he was yet true to the demands of his exalted rank.

"What is the meaning of this outrage?" he cried vehemently, speaking in English.

"It means, Your Majesty, that you are our prisoner, and you must accompany us this instant," said an officer.

"Yes, you've got ter quit, now, immediate," chimed in a San Franciscan who could not resist the temptation to bandy words with an Emperor.

"But the Duke of Connaught cannot have sanctioned these unwarrantable proceedings. I have but a few hours since written to the Queen——"

The Kaiser would have proceeded further, but the officer who had first spoken sternly broke in:

"Your Majesty, we have no time for argument. Will you walk or shall we carry you? You must decide at once."

"I will not, because I cannot, resist," was the reply, in a tone of such quiet dignity that it almost unnerved the man he addressed. In happier years they had met at Cowes.

Forthwith the party reached the street, and the Emperor, without another word being spoken, was lifted on to the magnificent charger provided for him, two troopers rode close on each side, and an imperative command recalled the scattered members of the detachment.

So quickly and effectually had the capture been carried out, that even yet there was no semblance of resistance in the vicinity of Westhausen.

The Emperor was placed in the centre of the third troop, and the whole party started back towards Lauenburg at a gallop. Half a mile from Westhausen a road deflected to the left, and Dr. Jameson led his men by this way in order to avoid the brigade of infantry they had passed en route. It was well he did so. A staff-officer returning from headquarters had recognised the uniforms of the last troop as they clattered by, and had given the alarm, whilst the general in command, although unable to fathom the real purport of the raid, scented danger to his royal master.

Troops were already advancing towards Westhausen at the double, and as there were over 10,000 men in the brigade, it is probable that not only every man in the British contingent would have been shot, but the Kaiser himself might have fared ill at the hands of his own men owing to their ignorance of the circumstances of the case.

"Dr. Jim," and his troopers, with their illustrious prisoner, were nearly four miles from Westhausen before they found a road that turned directly towards the British lines. It passed through a dense wood for some distance, and unexpectedly opened out on to a stretch of common.

Barely had the leading files left the shadow of the trees before they perceived in the distance the bright helmets of some Prussian dragoons, and the British horsemen were discovered at the same time.

The field telegraph, which was carried to high perfection in the German army, had warned the commander to be on the look-out for the party, whose numbers were correctly estimated, and he was now able to throw in their path nearly 600 stalwart Westphalians, well mounted, and eager to teach these marauders a lesson.

Neither he nor his men dreamt for a moment that the Kaiser was in the midst of the enemy.

The pace at which Dr. Jameson's squadrons travelled, the manner of their formation at the moment, the surprise of the rencontre, all contributed to confuse the issues of the cavalry combat that forthwith ensued.

One fact stood out boldly on behalf of the British. They knew the prize they had at stake.

This was no ordinary midnight scuffle between opposing vedettes. Outnumbered two to one by the Germans, each man who had followed Dr. Jameson in this memorable ride was ready to face singlehanded any odds that offered, and prepared to throw his life in the scale if that would suffice to turn the balance in favour of his comrades.

One order and one only was given.

"Cut your way through!" shouted the Colonel, and wedding example to precept, he clapped spurs to his horse to urge him along at top speed, and rode straight at the nearest batch of dragoons.

With a wild yell his men followed him, and, by sheer intuition, those in the rear knew what was going on in front.

In no wise unwilling for the game, the Germans were nevertheless unable to get their horses in rapid motion before the leading Britons were upon them, and the first batch of Westphalians disappeared as though they had been struck by lightning.

But the tremendous phalanx of men and horses behind, by its sheer density, soon rendered further progress impossible.

This consideration told both ways.

If it hindered the Englishmen, it also enabled more of them to reach the scene of conflict, and for a couple of minutes there was the heartiest give-and-take mêlée that the eyes of a soldier could wish to see.

The Emperor, secure in the midst of the third troop, which had been halted by Colonel Ritchie, watched the mad scene, with its fierce energy heightened by the uncertain light of the waning moon, with its hoarse cries of rage and keener notes of agony, the neighing and screaming of wounded horses, the clash of sword against sword or helmet, and he raged at the impotence of his position.

"Cut your way through!" shouted the Colonel.

He would have bartered his kingdom at that moment to be free and at the head of his gallant troops.

Dr. Jameson, bareheaded and breathless, blinded with blood from a cut across the forehead, suddenly heard Ritchie's voice, quite close to him, shouting some orders.

"Is he safe?" cried the Colonel.

"Yes," was the answer, "and by thunder he's going slick through, now."

Digitized by Google

Jameson managed to clear his eyes and after a moment's consultation he rode again into the press of the fight. He is endowed by nature with a high penetrating voice and he now put all his force into a final command:

"Leading squadron. Outwards—wheel!"

Some of the men heard him, others did not, but those who understood repeated the order. Its object was quickly made apparent.

No. 4 Troop, composed entirely of Americans, now rode forward in half-sections, every man with his sword returned, and a six-chambered revolver in each hand.

Forcing their chargers with knee and spur, firing point blank into the mass of the Westphalian cavalry, and practically making every shot to tell upon a horse or a man, the United States soldiers succeeded, as with no other arm they could have succeeded, in clearing a path for themselves.

Followed closely by the Emperor's escort they smashed their way through to the farther side of the common, and Major Coventry's squadron, now sadly diminished in numbers, faced round to stop pursuit.

"I am Dr. Jameson."

This part of their task was not a difficult one.

Nearly one-third of the Germans had fallen, and there were few among the survivors who did not bear upon their persons some marks of the contest.

The Emperor during this dramatic scene, had not uttered a word. He disdained even to cry for help as he was hurried through the press of his own troops, and he rode quietly forwards for nearly an hour after all danger of immediate pursuit had passed without exhibiting any sign of the burning thoughts that possessed his soul.

At a midway farmhouse a brief halt took place, and the Emperor's arms were unbound.

He was offered some slight refreshment, which he pleasantly accepted. Then he said, with a smile, to the officer who had arrested him, and who never left his side for a moment.

"That was a good fight!"

"Superb, Your Majesty."

"You were better mounted than my men. How many do you number?"

"All told, 320, Your Majesty."

"Ah. And you cut your way through twice as many of my best soldiers. No wonder you dare to face the world in arms. What casualties have you sustained?"

"I fear, your Majesty, that we have left 130 men on the field. That is a rough estimate made en route."

The Emperor sighed deeply. "It is a terrible price. And my own brave fellows, too. Even more of them, by necessity. Believe me, Captain, I am not worth it."

At 5.15 a.m., as the first notes of the reveille pealed forth in the grateful morning air, the gallant band, now so woefully diminished in numbers, rode into the British lines. The Emperor was at once taken to a spacious tent and invited to enter. He was followed by a slightly-built but active-looking man, whose forehead was roughly bandaged, and who was haggard from loss of blood, want of sleep, and extreme physical exhaustion. He stood for a moment looking at the Emperor.

"I am now going, your Majesty," he said quietly, "to announce your arrival to the Duke of Connaught. Meanwhile I have taken every precaution to secure your comfort, and can only express my regret if the rude necessities of the night were unduly irksome. Here, however, you will find every convenience," and, with a comprehensive sweep of his hand, the newcomer indicated the surroundings.

The Emperor followed his gesture, and the eyes of both men fell at the same instant upon a number of telegraph forms, ostentatiously displayed on a camp writing-table.

Then the Kaiser spoke. "May I ask," he said, "to whom I owe my capture and these—these delicate attentions?"

"Your Majesty, I am Dr. Jameson."

* * * * *

At nine o'clock that morning mounted orderlies from the War Office galloped furiously through the streets of London with imperative summonses to the members of the Council of National Defence.

At ten they were gathered in Lord Salisbury's room at the Foreign Office, and the sensational telegram from the Duke of Connaught was read. His announcement was received with silent amazement. Sir William Harcourt, bending forward with his hand over his ear that not a word might escape him, was the first to speak. "A most interesting example of historic irony," he said, nodding gravely.

"Telegrams figure largely in the life of the German Emperor," observed Lord Wolseley.

"The incident renders an already complex position more difficult." It was Lord Salisbury who uttered these words.

The Council were deeply engaged in discussing this unexpected development when a secretary entered with a special letter from Her Majesty. He handed it to the Prime Minister, who slowly read the autograph document within, and then, with equal deliberation, examined an inclosure. It was the Kaiser's letter to the Queen.

In simple phrase it requested that a direct representative of Her Majesty might be sent to Germany to arrange the terms of an honourable peace, and thus bring to an end a needless conflict fraught with disaster to both nations.

For a little while consideration of the dispatch was impossible. Each turned to his neighbour to eagerly express his astonishment and delight. But at last collective deliberation was resumed.

"Gentlemen," said Lord Salisbury, "before proceeding to discuss the conditions of peace, it is important that we should decide upon the person to perform this onerous mission. I am convinced that we shall best serve the interests of England, and at the same time meet the wishes of the Emperor, if we ask H.R.H the Prince of Wales to undertake it."

All eyes instinctively turned in one direction.

"Gentlemen," said the Prince, rising from his chair, "if this be your pleasure, I am ready."

CHAPTER XLIX.

THE PRINCE AND THE EMPEROR.

ON the afternoon of the day on which the Council of National Defence met in London, an important telegram was handed to the English Commander-in-Chief at Lauenburg. When he had read it, he summoned General Sir Richard Sheridan and gave him a few brief instructions.

"I am ordered," he said, "to set the German Emperor at liberty without delay. It is a duty which delicacy forbids my performing in person. I shall be glad, therefore, if you will proceed at once to his Majesty and inform him of the decision arrived at in London. You will provide an escort of cavalry and see that he is conveyed, with as little observation as possible, to the German lines. You will also inform him that his letter has duly reached Her Majesty, and that the Council of National Defence has agreed to a proposal of Lord Salisbury that the Prince of Wales shall proceed to Germany and meet the Emperor to discuss the terms of an armistice. His Royal Highness will arrive here to-morrow and will at once communicate with him as to the place and conditions of rencontre. I leave it to your good sense to do all that courtesy and discretion suggest."

Sir Richard concealed what emotion he might have felt at this news, and selecting a guard of honour, proceeded to the Emperor's tent.

The Kaiser had sufficiently recovered his good-humour. He was a soldier born, who knew how to submit to the strange reverses of battle, and he listened to the communication made to him with grave respect.

"I beg you to thank the Duke," he said in reply, "for the consideration he has shown me. I trust that German soldiers will never show themselves less lacking in such honourable courtesies of war."

Sir Richard restrained a smile. He was Saxon enough to scout the possibility that the German or any other Emperor could ever be in such a position as to enable him to exhibit courtesy of this kind to an English General.

With all becoming marks of respect, he formed up his guard of honour and rode off with his illustrious charge. Early the following morning the German army received back its wandering chief, almost before it had missed him, and Prince von Hohenlohe was so profoundly relieved that he did not during the whole day make a single reference to the military genius of his old friend, Von Moltke. The Kaiser found no difficulty, on his part, in controlling his exuberance of spirits or the undue emphasis of his opinions. He only once openly referred to the incident.

"The British," he remarked to the Prince, "say little about their colonial empire. But their object lessons are admirable. I do not wonder that they have seized the earth if they breed such amateurs as Dr. Jameson."

The old statesman grunted and took a long pull at his beaker of Munich beer. He proffered no reply, but he muttered to himself:

"Their amateurs found empires; ours do their best to lose them!"

Luckily the Kaiser did not hear him, and the Prince, much relieved by his aside, filled his pipe once more and smoked on with great content.

Towards nightfall some excitement towards the rear of the British camp announced that something unusual was happening. It was noticed, too, that the Duke of Connaught with his whole staff had stationed himself at the temporary depôt which marked the terminus of the military station. Through the army there rushed the welcome news that the heir to the throne had already arrived. That ever popular favourite, the Prince of Wales, was now in the midst of the troops who worshipped him so well.

A salute greeted him as he stepped from the carriage, in the uniform of a Field Marshal, and grasped the hand of his brother. Then, forgetting restraints of discipline as they recognised the well-known face, a mad shout went up from ten thousand throats. In such wise the British Tommy broke in to add his own spontaneous welcome and cheer Old England in the person of her Prince.

The latter saluted in response. And then his brother, placing his hand upon the arm of General Smithson, said:

"Permit me, before anything else is done, to present to you a brave officer and a skilled commander to whom I owe many debts of gratitude, and with me all Englishmen."

"General," observed the Prince, extending his hand, and not without a smile, "is it consistent with your republican principles to bestow a welcome upon a grateful ally?"

"Believe me, sir," replied the impetuous Smithson with fervour, "if we saw much of you on the other side, we should all turn royalists to a man!"

His Royal Highness made a laughing \retort, and the three rode off to headquarters.

(To be continued.)

RESULT OF "SHORT STORIES" PICTURE PUZZLE.

THE first prize of £2 2s. has been awarded to

Mr. R. W. HEALEY, 35 Queen Street, South Bank, who forwarded the most nearly correct solution. Books have been forwarded to the following:

J. Whincap, Raikes Road, Blackpool, Lincs.; Miss Rockliff Lubé, Briars Hey, Formby, near Liverpool; Edward Barton, Siedello School of Singing, Swinley, Wigan; A. Hutton, 3 Lapage Street, Bradford, Yorks.; Harry Cheetham, 24 Zion Street, Eccles New Road, Salford, Manchester; Miss C. M. Bone, 4 Osborne Street, Somers Road, Southsea; James Matthews, "Inverie," Thornton Heath, Chiswick; P. J. Edgington, 3 Great Hill, Dudley, Worcestershire; J. Hughes, 2 Crimea Terrace, off Langrove Street, Everton; F. P. Jones, 26 Midland Avenue, Lenton, Nottingham; C. Russell, 2 York Buildings, Edinburgh; M. Gravelet, 46 Boston Park Road, Brentford; J. W. Darling, 25 Rosebank Cottages, Gardiner's Crescent, Edinburgh; Miss L. Forrest, Morton Hall, near Gainsburgh, Lincs.; Miss Openshaw, Brooklands, Bury, Lancs.; D. Hancox, The Monkhouse, Cheadle, Stoke-on-Trent; J. W. Tirmey, Grasmont, Manor Road, East Molesey, Surrey.

RESULT OF "JUMBLE" COMPETITION.

THE prize of £2 2s. has been forwarded to:

Mr. JAMES MITCHELL, 2 Belfield Terrace, Musselburgh, whose attempt at the Jumble Story Competition was the most correct.

The following fifty have received books:

N. Cheetham, 102 Glenpark Road, Forest Gate, E.; R. Browne, 17 Jubilee Street, Larne, County Antrim; E. H. Jones, 2 Grange Terrace, Beach Farm Road, Southsea; R. E. Jones, 6 Bryn Bowydd, Bluenan Festiniog, North Wales; H. P. Harman, 75 High Street, Bromley; Mrs J. Holmes, 7 Fountain Street, Dennistoun, Glasgow; H. W. Greenwood, 149 Great Dover Street, London, E.C.; J. E. Hutchinson, 19 Victoria Embankment, Darlington; J. Marks, 58 Marylands Road, Paddington; A. W. Browne, 33 Lena Gardens, Brook Green, Hammersmith; Miss A. M. Groves, Linden House, Woodford Green; Mrs. Child, 55 West Rhondda Street, Swansea; S. G. Harrison, 51 Madeley Road, Ealing, W.; Mrs. Ayers, Winchester Villa, 86 Birkbeck Road, Leytonstone; J. O. Murgatroyd, 54 Haydon Park Road, Wimbledon; H. Grindall, 145 Durham Road, Sparkhill, Birmingham; John Scullard, 2 Herbert Street, Kentish Town, N.W.; C. Chapman, 68 St. Helens Gardens, North Hetherington, London; J. R. Ray, 2 Springwell Terrace, Northallerton; W. Fox, 10 Brunswick Row, Dundalk, Ireland; Mrs. Day, Highclerke School, Newbury, Berks; C. Russell, 2 York Buildings, Edinburgh; Miss Moss, 12 Euston Grove, Claughton, Birkenhead; E. Goodwyn, "Lensdene," Church Road, Hanwell; W. H. Littleton, 92 Harwood Road, Fulham; J. Moseley, Fern Lea, Church Street, Milnthorpe, Westmoreland; N. Pentelow, Bendyshe House, Little Yeldhem, by Halstead, Essex; H. H. Harrod, Manor House, Morebath, Tiverton; J. H. Gauldie, 36 Thornton Heath, Hertford; A. B. Gotch, 147 Park, Tottenham; W. Dowdell, 1 Belle Vue Terrace, Aberayron, South Wales; Sergt. F. H. Pannell, Army Pay Corps Barracks, Northampton; H. W. Crisp, 80 Brocklebank Road, Earlsfield, S.W.; Miss Annie Fowler, 120 Union Street, Torquay; C. M. Fleming, High Street, Wanstead; Miss Dorothy Hope, Taverham Rectory, Norwich; Mrs. W. M. Ramsey, 10 College Bounds, Aberdeen; A. W. Keith, 342 Duke Street, Dennistoun, Glasgow; Mrs. A. Neely, Royal Engineers, Stanhope Lines, Aldershot; E. Attwood, 3 Espley Terrace, Marston Road, Stafford; R. H. Scott, Ardebrooke, Andersonstown, Belfast; C. H. Vincent, The Hamlet, Haverhill, Suffolk; W. Shepherd, 50 Sharron Street, Sheffield; Mrs. A. King, 250 Priory Road, St. Denys, Southampton; Alex. Nevin, 6 Connaught Terrace, Lawrence Street, Belfast; Miss Edith Openshaw, Brooklands, Bury, Lancs.; T. Gooden, 19 Bank Street, Bolton; Miss Hutchinson, Beauport Buildings, Hollington, St. Leonards-on-Sea; Miss G. M. Appleby, 6 St. Catherine Road, Grantham, Lincs; J. A. Jeffrey, 45 King Street, South Shields, Co Antrim.

KEY.

24, 27, 40, 60, 80, 81, 44, 84, 74, 6, 57, 127, 54, 107, 15, 94 61, 66, 9, 49, 82, 95, 100, 58, 52, 36, 116, 28, 119, 129, 46, 130, 122, 43, 86, 7, 131, 42, 105, 117, 126, 72, 32, 112, 37, 97, 98, 108, 30, 25, 34, 14, 18, 125, 71, 123, 68, 31, 63, 64, 5, 132, 4, 29, 90, 69, 21, 96, 3, 133, 91, 113, 92, 93, 1, 47, 67, 11, 128, 65, 55, 102, 101, 35, 56, 106, 73, 114, 76, 38, 53, 110, 121, 62, 16, 51, 88, 33, 19, 85, 45, 115, 118, 20, 13, 124, 83, 111, 77, 10, 120, 103, 8, 22, 99, 50, 109, 39, 41, 75, 17, 26, 87, 78, 104, 12, 48, 70, 2, 23, 79, 59, 89.

PYN-KA

THE WONDERFUL METAL POLISHER

The Lustre Lasts!

Pyn-Ka Leaves no Scratches!

Cleans and burnishes gold, silver, plate, copper, brass, nickel, tin, glass, etc., better, quicker, and at less cost of labour and money than any other polish known.

Paste or tablets, 1d. to 6d. All dealers.

NOSE

MACHINES as worn by Nobility. Shape altered permanently by few weeks' wear, from 9/9 each. Red Nose Cure, Medically Approved, 3/9. Pamphlet, "Cause and Prevention," 1/-; particulars for stamp. Mention Paper.
LEES RAY, Specialist, South Castle St., Liverpool.

£20

Hairdressers fitted up. Estimates free.

Tobacconists Commencing. Sell. Guide (259 pages) 3d. How to open a cigar store, £20 to £2,000 Tobacconists Outfitting Co., 186, Euston Road, London. The largest and original house (50 years reputation. Mgr., H. Myers

TOOTH-ACHE

CURED INSTANTLY BY

BUNTER'S NERVINE

Prevents Decay, Saves Extraction, Sleepless Nights Prevented.

Neuralgic Headaches and all Nerve Pains removed by BUNTER'S NERVINE. All Chemists, 1s. 1½d.

SEVEN PRIZE MEDALS.

C. BRANDAUER & Co's CIRCULAR POINTED PENS

These series of pens neither scratch nor spurt. They glide over the roughest paper with the ease of a soft lead pencil. An assorted sample box for 7 stamps from the works, Birmingham.

TRILENE REGD. TABLETS THE ONLY CURE for STOUTNESS Registered by GOVERNMENT Price 2/6

ALL FAT PEOPLE

Readily Reduce Weight and Cure Corpulency Permanently by taking TRILENE TABLETS (Regd.) for a few weeks. They are very agreeable, harmless, and never fail to PRESERVE both HEALTH and FIGURE without change of diet. Reduction begins immediately.

An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

MISS HEYWOOD, 77 Hindhill Street, Heywood, Lancs., says: "I am 21lb. lighter, and my rheumatism also seems cured."

MRS. WEAVER, of Greenpits Villa, Station Road, Ross, Hereford, says: "Am reduced from 13st. 8lb. to 11st."

MR. CANHAM, 87 Alexandra Road, Norwich: "Tablets cured my wife of extreme stoutness; it has never returned."

LADY CONSTANCE CONRAD writes from Wiesbaden: "I am very pleased with the Tablets."

PRINCESS LIECHTENSTEIN writes from Laudsberg, Austria: "Pray send your excellent Tablets directly."

COUNTESS G. FURSTENBERG, Stammheim, Germany, writes: "They act speedily and well."

MR. BUTLER, Surgeon, Hampton Manor, Evesham, says: "My patient lost more than a stone."

Send 2/6 to THE "TRILENE" ASSOCIATION, 66 Finsbury Pavement, London, E.C.

Don't Cough-use

They at once check the Cough and remove the cause.

The Unrivalled

One Lozenge alone relieves. Sold everywhere, Tins 13½d. each.

Keatings Lozenges

PIANOS.

UPRIGHT IRON GRAND.

Complete Iron frame, Brass Pin Plate, Nickel-bolted Wrest Plank, Check Action, Full Trichord, Full Compass, Rivetted Hammers, Handsome Walnut Case, Inlaid Marqueterie Panel, Sconces, Trusses, etc. Tone and touch perfect. Guaranteed 25 years. 28 guineas, at 10/6 per month. Delivered free on payment of 10/6. Approval. Catalogues Free.

ORGANS.

GENUINE AMERICAN.

Imported Direct. Solid Walnut Case, Mirror Top, Music Case, 2 Knee Swells, Mouse and Dust Proof, 8 Stops, 3 Sets of Reeds, 14 Guineas, at 6/- per month. 10 Stops, 3 Sets of Reeds, 2 Octave Couplers. 18 guineas, at 7/- per month. Illustrated Lists Free. Kindly mention this paper.

THE LONDON AND LIVERPOOL PIANOFORTE CO.
Granby St. & Selborne St., LIVERPOOL.
Agents wanted where not represented.

KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR.

WHY INDUCE HEART DISEASE TO CURE YOUR HEAD

When you can get a real safe remedy like KAPUTINE?

Dr. Thurston, Licentiate, of the Royal College of Physicians, writes November 16th: "Knowing the formulæ from which KAPUTINE is compounded, I unhesitatingly recommend its use in preference to crude Antifibrin and other synthetic drugs which, unfortunately for sufferers, are so commonly used for Headache, and which have undoubtedly injurious effects on the Heart, Brain, and Vescicle tissues generally."

NOTHING LIKE KAPUTINE. NOTHING SIMILAR. NOTHING AS GOOD.

All leading Chemists sell it. Packets of 18 doses 1s. Sample 1d.

After 13 Years' Suffering, Cured for 1s.

The Rev. T. TAYLOR, Vicar of St. Bredward, Cornwall, writes: "Owing to a severe accident while riding, my wife has for the past thirteen years been subject to violent attacks of neuralgia. The relief she has experienced from KAPUTINE has been speedy and effectual. KAPUTINE, while it is efficacious in its use, is attended with none of the disagreeable after effects which she has experienced in the case of other drugs."

After 10 Weeks' Suffering, Cured for 1d.

From Rev. J. H. BURN.

DEER RECTORY, MINTLAW, ABERDEEN,
NOVEMBER 8TH, 1897.

"My own cure with one dose of KAPUTINE was marvellous after ten weeks incessant neuralgia.

Used also by Her Grace the Countess of Cavan, Lady Dashwood, The Countess of Munster, Surgeon Lieut.-Col. Baker, etc., etc.

Nothing Similar. Nothing as Good. KAPUTINE CURES HEADACHE IN 10 MINUTES.

If you enclose stamped envelope to A. M. Kaputine Ltd., Huddersfield, you will get free samples by return.

KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR.

YOUR ESTEEMED INQUIRY DULY TO HAND.

P. F.—The best county in England for cycling from an all round point of view is Lincolnshire. The roads are admirably suited to cycling, the scenery is often very beautiful, and there are scores of places of great historic interest.

H. G.—No bird of prey has the gift of song.

OLD STAGER would like to know if I can tell him which feature of the face shows signs of age least.———The nose. Bone and cartilage enter so largely into its construction and determine its characteristics, that it undergoes little perceptible change, as a rule, with the lapse of years. Next to the nose, probably the ears, as a rule, show the fewest and least obvious signs of old age.

W. L. D. asks: "Why do some people stick out the little finger when holding light articles?"———If you will observe closely you will find that it is people generally with short little fingers who do this. Those with such fingers rarely use them except when they grasp with the hand as a whole. In handling an article such as a teacup there seem always to be attempts at balancing the hand by aid of the little finger, in the same way as a fencer balances the rest of his body with his disengaged arm, and at the same time it is kept out of harm's way.

G. M.—There is a very important vestige of the toll system still existing in "the thorough toll" at Newcastle-on-Tyne. The importance of this toll is shown by the fact that it brings in more than £5,000 a year. This also shows what an inconvenience it must be, and the tradesmen of the city are agitating for its abolition. The toll dates from the reign of Henry II., who granted a charter for it, and it has since been confirmed by Act of Parliament.

J. G. J.—Many of the cast-off uniforms of our soldiers are exported to Africa for trading purposes amongst the Kaffirs.

BLACK would like to know where coal is cheapest and where it costs most. This is to settle a friendly dispute.———It is dearest in South Africa, while in China it is cheaper than in any other country in the world. But the march of civilisation and progress is bringing about a change in both places. The supply is increasing in South Africa, thus reducing the price, while in China the coal mines are getting into the hands of Europeans, who are not content with the small profits made by the Chinese out of their hidden stores of fuel.

LAURA writes to ask if there are any species of flowers which give out light.———Several. Nearly every one is familiar with the glow which is given out in the dark by various kinds of fungi. The ordinary nasturtium is another example of this peculiar irregularity, while the common marigold has been seen to glow brilliantly, the light seeming to play over the petals with quick changes. The best time for observing this phenomenon is on a night succeeding a sunny day, for there is no light after rain. The light increases in intensity during July and August.

H. D.—The healthiest spot in the world appears to be a little French village named Aumone. There are only forty inhabitants, twenty-three of whom are over eighty, and one is a centenarian.

O. S.—It is difficult to say exactly how many people in England ride bicycles. I believe the number to be something like a million and a half, at the least.

H. M.—The "terrier" which has puzzled you is the name given to a document that is, or is supposed to be, kept at every church. This document contains particulars of the income of the benefice, especially of glebe lands, which gives rise to the name of "terrier" — from the Latin word "terra."

"WHY is it," asks L. E., "that we never hear of members hissing when they disapprove of certain points in a fellow member's speech in Parliament?"———There is a rule of the House against it. That rule dates as far back as 1604, and is to the effect that whoever hisses or disturbs a man in his speech shall answer for it at the Bar as a breach of order and contempt of the House. This has put a stop to hissing, but there are many notable instances of members being "disturbed in their speech" by other means hardly less objectionable.

K.G.—The ribbon of the Garter is not generally conferred upon peers of lower dignity than earls. The only commoner upon whom the decoration has been bestowed was Sir Robert Walpole, who was Prime Minister during part of the first half of last century.

CYCLIST.—The largest cycling school in the world is probably the "Palais Sport" in Paris. The course is 1,000 yards long. A spiral pathway rises from the main floor to the roof, and is divided into two paths, for ascending and descending. Each pathway is inclosed on both sides by a high screen, which is painted to represent rural scenery.

CRICKET.—The distance between the wickets has never varied since the earliest records of the game; it has always been twenty-two yards.

H. L.—Certainly, if the umpire of a football or cricket match finds he has made a palpably wrong decision, he is at liberty to alter it.

C. T.—There are three hundred and thirty-four deer parks in England.

GERALD.—I know a good deal about bicycles and bicycle tyres, for I have been a keen rider for the past ten years. The tyre you mention is a second grade one. Dunlop's are unquestionably the most trustworthy for your purpose. You are mistaken in believing it is necessary to pump a Dunlop tyre to any particular degree of hardness to suit the state of the road. If you only partly inflate it, the tendency for the tyres to slip on greasy roads is very great, besides which they are liable to puncture and wear out more quickly. The tyres should be pumped so hard that when the rider is on the saddle it should not be depressed at all. Therefore, the amount of pumping depends entirely upon the weight of the rider. You can get a lot of information of this sort from a nicely got-up little pamphlet sent free by the Dunlop people from 14 Regent Street, W.C.

A.—On the average 111 platelayers are killed every year on the railways of the United Kingdom.

R. G. H.—Egypt is the only country in the world where there are more men than women. The male sex in the dominion of the Khedive exceeds the female by 160,000.

R. M. H.—It would be impossible for you to obtain a directory of St. Petersburg, for there is not such a thing in existence.

SHORT STORIES' ADVERTISEMENT RATES.

Single column per inch, per insertion	£0	10	0
Double ,, ,,	1	0	0
Full page inside, facing page of matter, either white paper or 2nd or 3rd page of cover, or back page, per insertion	10	0	0
Half-page ,, ,, ,, ...	5	0	0
Quarter-page ,, ,, ...	2	10	0
Eighth-page ,, ,, ...	1	5	0
Front page, whole ,, ,, ...	12	10	0
,, half	6	5	0

All spaces above one-eighth of a page are charged at per page rate.

Series discount: 5 per cent. for 13, 10 per cent. for 26, 15 per cent. for 52 insertions.

Black blocks are charged 25 per cent. extra. All advertisements are subject to approval. All copy must be sent in by Noon on Tuesday, Jan. 24th, if intended for the Issue on sale Feb. 7th, and dated Feb. 11th. The Proprietors reserve the right to hold over or suspend the insertion of any advertisement without prejudice to other insertions on order. All communications should be addressed to the Advertisement Manager, "Pearson's Weekly" Offices, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Printed and Published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON LTD., at Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

Messrs. C. ARTHUR PEARSON Limited have just published an important New Book of Travel.

THE LAND OF THE PIGMIES.

By Captain GUY BURROWS.

Dedicated, by permission, to His Majesty the King of the Belgians. With Introduction by H. M. STANLEY, M.P.

Demy 8vo, cloth, with over 200 Illustrations. Price 21s.

Captain Burrows, late of the Second Fusiliers, and now Captain Commandant in the service of the Congo Free State, has explored much territory never before visited by white men. The country known as the district of the Upper Uelle lies between the M'Booner River in the north and the Aruwimi in the south. With the exception of the Pigmies, the tribes inhabiting it are all cannibals. The Pigmies are a strange race of undersized men, generally little over four feet in height. Very few travellers have ever seen them, and the author, having lived among them, has had a unique opportunity of studying their strange customs and habits, of which he has now written a most interesting account. A prospectus will be forwarded on application.

MAD HUMANITY; Its Forms: Apparent and Obscure. By Dr. L. FORBES WINSLOW. Large crown 8vo, cloth, with numerous Portraits, price 7s. 6d.

"People who are absolutely certain that they are not insane will read a great deal that will astonish them in Dr. L. Forbes Winslow's grimly attractive volume. It is a book, however, which will make even the sanest reader have grave doubts of his own sanity."—Daily Mail.

THE PILGRIM'S PROGRESS.

With many Full-Page Illustrations, Borders, and Initials, by GEORGE WOLLISCROFT RHEAD, R.E., FREDERICK A. RHEAD and LOUIS RHEAD. Special Preface by the Rev. H. R. HAWEIS, M.A.

Demy 4to, cloth, price 7s. 6d.

The Athenæum says: "These excellent examples of the right way of illustrating Bunyan possess those masculine qualities, that directness, and the robust energy that the themes demand. As to the higher elements we associate under the name of design, there is not the slightest doubt Bunyan, could he study the works of the Messrs. Rhead, would recognise in them a crowning mercy specially reserved till now for himself."

A few copies still remain of the Edition de Luxe, limited to 200 Copies, numbered and signed, printed on hand-made paper, and bound in buckram. Price Two Guineas net.

NEW SIX-SHILLING NOVELS.

THE ADVENTURES OF CAPTAIN KETTLE. By C. J. CUTCLIFFE HYNE, Author of "The Paradise Coal Boat," &c. Illustrated by STANLEY L. WOOD.

THE PHANTOM ARMY. Being the Story of a Man and a Mystery. By MAX PEMBERTON, Author of "Queen of the Jesters," "Kronstadt," &c.

THE SEED OF THE POPPY. By CLIVE HOLLAND, Author of "An Egyptian Coquette," &c.

FORTUNE'S SPORT. By Mrs. C. N. WILLIAMSON, Author of "The Barn Stormers," &c.

THE KNIGHT OF THE GOLDEN CHAIN. By E. D. CHETWODE, Author of "John of Strathbourne."

BROTHERS OF THE PEOPLE. By FRED. WISHAW, Author of "A Russian Vagabond," &c.

TURKISH BONDS; or the Fight of Faith under "The Great Assassin." By MAY KENDALL.

STORIES IN LIGHT AND SHADOW. By BRET HARTE, Author of "Tales of the Pacific Slope," &c.

MORD EM'LY. By W. PETT RIDGE, Author of "Three Women and Mr. Frank Cardwell."

THE KEY OF THE HOLY HOUSE. A Romance of Old Antwerp. By ALBERT LEE, Author of "The Black Disc," &c.

SETTLED OUT OF COURT. By G. B. BURGIN, Author of "Fortune's Footballs," &c. With Frontispiece by JAMES GREIG.

THE MEMBER'S WIFE. By the Hon. Mrs. HENRY CHETWYND, Author of "A Brilliant Woman," "A Dutch Cousin," &c.

THE LOST PROVINCES. (Sequel to "The American Emperor.") By LOUIS TRACY, Author of "The Final War," &c. With 12 illustrations by H. PIFFARD.

THE OPTIMIST. By HERBERT MORRAH. Author of "The Faithful City," &c.

PRISONS AND PRISONERS. By Rev. J. W. HORSLEY, M.A., Author of "Jottings from Jail." Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.

SUITABLE GIFT BOOKS.

PIRATE GOLD. By J. R. HUTCHINSON, Author of "Romance of a Regiment," "Quest of the Golden Pearl," &c. With 8 illustrations by Ernest Smythe. Crown 8vo, cloth, price 5s.

THE GREAT HOUSE OF CASTLETON. By WINIFRED GRAHAM, Author of "When the Birds Begin to Sing," &c. Crown 8vo, cloth, illustrated, price 3s. 6d.

LITTLE MISS ROBINSON CRUSOE. By Mrs. GEORGE CORBETT, Author of the "Adventures of an Ugly Girl," "The Young Stowaway," &c. With Illustrations by A. Kemp Tebby. Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, price 3s. 6d.

PRINCE UNO: Uncle Frank's Visit to Fairyland. Illustrated by W. D. Stevens. Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, gilt edges, price 3s. 6d.
"We feel sure this pleasant fairy story, revised and embellished as it has been by excellent illustrations, will amuse little folk as much as it will touch and interest their elders."—Daily Telegraph,

JUMBLES. By LEWIS BAUMER. With 48 pages illustrated by the Author, printed in colours, and bound in paper boards, with cloth back, price 2s. 6d.
"Mr. Baumer is a clever and vigorous draughtsman, with a true gift of irresponsible fun—of nonsense, in fact—which he is able to express with pencil and with pen."—Academy.

IN A CHINESE GARDEN. By ANNIS LENNOX. Illustrated by Lawson Wood. F'cap. 8vo, price 1s. 6d.
"This is a dainty little book, quite out of the beaten track, and contains a series of pretty stories all about Chinese children. There is a quaintness about them that is charming, and the happy youngster who receives this pretty gift-book will rejoice."—Catholic Times.

LONDON: C. ARTHUR PEARSON LIMITED, HENRIETTA STREET, W.C.

Digitized by Google

"SEN-SEN"

THROAT EASE AND BREATH PERFUME

INVALUABLE TO SINGERS & SPEAKERS

Sold Everywhere. GOOD FOR YOUNG & OLD.

3P per packet.

GRATIS & POST FREE!

A beautifully illustrated Cycling handbook, telling

"ALL ABOUT DUNLOP TYRES FOR 1899."

Now ready, and sent to any address on application.

THE DUNLOP PNEUMATIC TYRE COMPANY LTD.,
ALMA STREET, COVENTRY;
160-166 CLERKENWELL ROAD, LONDON, E.C.

What is the Matter with Your Skin?

Anyway, it doesn't matter much what the matter is, because if you use LILLIE POWDER it will soon be all right again. LILLIE POWDER is a sure cure for Red Faces, Blotches, and indeed all ailments of the Skin. If you try it once you will be more than satisfied. If you go to a chemist or elsewhere for it, be sure that it bears this label. ☛

If there is any difficulty about it, buy it straight from us. This is what other people say.

TESTIMONIALS.

Used for Many Years.—"The Lillie Powder is prepared from my original recipe. I have used it for many years, and recommend it as being most beneficial to the complexion."—Lillie Langtry.

The Very Best.—"I think your new Lillie Powder quite the very best, and you may be pleased to know I have used it ever since I first went on the stage."—Ellaline Terriss.

Most Exquisite.—"I think your new Lillie Powder most exquisite."—Adelina Patti.

Unrivalled for the Skin.—"I guarantee that the Lillie Powder is prepared according to Mrs. Langtry's recipe, and that as a preparation for the skin it is unrivalled, owing to its medicinal qualities."—William Clarkson.

SEND FOR IT AT ONCE.

THREE TINTS—White, Flesh-colour, and Cream.

To be had of all the best Chemists and Hairdressers.

PRICE ONE SHILLING. BY POST, 1s. 2d.

THE LILLIE SYNDICATE (S.S. DEPT.), 3 HENRIETTA STREET, STRAND, LONDON, W.C.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

No. 526. FOR WEEK ENDING JANUARY 28TH, 1899. [ONE PENNY.

Obstinate Indigestion:

Its unpleasant Symptoms, with Illustrations of Cures in chronic and long-standing cases.

You awake in the morning more tired than when you went to bed, with an unpleasant taste in the Mouth, and the Tongue coated and dry. You have no Appetite for Breakfast—even the little food that is taken produces general discomfort, with pain and distension.

During the morning a faint sensation is experienced at the pit of the Stomach. There is a dull, sleepy feeling, and often an attack of Giddiness. The Face is flushed, the Complexion sallow, and the Skin disfigured by blotches. You feel irritable, out of sorts generally, have a dull Headache, and are greatly depressed in Spirits.

Numbers of people are suffering seriously from Indigestion and its results, when one bottle of Guy's Tonic would bring about a prompt and permanent cure. A few doses will do more for a Weak Stomach than a prolonged course of any other medicine. Nothing can be used with so much certainty in obstinate cases of Delicacy; in fact, no one need remain uncured who will carry out the simple instructions which accompany each bottle of Guy's Tonic.

"Suffered Seven Years."

"Tate Schools, Wexford.
"I have received inestimable "benefit from Guy's Tonic. The "medicine has only to be known "to be thoroughly appreciated. "I have been subject to Indigestion for seven or eight years, "and I have never got any real "relief till now.
"H. CANNING, EX. R. W. J."

"Indigestion for 10 Years."

"Netherton Iron Works, "near Dudley.
"Six months ago my Wife was "under the Doctor for a month. "She had been suffering from "Indigestion for ten years; but "I am pleased to tell you that "after taking three or four doses "of Guy's Tonic she says she has "not felt so well for years.
"E. BYWATER."

"Suffered Twenty Years."

"Sutton Bridge.
"My Wife for twenty years has "suffered from Indigestion. She "has been trying Doctors and all "sorts of medicine, but got worse. "This winter she has been very "low-spirited, and the eating of "a very small biscuit only has "caused Pain and Sickness. Seeing your advertisement, she "thought she would try Guy's "Tonic. She did so, and I can "safely say she is better than she "has been for years. Since taking "Guy's Tonic her Appetite has "improved, and she is decidedly "stronger. "J. T. ROSE."

"Suffered Sixty Years."

MR. HENRY SALMON, of Coxley House, Wells, Somerset, writes:

"For sixty years or more I "have suffered from Indigestion, "Wind, and Pain in the Side and "Pit of the Stomach, which at "times made me almost wish I "was dead—in fact, I have often "wished I was out of it. I heard "of Guy's Tonic, took one bottle, "left off Tea, took a glass or two "of cider a day (not more), and "before I had taken the last dose "of Guy's Tonic I was free from "pain. I have had a second "bottle of Guy's Tonic, and am "quite relieved.

"Suffered a Lifetime."

"Bishopstowe, Sussex.
"Having suffered nearly all my "life from Indigestion, and never "having found anything to do "me good till I was advised to "take Guy's Tonic, I am writing "you my grateful Thanks for the "Benefit I have had from Guy's "Tonic, and recommending it to "all my friends.
"M. J. JONES."

Guy's Tonic is a Vegetable Preparation of widely proved value in obstinate and chronic cases of Indigestion, Sluggish Liver, and Nervous Weakness.

Guy's Tonic, price 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. per Bottle, is now on Sale at all Chemists and Stores.

"ALFOSCO" REG. ALLEN FOSTER & CO., "ALFOSCO" REG.

SOLE MAKERS OF THE

'ALFOSCO' COSTUMES.

Buy Direct by Parcels Post from the Leading Firm of London Costumiers.

CLEARANCE SALE. GREAT BARGAINS FOR EVERYBODY.

ALLEN FOSTER & CO. offer at ridiculously low prices, their surplus Stock of last season's designs in Costumes, Mantles, and Costume Skirts. To be cleared in single garments, or large quantities. Price List of Bargains Post Free on Application. Owing to the great appreciation expressed by customers with the BROOCH we have been giving away as a New Year's Gift, we shall have pleasure in continuing to present each customer, during the Sale, with a similar gift.

Design No. 545. 10/6

In sending order, please give measurement round bust (under arms), waist, and length of skirt in front.

All Patterns and Particulars Post Free.

Design No. 94. 10/6

Ladies are invited to call and inspect goods at our Showrooms—
17 ROSCOE STREET, GOLDEN LANE, E.C.
BUSINESS HOURS 9 A.M. TO 6 P.M. SATURDAY 9 A.M. TO 1 P.M.

Design No. 545. 10/6.
The Reefer Costume.—This tailor-cut Costume consists of the Reefer Jacket and Skirt. The Collar is of Velvet, made in the Spécialité Serge (all colours). Price only 10/6. Carriage, 6d. extra. This fashionable Coat and Skirt made in the heavy Amazon Coating (all colours) will be 19/6. Carriage, 9d. extra.
Patterns and Sketches Post Free.

Design No. 94. 10/6.
Velvet-trimmed Costume.—Consists of fashionably-made Skirt and Bodice, tight fitting with full front, tastefully trimmed with Velvet and Pretty Buttons. GREAT VALUE FOR MONEY. This Costume is made in the Spécialité Serge, in Black, Navy, Electric, Blue, Blue-Green, Fawn, Brown, Myrtle, Crimson, Bronze-Green, and Purple. Costume complete, 10/6; Carr 6d. extra. Skirt only, 5/6. Carr., 5d. extra.

ALLEN FOSTER & CO.,

The London Manufacturers,
17 ROSCOE STREET, GOLDEN LANE, LONDON, E.C.

Digitized by Google

A Safeguard.

In wintry weather, Bovril—unlike the artificial stimulants so commonly resorted to—rallies the system up to resisting point. It supplies a store of warmth from a store of strength. It nourishes the blood and makes brain, bone, and muscle. It is the surest safeguard against colds, chills, and kindred ailments, and has proved invaluable in arresting incipient influenza.

BOVRIL

COFFEE WITHOUT DREGS.

GOOD! ITS MASON'S

MASON'S ESSENCE OF COFFEE AND CHICORY

EXPELS THE OLD METHOD

An agreeable, stimulating and sustaining beverage. Instantly prepared and most economical. Equal to the very finest coffee. Highly recommended by the Medical Profession.

Of all Grocers and Stores, or a Sample Bottle post free for 9 stamps.

ALSO TRY
MASON'S WINE ESSENCES
AND
MASON'S EXTRACT OF HERBS.

Sample Bottle of either sent free for 9d.; two assorted 1/3; three assorted 1/8.
Agents Wanted.

Manufacturers—
NEWBALL & MASON, NOTTINGHAM.

"WORTH A GUINEA A BOX."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

FOR ALL
BILIOUS & NERVOUS DISORDERS,
SUCH AS
Sick Headache, Constipation,
Weak Stomach, Impaired Digestion,
Disordered Liver & Female Ailments.
SALE NOW OVER SIX MILLIONS YEARLY.

In Boxes, 1s. 1½d., and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.

Prepared only by the Proprietor,
THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.
Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

No. 526.] [One Penny.

For the Week ending January 28th, 1899.

A Shattered Idol.

I was making my way home from the East by easy stages, and had accepted the invitation of my friend Donald Carmichael to pay him a visit in Florence, where he had made his home for the past five or six years.

One afternoon, when we were on our way to the lovely heights of Fiesole, my attention was arrested by a shop window containing the most exquisite bits of sculpture, as well as plaster casts of the best antique works, that were marvels of skill and artistic taste.

"Stop a minute, Carmichael," I exclaimed, dashing into the shop.

The proprietor, a handsome, stately man, no longer young, and yet in full possession of his manly vigour, with courteous, dignified manners, rose from his comfortable arm-chair in which he had been enjoying his siesta, and waited upon me with a grandiloquent reserve that was totally unlike the usual avidity of Italian shopkeepers.

I completed my purchases and he bowed me to the door with the air of a prince. Donald was waiting outside in evident impatience, and we had hardly gone a yard before he burst out: "Conceited blackguard, that! I should like to duck him in a horse-pond!"

I tried to defend my stately art dealer by saying:

"He is evidently above his position. He ought to have been a sculptor himself, not a shop-keeper."

"Oh, you don't know Fabiani! He's beneath contempt. His whole success and well-being—he has the best business of the kind in Florence—are founded upon a social crime!"

"A crime!" I repeated incredulously, struck by the bitter emphasis of his words.

"Yes, a crime. It's rather a long story, but it will beguile the tedium of waiting for the electric tram, if you care to hear it. Thirty years ago, there lived in an old

EDITED BY C. Arthur Pearson

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

palace not far from here the Marchese di Fiorelli and his young daughter, Gianetta. They were the last of their race, and had inherited the ruin wrought by their reckless ancestors as the only appendage to their ancient name.

"The household consisted merely of an old female servant, who did the marketing and prepared their frugal meals, and her son, whose duties were various; the principal of them being the honour of taking the Marchese and his daughter for their daily afternoon drive in the old carriage upon which were emblazoned the arms of the House of Fiorelli, drawn by an ancient steed, whose condition seemed to match the fallen fortunes of its master.

"No one but themselves knew the daily sacrifices that were made to keep up this one outward symbol of departed glory. It was the only joy of the old man's heart, the one bright spot in the darkness of his beggary, to take his seat in his family coach and drive to the public gardens, where he would dismount, and, taking his daughter on his arm, walk up and down listening to the music for an hour or so.

"And Gianetta had her own delight in these daily expeditions, for their way lay past a sculptor's studio, and at the large window was ever to be seen the handsome face and faultless form of Beppo Fabiani, the lazy model-apprentice, who, in those days, was fonder of casting love glances than sticking to his work.

"Pretty Gianetta had known nothing but age and unlovely poverty in her short life, and the ardent glances shot from Beppo's lustrous eyes stirred her foolish heart, till she looked back with bashful tenderness, and looks grew into smiles and silent greetings.

"At last they met, and the stolen fruit was sweet to her guileless inexperience. Old Caterina, the housekeeper, hurt her foot, and was unable even to hobble to market, so the Marchese was roused out of his habitual study of the family archives so far as to give his consent to Gianetta going out to do the marketing alone, provided she kept clear of the more crowded streets.

"For some days she obeyed his instructions, and then the longing for change, the thirst for excitement, which is so strong in youth, the desire to realise her beautiful dream, to approach the object of her constant thoughts, drove her wilful little feet past the sculptor's door. It was mid-day. Nearly everyone was taking their siesta, and the street was deserted. There could be no harm when there was no one about—but Beppo was lounging under the awning at the open door.

"Her heart beat wildly, and she lowered her eyes as she passed him, though she could feel his burning glance upon her, and before she had gone many steps she turned and stole a furtive look at the hero of her dreams. He smiled and slowly started to follow her.

"She quickened her pace, and, like a frightened fawn, almost ran to escape from that which, in her heart, she desired so earnestly, till she found herself in a quiet little street that ended in blank wall with Beppo standing before her.

"He addressed her in a tender, deferential way, and bent to kiss her hand as if she had been his liege lady. Fascinated by his beauty and subtle charm, she gave herself up to the joy of his presence, and her innocent day-dream merged into the love of her life.

"They met again, almost daily in the heat of the noonday sun, and Gianetta's love grew with each meeting. To Beppo it was a new sensation to find himself in the society of a high-born girl, who combined with her patrician charm the simplicity of a peasant maid, and soon his ambition and cupidity were aroused. The daughter of a Marchese, who drove by every day in his own carriage, would surely be a good match for him, Beppo Fabiani, who had only his beauty to recommend him.

"In a few weeks he began to talk of marriage, gently, insinuatingly, with hints at the alternative of an eternal separation that made the girl ready to make any sacrifice for him, and though Gianetta knew her father too well to hope for his consent to such an alliance, she trusted to his fatherly love to pardon the deed when done.

"Beppo's cunning soon found a plan, and it was arranged that on the following Sunday she was to feign a headache and remain in the carriage while her father took his stroll in the gardens. As soon as he was out of sight, Giannetta was to slip out and join her lover at their trysting place, where he would have a hired conveyance in readiness to take them to the village of Rifredi, and from there they would appeal to the Marchese.

"All went well, and the afternoon sun was pouring into the little inn parlour where the lovers were rejoicing in their success, when the tall, spare figure of the Marchese darkened the low doorway. His coachman had told him something was wrong, and they had set off in pursuit as soon as possible.

"Gianetta was so intoxicated with her love and admiration for the handsome Beppo, that she was blind to the grief and anger in her father's eyes, and sprang forward to receive his blessing on the union to be so shortly consummated.

"The grave old man put her gently from him, and bade her wait in an adjoining room while he spoke to her companion. He closed the door carefully behind her to save her from the pain of hearing the interview, never realising the difference between those ramshackle walls and the solid masonry of his own palace.

"'And now, sir,' he said calmly, turning to his would-be son-in-law, who was standing in an easy, graceful pose near the window, 'you have helped my daughter into this romantic situation, but you will, of course, see that it is an impossible one?'

"'I love your daughter—and pray—' began Beppo.

"'None of that nonsense,' interrupted the Marchese sternly. 'Are you in a position to make a home for her? You must understand clearly that I can give her no dowry, save her honourable name.'

"'We should not want much,' faltered Beppo, evidently taken aback, 'only just enough to start me in business.'

"'I am utterly ruined,' continued the old man. 'The little I could raise might serve to give you a start alone, but not as a married man.'

"'What do you mean, Eccellenza?'

"'I mean that I will compensate you for your disappointment on condition that you never seek to approach my daughter again. I must have your written promise.'

"Gianetta listened for the indignant refusal that she believed would burst from her lover's lips; but, instead, her heart was chilled and her love tortured by a base haggling over the terms of the bargain. At last the sum was agreed upon, the time and place of payment were fixed, and one of the men left the room.

"Was it Beppo or her father? She neither knew nor cared. She hated them both equally for the time, and sank upon the hard couch with her hands pressed to her ears lest she should hear more jarring sounds.

Digitized by Google

"When she came to herself her father was bathing her temples, and said gently:

"'Come home, my child.'

"She let him do with her what he would, and they drove back to the city through the sweet-scented summer's night in the shaky old carriage with its time-honoured coat-of-arms on the panels.

"She leant back in hard, tearless misery, till the old man took her hands in his and said in broken tones:

"'Yes, my little one. Men are base—worse than the beasts of the field, sometimes, in their sordid cruelty.'

"Then she knew how his proud heart had suffered too, and that the outward calm with which he had received the blow was born of a series of life-long humiliations. She pressed her burning lips to his cold, withered hand, and nestled close to his side till they reached home.

"Gianetta kept her room for some days after this, and when she again resumed her place as mistress of the house she found her father had discontinued his daily drives. Upon inquiry she discovered that both horse and carriage and all that appertained to them had been sold the day after that memorable excursion to Rifredi."

* * * * *

A week or so after Donald Carmichael had told me this pathetic story, he took me to dine with a great friend of his, "the most fascinating woman in Florence" as he called her. The Marchesa Rudolfi, the rich widow of a man who had died in the War of Independence, was nearer fifty than forty, and she employed no artifice to conceal the advance of years, wherein, perhaps, lay part of her charm.

She lived in the best possible style, and her well-appointed house at once suggested the atmosphere of home, just as she herself invited confidence. There was that in her genuine good-fellowship that made you long to tell her your troubles, and from certain lines in her face, you knew she had passed through the fire of pain.

Our conversation after dinner turned upon social pleasures, and I remarked upon the apparent fondness of the Florentiners for displaying themselves in gorgeous equipages day after day and hour after hour.

"How is it one never sees you grace the gay throng, Eccellenzia?" I asked lightly.

"I do not keep a carriage," she replied quickly, with a painful contraction of her expressive features.

As we were walking home I mentioned the incident to Carmichael.

"It was an unfortunate topic. Her maiden name was Gianetta di Fiorelli," he answered quietly.

Then I remembered where I had seen her before. It was in a bookseller's shop. She came in and asked for a classical work, and while the man was finding it she took up a new volume in a red cover lying on the counter and glanced at the title.

In a moment her lips curled and she threw it down in disdain. After she had left the shop I was curious enough to look and see what had evoked her scorn. It was a work by a popular author, entitled, "The History of a Passion," and I had hardly laid the book down when she had re-entered the shop, and was asking for the very novel she had so lately disdained.

Did she cherish any tender regret for the passion of her youth, as she did penance for the sacrifice her father had made to save her and the honour of their race?

MARY FERMOR.

THE LILY MAID.

WING TEE had come a long distance to cast her lot among us, and in coming she had learnt many things; among others, that what may be mere amusement to a man is fatal to a woman. Huie Chan had incumbered our shores many years, and he also had learnt a few things, but the one was the learning of the woman, while the other was only the learning of the man.

Before adjusting this newly-acquired assortment of miscellaneous learning, Wing Tee set about to accomplish her very laudable purpose in coming to our coast. The Australian missionaries who had penetrated into Wing's domain had lived on the fat of the land, and had introduced their English religion. They had, furthermore, sought to abolish many objectionable native customs, notably the worship of ancestors. In fact, after living among the Australians for a time, Wing soon came to understand that reverence or even common respect for one's parents or ancestors was a thing quite unheard of in the western world, and there were many other prospects quite as alluring.

The good missionaries had made much of the youthful Wing Tee. They had taught her to read and write, and had instructed her in their religion, and had finally declared her converted from the faith of her fathers. Then it was decided that she should be educated to become a missionary, too; accordingly, several struggling foreign missionary societies were saddled with the responsibility and expense of educating the ambitious young Wing in order that she might some day return to her own country and work among her people. And she must be transported to Sydney to be educated.

The lady managers of the foreign missionary board devoted themselves gladly to the care and culture of the Chinese girl, and were well repaid by her industry on becoming Australianised. But, unfortunately, aside from being industrious, Wing Tee was very fair.

* * * * * *

She was pleased to find such a charming bit of Pekin set down in this big city To her surprise, there were the same people, the same manners and customs, the same language, and the same delightful odours—the foreign devils called them nauseous smells—that she had left in her dear Pekin. But her one all-absorbing thought was to study and learn so that she might be a missionary, and go back to her own people and live on the fat of the land.

Digitized by Google

The lady missionaries watched her rapid progress with great pride, and remarked her sound conversion when she repudiated with a fitting horror the heathen practice of destroying the superfluous daughters of a family, and cheerfully accepted the civilised doctrine of the eternal condemnation of unbaptised infants. She was rapidly becoming enlightened.

* * * * *

Huie Chan made this discovery one morning on his way up Sacramento Street, when looking along the high balconied windows blossoming with Chinese lilies, he saw among the round little yellow faces of the flowers another face, somewhat larger, but scarcely less round or less yellow than they. Such a discovery, to be sure, is not unusual. In fact, some such discovery is the inevitable first act of every human comedy; it began with Adam, and will probably be the last thing to stop when time shall cease to be. If both the discoverer and the discovered are foolish, it usually ends in a romance; if only one is foolish and the other wise, it may result in a tragedy; but if both are wise, it usually ends in—nothing at all.

In this case it was not Huie Chan who was wise. He spent dreaming days and sleepless nights wondering who this "lily-maid," as he fondly called her, might be. As for Wing, she had not seen his fatuous smile when he looked up, and had only noticed as he passed that he was fat and walked like a duck.

Huie Chan was a prosperous barber with a flourishing fish-stall in the rear of his shop, and as the lily-maid was always at her window when he passed, he could attribute no more worthy object for her being there than to watch for him; consequently, one morning, instead of continuing on his way past the sweetshop, the restaurant, the basket-maker, to his own little hole-in-the-wall, with its mixture of soap, fish and pomades, he stopped at the low-browed doorway, and made his way up to the door that corresponded with a certain window.

Wing Tee was surprised. She looked up from her book, still conning in her mind the ten commandments, and was not pleased to see her visitor. Being a man, Chan was capable of seeing only one side of a situation, and that his own. He was glad to be there, therefore the lily-maid must be glad to have him there; but the book was not closed, and Wing Tee's eyes were raised only occasionally to answer some platitude, for—she was learning: "Thou shalt not make unto thee any graven image."

The first visit was not a great success, nor the next; but Chan, nothing daunted, persevered morning, noon, and night.

Finally, Miss Wing was forced to tear her mind from the contemplation of her "thou shalt nots" long enough to consider ways and means of bringing Chan's attentions to a stop. She might lock the door—yes, and to make sure she would tack up a notice, a little pink card, which should say in black characters, "Please do not disturb me."

Accordingly, the appeal for peace was posted on the door at Chan's usual hour of intrusion. And scarcely had the sound of the hammer ceased when Mr. Chan came puffing up the stairs.

"This," he said to himself, "must be intended for some of those babbling lady missionaries, although it does happen to be written in very good Pekinese."

But although Chan was ponderous of build, he was nimble of wit. The door was securely locked, but the transom was open, and through it came the sound of a little smothered giggle.

A table near the door offered the solution, a chair left in the hall made the second step quite easy, if only the table could be induced to bear the double weight.

* * * * *

Aha! his prayer-wads had not stuck for nothing. The table creaked and groaned, but, nevertheless, lent itself to his purpose, and once mounted thereon he could almost reach the transom; then, with the chair on the top of the table, he could put his head quite into the room. That "love laughs at locksmiths" is doubtless as true in the east as in the west, but the oriental laugh unfortunately has not always the desired effect upon the occidental lock.

As poor Chan had expected, the lily-maid was in her usual place by the window, her eyes glued to her book. Giving himself a moment to enjoy in anticipation her surprise at seeing him, he prepared to make his best bob—a bow was impossible—when, to his horror, the jar brought down the transom. A sudden wriggling to free himself sent the table and chair to the floor with a crash, and brought the transom down tighter on his precious neck.

The lily-maid sat motionless. Another wriggle and another tightening. A gentle, gurgling sound finally caused the lily-maid to raise her eyes, but she did not jump nor scream. She surveyed the intruder with unwonted interest. The staring eyes were fixed on her in an agony of appeal. He was certainly very fat; the eyes were scarcely more goggle than usual, and the face, always ugly, was not much worse in purple tones than yellow.

If she made an outcry, and called someone to his rescue, he would perhaps be sufficiently recovered in a few days to continue his visits; if she did nothing, he could not last more than a few moments longer, and she would then be able to pursue her catechism lessons uninterrupted.

The gurgling thing in the transom still followed her with beseeching eyes, the purple tones grew darker and spotty, then the eyes rolled up in a most unpleasant manner, showing a lower rim of white. When the tongue began to loll out of the half open mouth, the lily-maid lost interest in the Thing. Then the gurgling subsided into a faint, spasmodic puffing, and finally ceased altogether.

When satisfied there was no danger of any further interruption from what had once been Chan, she turned her back upon It, and bent her eyes upon her book, the gift of the lady missionaries, for she had reached the sixth now, and repeated to herself triumphantly: "Thou shalt not kill! Thou shalt not kill!"

FRANK GRIMSHAW.

Digitized by Google

An Ungentlemanly Tiger.

THE royal Malay tiger is no gentleman. If he were, the following would never have been told.

Punda-Tsang was an innkeeper. He was sole proprietor of the Ballawari-Dak, which is a very big name for a very small native hotel about sixty miles north of Penang, and on the high road to the Bukit, or hill-country. The quaint little structure clung to the mountain side like a swallow's nest, high over the jungle-bedded Sungei, whose foaming, crashing torrents came down from the upper mountains like an endless charge of white cavalry to the sea.

Punda was a good sort of a Malay, which means a bad sort of anything else. That is, he would plunder only on the securest principles, and never quarrel with a bigger man nor a better armed one than he. In this he differed from other Malays, who would plunder and knife upon no principle or provocation whatever, if they thought there was a ten-anna piece to be gained.

But a deeper reading of this prosperous Boniface of the jungle revealed the fact that he was capable of love, yes, even a tender human affection; and that little Iali, his five-year-old daughter, was the object of a worship in his heart even more fervent than that which he bestowed upon the five home-made clay gods before which, in a dark corner of the Dak, he burned a vast amount of thought ill-smelling stuff.

The second year of Tsang's married life had hardly begun when his beautiful wife was bitten by a yellow viper while gathering healing herbs down in the valley. When they found the poor creature she was dying. This calamity the bereaved husband regarded as a direct visitation of the clay gods in the corner; only the day before had he robbed a hunter of his rifle, leaving the poor fellow to make his way unarmed down to the sea, where he ran upon a pair of vicious species of Malay chimpanzee, in fleeing from which he fell over the cliff and was dashed to pieces. And Punda-Tsang always felt that that yellow viper was sent direct from the land of judging gods to avenge the blood of the poor hunter.

But there was one thing that mitigated the harshness of this vengeance—the presence of the little baby girl, whom he tenderly cherished, and whom he called Iali, which is to say "forgiven." But even were not the little creature a messenger of forgiveness to the penitent savage heart, she was more than worthy of his worship and love.

This child of the tropic forest was restless and agile as a young panther, with lustrous black eyes, and a wild, wayward nature, much spoilt by the wayfarers and fawned upon by the coolies that swarmed about the compound.

One day two British naval officers stopped at the Dak on their way down from a hunt in the hill country. We were seated under the palms before the bungalow after tiffin, smoking cheroots, while I listened to their exploits with interest.

Suddenly four native Malays approached, wheeling a live tiger in a clumsey wooden cage, and halted before the Dak. They were going to dispose of him to a naturalist down on the coast, who had a method of killing and stuffing animals by which the marvellous lustre of their skins was preserved.

The animal was certainly a magnificent specimen. If you have never seen a live tiger fresh from the jungle, take my word for it, the ordinary caged tiger at shows is as much like the former as tinned strawberries are like the fresh, lustrous fruit of June or July. The officers thought so, too, as they decided to buy him, and take him home for presentation to the Zoo.

They bought the animal, set the natives' hearts rejoicing, and started down the coast, while Punda-Tsang, not content with exacting fifty per cent. commission from the poor fellows for using his Dak for a tiger mart, committed the meanest act of his life.

He slyly sawed one of the cage bars nearly through in four places. Then he went to work, planning to waylay the tiger on his way back to his haunts after he had broken loose, which he knew would happen before the officers could get many miles down the valley.

He quietly pursued his planning until late at night, when he heard upon good authority that the tiger had broken his cage and nearly killed one of his owners. Then he prepared to put his plans into action.

Here we reach the illustration of the first-mentioned fact, of which Tsang was ready to take advantage; that the Malay tiger is no gentleman. He knew that the beast will never walk up leisurely and take his bite, but that the very moment he smells blood he will drop flat, and, even if the feast is a mile away, will begin a slow, creeping journey towards it, wasting hours, perhaps, and working up a terrific hunger in the meantime.

When he has approached within twenty feet of the prize, quivering with desire and terrible with greed, he will leap into the air like a cannon-ball and plunge down upon his victim.

Punda-Tsang knew all this, so he dug a pit down in the valley, constructed a network of branches over it, and laid a quarter of a bullock upon it. Then he waited for the tiger to scent the blood and make his slow, crawling journey, knowing that when he had made the grand twenty-foot leap he would go crashing through the network into the pit below.

Then Tsang planned he would starve the beast, let down a cage baited with more fresh meat, and, sliding the bars from above, haul the captured tiger out and sell him over again. All of this might have happened, but it didn't. Events somewhat strange and more terrible for Punda-Tsang intervened, and upset his arrangements.

As little Iali was the innkeeper's constant solace and companion, she went with him to the pit-digging, her father explained to her the manner of capturing the "four-footed jungle-god."

With the appearance of the new moon, that mascot of the Orientals, the pit was baited. For two days nothing was heard of the tiger, and Punda-Tsang began to fear that he had gone back to the hills by another route.

Digitized by Google

On the afternoon of the third day I sat on the cliff's edge, watching the mists rise from the roaring river bottom, a phenomenon which always accompanies the closing day. Suddenly there was a shuffling of sandals about the compound, and I knew that something extraordinary was taking place. I turned quickly, the big form of Punda-Tsang, the innkeeper, burst upon me suddenly, his flat face as pallid as a demon's, ferocious, but with the ferocity of nameless fear.

"Iali!" he cried hoarsely. 'Have you seen Iali?"

"No!" I replied, almost in a whisper.

He did not wait, but sped towards the so-called bullock-sheds, which were really caves cut in the solid rock beyond the Dak. I had become attached to the child, whose wonderful beauty had charmed, and whose weird ways mystified me. But I had never been alone with her, knowing that any accident happening to Iali while in my keeping would result seriously to me—perhaps cost me my life.

The coolies were flying hither and thither, making the air ring with their loud wails. Such agitation on the part of these vagabonds roused me to the realisation of the child's danger. Suddenly I turned my eyes and thoughts in the direction of the ravine where the tiger trap lay. I recalled vividly the child's interest in the "jungle-god," who was to be captured in the deep pit, and, knowing the little creature's absolute fearlessness, thought that, acting upon some childish impulse, she might have strayed down the narrow path to the pit.

I dropped over the ledge, soon reaching the pathway by a short cut. As I penetrated the jungle, now suffused with mist in the ruby glow of the perspiring day, I realised with what risk to myself I was entering this dangerous spot, all unarmed.

I was still debating whether or not to return for a weapon of defence when, as I leapt over a soft spot in the soft clay, I saw two footprints that struck terror into my heart; one was that of a tiger, the other belonged to a little child.

I dropped down beside them. No; there was no mistaking them, so clear and fresh were both. I rose to my feet, my head whirling, my ears half deafened by the noise of the jungle insects and the increasing roar of that river beyond. Then I crept forward, scarcely daring to breathe, my heart beating faster and faster with apprehension.

The distance to that tiger-pit seemed to be doubled, and the time that elapsed before reaching it everlasting. The crackling of the leaves and twigs on the moss beneath my feet added to my trepidation. Almost before I realised it I had reached the big trap, and then I stopped short, thrilled by a sound.

I looked up. Through the deepening mists and intervening boughs I saw the little child-figure of Iali creeping out upon the withered branches over the pit.

For an instant I had no power to move, or dare I speak lest, overcome by sudden fright, the frail little one might lose her foothold. Suddenly a new horror disclosed itself. What were those two glaring, cold, yet fiery points just beyond the pit, burning their way through the shadows?

Heavens! It was the tiger! He was lying flat on the ground, couchant, paws extended, quivering, ready for the fatal spring!

In moments like these one's reasoning powers become superhuman. I saw that in all probability either Iali or I was to be sacrificed, which one depended merely upon the caprice of the wild beast. I had heard that the calm, steady, fearless stare of a human being is more terrifying to wild animals than guns that kill. On the instant I resolved to practise it; it was my only expedient. So I stared at those two coldly bright and glowing points of light like a madman, without a quiver, without a doubt.

Suddenly I saw the little figure waver on the dead branches over the mouth of the pit, and then—oh, horrors! With a weak cry poor little Iali lost her foothold and slipped through the yielding boughs into the cave beneath.

For a moment all was silent. Then I heard her childish prattle. The soft sand had broken Iali's fall, and saved her life, while I was brought face to face with the most awful problem of my life.

For hours, as it seemed, I stood like a pillar of stone, the sweat pouring down my neck, my tongue hot and parched. One show of fear would, I knew, be fatal. The "jungle-gods" are keen, like demons, measuring strength with man. How long could I keep up this maddening strain? How long could I force upon this beast the illusion of my superior will?

All at once, as I stood like one in a trance, facing this growing problem, I was conscious of a stir in the reeds and underbush at my right hand. Though the sound caused me to tremble, I dare not take eyes from the crouching monster beyond.

The next instant, a strange huge shape crept stealthily out of the underwood, and advanced into the clearing toward the pit—a ponderous black monster with the body of a beast, but lifting through the grass the head and shoulders of a human colossus. It was an enormous ourang-outang.

The tiger crouched lower. He seemed to be nonplussed, as stunned by the intrusion of this huge interloper as I was. In silence he transferred his burning gaze to the ourang-outang.

Advancing to the very edge of the pit, the huge ape slipped, but he recovered. Sly beast! He saw that the branches were only a blind. Then he walked round the edge of the trap, and knelt down like a human being, slowly, deliberately reaching out his long hairy arm till his giant hand clutched that bullock bone.

Oh, what joy that calm, providential deed brought to my heart!

Then, to my intense relief, the ourang-outang slowly dragged the great mass of flesh off the network of the branches to the solid ground.

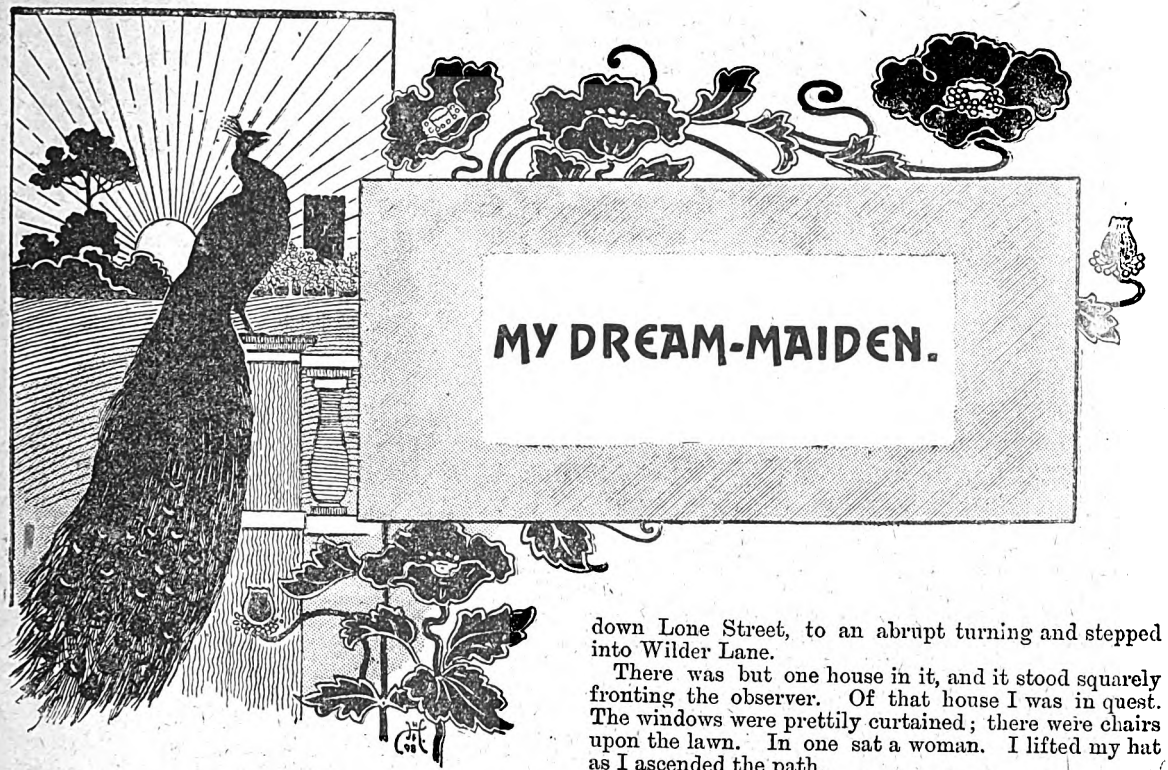
For a moment longer the gleam of those two terrible eyes followed the unsuspecting pilferer. Then came a rustle, a strange shriek like sudden thunder, a bound, and a roar, and the "jungle-god" had sprung into the air, and came down like a flashing avalanche full upon the broad body of the kneeling ape. A single paw struck the huge creature in the small of the back, and never shall I forget the sound of that blow, which broke the bones of the victim's spine like a cannon ball.

With an almost human groan, the preserver of my life, and of hers whom I came to save, gave up the booty, together with his own life. Then the tiger, with a final flash of the eyes full into my own, snatched up the meat in his jaws, and glided off into the thick of the jungle.

I have often wondered since how things would have turned out if that tiger had been a gentleman.

GEORGE DRUMMOND.

Digitized by Google



MY DREAM-MAIDEN.

I WAS disgusted with boarding houses; I could not afford to live at an hotel; I was engaged upon some literary work, and the atmosphere of the boarding house, where I had a particular peg on the hat-rack, and a particular girl to "make eyes" at me, was not a favourable atmosphere in which to condense in an attractive form the ideas and fancies that chased each other through my brain.

Seated one night at my window, looking through the evening newspaper—it was early spring and the days were lengthening—I seemed irresistibly drawn to the column devoted to advertisements for the sale of real estate. This was queer, for I had no interest in real estate, but, yielding to the impulse, I read every advertisement. Such splendid bargains; such glorious attractions! Yet, strange to say, in the whole lot there was but one that appealed to me. It was this:

FOR sale, a small house in quiet neighbourhood in good repair and comfortably furnished. Apply to Walker & Co., 7 Elm Street.

I read this through three times. I cut it out.

Visions of a home of my very own; an undisturbed retreat into which I could retire and remain until my work was finished, ran riot through my brain. I could read no more in the paper. I paced up and down the room and keeping pace with my steps were the words, "For sale, a small house in a quiet neighbourhood, in good repair and comfortably furnished." I tried to think of something else. It was of no use. I went to bed and lay awake thinking.

It was morning. I was a little way out in the country, far enough out to see the trees putting on their tender robes of green, to hear the birds and the running waters. I looked up and saw the sign, "Lone Street." I passed down Lone Street, to an abrupt turning and stepped into Wilder Lane.

There was but one house in it, and it stood squarely fronting the observer. Of that house I was in quest. The windows were prettily curtained; there were chairs upon the lawn. In one sat a woman. I lifted my hat as I ascended the path.

"I beg your pardon," said I. "I thought the house was unoccupied. I have the key."

"It is unoccupied," the woman said, still sitting in the chair.

I noticed that she was small, almost childish in build. A heavy mass of dark hair framed an oval face, thoughtful, intelligent, serious. The eyebrows were arched, the eyes a greenish-grey. The nose straight and slender, the mouth firm, with a dimple in one corner and a pitiful droop in the other, as if Fate had not dealt altogether kindly with her.

"And you?" I queried.

"Don't mind me. You will get used to me. I shall sit in this chair as I have sat night after night waiting—waiting for someone who never comes. I shall sit at the table. I shall sit at the window. I shall lie on the bed. I shall run up and down the stairs. I shall sing sometimes, I shall write and write and write. Do you have fancies? Sit down and talk with me."

I sat down. I could not take my eyes off the woman's face. She was singularly fascinating to me. I forgot my errand. I only knew that when I turned the corner of Lone Street into Wilder Lane, I had left discontent behind me. Here on the verandah with this woman of whose existence I knew nothing an hour before, I felt uplifted, mentally and spiritually. Life was indeed worth living—of which at times I had entertained doubts.

We talked. I cannot remember all we said. We talked like people who have known each other for years: who trust each other. I revelled in the interchange of thought; my life had been so solitary. I reached out my hand to clasp hers, which rested on the arm of the chair; a tiny hand with long fingers, unringed. I dropped the key. It fell with a tinkling sound. I started—

Digitized by Google

"You never slept so sound before," said my landlady.

The sun was streaming into the window of my room. There was the unmistakable odour of a boiled dinner in the process of construction.

"For sale, a small house, in a quiet neighbourhood." Of course I went there after my dream. I had had many strange dreams in my lifetime, but I could not recollect so impressive a vision as that of the house and the woman in Wilder Lane.

"I am sorry," said the suave Mr. Walker, of Walker & Co., "that I cannot take you out there in my carriage. I am alone to-day and tied down here."

"I can find it," I replied, with an inward rejoicing that the voluble agent could not accompany me. My dream was hanging over me, not disagreeably. I felt certain that I should have some adventure.

It was a beautiful morning. The buds were swelling on the trees; the air was mild; the sky a soft blue with fleecy clouds floating in its cerulean depths. I found Lone Street without difficulty. It seemed very familiar. I had purposely refrained from making any inquiries regarding the history or ownership of the house I was seeking.

At the end of Lone Street there was an abrupt turn, facing me was the house of my sleeping vision! I fully expected to see the woman of my dream sitting there near the front door. I was woefully disappointed, yet there was an air of occupancy about the place, and I foolishly imagined that she had gone inside for a moment. I waited expectantly, idly swinging the key.

I waited five minutes, ten minutes, fifteen minutes, then I went slowly up the path and rang the bell. With the impression strong upon me that there was someone inside the house, I dared not turn the key in the lock and enter. I could swear that I heard steps upon the stairs. Imagination plays strange freaks at times. I was wrong.

With the feeling that I was an intruder, a housebreaker, I turned the key with a trembling hand and looked in. I listened for a challenge from the inside; none came. I entered, shutting the door behind me, and found myself in a small hall, at the foot of a straight flight of stairs.

Still feeling an intruder, I went cautiously about, peering into every room before I entered it. I had never been in a house with such a look of homeliness, such cosy comfort, such a pure, sweet atmosphere as here! It was simply but tastefully furnished. The windows were open in every room. I never saw a house with so many windows. Windows in the halls, on the staircases; windows opening into tiny balconies, just large enough for two.

My progress through the house was slow, for I expected every minute to hear some one cry "Halt!" I expected—I hoped most earnestly—to see the dream-maiden. I lingered and listened. A door closed. I leant over the staircase, and I saw nothing; the wind was teasing me.

Having no reasonable excuse for remaining longer, and fully satisfied in my mind that I should return, I left the house reluctantly. Right round the corner in Lone Street a woman stood at the gate. A tall, gaunt woman, large-boned, and plain-featured.

"You have been to inspect the Wilder Lane house?" she asked.

"Yes; and you?—do you own it?"

She laughed. "No; I am the caretaker. I live here. Every day I must do the housekeeping there as if the house were occupied. I shall be glad when someone moves in. Have you a family?"

"No. To tell the truth, I had not thought of the housekeeping. It has to be done; it is one of the necessary evils of life. Could you do it—do it just the same as you do now? It seems so sweet and wholesome there. It seems like home. I never had a real bonâ fide home; mine have all been shams, make-believes."

"I would do it," she interrupted. "Have you bought it?"

"Bought it! I have not even talked with the agent about it. Do you know its history?" said I; "every house has a history."

"Yes, I—"

"Don't tell me! Don't ever tell me. You may think it strange, but to me a house has individuality. I respect its past life. If it is best for me to know its history it will be revealed to me."

The tall, gaunt woman looked at me curiously, but said nothing. In her mind I was not quite all there, I felt certain.

May Day found me installed in the house as owner. My arrangements for housekeeping were delightful. The tall, gaunt woman was to do all that was possible of my work in her own house; my washing and ironing were to be done at her home; my food cooked there, but it was to be served in my cosy dining room. Never was a man so favoured; a home without its disagreeable features.

I chose for my chamber the room that had the most masculine air about it. The furniture was solid and substantial.

There was a small writing desk by the window; there were no lace curtains, no feminine needle-work to fuss over, and get angry about. A couch with a dark covering had but one sofa pillow upon it; the pillow was dark also. The pictures upon the walls were such as a man would fancy and admire.

Across the passage from my chamber was a dainty woman's boudoir. The furniture was light and pretty. There was a desk here, but it was a small affair; there was no key in the lock. It did not matter. I could not, and would not open it, had I the means, for on the threshold of this chamber I had paused and wondered if it would be right to intrude.

All day I had felt as if someone were with me; still more I became possessed of the idea as I entered the room. What spirit haunted this house? Who had dwelt therein?

The pictures in this chamber were of noble-looking men, saints and martyrs. There was one large engraving: a great stretch of waters, angry waves dashing against a rock; sitting thereon was a woman, her hair disordered by the wind and spray; one hand held a cloak tightly round her, like a shield from the storm; the other was stretched out, the slender fingers beckoning. I could see nothing to respond. It was a sad picture, and the woman portrayed therein seemed like the dream-woman. So strong was the resemblance, that I wondered what the witchery was that made this face so attractive a one. It was the soul that my eyes divined, and to which my soul answered. With a deep sense of peace, I fastened all the doors and windows below stairs and sought my chamber and rest.

"Come!"

I started. I had not seen her enter. It was indeed the dream-maiden calling me. Standing in the doorway, she looked placidly into my chamber. I felt no embarrassment as I arose, and followed her from the room.

Digitized by Google

She led the way down the stairs and into the tiny dining room. We breakfasted. Sitting opposite me, she poured the coffee and sweetened it with a glance that made the blood run warm through my veins.

"This is comfort," she said, and added gravely. "I have waited for you many years."

"Had I known," said I, "I would have come long ago. I have just begun to live. Will it last? It seems too good to be true."

"Will it last! Does anything last! Oh, the long, long years; the secret longings; the few joys, and the many sorrows! I love you."

"Then, indeed, have I entered my kingdom!" I pushed my chair back hastily; I ran towards her. She looked in my eyes, I was about to clasp her in my arms—oh, Heaven! It was night, darkness. I was alone. This had been but a tantalising dream.

I never slept but that she came to me. So real she seemed, so real our conversations, that I sketched her as the heroine of my novel. The book won fame and money for me.

One day, seated at my desk, I pulled out a hitherto unused drawer. Something rattled in it. I put my hand in and drew out a package wrapped in tissue paper. It was a old-fashioned gold locket. Inside (I could scarcely believe my eyes) was the face of the dream-maiden, my night companion.

The face was as I had seen it a hundred times. What mystery was this? Here indeed was something tangible, something real; there must be such a woman somewhere in real flesh and blood. I must find her. Why had she not sought me after reading my novel? Why did she not reveal herself and not torture me longer? What was this kinship of souls, this intensity of feeling that held this woman and myself by a tie akin to spiritual communion?

I went to her chamber. I sought frantically for other clues to her indentity. At last I sought a key to fit the lock of her desk. Surely it would not be sacrilege to touch her most precious belongings, our lives had been so peculiarly asssociated.

Within the desk I found poems, unfinished novels, essays, small and clever sketches. Writer and artist, she was doubly talented. I eagerly scanned them all. All were strong and vigorous, but most of them too sad to please the general reader or picture-lover. To me they were a revelation of the life, and heart, and soul, of the only woman in the world that I loved, the only woman who could satisfy my cravings.

"Yes, I know the former owner of the house," said Mr. Walker blandly. "Let—me—see! She lives in Antwerp Street now, No. 13."

"Antwerp Street?" I repeated. "Isn't that a poor locality?"

"A poor place, yes. She lost what little money she had. Her name is Belmont, Desirée Belmont. I always thought it such an old name."

Now I know. In an hour, if Fate were kind, I should be in the presence of the dream-maiden, a dream-maiden no longer. Desirée Belmont, my heart's desire! I threaded my way down the narrow dirty street with a heartache at the thought that she, my dainty sweetheart, lived in so foul and unwholesome a place. I had no idea what I should say. I only knew that I should force her to return to her former home, and I—would go back to lodgings until what I hoped for came to pass.

How wildly and boldly we plunge into the future!

No. 13. Would she answer my ring? I, a strong man, was trembling with excitement. I listened; a slow step echoed from the passage-way, a feeble hand turned the knob. An old lady stood before me; a beautiful old lady with a look like her in the eyes.

"Miss Désirée Belmont? Yes; will you step in?" I followed her through the passage into a tiny room.

"Be seated, sir," she said, with a quaint old-fashioned dignity. "It is a long time since an inquiry has been made for Désirée Belmont."

"Surely she is alive, and here," I interrupted excitedly. "I must see her. I can help her, and she can help me."

"Help you, a strong man like you!" said the old lady sadly. "The time was," here a blush reddened her brown skin, "when Désirée Belmont could have been of service to you or anyone. It is past."

"Tell me—tell me at once! Is she not living?"

"Living, yes; I am Desirée Belmont."

"You, you! There is some mistake. There must be a young woman of the same name. Little Désirée! Your niece, perhaps."

"Let us understand each other. I have no niece; I know no other Désiree Belmont"

"Did you ever live in Wilder Lane?"

"Oh, my home, my pretty home!" said the old lady with tear drops slowly trickling down her cheeks. "Tell me about it. Tell me who lives there now. Strange stranger," looking at me earnestly. "I have seen you somewhere—where?"

"Where? Goodness knows!" I exclaimed. "Have you ever seen this locket?"

She clutched it from my hand and looked eagerly at the face of the dream-maiden.

"Yes, yes, that is I—I, when I lived in Wilder Lane. Did you find anything else? I wrote a lot in those days. I was an imaginative girl. Poverty has taken all the imagination out of me. I'm almost worn out, sir; almost."

"How long ago was this? Am I dreaming? Is there no young Desirée Belmont?"

"There was one once," she answered sadly. "I have haunted that house in Wilder Lane ever since I left it in my womanhood. It has been vacant so many years. I paid for perpetual care as one pays for a plot in a cemetery. I was quite happy there, really happy when I forgot myself in my fancies. I loved that house. Every night, almost, I am a girl again. I go back there. I see—yes, I have seen you in a dream! If I had ever married the man I loved, you might have been my son."

I was bewildered. My dream had been shattered, but surely Fate had drawn me there for something.

"Your son," I said, rising and standing over her, pressing back the hair from her forehead tenderly. "Your son I will be. Tell me the name of the man you did not marry."

"Edward Gordon."

"My father! My miserable father! This is a miracle, after all these years. You knew of his death, and of hers—my mother?"

"He died first," said the old lady. "If he had lived, I might have been your second mother, and lived there with you."

I settled her affairs where she was, and took her home with me. Should you pass the house in summer time, you will see her seated in the front garden.

EDGAR GREENE.

Digitized by Google

BOOK II.—CONCERNING THE - - VOYAGE IN THE SOUTH SEAS.

SUMMARY.

A MAJOR and a cornet of Sheridan's Horse seek refuge in the wilds of Lochaber after the battle of Culloden Moor. They are joined by another refugee, Murtagh O'Neill. The major succumbs to wounds received in the engagement, and a troop of heavy cavalry discover the hiding place of the remaining two fugitives, and give chase to them.

They manage to get away safely and reach St. Peter's Strait, where they discover a trading cutter standing apparently empty. They take possession and make off with their prize before the owner's return. A boy appears out of the forepeak and volunteers to act as pilot, and they decide on a cruise to France.

The cutter is run down in a fog by a British privateer, giving the fugitives only just time to escape on to the larger vessel as their own goes to the bottom.

The Governor of Lima observes a strange craft cruising in his waters, and orders it to take its departure. The crew defy him, however, and he sends the Santa Thérèsa to punish them for their impudence. Unfortunately for him his own men get the worst of it, and Sneyd, attended by Sandy Carmichael, lands and interviews the Governor, demanding an enormous sum as compensation money. This His Excellency reluctantly agrees to pay.

The Fortune's Favourite, the snow which rescued our three heroes from a watery grave, to all appearances a simple trader, proved to be an armed adventurer. After cruising about on the Spanish Main, and accumulating much treasure, the captain decides to return home. Before doing so, he dispatches a part of his ship's company, including Sneyd, Carmichael, and O'Neill on a prize vessel in search of fresh adventure.

CHAPTER III. (continued).

Two days after the bowsprit began to head towards the south, Gauntlett, who was leaning over the weather bulwark aft, uttered an exclamation, and gave hurried orders to have the vessel hove-to. She lay head to wind, with heavily slatting canvas, and the watch below somewhat naturally came up on deck to see what was to do.

"Ambergrease!" exclaimed the captain, pointing to three lumps of bright greyish matter, which every now and again appeared on the crest of a swell, some half-cable's length away on the quarter. "There's value there equal to 'arf the dollars we've got below. Away aloft there, some o' ye, and rig tackles to get the jolly-boat into the water. There's the ladies o' the court, and them as loves parfumes, 'll give more'n its weight in gould fer this ambergrease."

The little boat was lifted from its chocks amidship, swung over the side, and splashed into the water. O'Neill lowered himself down and took the sculls. Sneyd sat in the stern-sheets. "Here, Doctor," said Gauntlett, "you've delicate fingers, do you go too, and pick up every bit you can see, though it be no larger than a groat piece." So Sandy Carmichael got into the boat, which rowed off, leaving the bulwark rail of the schooner lined with bearded faces, all agog with curiosity.

O'Neill rowed on with lusty strokes, and Sneyd was soon able to pick up the first piece of ambergris, a lump weighing some five and a half or six pounds. It was solid, opaque, and of a bright grey colour, intermixed with reddish striae. It was sufficiently soft to yield under the fingers like stiff putty, and when pressed it exhaled a most delicious odour.

"More plazing job to the nose this, yer honour, than steeping flax," remarked O'Neill. "And it's meself that knows what a flax-pit sniffs like when they're takin' out the stuff."

"I don't know what steeped flax smells like," said Sneyd, "but I don't wonder at people who can afford luxuries, paying fabulous prices for a substance which emits an odour so heavenly as this."

It was uncommon to find this precious grey substance in any quantity, and consequently Captain Gauntlett did not think it worth while to lower either of his larger boats to aid in the collection. And those in the jolly-boat were quite of the same opinion. They thought that every next half-dozen strokes would bring them to the end of the store. The fragments were getting smaller, certainly. None were larger than a clenched hand. Many were as tiny as hazel nuts. But all were worth collecting. And wishing to take full advantage of an opportunity which might not occur again in the lifetime of any of them, they gleaned the sea with abundant care, and did not miss a fragment that their eyes fell upon.

So fully were they taken up by the excitement of their employment that time had passed by unnoticed, and it was not till the boom of a gun reached them across the water, that they unwrapped themselves from their enthralling pursuit, and lifted their eyes from the ocean surface in their own immediate neighbourhood. But at the signal, which was evidently intended to attract their attention, they looked up, and found that, what with their own rowing and the schooner's drift, at least six long sea miles separated them.

"The schooner's hull-down," said Sneyd, with some uneasiness.

"And taking in canvas, an' makin' things snug generally," added O'Neill.

"There goes another gun," remarked Sandy, who had noted the flash and the smoke; and, sure enough, a minute afterwards the sound boomed sullenly across the swell to their ears.

"Well," said Sneyd, "we'll obey orders and turn back, especially as I don't think there's much more of this grey stuff to collect. But I do wonder what has turned up to make the skipper call us back in that peremptory fashion. Two guns! It must be something pretty serious. He's not the man to blow away blank cartridge for nothing."

Digitized by Google

"It's dirthy weather, yer honour, that's what the skipper's making all snug for. See, his maintopmast's sthruck, an' that's the foret'gallant-yard they're afther lowerin' on deck this minute. See now, if yez give me one of the oars, and stick to the other yerself, it's there we'll be in half no time. Sandy, do you ship the rudder, and don't let us row round more corners than's needful."

They bent to their oars, and shoved the tubby little boat through the water with all the speed she was capable of.

Meanwhile, the sky to windward was darkening rapidly with heavy masses of black cloud, which sprung up from under the horizon, and spread rapidly over the hitherto blue heavens. The sun grew lurid, red, angry; and at last it was blotted completely from sight. A deep twilight fell over the ocean, and the breeze died away completely. The air was stifling hot; and although lightly clad, the two rowers were almost choked with their exertions. Yet they worked like horses, and tugged at their oars with the desperate energy of men who knew what they had to expect if they did not regain their ship in time.

The moan of the storm began to reach them over the waters, and herald its coming.

Sandy sat in the stern, tiller in hand, steering carefully. Every inch of way was important, and he didn't intend to deviate a hand's-breadth from the straight course, if careful steering could do it. The rowers glanced at his still set face every now and again, but they could learn nothing from it. Sandy's countenance, from the early training of that man Duncan Carmichael, was never particularly indicative of his feelings; and when at all excited, it was more wooden and expressionless than ever.

The noise of the gale grew louder as the wind-storm approached; and presently, after a few sharp squalls, the hurricane burst upon them with its full strength.

By a rapid glance over his shoulder, O'Neill saw that the schooner was in the thick of it, more than a mile away from them; and that they had no more chance of reaching her then, than of climbing to the moon. Indeed, there was little prospect of anything except swamping before them. But he was a brave man—brave as his companions were brave—and he did not intend to die without an effort. So, tossing his oar into the after rowlock, he bade Sneyd take the pair and keep the boat head to wind as well as he could, with Sandy's help. Of course, she was drifting away before the constant succession of terrific squalls that swept down on her, but that did not matter much so long as she did not meet the wind with her broadside, and get blown bodily over.

Beyond the ordinary swell, there was not much sea on as yet. The wind and the rain kept it from rising with much rapidity. But all hands knew that there would be heavy waves running before long; and from them would come the greatest danger. The cockle-shell of a boat might, by dint of severe exertion, be kept head on to them, but their breaking crests would inevitably swamp her. O'Neill was working to prevent this. By a happy streak of providence, there was a coil of good inch and a half manilla lying in the bow. Tossing the precious store of ambergris into the seething waters alongside with as little compunction as though it had been shingle ballast, the Irishman got up the floor gratings of the boat, her mast, and tiny lug-sail, and lashing them into a secure raft, bent on one end of his manilla warp and launched it overboard. Being almost flush with the water, it offered little or no resistance to the gale, and so stayed stationary, whilst the boat drifted rapidly to leeward. Yard after yard of the manilla hissed over the bow, and when as near as he could guess eighteen fathoms had run out, O'Neill checked it, and made fast on board to the foremost thwart.

"There goes another gun," remarked Sandy.

The sea was rising rapidly now, and the spindrift from the top of the waves was cutting like sleet through the air, but the boat felt the drag on her, and ran up and down the liquid hills and valleys squarely and accurately. Sneyd had unshipped his sculls as soon as the floating anchor had got the little craft in check, and was sitting down on the bottom boards aft along with his companions.

They did not speak to one another. A shout would not have made itself heard; and although they might have interchanged ideas by means of signs, neither had much to say to the others. Theirs was an almost hopeless look-out. They had seen the schooner run past them under bare poles, in the first squall, her people looking at the tiny boat helplessly, hopelessly. And when the vessel shot away into the storm-wrack, they knew they might never expect to see her again. Even supposing both were afloat and undamaged when the weather moderated, as it was bound to do sooner or later, what hope was there of coming together again?

And, moreover, they need not reckon upon being picked up by other craft. The South Pacific is a tolerable desert even to-day; but then, there was not one vessel on it for five hundred one would find now, and they would be far away from the track of even these scanty few.

Digitized by Google

But still, absolutely helpless as their case appeared to be so far as human judgment could discern, none of the three was of that breed which gives in till the bitter end. A weak mind might have said, "I am born to die, why prolong an easy death into a death of agony?" and, going forward, cut the warp and have been comfortably drowned in less than a couple of minutes. A Spaniard would have occupied his time in calling vigorously to the saints who would probably neglect his petition, and give him no help. A Turk would have said "Kismet," and have bothered his head about no matters sublunary or otherwise any further. But these three Britons had no notion of throwing up the sponge till they were forced to.

The jolly-boat was a heavy, clumsy, apple-bowed little structure, very different from even the North Sea trawler's punt of to-day—and that is the most solidly built craft I can think of. But although she was not good for racing purposes, she was well adapted to the use her builder intended her for—namely, to live in a heavy sea. A smart yacht's boat of similar capacity would have been swamped in ten minutes with the sea running as nastily as it was then; if, indeed, she had not collapsed into primitive staves before that time. But this bluff-bowed little tub of the last century rode out the blow with comparative ease. She wasn't dry by any means. Nothing could have been, with such a tearing pother of broken water about. But she never shipped anything green, and the white wave-tops that splashed hungrily over her stout sides were quickly hove overboard again to the place whence they came.

Sandy sat on the stern thwart with a shrunken hand on the tiller.

The sea-anchor was certainly a great help. A huge green curling wave would swoop up, with its bending crest already whitening. If that were unchecked, it would sprawl over the boat and send her down without further ado. But when such a roller reached these spars and sails and gratings, it had to break willy-nilly, and its shattered fragments would sweep shrieking on, and the little boat would wriggle over the yeasty débris, and take scarcely so much as a bucketful on board.

Through half the night did the hurricane rage with unabated fury; and then the wind dropped almost as suddenly as it had arisen.

There was still, of course, a heavy sea running. But from long oily swells such as these were, the boat need fear no danger; and, worn out by what they had gone through, the three occupants one by one nodded off, and fell asleep.

When they woke up the sun was just past meridian, and baking hot. There was no cloud in the sky, but a gentle breeze from the eastward ruffled the surface of the heavy swells which were sweeping up with monotonous regularity.

All were suffering acutely from thirst already, all were stiff and cramped from lying in the boat, all awoke unrefreshed; but each bore his discomfort without complaint.

Sneyd was the first to speak. "We must stand in towards the coast," he said, as cheerfully as if they'd but an easy half-hour's sail before them. "See if there's a compass in the after-locker, Sandy. There was one on board the day before yesterday, for I saw it myself."

Sandy reported the compass on board and uninjured, and the other two busied themselves with heaving up the sea-anchor, unlashing the heterogeneous collection of which it was composed, and getting each item on board and stowed in its place. Then the mast was stepped, and the sail, a standing lug, run up and sheeted flat home, for the very wind was against them, and beating in so light a breeze would practically be useless. Their flat-bottomed, round-bowed little tub would make far more leeway than she would gain in the other direction, and they might quite as well, if not better, have remained at their sea-anchor.

Each knew this, but each was anxious to be rid of the maddening sense of inaction. Energetic, all three, by nature, the idea of sitting still, waiting for death, was more than they could endure. Far better make a struggle for it, even though that struggle was obviously useless.

So the boat was close-hauled as near as she would go, and, taking it in turns to steer, they sent her slowly and slantwise over the rollers, on a course which would have brought them to somewhere or other on the Californian coast, if it had been persisted in long enough. Of course, they had no intention to journey that far. This was only the first board of a series of tacks which was to bring them to the nearest land of South America. They even kept up the farce by beginning to discuss what they should do when they landed, how the Spaniards would treat them, and how they should behave towards the Spaniards. But this effort at cheerfulness failed. One by one they dropped out of the conversation. Their mouths were dry and parched. Their aching tongues had swollen up to double the normal size, and were covered with a dark and gluey fur.

Keeping their clothes moist with sea-water afforded some relief; for the moisture creeps in through the pores of the skin; but it did not assuage the intense longing for drink.

Digitized by Google

In the night it rained.

Fearful lest the shower might be short, they greedily sucked the first drops as they fell on their brine-encrusted clothes; and then caught more in their hats, and drank out of them delicious draughts that seemed of nectar. Then the rain downpoured with tropical violence, and by spreading out the sail across the thwarts they collected a couple of quarts. For want of a better vessel to stow it in, this precious fluid was run into the wooden baler; and, in order to keep this from spilling, one or other of them had to sit with it between his hands, and watch every movement of the boat with jealous care. Their hats were, all three of them, leaky and porous, and so unsuited for reservoirs. But they answered for drinking vessels, and, before the rain ceased, they had each of them imbibed as much water as he could hold.

This liquid meal rendered the pangs of hunger, which were beginning to make themselves very painful, less acute; but it did not remove them. The three poor fellows felt faint and weak. To stand up was to be overcome with dizziness. Lying down was the only position approaching ease. He who had charge of the precious wooden baler was thoroughly exhausted with his efforts at the end of an hour's spell.

Another day dragged itself through, and another night, and again they found themselves without water. The fierce sun had robbed them of much of their little store and, despite the jealous care of him who handled it, a drop would occasionally splash over the side of the wooden vessel, and be lost irretrievably. It yielded little more than a mouthful apiece, and what was that in such a climate?

On the morning of the third day the two elders were lying helplessly on the floor gratings. The ex-cornet of horse was worst. He was almost unconscious.

Sandy, although the youngest, seemed to bear up best under the trial. The hard usage of his younger days had done him this service at any rate, though it is to be doubted whether Duncan Carmichael had any such end in view when he applied his course of treatment. But the result was valuable in this time of need. Sandy sat on the stern thwart with a shrunken hand on the tiller, and a pinched face turned now to the luff of the lug-sail, and now to the ocean to windward.

He could steer by instinct, and instinct taught him to cast an occasional glance to see what the weather was going to be; and, doing these matters without trouble, he had his brain at liberty to ponder over other things.

During the first part of the day Sandy was much too tired and feeble to think much, and when the midday heat was at its highest and most cruel strength, he expected every minute to topple helplessly over like the other two in the bottom of the boat. But when the baking afternoon began to cool somewhat, Sandy began to be haunted by a vision of some strange bird-like creature that he could not understand at all.

He didn't think it was an ordinary feathered biped that was annoying him, for if it had been he would have recognised it. A great sea-fowl—an albatross, he thought it was—had been hovering near the boat all day, and it was there even then. He could make it out clearly enough—beak, pinions, everything. But still this other bird, or whatever it was, produced too blurred an image on his retina to produce any definite impression.

"My brain must be going," he told himself. "That book of Dr. Menteith's, 'Ye Illusions offe ye Dying,' mentioned it as a symptom of those who perish from hunger and thirst."

He passed a hand wearily across his eyes, and looked about him again. There, overhead, was the great sea-fowl, grimly waiting till his meal should be ready. There, in the boat's wake, was a black triangle, like a tiny lateen sail, which never deviated from its relative position. But Sandy took very little notice of either fowl or fish. That they were waiting to make a meal of his carcase troubled him little just then. It was the strange thing ahead that perplexed and worried him. He had always been of an inquiring turn, and his late training had brought out the latent thirst for information which lay within him. At this, one of his last moments, there was a strange living thing of some kind—he felt sure it was living—within reasonable distance, and he could neither make head nor tail of it. Presently he would die, and the chance would be lost.

Mytto shaded his eyes with a hand, and gazed afresh.

It was a grotesque idea. If he did come near enough to this strange animal to classify and make notes on its peculiarities, the discoveries could not be handed along. They would die with him. But though quite aware of this, he didn't think it mattered particularly. Once he had got near enough to this strange bird—he was sure it was a bird now; he could distinguish its wings; great, grey wings—once close abreast of this bird, his curiosity would be satisfied, and he would just lie down on the grating and close his eyes.

To put the matter bluntly, Sandy had become light-headed. The two men in the bottom of the boat were by this time quite unconscious. They were lying absolutely still, with a few gallons of sea-water splashing backwards and forwards over them, and might well have been taken for dead. The steersman would not be long before he joined them. His half-crouched body was swaying with every roll of the boat. His eyes were dull and heavy. His face was terribly emaciated. His clothes hung loosely upon his frame. But the shrunken hand which grasped the tiller steered as straight a course as any hand could have done, and the jolly-boat held on to one fixed point. The last remaining scraps of Sandy Carmichael's mind were guiding those skinny fingers to carry out their owner's last wish. This strange sea-fowl ahead; this bird with the great, grey wings; that was the lodestone that was drawing the hapless little boat along.

His bearers . . . . placed the shell to his lips afresh.

CHAPTER IV.

How the canoes sailed down from the North: how a sail was spied: and how three white men were rescued.

FROM an island which lay a hundred and twenty miles away to the north, a couple of canoes were sailing to another island, which was distant eighty miles south.

The canoes were dug-outs, hollowed by fire and rude cutting tools from the solid trunk. Each was about thirty feet long, with six feet for greatest beam. Alone, neither would have been able to stand the seas which one assuredly must meet with in so long a voyage, even in the most favourable weather. But each was made to support the other.

I mean that, by means of poles laid across the gunwales, they were lashed securely side by side, about five feet apart, so that a capsize was more or less impossible. There was a platform on the poles—a grating, one might almost call it—of bamboos; so that, if a sea was shipped, it would quickly drain away. And, furthermore, the canoes had been prepared for sea by having a good broad plank sewn on with fibre above the gunwale, so that each had, to use a technical term, abundance of free board.

A mast rose from each canoe, the two heads being joined together. In the triangle thus formed, a sail laboriously woven from coarse fibre was hoisted, and set on boom and yard.

The platform held crew and passengers. There were eighteen men of all ages. Most of them were stark naked, but some bundles of tappa cloth showed that during the evening chill they could clothe when they wished to. Happy mortals! clothing was to them for warmth, not decency; for, like Adam before the fall, they were naked, and not an atom ashamed. Indeed, only two of them were clad, and these more as a sign of office than for any other reason.

Their one garment consisted of a yard-wide strip of tappa cloth thrown over one shoulder, and wound loosely round the body.

The two men who wore these insigna were chiefs, father and son. The elder was just then sitting in the stern of the starboard canoe, steering. He had no compass before him, and, it being daylight, of course there were no stars visible; yet for all that he held on confidently enough. How he steered I cannot tell; but it is a well-known fact that the aboriginal races of the Pacific Islands were gifted with an instinct, which guided them infallibly across the great sea wastes in their frequent ocean voyages.

The younger man was pacing backwards and forwards over the heaving bamboo deck, apparently exercising himself.

Every time he came forward in his short parade, he stopped for a moment to scan the semicircle of the horizon before him, and then, turning, resumed his walk. The other men were lying and sitting about, chatting or sleeping. There was nothing for them to do.

Suddenly the elder chief spoke.

"Mytto," he said, "old eyes are better than young ones still."

"How's that, father? What do you see, that I don't."

"There, straight ahead. You've passed your eye across it at least six times since it rose above the water's edge."

With his attention thus drawn, Mytto shaded his eye with a hand, and gazed afresh.

"A white speck, father," he said. "Some seafowl, is it?"

"Too far away for that."

"Wait," said the younger man. He cast off his tappa robe, and seizing the mast of the weather canoe with hands and knees, swarmed nimbly aloft, and perched himself on the swaying yard, held on to the apex of the triangles balancing himself on his lurching perch with a true sailor's agility.

Digitized by Google

"Well?" inquired the steersman.

"It is a canoe," replied Mytto, "yet like no canoe I've ever seen before. She is all visible from here, what there is of her, and that's very little. How men dare put to sea in such a tiny cockleshell, I can't understand."

"Been fishing, perhaps, and got blown off shore," suggested one of the men.

"She's no craft of ours, of that I'm sure," continued Mytto. "Her sail, too, is different in every way—in colour, shape, and hoist—from those we know."

"What men are there on board?" inquired the older chief.

"I can't see. The sail hides them. They are a little to weather of us. But we are holding on to meet one another, and shall soon know."

The newcomer's hull was visible from the deck now, when the lashed canoes rose on the summit of a swell; and Mytto slipped down from aloft, and joined the knot of men below. All were on their feet, gazing eagerly ahead. Almost anything would have been welcome to break the monotony of their voyage.

"There's an old hand at the steering paddle," quoth one. "She's coming at us as straight as an arrow flight."

"And that's crooked if it comes from thy bow," laughed another. "But likely enough she's seen us, and so has a point to make for."

The old chief in the stern heard this last remark, and, to test its truth, bore away a point or two. In a minute the strange craft had put up her helm so as to intersect this new course.

"They have seen us, father," said Mytto.

"I know it, boy. Come now, all of you, get your weapons. 'Tis always well to take a stranger at sea for an enemy till he proves a friend. That may save a surprise."

The men got clubs and fish-bone-tipped lances from the canoes, laid them out in readiness on the deck, and then recommenced their occupation of staring at the craft ahead.

When the two vessels were about a hundred yards apart, rolling sideways over the same swell, the stranger ran slowly up into the wind, her sail flapping and tearing wildly at its sheet. There was a man in the stern, but he had fallen across the tiller, and forcing it to leeward, had brought his cock-boat up head to wind. Presently she fell off again on the other tack; but, as the sheet was made fast to windward, she made but little headway.

The lashed canoes overhauled fast. Clubs and lances were little thought of now. Three forms were visible in the stranger, and those three were to all appearances dead men. A shark was following; and sharks generally knew when they were to have a meal.

Foot by foot the canoe came up astern, and then the old chief skilfully manœuvred alongside.

Mytto sprang on board with a rope's end, which he made fast. He found halyards, which he was accustomed to, and casting them off, ran down the sail. And then he turned to the three occupants. Those lying in the wash on the floor gratings, being nearest, commanded his first attention. He examined each carefully. Both were alive. Then he passed on to the younger stranger in the stern. He was alive too. He moaned when he was touched, but seemed in a better way than his companions.

Mytto took in the situation at once. "Poor fellows, they are perished with thirst, and starving," he said.

Half-a-dozen men dived into the canoes, and half-a-dozen eager hands held forth green cocoa-nuts. Two more of the islanders boarded the boat, and they and Mytto, each taking a patient, poured the sweet juice between their parched and blackened lips, and one by one the sufferers regained conciousness.

(To be continued.)

HOW TO START - - - - - - A LIBRARY.

EVERY household in the United Kingdom worthy of the name, contains at least one book-case with an assortment of volumes, the nature of which is a pretty sure index of the character of the owner. In some cases the husband is responsible for the selection; in other cases the wife takes the initiative, and buys those novels which most takes her fancy.

A great number of men and women feel the absence of good standard works, works that they had taken down from their parents' bookshelves when they were yet unmarried, books like "Grimms' Fairy Tales," "Arabian Nights Entertainment," and "Don Quixote," books which they are always going to buy for their own delectation and for that of their offspring, but which they never do. There is always some new and important novel that gets the money they have decided should be spent on one or the other of these books, and so they never find a place in the bookshelf.

Then, again, the price! Works which are likely to have so much thumbing as either one of those mentioned above, must not be bound in paper covers or printed in tiny type. Yet to secure them in acceptable and durable form has hitherto been beyond the means of the ordinary man.

We say "hitherto" advisedly, for it is now possible, as the result of the arrangements which we have made with various publishers, for everyone who is in a position to pay rent for a home at all, to become (for the initial payment of ten shillings) the possessor of not only these three books, but of ninety-seven others of equal value besides!

Such an opportunity as this was never before offered to anyone, and it is only by arranging for the disposal of enormous quantities that we are enabled to supply such a number of books for so nominal a sum of money.

Bound in cloth, the hundred volumes will cost you, first of all, a ten-shilling postal order, and then a monthly payment of twenty shillings for seven months—surely an easy matter for anyone who is in a position to afford even the accommodation for one hundred books!

If you wish to clear off the whole sum at once, you may pay £7 down for those bound in cloth, while for another sixty shillings, the same volumes will be supplied in handsome half-morocco binding.

If a hundred books is beyond your means or ambition, fifty of them may be secured on conditions which appeared in last week's P.W., and which will appear again shortly.

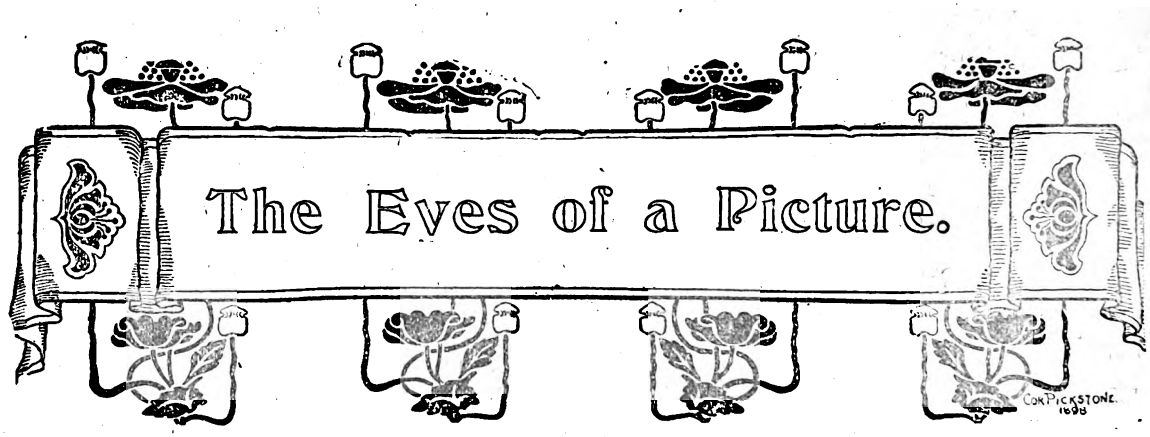
Anyway, whatever you may think for the moment regarding this manner of improving your mind and embellishing your home, I would advise you to drop a postcard to the 100 BEST BOOKS DEPARTMENT, asking for a list of the volumes offered, together with full particulars, and these will be sent you by return of post. If you don't care for them—well no harm is done.

A LITTLE DANGEROUS.—He (designingly). "What a terrible thing it would be if some rascal should marry you for your money."

She (discouragingly): "It would be for him—if I found it out."

Digitized by Google

The Eyes of a Picture.



When I became the occupant of the Château Blanc, in the neighbourhood of Fontainebleau, I found that my wish for a place of complete seclusion was likely to be realised to the full I was not in a suitable state of mind for society, and I had deliberately given myself three months in which to fight out a certain battle with myself, for which I needed solitude and reflection.

When the old woman who acted as caretaker of the place took me through it on a tour of inspection, there were three things which, in spite of my preoccupation with my own affairs, struck me very forcibly.

The first was the forlorn remnants of the body of a white swan, which must once have been a creature of splendid size and shape. My informant told me that this swan had been a great pet of the former owner of the château, until some accident had killed it; after which it had been stuffed and fastened in its place upon the surface of the little lake under his window. There it was still—what remained of it—a mass of weather-beaten and dirty feathers.

Another thing that compelled my strong attention was a certain picture that hung in the bedroom of the late owner, and which I was informed was his own portrait, painted by himself. This room, by the way, was sinister and mysterious in its effect beyond any I had ever entered. One reason for this was the fact that all the furniture, which was elaborately carved and must once have been of beautiful polish and colour, had been ruthlessly covered with a coat of black paint—the bed, the table, chairs, wardrobe, chest of drawers, and even the great leather easy-chair, which was placed just under the picture facing the opposite wall.

It was a wretched piece of work, that picture, representing a man dressed in some sort of court dress of the last century, and it would have seemed ineffectual to the last degree but for the truly marvellous expression of the eyes, which were fixed on a certain spot in the wall opposite, with an earnestness and intensity which made me feel that there was some hidden significance in this look. The man not only stared at the spot himself, but he compelled me to do the same, to look again and again.

And yet there was nothing to see. The wall was perfectly bare in that place; and covered with a meaningless sort of wall paper which gave no encouragement whatever.

Another thing that I noticed specially, with a feeling of being imperiously directed to do so, was a large rusty key that hung on the wall directly under the picture. When I inquired of the old woman what this key belonged to, she answered that she had never known, but that it had been hung there by the late proprietor and had been undisturbed since his death. That event had occurred many years ago, and it was owing to the provisions of the will left by him that no one had ever occupied the house in the interval. The prescribed time had only just expired, and I was the first person to rent the château, the revenue from which was to go to a nephew who lived abroad.

The sombreness of the black chamber suited my frame of mind, and I decided on taking it for my room. Besides this, the picture, the key, and the white swan all interested me, and as it was the first time that an outside interest had made any headway against the melancholy of my own thoughts, these objects, far from cheerful as they were in themselves, afforded a grateful diversion.

So continually did I wonder why the picture looked always, and could compel me to look, at that one spot, and why the key had been hung in that place and kept its position so many years undisturbed, as if some ghostly guardian watched over it, and why, ever and always, the old white swan compelled me, as if by some irresistible power, to connect it with these other things, that I kept myself awake at night, weaving all sorts of stories concerning these objects, and spent half my days in looking from the picture to the wall, and back again to the key, and then out of the window at the battered effigy of a noble bird beneath it, until the confusion of mind thus produced seemed likely to drive me crazy.

I expended all the ingenuity of which I was master in questioning the old woman, who had lived here in the time of the former owner, bnt the satisfaction of my curiosity in that direction was rather meagre.

She told me that her former master had had a wife whom he adored, fair as an angel, and gifted with a divinely beautiful voice such as none had ever heard, before or since. This young wife had been snatched from him by a sudden and frightful death. The fever which seized her had been so contagious, the woman said, that every one had fled the premises, except one woman servant and the master himself. These, with the help of the doctor, had nursed the young wife through her brief illness until its end.

My informant had heard it said that the circumstances of her death were very peculiar—that in her delirium, on the very last night of her illness, those who had ventured to linger about the premises had heard her singing more gloriously than ever in her life; that it had reminded them of the great white swan, which but the night before had sung its last sweet song on the lake, in the moonlight, and had been found dead in the morning.

Digitized by Google

The woman who had remained to help the master in his last sad ministrations to his dying and dead wife had gone away the day after the funeral, and had never been heard of since.

The funeral, in the quaint old church but a few paces from the house, had been, from the woman's account, melancholy enough. Scarcely anyone dared to come to it, so malignant had been this fever, and it was feared that the few men who were willing to act as bearers would not be equal to the task; but the poor lady had been light and fairy-like in figure, and so wasted was she from this consuming fever, that the bearers declared that her weight was scarcely more than that of an empty coffin.

The woman further said that, as the small funeral cortège was leaving the church, it had surprised everyone to see the husband, who was directly behind the coffin, pause directly under a statue of the Virgin, and single out from the great bunch of ribbons which hung there, the long strip which his young wife had placed there on the day of her marriage to him, less than a year before. It was an old custom connected with this church. Every girl married there had conformed to it, and some of the ribbons were yellow with time and almost dropping to pieces.

The longest and freshest bit of all had been put there by the beautiful young creature now lying dead in the flower of her youth and loveliness.

No one ever knew, the woman went on to say, how the master spent his days after the funeral was over. He had forbidden every servant to return, and turned a deaf ear to the rings and knocks of visitors. Months had passed, and no one held speech with him. They knew he was alive, because people who had looked through the palings had seen him walking in the garden, and one person reported having seen him carry from the house the stuffed body of the great swan and fasten it in its place on the lake, where it could be plainly seen from his window. He must have embalmed or stuffed it himself, the old woman said, for he was known to have remarkable knowledge and skill in such strange arts.

As was inevitable, after hearing all this, my interest in the picture, swan, and the key, deepened sensibly. There was certainly a touch of the supernatural about these things for me. I had only to stand near the spot on which the eyes of the picture were fastened to experience the strangest, the most overwhelmingly significant sensations I had ever known.

The spot was haunted by a presence, it seemed to me, and as often as I stood there I could feel my heart throb and cease throbbing, my breath pant and cease panting, my flesh turn cold and moist with consciousness and apprehension.

I tried to account for all this on natural grounds, but I found it was quite impossible to do so.

One day—it was the 19th of August—a hot, sultry, indescribably gloomy day, when the heavy clouds that lowered seemed only to darken the whole earth without giving forth one drop of moisture, the old woman came to my room and chanced to mention that it was the time of the death of the young mistress of the Château Blanc.

She had died, it appeared, just at midnight, between the 19th and 20th of August. After giving me this information, she said good-evening and left me to the reflections which it aroused.

I can scarcely call them reflections. They took the form, rather, of a sort of compulsion that was laid upon me to obey a certain force by which I felt myself suddenly dominated.

It was the picture that did it; this was certain, for, as often as I faltered, one look into that insistent, commanding, coercing face compelled me to go on. In obedience to its bidding, I did as follows:—

I went to an old desk in the room, and took from it some simple carpenter's tools, with which I deliberately cut through, first, the wall-papering, and then a thin boarding, which covered all the space between a door and window opposite the picture.

When this was done I saw—I cannot say whether most to my satisfaction or my horror—that I stood in front of a door—a regular, ordinary door, with panels, hinges, and, more than all, a keyhole. I glanced at the picture. It seemed to me that the canvas positively lived with expression.

The eyes commanded me to get the rusty key. I took it, fitted it in the lock, in which it turned with difficulty, and then, with my heart almost choking me with its throbs, my knees shaking under me, my body covered with a cold sweat, and my tongue dry in my mouth, I opened the door.

As it creaked on its rusty hinges, I saw, by the light of the candle which I held in my hand, a mass of cobwebs, heavily weighted with the dust of years, and, through these, a woman's figure.

It was clad—for I obeyed the eyes, which commanded me to examine it, though my heart was cold with terror—in what I made out to be a white silk gown, above which was the face, withered and awfully livid, as I had heard that the faces of the embalmed appear years after death. Still, it was recognisable as a real human face, and was surrounded by masses of yellow hair, which, even through the dust and cobwebs, gleamed with the brightness of gold.

The hands held something in their shrunken fingers—a white ribbon, with the date of her marriage and death upon it, her husband's name and her own, and these words, which, under the compelling eyes of the picture, I laboriously studied out:—

I HAVE been able to keep you near me, even in death. I have never been separated from you, or from what once was you to me. But when death shall come to me you will have no power over my body, and they will take me from you. That I am unable to help, I think only of this; you cannot suffer for it, since you have so long ceased to be, and by that time my suffering also will be over. I shall put my spirit into the eyes of my picture, which will watch over you still.

I looked from the paper to the picture. It seemed dull and inexpressive—mere canvas and paint. The power of the eyes was gone. Their spell over me was broken.

Suddenly I felt within me a long-absent yearning for human companionship—for life and love. I had come to this place impelled by a morbid and unhealthy desire for solitude, and my experiences here made me more morbid and unhealthy still. They had culminated now in this awful revelation of disappointment and death, which threw into brilliant contrast the bright possibilities which still remained to me, and I resolved to go back into the world and do my best to deserve and win these

EDNA WOODFORD.

Digitized by Google

THE TIMMINS TROUBLES.

VII.—Filling a Foreign Order.

"I SAY, my dear," said Mr. Timmins, as he finished reading a letter he had just received, "my brother out in Canada wants me to buy a razor strop and a suitable present for a young lady, and send them to him."

"I didn't know that a razor strop was a suitable present for a young lady," replied Mrs. Timmins, who was busy, and caught the remark imperfectly.

"It would be a suitable present for some married women; it would sharpen 'em up!" retorted Mr. Timmins. "Who said anything about a razor strop and a young lady? What I observed was that my brother in Canada wants me to send him a razor strop and a suitable present for a young lady. Now, I can get the strop, but I don't understand what kind of a present he wants."

"Let me see," mused Mrs. Timmins, her shopping instincts rising to the surface. "Does he say what kind of a young lady she is?"

"No, he doesn't!" roared Mr. Timmins. "He leaves something to the imagination of the reader. I suppose she's got legs and arms, because if she hadn't he would probably have mentioned it. What he wants is a present for an average woman; now, what can we get for her?"

"If I knew whether she was a blonde or a brunette, I could tell better what she would like," replied Mrs. Timmins, who, like the rest of her sex, always associates a woman with the colour that becomes her best. "Do you suppose he means something for her to wear, or some ornament for her house? You see I don't know whether she keeps house or lives at home."

"What difference does that make?" demanded Mr. Timmins. "She's probably a human being; but we will suppose she roosts in a tree. Does that help you? Can you think of something useful for a female who lives in a tree, and hops with light-hearted skips from bough to bough like a blessed crow?"

"You might get her a toilet set," suggested Mrs. Timmins, taking refuge in a woman's one idea of an appropriate present for another woman.

"She doesn't want a toilet set," snorted Mr. Timmins, "any more'n she wants the chicken pox. Think of something that is pretty, and at the same time that she can use. Now think!"

"How would one of those new painted porcelain flower-pots do?" ventured Mrs. Timmins.

"That's it!" howled Mr. Timmins; "a flower-pot with a beastly saucer under it to catch the water till it overflows on the carpet! That's your idea! One with broken-legged spiders painted on the outside and a hole in the bottom, so she can use it for a spyglass! That's the idea! A six-shilling flower-pot for a threepenny rose bush with the blind staggers and a touch of the pip! Where's the pot? Fetch the highly-seasoned flower-pot!"

And Mr. Timmins leant back in his chair and glared at his wife.

"I tell you what will do, my dear," said Mrs. Timmins, approaching the next suggestion cautiously. "Why not send an album?"

"You mean one of those books for a lot of idiots to wish they were dead in?" asked Mr. Timmins suspiciously.

"No," replied Mrs. Timmins, "a photographic album."

"Don't want it," sniffed Mr. Timmins contemptuously. "You mean that sort of a thing that a girl always brings out after tea and says: 'That's ma, and that's pa, and that's aunt Vi and her little boy, and that's Uncle Simon, and that's Aunt Flo, and that's Uncle John, and that's my niece Nellie, isn't she sweet? And that's a a dog we used to own, and I don't know who that is, and that's Clara Morris!'

"Don't want it!" And Mr Timmins's voice rose to steam-whistle pitch.

"Do you suppose I'm going to inflict a suffering world with a bookful of old stagers that all look alike and have been in every album since Adam began to wear trousers? Can't ye think of something sensible?"

"Wouldn't half-a-dozen forks be nice?" faltered Mrs. Timmins, almost at her wits' ends.

"Just the thing!" gasped Mr. Timmins. "Half a dozen pitchforks and a ton of hay. Then you might throw in a hen coop and a rat climbing over the back paling. You've got ideas about such things! All you want is a white beard and a chimney to be Father Christmas! With your intelligence on these subjects you only need a glass front and a glue pot to be a toy shop! I'm going to buy this present myself!" and Mr. Timmins shot out of the house and tore down the street with his head sunk into his shoulders and his fists in his pockets.

In an hour he returned all grins and tossed a parcel in his wife's lap.

"Now, my dear, what do you think of that?" he asked cheerfully.

Mrs. Timmins opened the parcel and disclosed a huge crimson handkerchief that would have made a tabernacle tent for a camp meeting.

"How did you come to think of it?" she asked, holding it up admiringly.

"Why," replied Mr. Timmins, "he said in the letter if I couldn't think of anything else to get a handsome handkerchief. Here it is," and Mr. Timmins drew out the letter triumphantly.

"But he doesn't say handkerchief; he says a nice handkerchief-case! Here's the case on the next line," said Mrs. Timmins mildly, planting her thumb on the supplemental word.

"Bless the man!" he replied. "Why doesn't he write plain? Why didn't you tell me before what he wanted? What did you let me break my neck to get this flag for when he wanted a box? If I didn't have any more sense than you've got I'd put broken glass on my head and let myself out for the back wall of a lunatic asylum!"

And Mr. Timmins dived into his chair, and snored lustily until bed time.

"Anyhow," thought Mrs. Timmins as she put the handkerchief away, "I can find out where he bought it, and exchange it for things for the baby."

And Mrs. Timmins fired another charge of ipecacuanha into the infant, hushing its startled cries, as Mr. Timmins, fast asleep, slid out of his chair like a load of coal.

Digitized by Google

The Toss of a Coin.

"LOST!"

The young man spoke quietly, but there was a somewhat hopeless ring in his voice. He leant back in his chair and looked at the man sitting opposite him.

"Since I have lost everything," he continued, "our play must now cease. You have won from me all I possess. Are you not satisfied?"

"Not quite," replied the other. He hesitated a moment, then continued: "It is true that I have won all your money and your property, but there is still something left to you which I would fain win."

Rupert Gainsford glanced at him inquiringly. The two men were seated in a spacious room, one of the suite set apart for Rupert's use in the Gainsford mansion whenever he chose to visit his uncle. He was a young fellow of about twenty-four years of age; his companion was Nicholas Harley, an older man, and one whose name sounded ill in the ears of the better class of the aristocracy of London as it was in the latter days of the reign of His Most Gracious Majesty, George III.

Owing to a service which he had accidentally been able to render Sir Henry Gainsford, Harley was an occasional visitor at Gainsford House. But of late his visits had been more frequent, and he had endeavoured to place himself on very friendly terms with the nephew and heir.

On this particular evening, Nicholas Harley had steadily urged Rupert to play cards with him in order to regain some of the money which he had lost during the previous few days. Rupert Gainsford was scarcely better than many of the young gallants of his time, and of late Nicholas had seemed to gain considerable ascendancy over him, with the result that his style of living had not improved. They had retired to this room rather early in the evening and had continued their play, while Sir Henry and his daughter Dorothy had gone earlier than usual to their own apartments.

All through the two hours' play luck had apparently been against Rupert. Little by little he had lost his money and his possessions, until finally he had thrown down the cards at the end of a game with the exclamation at the beginning of this story.

Nicholas Harley's remark that there was still something left to play for, excited Rupert's curiosity.

"What do you mean?" he asked. "I have lost everything."

"Listen," replied Nicholas. "You are betrothed to your cousin, Mistress Dorothy. I propose that we shall regard her as the stake for a fresh game and——"

"How dare you mention her so lightly!" cried Rupert angrily, as he pushed back his chair and sprang to his feet.

"Tut, tut, man!" said Harley as quietly as though the other had made no movement. "Sit down and listen to what I have to say. You are but ill-acquainted with me if you think I would speak lightly of your cousin."

Rupert sank back into the chair and waited for the other to continue. It struck him that there was an unusual ring of sincerity in the man's voice as he uttered the last words, and his anger cooled a little.

"You are betrothed to your cousin," continued Nicholas, "and the marriage has been planned, as I understand, ever since you were children. I know that you care but little, if at all, for your cousin in the way that a man should care for the woman who is to be his wife. With you, as with men generally, marriage is not a love affair, but a mere matter of course, the only conditions being that your bride shall be of equal rank at least, and that she shall have sufficient personal attractions to grace your household. Beyond that, you care nothing. Is not that true?"

"And presuming that it is true?" queried Rupert, ignoring the question.

Digitized by Google

"I desire to wed Mistress Dorothy," Harley went on, "and——"

But he was interrupted by a laugh from Rupert Gainsford.

"You!" sneered the young fellow. "The only recommendation you have is riches which have come into your possession—well, suddenly. You are not of noble family and your good looks—but I will not harass your feelings by referring to them!"

Although Harley raged inwardly under this criticism, he remained outwardly cool. It was his policy to be conciliatory, and in his determination he never allowed anything to spoil the attainment of his object.

"I grant," he said, "that I cannot boast of so comely an appearance or of such descent as yourself, but I can offer to your cousin that which you cannot—I can offer her love. You think that I stand but little chance of winning her affection, but I tell you that you do not understand the power of a man's love over a woman. That love will in time be returned by her, however improbable it may seem to you. It is in woman's nature to look for love, and when she sees that she is the object of a man's deep and undivided affection, her soul unconsciously goes out to him; the man's love has broken down all barriers, she disregards all else, and she loves him!"

He stopped abruptly, as though his feelings overcame him.

"Still, you don't tell me why you proposed her as the stake for a fresh game," remarked Rupert, moved by Harley's words and by the suppressed emotion evident in his voice. He still resented the proposal, but his curiosity and interest were aroused.

"While you are in the way," returned Harley, "I stand no chance of winning Mistress Dorothy. You may be as poor as a church mouse, but your uncle has set his heart upon the marriage."

"I am out of the way, since I have nothing now to offer her," replied Rupert. "I could not wed her in my present position, and I would not accept my uncle's charity. When he dies, I am heir to his property, but I have honour enough not to accept it now, although my kind-hearted uncle would give me all he possesses. And he is good for another twenty years yet—Heaven bless him! No, I have nothing to live for, and will seek death on the field in Spain or elsewhere."

"No, you will be in my way as long as you live—whether you be poor or rich," said Harley firmly. "With you dead, I could hope to gain Mistress Dorothy's hand. My love and Sir Henry's gratitude will help me. This is the stake I propose. You have told me that life is useless to you. I will put all that I have won from you against your life—that is: If you win the game you will re-enter into all your possessions; if you lose you will undertake to commit suicide within forty-eight hours and leave the way open to me."

It was a strange proposal, and Harley waited with ill-concealed anxiety for Rupert's reply. Rupert was in a frame of mind admirably adapted for the attainment of his companion's object; he was dejected and annoyed at his foolishness in allowing himself to be drawn into the excitement of gambling to the extent of utterly ruining himself and spoiling a life that offered such bright prospects. He could not now bear to face his cousin and his uncle and to show himself in the light of a profligate, and his companion's proposal offered just the chance of retrieving himself.

If he lost, what did it matter that he was bound to commit suicide? He might as well end his career that way and at once, as go off and die in battle or of fever in some foreign country. There was something else—a feeling that was new to him; he had lost Dorothy! And here was a chance of winning her back.

"I accept!" he cried impulsively. "Let us try again and see if fortune will favour you to the end, or whether she will turn upon you like the fickle jade she is said to be. At any rate, she has been steadfast in her attitude towards me."

Nicholas Harley gathered up the cards with a deep breath and prepared to shuffle them, but Gainsford stopped him.

"No more of those cards," he said decisively. "I have had enough of them. We will decide this stake by a throw of the dice, and finish quickly."

"No," objected Harley. "I play not with dice. Let us decide this either by the cards or, as you wish to settle it quickly, by the toss of a coin. I will place the coin in this box, shake it up, toss it up to the ceiling and allow it to fall on the ground. If the head be uppermost, I win. If it be tails, the stake is yours. I will toss it up from this box, because it is easy for a man to influence the result if he places the coin this or that way up and spins it from his forefinger and thumb. Do you agree to that?"

"So be it!" returned Gainsford. "You must furnish the coin, for I doubt whether I have one to offer—at least, not a worthy one. It is a big stake; a wife for you, or life and a wife for me."

"Oh, I have one," replied Harley rather quickly, slipping his hand into his pocket and dropping a silver piece into the box.

He shook the box vigorously, and then gave it a jerk which sent the coin spinning into the air.

There was a moment's breathless silence as the men saw the coin descending, and each bent eagerly as it touched the floor and rolled against the leg of the table.

"Heads!" cried Harley triumphantly.

Rupert glared at the coin, then with a stifled groan returned to his seat. The other picked up the coin quickly to replace it in his pocket; but in his excitement he let it slip to the carpeted floor without noticing it.

It was all over, and he was bound in honour to take his own life within forty-eight hours. Rupert sat motionless in the chair, scarcely conscious of what was passing. He saw, as in the distance, the figure of his companion going towards the door, and a faint sound of a parting greeting smote upon his ear. He had a vague feeling that Harley was leaving the house instead of passing the night there, as he had been invited to do. When at last he did rouse himself, the light of the day was peeping in through his blinds and curtains.

He got up and walked about the room. Should he put an end to his life there, or should he leave the house at once and destroy himself in some quiet spot outside London? His dull eyes wandered over the carpet, and suddenly rested upon something that glittered in the morning light. Mechanically he picked it up, and as he recognised the silver piece which had decided his fate, he put it into the pocket on the left of his waistcoat.

"Harley, at least, will recognise me by that, I expect," he muttered with a bitter smile. "Yes," he went on, after a pause, "I will put an end to my wretched existence here, I cannot live another half-hour in this torment!"

He walked into the inner room and took from its case a rather clumsy pistol. Surveying it meditatively, he slowly returned to the outer room.

Digitized by Google

"This will be quicker than a knife," he said half aloud. "Where shall the bullet go? Into my heart, or through my stupid head? Into my heart, I think, since it is incapable of love, if Harley is correct."

He held the pistol within three or four inches of his left breast and prepared to pull the trigger. He looked round hastily and then fired, his hand trembling slightly as he did so. He felt the concussion, which caused him to stagger a step, and he heard a smash as the bullet crashed through the looking-glass on the chimney-piece at his side.

For a moment he could not understand what had happened. He had fired at his heart, as he thought, and had felt the bullet strike him, yet here he was unharmed save for a pain in his left arm. He was gazing in a dull manner at the still smoking pistol when the door of the room was pushed open and a beautiful girl of twenty, whose face betokened great alarm, rushed into the apartment.

"Oh, Rupert, what is it!" she asked in terrified accents.

Then catching sight of the smoking pistol she recoiled in horror.

"Rupert! Rupert! What does it mean?" she asked again.

But the guilty look upon his haggard face was sufficient answer for her. Instinctively she realised what had taken place, and staggering to the chair occupied on the previous night by Harley she sank into it, buried her face in her hands and wept.

The noise of hurried footsteps outside recalled Rupert to himself, and he hastened to the door in time to prevent the entry of the affrighted servants, whom he assured that his pistol had gone off by accident as he was handling it. Closing the door again he walked slowly back to where his cousin was still sitting, and tried to calm her with tender words, uttered in a shamed and hesitating manner.

"What does it mean?" she repeated, rising and facing him with tears still in her eyes. "Why have you been so wicked as to make an attempt upon your life?"

Slowly and in a shame-faced manner, although he tried to appear unconcerned and even haughty, Rupert explained the cause of his action. As he spoke, although he did not mention the exact reason of the last act of the previous evening's gambling, a flush overspread Dorothy's cheeks and was in turn reflected on his own.

"I have lost everything," he said, "and as life now is worthless to me I decided to be rid of it. What have I to live for?"

Dorothy essayed to speak, but her words were inaudible. She cast a tell-tale glance at him and her eyes drooped, while the flush deepened on her cheeks. But Rupert misunderstood the reason of her agitation.

"Yes," he said bitterly. "It is true, I have nothing to live for now. Even you turn from me as I knew you would."

"Rupert! Do not speak so cruelly!" cried Dorothy, raising her eyes to his and clasping her hands. "Oh, why will you force me to speak these words—why will you force me to tell you that I want you to live for my sake, that I—I—love you, Rupert?" Then overcome by her emotion, and her cheeks burning with shame, she would have fallen back into the chair had not her cousin, with a wild impulse, his heart stirred by a sensation that was new to him, clasped her in his arms and pressed her passionately to his breast.

For a brief space they remained thus lost in ecstasy, but it was not long ere memory returned to Rupert and he gently pushed her from him.

"It's too late, Dorothy!" he cried passionately. "I have pledged my word, and whatever I am I will not fail to keep that. Had Fortune favoured me, that pledge would now have been kept, but something—how could it have happened? Why did not the bullet pierce my heart as I had intended?"

His hand wandered to his left side as if seeking some explanation, and he felt the coin which he had placed in his pocket. The truth flashed across his mind at the contact, and he drew forth the silver piece and held it towards Dorothy.

"This is the coin by which I lost my life, and yet it has been instrumental in saving it this morning. I cannot do better than give it to you, Dorothy, and ask you to keep it in memory of me. For the accident of this morning cannot cancel a gentleman's word of honour."

He handed it to her, and she took it mechanically, shuddering as she touched it. As she raised it from his hand she turned it, and then uttered an exclamation.

"What a strange coin, Rupert!" she cried. "How could you decide a bet with such a one as this? It has two heads—it is alike both sides."

Rupert started and quickly took the coin from her hand.

"Yes," he said slowly, "it is a strange coin. I will communicate with Harley about this. And now, Dorothy, dear, go back to your room and leave me. I must be alone."

Dorothy hesitated and placed her hand upon his arm.

"I cannot go unless you will promise me—not to——"

"I promise you very willingly, my sweet Dorothy," answered Rupert, as he took her in his arms and kissed her again. "Be not afraid for me now, for this piece of money has brought life, a new life, for Rupert Gainsford. All will be well for us yet."

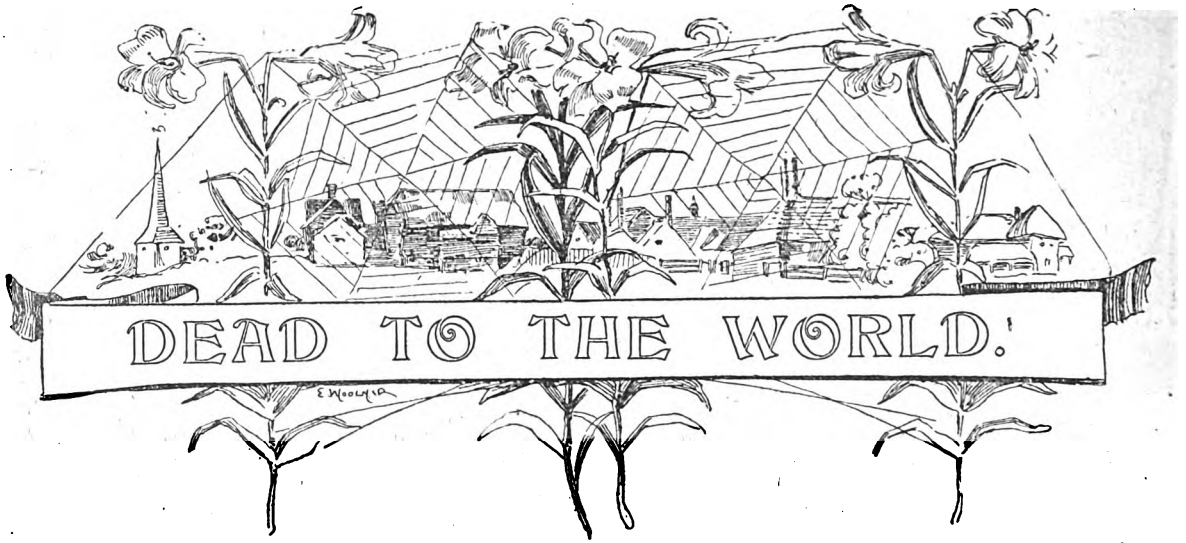
She left the room, and Rupert seated himself at the table and wrote in clumsy style, for his hand was not experienced in the use of the pen, a short letter to Nicholas Harley. He was about to sign it, hesitating whether to add anything more, when he noticed on the table one of the cards, which Harley had left behind—for it was his own pack. The card was half hidden by a wine-bottle which had been set upon it.

Rupert took it up and examined it. A peculiar expression flitted across his face, and he continued his letter. When finished, it read as follows:

"I am returning to you a silver piece which you dropped here by accident instead of replacing it in your pocket at the close of last night's play. It is a curious coin, and one which no doubt has great value in your eyes. In return for its restoration I require you to cancel all my obligations to you. As I have a witness of this transaction, it will be useless for you to dispute it. On hearing from you, I will also return one of the pack of cards belonging to you, with which we played last night. It is a pity that such a pack should be spoilt by the loss of one card, for I notice that this one has a peculiar marking on the back, which may account for the good fortune which has attended you during the past few days. Perhaps it is a gambler's superstition which induces you to play with your own cards!"

G. MERRIAM.

Digitized by Google



AMONG all the fatalities with which fate has crossed the lives of men, there was never one more strange than that which befell George Weston in the month of August, A.D. 1893.

He was the junior member of the firm of Hamlin and Weston, of Wellington, New Zealand, and was going home to dinner, in good spirits, about five o'clock in the afternoon.

His firm was negotiating for the purchase of a tract of timber growing some four hundred miles away, and he was to start on the following morning on a tour of inspection, which would take several weeks. He loved the life of the woods, and anticipated good sport, as well as a profitable business journey.

Near the telephone building in Clifford Street he was stopped by an old man with a long grey beard, the face of a Greek philosopher, and large eyes as calm and clear as those of a toad. He was a foreigner of some kind, and his speech was a queer jumble of words, that sounded as though he had learnt the language from the dictionary. He pointed his long finger at Weston's face, and called his attention to a twitching of the muscles of the cheek, which recurred at intervals, and in an impressive manner, pronounced this to be incipient paralysis, sure to develop with fatal result, unless arrested in time. The cure, certain and speedy, was contained in the small phial which he placed in Weston's hand.

"My name and address," said he, "are on the scroll about the phial, and when success is assured, with your sense of justice I leave my compensation to you."

With a bow he was gone, disappearing round the corner of the street.

Now, the one persistent annoyance of Weston's life was this spasmodic contraction of his facial muscles. It had been present ever since he could remember, and though causing him no real inconvenience it had always worried him. It was the restiveness and irritation which men of perfect health and robust physique always feel at some trifling blemish, and he had tried all manner of means to get rid of it.

He had tired of regular medical advisers, who made light of the matter, and bravely encountered the good-natured ridicule of his friends, and had taken to nostrums and patent medicines, and swallowed unlimited doses of infallible remedies, with no other result than the occasional derangement of his powerful digestion.

The peculiarly venerable and striking appearance of the stranger impressed him that, although at first he had no thought of using this new specific, the possibility of his doing so was in his mind when he reached home.

Mrs. Weston was a matter-of-fact woman, who believed in all things respectable and orthodox, and had no faith in anything else; and she was not in the least impressed by her husband's eloquent description of the venerable and majestic appearance of the stranger, but unhesitatingly pronounced him a swindling quack, and advised her husband to have nothing to do with his medicine, which was quite likely to prove to be some slow poison, that would either kill him, or give him some incurable drug habit.

Thus rebuffed, Weston dropped the subject, and went about his preparations for the morrow's journey.

As the train was to leave very early in the morning, it was arranged that he should occupy their spare bedroom downstairs, so that he might go out without disturbing his family at an unearthly hour.

Alone in his room, after bidding his wife good-bye, Weston brought out the phial and took off the paper that was wrapped round it. It was an odd name on it, which added to the impression its owner had already made upon him.

"Iconax Bagristus, M.D., Ph.D." The directions were simple: "Half-an-ounce. Take whole on retiring." The contents of the phial were colourless, and an application of the tongue proved them to be tasteless.

After a moment's hesitation, he drank it at a single swallow, put the empty phial and paper on the dressing-table, and went to bed.

He fell asleep almost immediately, and so profound was his slumber that, when aroused by the rattle of the alarm clock, he sprang to the floor with a feeling of being late. He seemed to have slept days instead of hours. He dressed quickly, and noiselessly left the house; and, as he inhaled the fresh air of early morning, he felt strangely vigorous and young, and had a schoolboy's impulse to break into a run as he went down the silent street.

That evening he arrived at a town on the coast,

Digitized by Google

whence, on the following day, he was to take passage on a small steamer that made weekly trips to fishing stations a hundred miles, or thereabouts, farther along the coast.

On reaching the end of his first day's journey, Weston found that the boat left on her day trip earlier than he supposed, in fact, would pull out about ten o'clock the next morning, which left him but short time to make his necessary preparations—which consisted in laying in a stock of provisions, and securing the services of a couple of men as assistants. For this reason, it came about that he could only write a brief note to his wife, announcing his safe arrival, and which in his hurry he forgot to post, and carried off with him to the woods.

He left the steamer at the mouth of a small river, some thirty miles from his destination, and with his guides and stores, made his way a day's journey up stream, where they pitched their camp.

Here, for the next two weeks, Weston lived the life of a wild Indian, and no Indian ever roamed the woods in a more savage state of health and spirits. He surprised himself, and tired out his tough companions, by his strength and endurance.

There were some features of his physical condition so marked as to be rather startling. The facial convulsions had wholly disappeared, which was a great relief to his mind. Then there were changes in the matter of his taste for various articles of food—a decided disinclination for many little luxuries and knick-knacks for which he had formerly had a liking—and a general tendency of his appetite in the direction of plain articles of diet. He had been a smoker for years, but now discovered that his taste for tobacco was gone.

All this was very well, but there were some other things that seemed uncanny, and nearly gave him a turn when he first noticed them.

Like everybody else, he had various scars on his person, tokens of the scratches, cuts, and bruises he had received in the chance medley of life. These had all disappeared. Even the anchor that he had, when a boy, paid a sailor to tattoo on his arm was gone! His body was as free from blemish as that of a new born baby.

And there was something else he had noticed shortly after leaving home. He had a ring with a ruby setting that his partner Hamlin had given him the day he was twenty-one—when he became a member of the firm of Hamlin and Weston. It fitted easily at the time, but his hands had grown since then, and for several years the ring had been a fixture; and yet it was gone! And what added to his surprise, was that there was no trace or mark on his finger to show that it had ever been there!

But his high spirits easily dispelled all unpleasant feelings caused by these outer occurrences, and the enjoyment of his daily life was but little disturbed by them.

The days passed swiftly, and in two weeks his work was done, and he returned to the steamer and again took passage; and the first thing he did when he landed from her was to go to the post office, where he met with a great disappointment.

"Nothing," said the clerk, after shuffling a pile of letters.

This was so unaccountable, that Weston was sure there was a mistake, and asked the clerk to look again, and that official, being good-natured, did look again, and very carefully, but with the same result.

Now, by pre-arrangement, there should have been letters from his partner about this very business in hand, and it had seemed certain that there would at least be half-a-dozen from his wife, who it will be remembered had heard nothing from him since he left home.

It was all so unexpected that Weston had a vague idea that there had been some kind of cataclysm in his native city that had suspended ordinary pursuits and avocations. To ease his mind he bought a paper, which was of the issue of the day before, and the first thing he saw was a heading in big capitals, and under that something which threw some light on the matter.

COMMITTED FOR TRIAL.

OUR readers have not forgotten the recent death of Mr. George Weston, of the well-known firm of Hamlin and Weston, and the facts that came out at the inquest, resulting in the arrest of Dr. Iconax Bagristus, a quack doctor, of Johnson Avenue, charged with the murder of Mr. Weston.

The case came up for hearing yesterday, and the doctor was committed for trial. The case will be in the list for the next Sessions, which begins next week; it may, however, be postponed.

Weston gave a long whistle.

"Well, here's food for thought! Charged with the murder of Mr. George Weston! Facts which came out at the inquest! How the dickens could they hold an inquest without the body?"

But however mystifying all this, it was evident that the same cause that had put Dr. Bagristus in legal jeopardy, had interfered with Weston's correspondence, and he was not long in deciding that the sooner he appeared at home the better it would be for all concerned.

He looked at the time tables, and he found that the first train for him would leave at ten o' clock in the evening. He then hunted up the back numbers of the papers to learn what he could of the origin of this mystery. He found the starting point in the evening paper of the day he left home; and if there was a trace of amusement in his first impressions, it vanished when he read the big headlines that now made his eyes open widely and almost stopped his breath.

This is what he read:

ANOTHER MYSTERY.

SUDDEN DEATH OF MR. GEORGE WESTON.

Then followed a column of details, from which it appeared that Mrs. Weston, on going to her husband's room in the morning, had found him dead in bed, and the empty phial on the dressing-table. Full particulars of the situation of the room—his reasons for occupying it that night—the position and appearance of the body—his conversation with his wife about the medicine, etc., were given with the customary elaboration of detail, and left Weston nothing to learn concerning what was happening in his house while he was being whirled away from it on that eventful day.

Had he possessed only ordinary physical and mental stamina, he would have fainted, so sudden and powerful was the shock he experienced. As it was, the room seemed whirling round and his chair sinking under him.

What a weight oppressed him! Was he himself? Yes, he could not doubt that, but who, or what, was it his wife found dead in bed? What monstrous thing had happened?

For a time he sat listless and passive, wondering, but resigned to what should come next. This state soon passed away, and he began to feel more like himself, but burning with impatience to get home and grapple with this shadowy, nameless thing of evil. But he could do nothing to hurry his departure, and he judged it useless to telegraph; so, schooling himself to patience, he looked over the papers of later dates for the further development of the case.

Digitized by Google

He was soon in possession of all the facts, and while his wonder was not lessened, he read what followed with composure.

In the next paper he found an account of the inquest. There was a post-mortem, and the eminent medical gentlemen who made it testified to the appearance of the body. There were indications of convulsions, the cause of which they were not prepared to specify, but which would doubtless appear when the chemist had finished his analysis. Pending the investigation, the inquest was adjourned.

Three days later was an account of the funeral, and if Weston had any post-mortem vanity it was fully gratified. The next issue told of the reassembling of the coroner's jury, and the report of the chemical experts, which sounded indefinite, and led one to surmise that the scientific gentlemen were non-plussed; and the gentlemen of the jury were evidently of that way of thinking, for they rendered a verdict of death from unknown causes.

This gave Weston a very complete history of his case, and he could think of but one plausible explanation—and that was preposterous and utterly absurd—that some tramp had entered his house after he left, and died suddenly, and the body had been mistaken for his.

But speculation was useless; all he could do was to wait.

The next evening he alighted at the well-known station. He had learnt from one of the papers that his wife and children had gone home to her father; but he decided that before following her he would see his partner, who was a bachelor and lived in rooms connected with their office; and there Weston found him alone, which was what he wanted.

Hamlin was a theosophist, and held to all sorts of occultism; but no matter what one's theoretical belief may be, no living man who had just buried his dead friend can, with composure, see that friend walk into his room with a travelling bag in his hand, and hear his hail of:

"Well, how are you, old fellow?"

Hamlin was reading, and when he heard the voice he gave a sudden start and turned half round to look at his visitor. There was another start, and a quick drawing of the breath, as Weston came nearer and stood looking down at him. At this, Hamlin passed his hand over his face and got up.

"I beg your pardon, but I did not hear you knock, and you startled me—you so much resemble—another person."

At this Weston broke out laughing.

"Well, John, this is good; but I feel rather serious about it on a count of Kate; she is in trouble, and I want to go to her as soon as possible—to-night if I can get a train."

And then, as Hamlin was silent, and looking at him strangely:

"Come! We'll have the fun later—just now I am feeling very anxious about Kate."

"I think," said Hamlin, speaking very slowly. "there is a mistake——"

"I should say there was a mistake!" broke in Weston. "A very big mistake; and how in the name of bedlam all you people—even you and Kate—could make such a blunder passes my understanding."

"May I inquire, sir, what you are talking about, and who you are, and what you want?"

There was a shade of irritability in Hamlin's voice, and Weston's face assumed a look of surprise.

"Who am I? Well, I think you and I ought to know each other by this time!"

"Look here!" said Hamlin in a sharp tone. "I don't know who you are, nor what your object may be in coming here. Your resemblance to my late partner is so remarkable that I was startled when you came into the room; but I wish to say plainly that if you purpose to make that resemblance the basis of any stupid joke, it is in very bad taste. If you have any other object, you will oblige me by stating it, or else go about your business."

At this Weston gave a cry and sank into a chair. A new and alarming view of his case was dawning on him. Hitherto he had supposed that he had only to show himself, to be recognised and received. He was seized with dread, and a fear came upon him that he had lost his place in the human family; and as he thought of his family he gave another cry, and stretched out his shaking hands towards his partner.

"For Heaven's sake, John, don't say that you don't know me! Don't say that I am not your old friend, George Weston!"

The relations between these two men were closer than those of ordinary business associates. Hamlin was fifteen years Weston's senior, and had been an elder brother to him all his life.

There is a Freemasonry in human love: certain undefinable gestures—inflexions of the voice—glances of the eye, and other signs that cannot be simulated; and as Weston sat there, with his outstretched quivering hands, there was in his face the old coaxing pleading look that Hamlin knew, and that he had seen and felt so many, many years ago, when the orphan boy he loved had made some appeal from his judgment to his affection. And now this familiar look penetrated his armour of common-sense and went to his heart.

"Hang it all! I don't know what to do, nor what to think! A week ago I buried my friend and brother, George Weston; and to-night he apparently comes back to me in life and health! Am I dreaming? Or out of my senses? Speak to me, George—for I can't help calling you so—tell me something, can't you?"

"Now you give me hope," said Weston with a great sob of relief. "I thought I was lost. Sit down and I will tell you all about it."

He sat down, and Weston told his story. When it was finished, Hamlin got up and began walking about the room.

As the train which he intended to take to follow his wife left before business hours the next morning, and they wanted to see Murray, the lawyer who was defending Bagristus, they went to his house, and there they encountered a rebuff that annihilated all hopes.

The lawyer listened to their story with evident contempt and indignation, and at its conclusion bluntly told Weston that he considered him an impostor, and almost rudely refused to enter into any discussion of the matter.

As he accompanied them to the door he relaxed a little and spoke a few words to Hamlin; Weston he utterly ignored.

"You need have no concern as to Dr. Bagristus. He is not charged with murder; only with manslaughter, and they can't convict him of that. They have found no poison in the stomach, and they will not. He will be acquitted."

Digitized by Google

They went away, and for some time walked in silence, the same depressing thought in the minds of both. At length Weston gave utterance to it in a voice that was like a groan:

"It's no use, John! No one will believe that I am George Weston—not even Kate. For how can I prove my identity?"

"I am afraid it is so."

"I know it is," continued Weston bitterly, "I can see it all now. There are innumerable and unsurmountable obstacles, which must for ever separate me from Kate. I am a lost man!"

"Don't say that, George. We must think; we must plan; but first let us get back to my rooms."

Not another word was spoken until they reached his quarters; and then of a sudden Hamlin seemed to go crazy. He turned upon Weston and shook him until his hat fell off.

"What idiots! What are our heads good for, I wonder? The thing is so simple that it is strange we didn't think of it at first. You must marry Kate!"

"Marry Kate! What do you mean?"

"Just that exactly. You must marry her again, not now—not at once—but after a while—after a suitable time has elapsed."

"I don't see how that will help matters," said Weston.

"Why, it's all plain enough. You go away now, you disappear, in fact you haven't appeared much in your present state. You take a new name, let's see, your mother's name was Barnard; take that, George Barnard. In about a year George Barnard appears, gets acquainted with George Weston's widow, courts her, marries her, and lives happily ever after! What is the matter with that?"

"Why nothing, I suppose; but it is hardly satisfactory either. It is so long to wait, and I don't like the notion of Kate's being willing to marry another fellow. And then, I shall go dangling through life as her second husband, and step-father of my own children."

"But you can't get back on the old footing. That is gone by. You are legally dead—and you have no place among these living men, and you can't crowd in anywhere. You are out of the world, and the only way to get back is to marry into it. And you can even get your name back. It is not unusual for the groom to take the bride's name, and I think I shall insist on that, so that our firm can keep its old style."

"Oh, Kate, Kate!" groaned Weston, "how the time will drag!"

"Let it drag," said Hamlin, "so long as it keeps at it. I will keep you posted as to events. My hand shall be over Kate, and I will see that nothing interferes with our plans. In a short year you will be back, and then all our troubles will be

In the deep bosom of the ocean buried.

Courage, my friend; let us face the inevitable. George Weston is dead. Long live George Weston!"

While they were at breakfast the next morning, Hamlin took up the newspaper, and when he had opened it, gave a yell.

"For Heaven's sake, what is this! Suicide of Dr. Iconax Bagristus! The murderer of George Weston committed suicide in his cell last evening!"

"I can't understand that."

Just then there was a knock at the door and a messenger gave him a letter from Murray.

DEAR SIR,

Since your call in the matter of Bagristus, an event has occured that leads me to think that I owe you an apology for my somewhat rude reception of your communication. Having occasion later yesterday evening to visit my client at the jail, I mentioned to him (for what reason I do not know) the statement which you had made. This threw him at once into a state of extraordinary excitement, the moving cause of which seemed to be his belief that he had at last (and, as I inferred, by accident), made the great discovery he had so long sought—the elixir of life. His mental exaltation was so great that I could transact no business with him, and so came away, leaving him in what I should term a state of ecstasy. I was therefore much surprised to hear that he had committed suicide. At once I repaired to the jail and inspected and identified the body. I remained there half-an-hour, and as the night was pleasant decided to walk home. I had proceeded as far as the Library, and was passing it, when a man who was walking quite fast, came behind me, and put his hand on my shoulder. I turned quickly and saw—Dr. Bagristus! I make this statement as a statement of a fact as it then appeared to me. He gave me a paper, spoke a few words in a hurried and incoherent manner, and then disappeared round the corner.

I went to a light and read the paper, which was as follows:

"HONOURED ADVOCATE,

"I will not abide the slow progress of the interminable law. The Great Secret is to me opened, and I am of all things the possessor. To elude the myrmidons of the prison was in the darkness easy. Of your high courtesy, accept my humble thanks for your great goodness.

"ICONAX BAGRISTUS, M.D., Ph.D."

I returned to the jail as quickly as possible. It had not been more than twenty minutes since I left it. I found the attendants still busied about the disposition of the body. I again inspected the body; I found that no strangers had been seen about the place, nor had anything unusual occurred. I then left the jail and went to my home. I have no explanation to make, nor opinion to give as to this affair. And as, on reflection, it seems to me that an apology is due to you, as before stated, the same is therefore tendered.

Yours truly,
THOMAS MURRAY.

The foregoing events occurred in the summer of 1893.

In the autumn of the next year, the following notice appeared in the papers:

MARRIED.—On the 10th inst., by the Rev. John Pontifex, at the bride's residence in Sparrow Street, George Barnard of Duluth, and Katherine, widow of the late George Weston, of this city.

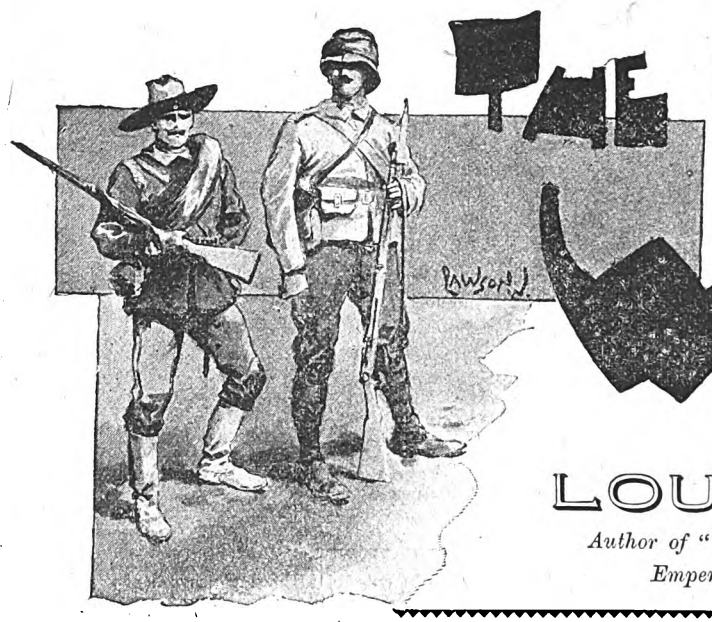
GUY SOUTHWELL.

MR. ASKIN: "How did you get rid of that odious little fellow Bookwright, who talked shop?"
Miss Playfair: "I talked shopping."

JACK (who has popped): "It takes you a long time to decide."
Sallie: "I know. And I've about concluded to wear a demi-train of white chiffon over white silk, and have no bridesmaids."

MRS. YOUNGBRIDE: "How is it that you charge a penny a quart more than the other milkman?"
Waterpotts: "Madam, you must remember that all my milk is hand-milked. That, of course, makes the price a little higher."

Digitized by Google



THE FINAL WAR

BY

LOUIS TRACY.

Author of "The Shadow Hand," "An American Emperor," "The Lost Provinces," etc.

CHAPTER XLIX. (continued).

THERE was a general disposition to good-humoured riot throughout the camp that night, and the fiery colour-sergeant made little effort to check the spirits of his festive company. Jest ran high, and many an improvised song dealt, as Tommy loves to deal, with the delicate diplomatic position that lay before the two chief actors. One of them ended thus, to a catchy tune which was quickly taken up:

When I saw our William, damme,
He was blubbing for his mammy,
And he pined for German sausage and for stuerkraut in pails.
So says I unto the Kaiser:
"You may go away to-day, sir,
But you'd best look out to-morrow when you meet the Prince of Wales."

And there was indeed cause for both these distinguished personages to look to their conference on the morrow with some anxiety. If the Prince's mission was delicate, the Emperor's was still more so. True, he had not to meet the representative of England as a captive. That indignity was spared him. But Dr. Jameson's escapade had considerably embarrassed his situation. It was difficult to plead the equality of a commander surrounded by an unbeaten army.

It was not what could be said, but what neither would care to say, that formed the difficulty. The Prince of Wales could not hint that the Kaiser's cause was lost, and that the latter was suing as a defeated general. The Kaiser dared not confessed that terms of peace were only such as the British Government might insist on. Beneath the surface of courteous words there was bound to be a subtle war of hidden meaning. It was to be a contest of tact; and the Kaiser reflected not with overmuch equanimity, that tact was not a particularly striking element in his character.

An hour before noon on the next day, the Emperor set out with a small staff of officers to the memorable farm-house midway between Westhausen and Lauenburg. He had taken the precaution early in the day of laying bare his heart to Hohenlohe. The German Chancellor did not mince matters as he gave his earnest advice.

"Peace! Before all things, peace!" he exclaimed at the close of his remarks. "We must not forget, sire, that fencing is waste of force and fights against us, when the conclusion is obvious. It is better to accept with grace than irritate by useless argument. Your Majesty will use the occasion well, and miss no opening that the English Prince may give you; but I would humbly recommend that, if you fail to achieve what you propose, it is better to submit to the generosity of Great Britain than incur her anger."

The Kaiser had no retort to make, but thanked his counsellor submissively.

When he reached the rendezvous and entered the farm-house, past which he remembered so well riding but three nights before, he had time to collect his thoughts and to ruminate, somewhat mournfully, on the task before him.

He wished that the hours he had spent upon the elaboration of ornate proclamations, swollen with plethoric terms, had been bestowed upon acquiring the nice distinctions of subtle speech, for he had cause to fear the unassuming tongue of his opponent. It was rich in resource; it was strewn with unsuspected pitfalls and deceptive turns. Danger lurked in a compliment, and in concession there was guile. The Prince, beyond all men he had ever met, possessed the rare gift of tact. He lured his adversaries to their ruin. He had an innocence of phrase that was a snare unto the thoughtless, and in his honey there was gall.

And then the Kaiser reflected that the English language had an embarrassing wealth of terms; it boasted as many words as any three Continental tongues. Each one of these was an armed man waiting to do him battle. He was hopelessly outnumbered before he entered into the engagement.

Half-an-hour had elapsed when an orderly announced the arrival of the Prince of Wales. The young monarch rose to welcome his relative and foe.

All others retired.

The Emperor noticed that his visitor made him formal greeting and did not offer him his hand.

Colouring slightly, he opened the conference.

"Permit me, first, your Royal Highness," he said, "to thank the British Goverment for its generosity in giving me my liberty. It was a chivalrous action worthy of a generous foe."

"Pardon me," replied the Prince gravely. "It is for us to regret that you did not communicate your desire for an armistice to the Commander-in-Chief of our Second Army Corps. It would have prevented an unfortunate occurrence which I at least deeply regret."

"For that I do not care a jot!" exclaimed the Kaiser, with warmth. "I am ready at all times to accept the fortunes of war upon my own person."

Digitized by Google

"You misunderstand me," was the reply. "Much as I am concerned by that mishap, I was thinking of the preparations carried out at Southampton, which an early telegram would have delayed. Your message reached Her Majesty too late to prevent the embarkation and dispatch of a corps of over 150,000 additional troops, largely American, which I presume are now in the act of landing upon the quays of Hamburg!"

The Emperor started. Here was a new and unpleasant factor in the game. He had practically lost even his superiority of force.

"Let us forget such circumstances for a time," he begged. "Believe me, I have long commenced to regret my haste in co-operating in such an enterprise. The war is a terrible blunder. I feel it deeply. You will scarcely doubt my sincerity?"

"Not in the least, your Majesty," returned the Prince heartily, "not even if you were to insist that it dated as far back as the battle of Worthing."

This delicate thrust brought flames of colour to the Kaiser's cheeks.

"You are severe, sir," he said. "I embarked upon this war in error. I imagined it essential to the extension of the German Empire. I was wrong. My error I have seen most clearly, and it is surely not unnatural that I should hasten to confess it."

An orderly announced the arrival of the Prince of Wales.

"By no means," observed the Prince sententiously. "Time frequently works great changes in our opinions."

"Before matters have reached a climax," continued the Emperor, "whilst Germany still boasts her inexhaustible armies, whilst yet a decisive blow is lacking which should place either of us in an inferior position, I have begged that we may meet and seek some conclusion that may leave the honour of either of us untouched. Germany has nothing to gain by a continuance of this frightful struggle."

"So it would seem!" exclaimed the Prince sternly. "But we have."

"You?"

"Does it not strike you, your Majesty, that you have thundered at our gates a question? That question demands an answer. It can never be left to conjecture. You assailed us wantonly, without warning. You confess you had no reason for your swift assault. And now, driven back to your own dominions, you tell us you were wrong, and suggest that we should sheath our swords."

"In the interests of peace."

"You are a convincing advocate of peace, sir!" was the Prince's quick retort. "I fancy the argument was somewhat rudely opened!"

"And what do you gain by the continuance of war?"

"This is what we gain. A peremptory question demands a definite and final reply. You have asked whether the British Empire—I may now add, the Saxon race—can hope to withstand the shock of allied enmity. You have chosen a magnificent stage for the discussion of this delicate point. The whole world acts as audience. We cannot, we will not disappoint it. If no longer our policy of peace can secure the safety of mankind, we will at least make it certain that the savage vindication to which we have been driven shall be conclusive. These problems, clouded by the subtle rancour and secret conspiracies of European states, can no longer rest in dubiety. This war is the Final War. If we have to strike, it shall be a stroke to kill the very hope of a successor. We will not leave such doubts seething in the cauldron of international distrust and hatred. They will be resolved once for all, and no one shall again dare to raise them!"

The Emperor grew uneasy before the stern logic of the Prince.

"Whatever your purpose," he declared, "I maintain that Germany is the natural ally of England!"

"A natural ally!" exclaimed the Prince. "An alliance like that of conspirators, then, which must be sealed in blood! An alliance written on the plains of Stralsund, and scored upon the stones of Neuminster! Let us be frank your Majesty. I still await your proposals."

"I will make them clear," replied the Kaiser with hesitation, "if I have not already done so. We meet on equal terms. We both hate this infamous war of brethren. Let us gather in our forces and proclaim a peace. It is Germany's policy to seek the hand of England. Surely you can recognise in this meeting a desire that is not false? Do you fear our sincerity when our nation is still behind us?"

"We do not fear Germany, sir," declared the Prince proudly. "The German people are not with you. But who will be responsible for the vagaries of their statesmen?"

"Not their statesmen," hastily interrupted Wilhelm. "I take the blame upon myself."

"I cannot waste time in distinguishing between those of her advisers who are statesmen and those who are not!" was the rapid retort.

"Will not a peace suffice you?"

"By no means!"

"Then what do you demand?"

"We demand," said the Prince, "a complete settlement of the question which this war has raised."

"What question?" asked the Kaiser.

"Do you mean that you have forgotten it? Why, it is you who have suggested it. You have declared that it is necessary to decide whether England is to be supreme throughout the world! We have never propounded such a point. But as you demand it shall be determined, there is nothing left but to determine it."

"Why, sir," exclaimed the embarrassed sovereign, "you speak as a conqueror."

"Nay; that would be premature! I do not wish to be compelled to."

"Your argument is obvious. You contend that we have to settle whether England shall control the affairs of Europe. You are surely not serious. England is not a Continental power!"

"True," replied the Prince shortly, "it is a position we should have owed to you!"

"But do you insist on dominating the world!"

"You misunderstand me," said the Prince. "Let me again review the position. This challenge, thrown out at us we have accepted. You have forced us to take the settlement of European problems in our own hands, or to have our own position s ttled by you. There was no alternative. It is a tremendous task. We have not shrunk from it. These problems shall indeed be settled. There shall be no more questionings. When we have settled them we shall be content to withdraw, but only when we have made it impossible for any selfish power to raise them again. There is but one condition, therefore, of a treaty of peace. It is that you side with England in her task. You must accept her as an arbitrator and support her award. If you do not, it is clear we are still at war."

"And German interest——?"

"German interests, no less than the interests of France Russia, Austria, Turkey, and the remaining countries, are involved in the delicate problem we have to settle. You cannot be exempt. Whether you will gain, or whether you will lose, must necessarily depend upon the general justice of the policy you have pursued."

"But I should prefer to know more of the details of your scheme."

"Pardon me," replied the Prince coldly; "such details I cannot give, even if I would. We must consult America. She is our ally, and has armed herself. I understand that more than three millions of her people are waiting to be carried over to these shores to take their part in the grim preliminaries!"

The Prince of Wales . . held out his hand.

The Emperor paused. He felt his position to be hopeless. Each step made it worse; and what he heard convinced him only the more of the madness of his act and the imperative call for immediate peace.

"Let me understand," he continued at last. "You say that you will withdraw when the guarantees for final peace satisfy you. What guarantee can you deem sufficient?"

"That," observed the Prince, "is no difficult matter. We shall demand immediate and complete . . disarmament."

"But," cried the Kaiser, "who can effect such a consummation?"

"We," was the laconic reply.

"But how, if you are not in arms?"

"It seems," said the Prince, "that England and America will necessarily remain in arms till the end is effected."

"Heavens!" exclaimed the amazed monarch. "Do you ask that we shall lay ourselves bare to an armed foe?"

"You do not trust us yet, it appears," was the Prince's response. "Trust is the prime condition of peace. I regret I have no other terms to offer."

For many long minutes the Kaiser remained wrapped in thought, torn by a thousand cruel perplexities. Yet he could see no issue to them any way. The insuperable power of the British race confronted him. It was hopeless longer to dream of a happy encounter.

And after all could not Britain be trusted? Her history stood behind her: She had ever been the advocate of peace, the champion of liberty. A free, emancipated Europe! It was a strange and inspiring thought! A new era of hope of industry, of progress.

Beyond all came the ominous words of the Chancellor to his mind.

"Peace! Before all things, peace!"

Aye, and not only that. This far-seeing statesman—what had he said as his last exhortation?

"It is better to submit to the generosity of Great Britain than incur her anger."

England was now firm set on her purpose. She must advance to its attainment or be hurled back, crushed. And who could take up this giant's task? Germany? Impossible. But this was not all. Behind England was America. It was the whole race—the race that pervaded the world, that gave to the earth its history and to the sea its speech. Here was a power strong as that of destiny. Not all that remained of mankind could keep back this irresistible people.

Her purpose, too—not one of empire, of ravage, of possession; rather a holy and religious purpose that had for aim the union of the world in one eternal bond of peace. It was the dream of philosophy, the message of science, the yearning of art. In its beneficent light the earth would bloom into new beauty. It was a mission that no brute force or savage hate could stay on its triumphant course.

Such thoughts coursed through the Kaiser's mind. And then, rising suddenly, he exclaimed:

"Prince, I accept your terms. I swear to assist your purpose. Germany shall submit to your award. Henceforth we shall be allies and not foes!"

The Prince of Wales sprang up in eagerness from his chair and held out his hand.

"You have spoken nobly, nephew," he said. "Your trust in us shall not be shaken. Your words have not only saved the fate of Germany: they have saved the fate of the world!"

And in solemn silence, each moved by deep emotion, these two representatives of the great Teutonic nations clasped hands in token of their sacred compact.

CHAPTER L.

How the Parisians Danced.

"We will dance behind our fortifications," wrote the Gil Blas. As a mere trope, an idle metaphor, the phrase would serve, but as a description of actual fact it was far from being justified by events.

Paris was not in the least degree jubilant. Although the military spirit of the people was stirred by the sheer necessities of the moment, there were glimpses of rational judgment which showed to thoughtful observers that gay, Lutetia would be herself again when the war had ended and not until then.

The Ministry, in reality tottering to its base, was ostensibly propped up by public opinion.

Now, in an earnest, self-sacrificing, devoted Paris, this would have been impossible. The fierce energy of the citizens would demand rapid success, or equally rapid change. But here a more cynical mood betrayed itself. "These clever fellows got us into this mess," said the city in effect, "let them get us out of it again. They must have every chance of convincing both us and the English that they were not mistaken in bringing about this disastrous war."

This wholly unexpected attitude on the part of the fickle Parisian mob did not reassure the President and M. Hanotaux.

"During the Commune," murmured the head of the State, "a man was in power one week and forgotten the next." And he sighed with the reflection that the last state of that man was better than the first.

"My dear colleague," replied with a smile the fire-eating scientist whose advent to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs had proved so epoch-making; "Fate is often feline. We are being played with before the moment of immolation."

If the chiefs of the Republic secretly expressed such opinions, who shall describe the loud-mouthed fury of that large class of Parisians whose entire fortunes depended on the gratification of the expensive tastes cultivated by English milords and American honourables and their wives and daughters.

A tremulous wine-merchant . . . . addressed a crowd of customers.

Where was now the Paris hat, where the gants de suède? Of what avail were the gowns of Paquin, the dinners of Durand? The hotels and emporia of fashion closed, the large restaurants empty, the Casino mute—the capital of the world où l'on s'amuse was indeed desolated.

When a party of wealthy shopkeepers dined at Durand's both proprietor and guests ground their teeth in silent rage as they read the label on the bottle of superior champagne: "The same as supplied to England."

Alas, England was drinking beer, and English ladies were wearing goods manufactured in Bradford or Manchester.

Digitized by Google

The first outbreak of real patriotic feeling sprang tumultuously into existence when the news came that Russia had crumbled into fragments, and that the German Emperor had yielded.

So France was again left to fight on unaided to the bitter close. Why was it always France that must pour forth her blood and her treasure to advance a cause or bolster a theory? Did mankind need teaching the tenets of liberty—France must wade through accumulated horrors to provide the rest of the human race with an object lesson. Did the world require some magnificent demonstration of the art of empire—France again must give her sons and her millions to scrawl the thesis across the face of Europe. And when England, the all-pervading power, grew so arrogant that the rest of the nations panted for elbow-room, the final outcome was that France should be down-trodden to give other malcontents breathing-space.

For a time it seemed that Paris would be true to her traditions, and hold each street as a barricade, and each house as a fort.

But the fever died as quickly as it arose, and by common consent the blame of the situation was placed on the shoulders of the authorities.

Of course politics ran high in the cafés, and the duties of patriotism were proclaimed in flamboyant terms.

"Citizens and brothers," a tremulous wine merchant cried from the celebrated Boulevard Haussmann, as he addressed a crowd of customers, "Paris must be true to her traditions. We must give our last sou, spend our last drop of blood, in defence of these stones hallowed by the footsteps of the pioneers of liberty, equality, and fraternity."

Yet, at a late hour that night, he and his wife hid all their jewellery and the greater part of their money beneath a flagstone which supported the kitchen boiler.

For the truth about the sortie was now leaking out, and even the vainglorious survivors found it necessary to depict the courage of the English in lurid language, if only to enhance the prodigies of valour they had themselves performed. Who should stay such Paladins as the foe?

The President and M. Hanotaux conferred together very seriously when the German Ambassador communicated to them the result of the conversation between the Emperor and the Prince of Wales.

"Are we to expect then," M. Hanotaux said in freezing tones, "that our quondam ally is about to become an active enemy on the eastern frontier, in obedience to this new-found gospel of peace and brotherly love?"

"No, sir," was the dignified reply. "It is no part of His Majesty's programme to turn traitor. His desires were prosecuted in the interests of the German people, but he expressly stipulated that he should be exempted from further co-operation in the war save in the guise of a mediator."

"France has received little help from German arms in this quarrel," was the contemptuous retort. "She wishes none from her diplomacy."

"Will you not follow the example of Germany?" said the Ambassador.

"Never," cried the Frenchmen, speaking together.

The Ambassador then withdrew.

For a little while neither spoke. At last the President said: "My dear colleague, what is to be the end?"

"We must triumph." The words were brave, but the tone was not that of assurance.

"But if we do not? I tell you candidly I fear the worst. Investment of Paris is impossible! I cannot see how any point of the lines is to be forced; yet I tremble. The unbroken successes of the invaders, their indomitable spirit, their carelessness of consequence—above all, the quiet confidence with which Lord Roberts is moving his forces on the west, perplex and sadden me. What if Paris be carried by a coup de main?"

"There is always a pistol," was the moody response.

"Pouf! You are distracted to make such an answer. I am not speaking of myself, or of you, but of France. What can be done for France?"

"All that is possible. Secure the best terms, and then, for ourselves, bon jour!"

Changed, indeed, was the tone of the stout-hearted minister since that council at Versailles in May!

Trains travelling east were crowded.

General Saussier, as became a brave soldier, was more hopeful.

He had 500,000 men under his command, not counting the Garde de Paris and the citizen battalions now doing duty within the walls.

His defences were justly deemed impregnable. His communications south and east of the capital were unimpaired, and he had satisfactorily arranged for a strong corps from Chalons to throw itself in the path of Sir Redvers Buller. He counted upon the English hurling themselves vainly against the circle of forts, while France was collecting her yet magnificent energies for a final effort to crush the persistent foe.

A man of colossal bulk, and unwieldy withal, the French Commander-in-Chief bore charger after charger to the earth whilst he cantered from camp to camp and from battery to battery. When too physically exhausted himself to remain in the saddle he was driven in a landau on his tour of inspection, and he certainly succeeded in impressing officers and men alike with belief in his sagacity and respect for his unflagging energy.

His plans were well laid so far as the tactical distribution of his troops went. Under the most favourable conditions his great opponent must require some hours to move any material section of his army, and in the same time, by keeping strict watch upon the British, General Saussier could bring to bear against them a vastly superior force.

These considerations, backed by the 2,000 splendid cannon that peered through the embrasures of the fortifications, were potent reasons for the hopefulness of the French military chief.

He looked solely at facts. The President and M. Hanotaux thought of principles.

Had he been present at certain midnight drills taking place nightly within the British lines, General Saussier might not have felt so confident.

That the public did not share his views was shown by the actions of many besides the keeper of the estaminet in the Boulevard Haussmann. The real reasons were never avowed, but it was surprising to note the numbers of women and children whom their male protectors thought to be suffering from the ill effects of a hot September.

Trains travelling east were crowded with healthy-looking invalids, all of whom had suddenly discovered the marvellous salubrious qualities of the Vosges mountains.

There was disturbance even within the sacred circle of the arts.

So it came to pass that one night, when the peaceful calm of the Tuileries garden was only accentuated by the distant rumbling of commissariat waggons crossing the Pont de la Concorde, a small group of men were busily occupied in digging deeply beneath the trees in a secluded spot.

Long they laboured, and when the trench was ample enough they solemnly interred two heavy packages, securely bound in waterproof cloths, and so cumbrous that they required the united strength of many hands to lower them with ropes into the grave-like receptacle prepared for them.

The diggers were men whose names are famous throughout the world, and they were rescuing the Venus de Milo from the dangers that threatened her.

Digitized by Google

Once before, so goes the legend, has the beautiful Aphrodite descended from her throne in the Louvre and sought obscure safety at the hands of her worshippers. When Prussian shells began to rain on Paris from Chatillon the majestic statue was carefully stowed away in a secret resting-place until siege and occupation were ended.

The painter, musician, and the man of letters foregathered to growl at everything and everybody.

And now the scene was re-enacted—not without due cause. If you doubt the earnestness of these devotees at the shrine of Venus, you should read the inscription on the Rosetta Stone in the British Museum.

When Napoleon took the bronze horses from St. Mark's, in Venice, he was compelled by treaty to restore them. England never gives back that which she has once grasped, and Aphrodite must never gaze with calm self-sufficiency at Phœbus Appollo. So she was hidden for a space beneath the trees of the Tuileries.

Art in the Quartier Latin was not so serious.

Here the painter, the musician, and the man of letters foregathered to growl at everything and everybody. Paris might be hypnotised by the dread of impending evil, but not so the children of Bohemia.

They had found, to their great joy, that at least one proprietor of a restaurant so bubbled over with patriotic ardour that an epigram at the expense of the British meant a free dinner, and a rousing speech, à la patrie, sufficed for unquestioned additions to an already surfeited slate.

Thus did Paris fret and fume, and stir uneasily as though in slumber disturbed by fearful dreams, whilst a few miles away on the west the might of Britain assembled in dread and portentous array.

And there was no dancing—not even at the Bal Bullier or the Moulin Rouge.

(To be continued.)

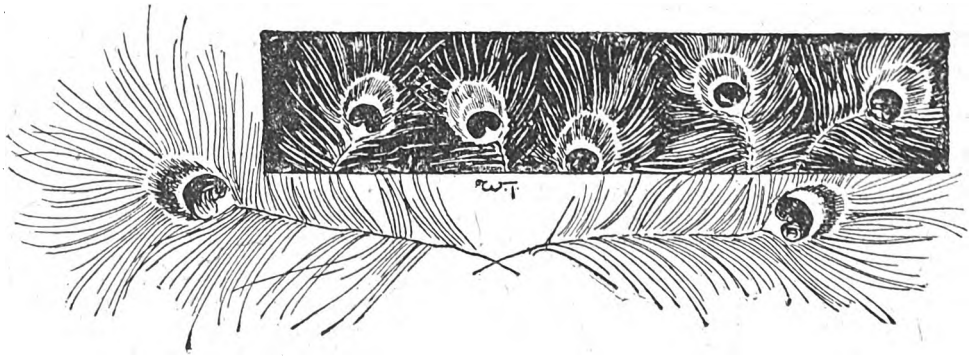
Result of Distribution No. 14.

Two applicants have this week received a sovereign each. They are:

Mrs. E. BURRESS, 19 Jeyes Road, New Brompton.
J. MORETON, Lugwardine, Hereford.

Those who did not apply are:

Mrs. Adams, Penhenver, Hoefield Terrace, Plymouth; George Bone, Brea Vean, Just-in-Penrith, Cornwall; R. Campbell, 8 Westgate, Gainsborough; Miss Dorsey, 44 Margaret Street, Hull; A. G. Edwards, Post Office, Prickwillow, Cambs.; S. F. Francis, West Street, Cromer; Jas. Garrod, 14 Clarkson Street, Ipswich; John Hendry, Cathedral Street, Dunkeld; J. G. Johnston, Victoria Street, Stromness; Mrs. Keith, Ashfield House, Rothesay; W. Lawlor, 86 O'Connell Street, Dungarvon; Jas. M'Mullen, 62 Linen Hall, Ballymena; H. Nurse, 5 Bath Terrace, Russell Street, Reading; J. T. Page, Victoria Road, Fenny-Stratford; C. G. Oppermann, 60 Bell Street, Henley-on-Thames; F. Rashleigh, 8 Guadaloupe Terrace, Sandown, Isle of Wight; Geo. T. League, West Street, Havant; T. S. Wakefield, Hall Farm, Packwood, Warwickshire; R. Young, 30 Downing Street, Farnham, Surrey; F. Vivian, Marshfield, Monmouthshire; W. Arnold, Penarthur, St. David's; M. Quinn, 18 Elmswood Road, Egremont; A. Batson, 10A Liverpool Road, Luton; H. Copley, Crown Street, S. Ives; W. T. Dunkley, 22 Kettering Road, Rothwell; Geo. Eayres, Chapel Street, Holbeach, Lincs.; G. Foster, 1 Royal Cres Villa, Canterbury Road, Margate; Mrs. Godley, 63 Hampton Road, Stockton-on-Tees; John Hall, 28 Dotwick Street, North Shields; G. ohnston, Boundary Road, Carlisle; Geo. Kelly, 53 Boroughgate, Appleby; Jas. Loader, 125 North Road, St. Helens, Lancs.; R. Mear, 86 High Street, Longton, Staffs.; Jas. Neale, 77 Chester Road, Kidderminster; E. Oakley, 13 Hamer Place, Derby; Jos. Pratt, 3 Stratford Square, Nottingham; John Reid, Lodge Farm, Donington, Leicester; Mrs. E. Stevenson, Gilmorton, Lutterworth; Mrs. Munday, 163, Walton Street, St. Thomas's, Oxford; W. T. M. Wallet, 1 Crescent, Minories, E.C.; H. Dolling, 57 Lower Clapton Road, N.E.; J. M. Hodgekins, 6 Leighton Mansions, Queen's Club Gardens, West Kensington; Miss M. Oades, 26 Summers Town, Lower Tooting, S.W; H. Howe, 3 Iverson Road, Brondesbury, N.W.; J. D. Lister, 105 Noel Street, Nottingham; Miss B. G. Jeffrey, 4 Albert Terrace, Salisbury; H. Owen, 32 High Street, Wimbledon; C. Santer, The Bridge, Corbrook, Kent.



Digitized by Google

Messrs. NICOLE FRERES'

REGINA & POLYPHON MUSICAL BOXES

PLAY YOUR OWN SELECTION OF MUSIC.

These Boxes render on steel combs the most exquisite music, with a compass and volume of tone equal to that of a piano. As a Social Entertainer they are unrivalled, playing over 1,000 different tunes, including all the latest popular music, as well as classical and operatic selections. With one winding run 20 to 30 minutes. The tune sheets are of metal and practically indestructible, while the mechanism is solid yet simple. Handsome cases. Make very delightful presents.

All Prices, from 16/6 to 100 Guineas.

All Dealers, or Illustrated No. 3 Catalogue Free to Readers of "SHORT STORIES."

NICOLE FRERES Ltd. (Dept. 3)

21 ELY PLACE, HOLBORN CIRCUS, LONDON, E.C. Established 1815.

ATLAS LOCKSTITCH MACHINE.

Works by hand or treadle. Guaranteed 4 years. Equal in quality and size to any machine To ensure satisfaction, we will send machine on receipt of 5/- P.O. for ONE MONTH'S TRIAL. Balance can be paid 5/- Monthly. Call or write for designs and Samples of work. 39/-

THE ATLAS SEWING MACHINE CO., 188B High St., Camden Town, London, N.W.; 63 Seven Sisters Rd., N.; 14 High Rd., Kilburn.

GIVEN AWAY

HUNDREDS OF POUNDS IN PRIZES - EVERY COMPETITOR GETS ONE OR A 300 HOUSE

LIBERAL PAYMENT FOR WRAPPERS. PARTICULARS WITH EACH 2½d AND 3d BAR.

CHANCELLOR SOAPS

Send 2 stamps for Sample to 13 Clerkenwell Road, E.C.

TO THE DEAF

TO THE DEAF. A Gentleman who cured himself of Deafness and Noises in the Head after fourteen years' suffering will gladly send full particulars of the remedy on receipt of stamped addressed envelope. Address: A. CLIFTON, Amberley House, Norfolk Street, Strand, London, W.C.

PALATABLE SUBSTITUTE FOR COD LIVER OIL.

DEVONSHIRE CREAM.

(REALLY GENUINE.)

In Patent Air-tight Tins. ¼lb., 10d.; ½lb., 1/4; 1lb., 2/4; including Tin and Postage.

MRS. CONYERS, MORCHARD BISHOP, DEVON.

SULPHOLINE LOTION,

For clearing the skin from Spots, Blemishes, Redness, Roughness, giving a Beautiful Complexion and pleasing appearance.

SHILLING BOTTLES.

KEATING'S LOZENGES

THERE IS NO BETTER REMEDY IN THE WHOLE WORLD FOR ALL COUCH AND THROAT TROUBLES THAN KEATING'S LOZENGES. ONE GIVES RELIEF. THEY WILL CURE, AND THEY WILL NOT INJURE YOUR HEALTH. THEY CONTAIN ONLY THE PUREST DRUGS.

Sold everywhere in 1/1½ Tins.

NOSE

MACHINES as worn by Nobility. Shape altered permanently by few weeks' wear, from 9/9 each. Red Nose Cure, Medically Approved, 3/9. Pamphlet, "Cause and Prevention," 1/-; particulars for stamp. Mention Paper.

LEES RAY, Specialist, South Castle St., Liverpool.

£20

Hairdressers fitted up. Estimates free.

Tobacconists Commencing. Set Illd. Guide (239 pages) 3d. How to open a cigar store, £20 to £2,000 Tobacconists Outfitting Co., 186, Euston Road, London. The largest and original house (50 years reputation. Mgr., H. Myers

---

VARICOCELE.

Every man suffering from Varicocele and the allied troubles, or Varicose Veins, should send for treatise, describing their Causes, Symptoms, Results, and Successful and Painless Treatment without surgical operation or the use of cumbersome trusses and electrical appliances. Will be sent sealed, post free.

S. S. MURRAY,

7 Southampton Row, London, W.C.

ZOX

CURES

NEURALGIA

Toothache, Headache, Sciatica, and all Nerve Pains.

PURE, HARMLESS, AND NON-APERIENT.

Do not be persuaded to take a substitute, there is nothing as good as ZOX.

Of all Chemists, 1s. and 2s. 6d. per Box.

ZOX Co., 11 HATTON GARDEN, E.C.

Will Prolong Life!

Rev. W. SMITH, of Zion House, Kirton-in-Lindsey, writes: "January 4th, 1899.

"Some years ago I had a severe illness, accompanied with bronchitis; my voice was quite gone when a friend brought me one of your Electropathic Appliances. I had no faith in it at the time, but was persuaded to put it on; and immediately I felt its power. I was soon restored to health and strength, and my voice is now stronger than it ever was. I have recommended your appliances to many of my friends, and have never known them to fail in giving relief and prolonging life."

Write without delay for New Medical Work, entitled: HEALTH, THE SUNSHINE OF LIFE." Will be sent POST FREE. Medical Battery Co., 489 OXFORD STREET, LONDON, W.

ALL FAT PEOPLE

Readily Reduce Weight and Cure Corpulency Permanently by taking TRILENE TABLETS (Regd.) for a few weeks. They are very agreeable, harmless, and never fail to PRESERVE both HEALTH and FIGURE without change of diet. Reduction begins immediately.

An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

MISS HEYWOOD, 77 Hindhill Street, Heywood, Lancs., says: "I am 2lb. lighter, and my rheumatism also seems cured."

MRS. WEAVER, of Greenpits Villa, Station Road, Ross, Hereford, says: "Am reduced from 13st. 8lb. to 11st."

MR. CANHAM, 87 Alexandra Road, Norwich: "Tablets cured my wife of extreme stoutness; has never returned."

LADY CONSTANCE CONRAD writes from Wiesbaden: "I am very pleased with the Tablets."

PRINCESS LIECHTENSTEIN writes from Laudsberg, Austria: "Pray send your excellent Tablets directly."

COUNTESS G. FURSTENBERG, Stammheim, Germany, writes: "They act speedily and well."

MR. BUTLER, Surgeon, Hampton Manor, Evesham, says: "My patient lost more than a stone."

Send 2/6 to THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION, 66 Pinsbury Pavement, London, E.C.

PIANOS. UPRIGHT IRON GRAND.

Complete Iron frame, Brass Pin Plate, Nickel-bolted Wrest Plank, Check Action, Full Trichord, Full Compass, Rivetted Hammers, Handsome Walnut Case, Inlaid Marqueterie Panel, Sconces, Trusses, etc. Tone and touch perfect. Guaranteed 25 years. 28 guineas, at 10/6 per month. Delivered free on payment of 10/6. Approval. Catalogues Free.

ORGANS. GENUINE AMERICAN.

Imported Direct. Solid Walnut Case, Mirror Top, Music Case, 2 Knee Swells, Mouse and Dust Proof, 8 Stops, 3 Sets of Reeds, 14 Guineas, at 6/- per month. 10 Stops, 3 Sets of Reeds, 2 Octave Couplers. 15 guineas, at 7/- per month. Illustrated Lists Free. Kindly mention this paper.

THE LONDON AND LIVERPOOL PIANOFORTE CO.,

Granby St. & Selborne St., LIVERPOOL.

Agents wanted where not represented.

Digitized by Google

SHORT TRUTHS.

T. M.—Arctic explorers state that the natives of the regions of snow and ice never attempt to assuage thirst by putting snow into their mouths. If snow is melted, it becomes drinkable water, and relieves thirst as ordinary water does; but if it is allowed to melt in the mouth, it increases the thirst.

V. S.—There are now 58 prisons in England; less than fifty years ago there were 113, so that the number has decreased by practically one-half, despite the increase in population.

W. H. has been puzzled, when reading about Egyptian finance in the newspapers, by the signs £T and £E before the figures; thus, £T200,000. He would like to know what these mean.———They signify that the money is stated in Turkish or Egyptian pounds. The Turkish pound is worth a little more than 18s. of our money, and the Egyptian pound is equal to £1 0s. 3d. These values vary somewhat, according to the rate of exchange.

F.—The largest fire insurance policy in existence is that covering the property of the Santa Fé Railway Company. The amount of the insurance is £1,000,000, and the annual premium is £30,000.

WET.—Some time ago a company was formed in America to loan umbrellas. Subscribers paid a small annual fee, as receipt for which they received a metal ticket. Shops or depôts were opened in various streets, and when a subscriber was caught in a downpour, he only had to call at the depôt and leave his ticket in order to procure a gamp. That was what the company thought, but it usually happened that when the over-confident subscriber was caught in a heavy shower, the nearest call-room was several streets away; as he would have got drenched in reaching the place, he had to do the same as other people, and take shelter in a doorway. So the scheme fell through.

B.—The wholesale prices realised by foreign butters form the best indication of the value set upon them by consumers in this country. The highest prices are obtained by the Danish, Swedish, and Dutch varieties; the prices fluctuating between 105s. to 120s. per cwt.

H. G.—The Swedes pay great attention to the replanting of trees, to compensate for the continual demand upon the timber of their country. Every year the school children plant about 500,000 trees, under the guidance of their teachers. They do not all grow; but those that take root are sufficient to prevent undue denudation of the forests.

R. E. asks: "Is it known how many white elephants have been captured?"———There is no authentic record in black and white; but a celebrated elephant hunter has stated that since the beginning of the Christian era only twenty-four of these animals have been caught.

WILL.—The last will and testament of Shakespeare is kept at Somerset House. It is fixed in a series of frames protected by glass.

J. M.—Athmos, a mountain in Roumelia, is called the Monte Santo, or Holy Mountain, owing to the number of monasteries and hermitages erected upon it. These buildings contain numerous manuscripts of the New Testament that are of great antiquity.

F. L. B. asks: "At what age should a man give up football?"———Some say that a man should not play after the age of thirty; but it is a matter in which everybody has a right to please himself. However, it is courting disaster to play at an age when a breakage may mean a permanent injury.

C. N.—Undoubtedly a large percentage of the crime committed in this country goes unpunished. It is computed that in 55 cases out of 100 the criminals escape the reward of their misdeeds. There are about 40,000 persons under the suspicion of the police—persons known to be thieves, receivers, or otherwise out of the pale of honest society, but there is no evidence that will enable the police to arrest them.

KISS. — Certainly, kissing may be dangerous at times, as when a person is suffering from a throat complaint; but in such cases the common sense of the parties in question should recognise that the osculatory greeting should be abandoned. In Servia they have a custom of kissing deceased friends before burial, and so strongly is the custom rooted in the popular feeling that the common sense of the inhabitants is useless against it. Some years ago there was a serious epidemic of diphtheria due to it, and the authorities had to issue a stringent prohibition. But the regulation evoked such hostility that it was found necessary to limit it to cases of persons who had died from diphtheria. Even the severe lesson of the epidemic did not teach the people to drop the practice in connection with other diseases.

G.—It has been estimated that if the pictures in the National Gallery were sold, they would fetch a million and a half sterling. But they would most probably realise a larger sum, as American and other millionaires would eagerly compete for the possession of certain pictures, which cannot be equalled.

D. K. R. asks: "How can worry kill a man?"———Worry injures beyond repair certain cells of the brain, and the brain being the nutritive centre of the body, the other organs become gradually injured, or a combination of them arises, and death finally ensues.

F. A.—It has been computed that, on the average, an engine-driver travels 20,000 miles a year.

BEGINNER writes: "What would you say was the most common form of accident a cyclist is likely to meet with, and should therefore endeavour to guard against?"———That which is commonly known as "skidding"—the sudden slipping of the tyres along the road—throwing the rider violently on the ground with as much precipitation as when one's feet slip on an ice-slide. It is also one of the most dangerous, for it is impossible to save oneself on such an occasion. You are over before you know where you are. Especially is it dangerous where the traffic is great, for it is more than likely that the rider will be thrown right under the feet of horses and the wheels of passing vehicles. There is a fortune awaiting the inventor who can find means to lessen this danger.

C. P.—The original cost of St. Paul's Cathedral was a million and a half sterling.

S. L.—There is more money made out of the "rag business," as you style it, than you suppose. A ton of old rags is worth something like £10 to a dealer, who pays, perhaps, one-third that sum for it.

SHORT STORIES' ADVERTISEMENT RATES.

Single column, per inch, per insertion	£0	10	0
Double ,, ,, ,,	1	0	0
Full page inside, facing page of matter, either white paper or 2nd or 3rd page of cover, or back page, per insertion	10	0	0
Half-page ,, ,, ,, ...	5	0	0
Quarter-page ,, ,, ...	2	10	0
Eighth-page ,, ,, ...	1	5	0
Front page, whole ,, ,, ...	12	10	0
,, half	6	5	0

All spaces above one-eighth of a page are charged at per page rate.

Series discount: 5 per cent. for 13, 10 per cent. for 26, 15 per cent. for 52 insertions.

Black blocks are charged 25 per cent. extra. All advertisements are subject to approval. All copy must be sent in by Noon on Tuesday, Jan. 31st, if intended for the Issue on sale Feb. 14th, and dated Feb. 18th. The Proprietors reserve the right to hold over or suspend the insertion of any advertisement without prejudice to other insertions on order. All communications should be addressed to the Advertisement Manager, "Pearson's Weekly" Offices, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Printed and Published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON LTD., at Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

SUPERIOR PRINTING OUTFITS

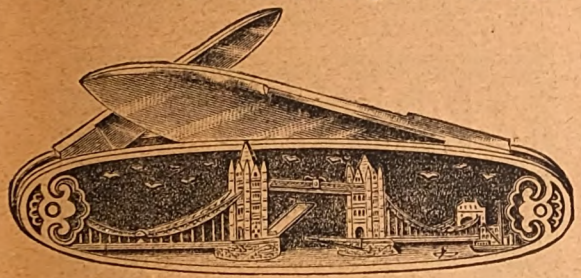
For 1/2, 2/3, 2/8, 3/4, 3/9 and 6/9, post free.

Consisting of Letters, Points, and Ornaments, a Type-Holder, supply of Ink, Pad, and Tweezers. Any name, &c., can be made at pleasure, for stamping Books, Papers, and Printing Cards.

ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUE FREE.

Agents wanted for the Sale of Patent "Air Cushion" Rubber Stamps and Type.

The "Tower Bridge" Knife.



No. 992.—Aluminium Handle, which bears an excellent representation of the Tower Bridge; fitted with two best Steel Blades. Price 1/9 each.
No. 1319.—Same, with Corkscrew. Price 2/6 each.
Postage, 1d. each extra.

THE "EAGLE" KNIFE.

No. 346.—Aluminium Handle, very light and compact, fitted with two best Steel Blades, price 1/6 each. Postage, 1d. each extra.

The "Mignon" Dating Stamp.

COMPLETE IN BOX, WITH PAD AND INK.

Price 2s. post free.

Indispensible for Receipting Bills, for Dating Correspondence Papers, etc.

FUN FOR THE MILLION!

THE "HARLEQUINADE" SET OF SIX COMICAL RUBBER STAMPS.

Same Size of Drawings with Self Inking Pad.

Endless Variety of Mirth-Provoking Pictures can be produced.

Price, all complete, 2/6 only.
Postage, 2d. extra.

YOUR OWN MONOGRAM,

TWO LETTERS

Complete 6d. each. Postage 2d. extra.
Including Box, Pad, and Ink for Paper, or Indelible Ink for Linen.

THREE LETTERS

Complete 9d. each. Postage 2d. extra.
Including Box, Pad, and Ink for Paper, or Indelible Ink for Linen.

Agents Wanted. Illustrated Lists Free.

M. LINDNER, Patentee, Manufacturer, and Importer, 170 Fleet St., London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

LYLE'S PURE SOLUBLE COCOA

Is Nutritious Easily Digested of Delicious Flavour & Aroma

GUARANTEED TO BE THE PRODUCT OF THE FINEST COCOA BEANS.
—ABRAM LYLE & SONS Ltd
MAKERS OF LYLE'S GOLDEN SYRUP

"KKOVAH"

JELLIES

Real Fruit Flavored!

A FREE TRIAL SEND US BY P.C. YOUR GROCER'S NAME & ADDRESS MENTIONING THIS PAPER & WE WILL FORWARD FREE & POST PAID SUFFICIENT TO MAKE ½ PINT.

SUTCLIFFE & BINGHAM. KKOVAH WORKS MANCHESTER.

"LOUIS" VELVETEEN

See that the name spelt L.O.U.I.S is stamped on every Yard.

TRUE TO THE ROS ASPERA JUVANT

LOUIS XI KING OF FRANCE 1461-1483.

"MATCHLESS" METAL POLISH.

"WARNING TO LADIES."
Beware of Polishes that set up injurious acids. They impregnate your cloths with verdigris and spoil your hands.
"SIMPLE TEST."
Dab a small quantity on a penny and leave it overnight. If it sets up acid the surface will become green with verdigris.
"MATCHLESS" METAL POLISH will not turn any metal green, and is therefore free from acid.

FREE FROM ACID POISON OR GRIT.

LARGEST SALE IN THE WORLD

PATON, CALVERT & Co MANUFACTURERS, LIVERPOOL

ASK FOR & INSIST ON HAVING HARRIS' DELICIOUS & ABSOLUTELY PURE

MADE ONLY BY HARRIS AND Co

GOLD MEDAL

OF STORES & GROCERS EVERYWHERE

BERMONDSEY CAKE FACTORY, LONDON, W.

CAKES

APPLICATIONS FOR SOLE AGENCIES INVITED

IT IS NOT Reckitt's PARIS BLUE

UNLESS RECKITT'S NAME IS ON THE WRAPPER.

"AH, BUT YOU SHOULD GET THE 'SUNDAY READER.'"

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

No. 527. FOR WEEK ENDING FEBRUARY 4TH, 1899. [ONE PENNY.

BEECHAM'S PILLS

WORTH A GUINEA A BOX

THE WORLD'S MEDICINE

ARE GENERAL FAVORITES

Digitized by Google

ZOX

CURES

NEURALGIA

Toothache, Headache, Sciatica, and all Nerve Pains.

PURE, HARMLESS, AND NON-APERIENT.

Do not be persuaded to take a substitute, there is nothing as good as ZOX.

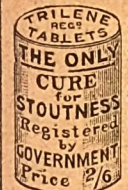
Of all Chemists, 1s. and 2s. 6d. per Box.

ZOX Co., 11 HATTON GARDEN, E.C.



ALL FAT PEOPLE

Readily Reduce Weight and Cure Corpulency Permanently by taking TRILENE TABLETS (Regd.) for a few weeks. They are very agreeable, harmless, and never fail to PRESERVE both HEALTH and FIGURE without change of diet. Reduction begins immediately.

An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

Miss HEYWOOD, 77 Hindhill Street, Heywood, Lancs., says: "I am 21lb. lighter, and my rheumatism also seems cured."

MRS. WEAVER, of Greenpits Villa, Station Road, Ross, Hereford, says: "Am reduced from 13st. 8lb. to 11st."

MR. CANHAM, 87 Alexandra Road, Norwich: "Tablets cured my wife of extreme stoutness; it has never returned."

LADY CONSTANCE CONRAD writes from Wiesbaden: "I am very pleased with the Tablets."

PRINCESS LIECHTENSTEIN writes from Laudsberg, Austria: "Pray send your excellent Tablets directly."

COUNTESS G. FURSTENBERG, Stammheim, Germany, writes: "They act speedily and well."

MR. BUTLER, Surgeon, Hampton Manor, Evesham, says: "My patient lost more than a stone."

Send 2/6 to THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION, 66 Pinsbury Pavement, London, E.C.

ATLAS LOCKSTITCH MACHINE.

Works by hand or treadle. Guaranteed 4 years. Equal in quality and size to any machine 39/-

To ensure satisfaction, we will send machine on receipt of 5/- P.O. for ONE MONTH'S TRIAL. Balance can be paid 5/- Monthly. Call or write for designs and Samples of work.

THE ATLAS SEWING MACHINE CO., 188B High St., Camden Town, London, N.W.; 63 Seven Sisters Rd., N.; 14 High Rd., Kilburn.

VARICOCELE.

Every man suffering from Varicocele and the allied troubles, or Varicose Veins, should send for treatise, describing their Causes, Symptoms, Results, and Successful and Painless Treatment without surgical operation or the use of cumbersome trusses and electrical appliances. Will be sent sealed, post free.

S. S. MURRAY,

7 Southampton Row, London, W.C.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK

Southampton Bldngs., Chancery Lane, London, W.C.

Invested Funds, £10,000,000. No. of Accounts, 85,094.

TWO-AND-A-HALF per CENT. INTEREST allowed on DEPOSITS, repayable on demand. TWO per CENT. on CURRENT ACCOUNTS, on the minimum monthly balances, when not drawn below £100. STOCKS, SHARES, and ANNUITIES purchased and sold for customers. SAVINGS DEPARTMENT.—Small deposits received, and Interest allowed monthly on each completed £1. The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with particulars, post free. FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

Telephone No. 5, Holborn. Telegraphic Address: "Birkbeck, London."

Don't Cough - use

They at once check the Cough and remove the cause.

The Unrivalled

One Lozenge alone relieves. Sold everywhere, Tins 13½d. each.

Keatings Lozenges

PIANOS. UPRIGHT IRON GRAND.

Complete Iron frame, Brass Pin Plate, Nickel-bolted Wrest Plank, Check Action, Full Trichord, Full Compass, Rivetted Hammers, Handsome Walnut Case, Inlaid Marqueterie Panel, Sconces, Trusses, etc. Tone and touch perfect. Guaranteed 25 years. 28 guineas, at 10/6 per month. Delivered free on payment of 10/6. Approval. Catalogues Free.

ORGANS. GENUINE AMERICAN.

Imported Direct. Solid Walnut Case, Mirror Top, Music Case, 2 Knee Swells, Mouse and Dust Proof, 8 Stops, 3 Sets of Reeds, 14 Guineas, at 6/- per month. 10 Stops, 3 Sets of Reeds, 2 Octave Couplers. 15 guineas, at 7/- per month. Illustrated Lists Free. Kindly mention this paper.

THE LONDON AND LIVERPOOL PIANOFORTE CO., Granby St. & Selborne St., LIVERPOOL.

Agents wanted where not represented.

NOSE

MACHINES as worn by Nobility. Shape altered permanently by few weeks' wear, from 9/9 each. Red Nose Cure, Medically Approved, 3/9. Pamphlet, "Cause and Prevention," 1/-; particulars for stamp. Mention Paper.

LEES RAY, Specialist, South Castle St., LiverPool.

£20

Hairdressers fitted up. Estimates free.

Tobacconists Commencing. See Illd. Guide (259 pages) 3d. How to open a cigar store, £20 to £2,000 Tobacconists Outfitting Co., 186, Euston Road, London. The largest and original house (50 years reputation. Mgr., H. Myers

---

TOOTH-ACHE

CURED INSTANTLY BY

BUNTER'S

Prevents Decay, Saves Extraction, Sleepless Nights Prevented.

Neuralgic Headaches and all Nerve Pains removed by BUNTER'S NERVINE. All Chemists, 1s. 1½d. NERVINE

COFFEE WITHOUT DREGS.

GOOD! IT'S MASON'S

An agreeable, stimulating and sustaining beverage. Instantly prepared and most economical. Equal to the very finest coffee. Highly recommended by the Medical Profession.

Of all Grocers and Stores, or a Sample Bottle post free for 9 stamps.

ALSO TRY

MASON'S WINE ESSENCES

AND

MASON'S EXTRACT OF HERBS.

Sample Bottle of either sent free for 9d.; two assorted 1/3; three assorted 1/8.

Agents Wanted.

Manufacturers—

NEWBALL & MASON, NOTTINGHAM.

PALATABLE SUBSTITUTE FOR COD LIVER OIL.

DEVONSHIRE CREAM.

REALLY GENUINE.

In Patent Air-tight Tins, ¼lb., 10d.; ½lb., 1s. 4d.; 1lb., 2s. 4d.; including tin and postage.

MRS. CONYERS

MORCHARD BISHOP, DEVON.

COMFORT, CLEANLINESS AND CURE

FOLLOW THE USE OF

Dr. PAUL'S WHITE PILE OINTMENT.

Gives ease at once and effectually removes Piles, Cracks, Fissures and Ulcerations. In boxes 1/- & 2/6 each. Post free 1/2 & 2/9

PENN & CO., 89, BLACKFRIARS ROAD, LONDON, S.E.

12,000 Stitches a Minute.

A LADY writes of the NEW AUTOMATIC KNITTER:

"I earn my living entirely by the machine."

A FATHER writes: "My little girl, nine years of age, earns as much as Five Shillings some days."

Knits Socks (a pair in 35 minutes) and Stockings, Underclothing, Fancy Goods, &c. Easily learned. Lessons free. Cash, Hire, and Work Terms from Sorres. Dept., 67 Southwark Street, London, S.E., or 58 Union Street, Glasgow.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

No. 527. ONE PENNY.

For the Week ending
February 4th, 1899.

The Ambuscade.

I HAVE seen many brave men go down amid a rain of bullets, fighting to the last. I have seen them go into places, and carry out orders, knowing that it would cost them their lives, and never flinch or hesitate; but of all these, the death of one is most deeply engraved on my memory.

One of our young comrades was Charles Hooker, a happy, handsome Englishman of twenty-two, who had thrown in his lot with us Cubans in our struggle against the Spaniards. From the very moment he joined us, he became a favourite with all, from the highest officer to the last orderly.

Tall and slim of stature, his brown hair was thick and curly, and his eyes were black, with such an innocent look in them that you could not help but wonder how he could accustom himself to a life in which death played so strong a hand. Good-natured, with always a kind word of encouragement, he yet had so firm a sense of duty that everybody looked up to him.

Late in the afternoon of a July day all was bustle and noise in the camp. Bugle-calls were heard, the men ran here and there, and the cries of the orderlies, mingled with the loud orders of the officers, had thrown the quiet camp into a state of uproar.

"I wonder what we are up to now?" shouted Hooker, as he tightened the girth on his horse.

"Don't know; but we shall soon find out. Come on, or you'll be late for formation," I answered, springing into the saddle and trotting down into my place in the line.

Horses were saddled, straps were tightened and accoutrements hastily buckled on. The line was soon formed, and, as we stood at attention while Captain Planas was inspecting us, we were wondering why we were called out at so late an hour; for it was five o'clock, and all of us knew that at that time no danger was to be feared from the enemy.

"Squadron! Right by fours! Column right! March!" rang out in rapid succession, and we walked our horses slowly out of the camp, noticing, as we did so, that only two squadrons besides our own were leaving, and that all the impedimenta, together with the rest of the force, remained behind.

Digitized by Google

Slowly we rode along, and as hunger is not a very good promoter of conversation, it soon lagged, and the silence was broken by the tramp of the horses' hoofs and an occasional remark from one of the men.

Disgust at the prospect of spending a long, cold night without a fire, joined to the gnawing of an empty stomach, had succeeded in throwing me into a wretched humour, and as I rolled over my blanket and answered with a grunt Hooker's cheerful "Good-night" I mentally made a vow to make someone pay for my feelings on the morrow.

Large clouds blew up, and for a moment covered the moon. Some drops of rain began to fall, but still the tired men slept on, Captain Planas alone remaining awake; the responsibility of the ambuscade lay on his shoulders, and, young in command, he felt too anxious to rest.

"Three o'clock," he muttered, as he glanced at his watch. "Sentry, pass the word to wake the men—and no one is to talk," he added, addressing the guard.

"Now, men," he continued, as we hastily sprang to our feet, "you are not to fire until I command, no matter what happens. Fire low and true. Remember that I have pledged my word to capture the convoy, and I know that I can rely on you all. Let each man choose his tree, and, above all, no noise, and await the order; then, aim well, and fire."

Silently the men took their places, and for a moment the click of springs could be heard as we examined our rifles; then, once more all was still.

The first rays of dawn were lightening up the sky when, at the turn of the road, some four hundred yards away, a solitary horseman came in sight—the advance scout of the convoy. Slowly he came on, looking from side to side, his gun shining in his hand.

How handsome and soldierly he looked, I thought, as his horse carefully picked his way along the stony road; at that moment a hundred rifles were probably levelled at him, ready to speed the messengers of death on their way, had prudence not forbidden a movement.

Nearer and nearer he came, behind him could be seen some one hundred men—the vanguard.

Already the first horseman was abreast of the ambush. Would he see us? If so, all was lost. We could hear the creaking of his accoutrements as he almost brushed against us. Now the main body was in sight; in the midst of them could be seen twenty or thirty pack mules —the coveted convoy.

I glanced at Hooker at my side. His patient manner never seemed to abandon him, but the colour that came and went on his fair cheeks, together with a hasty look which now and then he cast at our captain, told me that, although he could control his feelings, he was as impatient as I for the fight to begin. All knew that the moment for action was fast approaching.

There was the tramp, tramp of the troops as, with a steady shuffle, on they advanced.

My blood rushed to my head, a choking sensation seized my throat. I held my breath lest it should betray our presence. I could feel every pulse in my body throb as, crouched behind a tree, I aimed and awaited the signal.

Still on they came. Twenty feet away was the commanding officer, his eyes and ears on the alert. Would the order never come?

At last! "Fire!" and the roar of three hundred rifles rent the air, re-echoing through the woods; the shouts of the officers and surprised men, the clatter of hoofs, and the sharp notes of the bugle, threw the peaceful scene of a moment before into the confusion and noise of battle.

At the first volley the enemy gave way; but now they rallied and returned our fire. It was give and take, and I knew that we were in for a hard, stubborn fight.

A square was formed by the Spaniards, in the middle of which were placed the loaded mules. As fast as one went down his carcass was dragged to the front, and soon a rampart was formed, from behind which the enemy knelt and fired.

The order had been given by Captain Planas, and we had closed in, completely surrounding the square.

Side by side Hooker and I fought, and as I occasionally caught sight of him through the smoke I saw him firing, his hat off and his cheeks rosy with the excitement of battle.

On all sides men went down; some lay still, while others writhed and groaned in frightful agony, calling on their more fortunate companions to end their misery; while in the midst calmly stood Captain Planas, bending now and then to soothe a wounded soldier, urging and encouraging his men, unmindful of his own safety.

Cries of derision and defiance came from the square, answered by similar ones from us.

Suddenly a shout went up. Over-confident, Captain Planas had advanced too near; a bullet had struck him in the breast, and he fell, calling on us to avenge him.

Dismayed at our loss, we hesitated, and began to yield; a panic seemed to seize us, and death, of which we had not thought before, now appeared in all its horror.

The Spaniards, seeing our condition, took courage, nd poured their deadly volleys into our ranks. Defeat and disgrace stared us in the face; the battle seemed lost. But the tide of the fray was turned by Hooker.

Grasping Cuba's torn and tattered flag of victory in one hand, his machete in the other, this young Briton called on the men to follow him, and looking neither to the right or left, he dashed headlong into the square.

The men, amazed as they were by his bravery, obeyed by one common impulse, and horrible carnage ensued.

In the midst of the square stood the young Englishman the blood running down his face from a cut on his forehead, his eyes shining with the light of a brave man who fears not death, but dishonour.

In his hand he still held the flag for which he was dying, while with his machete he kept at bay a burly Spaniard who cut and slashed at him.

All around men fought and fell; the weakest heart grew strong and the hand struck true as the men gazed on the brave young fellow who was now leading them.

Like wild beasts we fought, well-nigh exhausted by our efforts, and desperate at the loss of our captain.

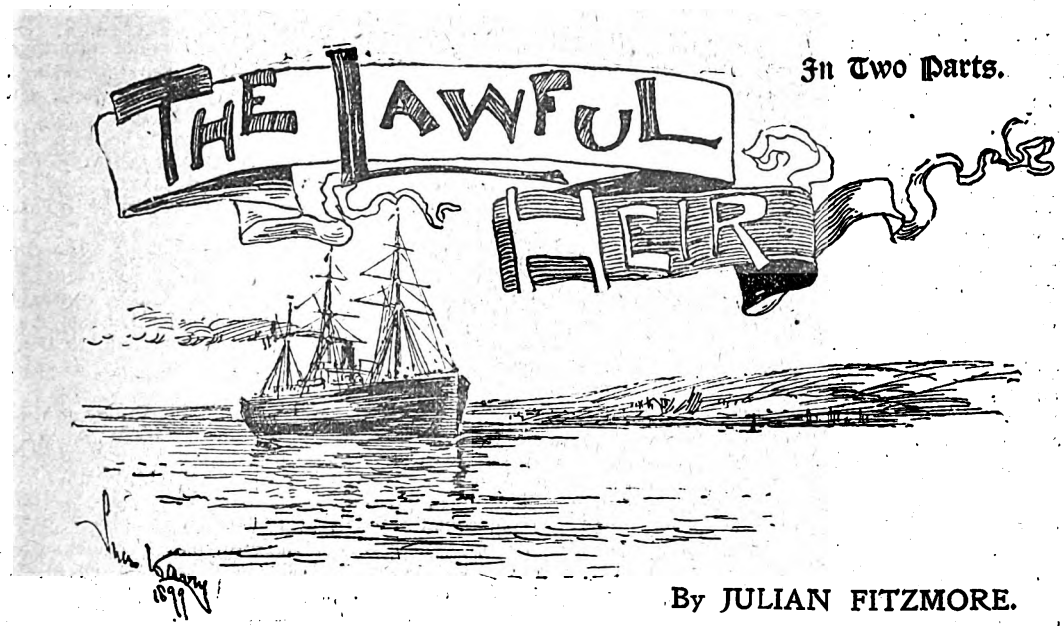
The onslaught was too strong to resist; the enemy broke and ran. The day was won.

But how much had it cost us! For as I looked I saw Hooker standing for a moment amid the dead and dying, a ray of light, as it stole through the smoke, lighting up his pale but happy face. Slowly he sank back, the flag pressed to his bosom, and, as with uncovered head I knelt by his side, he smiled and passed away.

That night we sadly laid him to rest, wrapped in the flag for which he braved death and died.

M. R. Dennis.

Digitized by Google



In Two Parts.

By JULIAN FITZMORE.

CHAPTER I.

Far Away from Home.

IN a log cabin in the backwoods of America sat one warm summer's evening a man, with a youth of nineteen years or so by his side. It was quite in the doorway of the cabin that they sat, for the day had been one of Canada's very hottest, and scarcely a breath of air was to be obtained, so sultry had it been for many hours. The shade of the porch was therefore extremely comforting and refreshing to these two who had toiled vigorously during the day in the Canadian forest at their regular work of lumbermen.

It was hard, trying work, that of a lumberman and a backwoodsman. For above nineteen years had the elder man, now probably fifty years of age, been engaged in it, and though the life was healthy enough, yet one with only a fragile constitution at the start, and whose previous life had not been such as to fit him for this work, the labour endured for so long had in the end begun to tell. The elder man, therefore, was going grey, and had the worn face and general tired look that one associates usually with a premature ending of life. Of late these symptoms had been more than previously plain, even to the man himself.

When he had first arrived, nearly twenty years ago, from the north of England, at that Canadian spot, utterly alone except for the dear girl who had accompanied him from London as his wife, he had had great hopes of the happiness that was in store for him, and had looked with all a young husband's joyful anticipations at the long future stretching before him in the society and friendship of one he so loved. And Carla, his wife, had returned his love with interest, and had as bright ideas of the future, and of the happiness she would make for him, as ever wife had in this world. They were wholly absorbed in each other, and they knew what each had given up for the other. For it had been a case of mutual self-sacrifice, though the man had given up by far the most.

Conrad Walker, for so he now called himself, had belonged to a family of high reputation in his native land, and had, being the only son, been the heir to all its tithes, dignities, and income. But when he fell in love with Carla Hanley, the daughter of a retired merchant of Clapham, and announced his intention of marrying her, the anger of his parents knew no bounds, and he was threatened with all sorts of pains and penalties if his foolish ideas, as they termed them, were persisted in.

Well, Conrad was just one of that sort to persist in such a case. Though his bodily strength was slight, and his health only delicate, especially at that time, his determination and mental ability were by no means small; and when he was thus so strongly opposed, it only made him the more resolute.

"You'll leave here," had said his father, after an angry interview; "you'll leave here, sir, at once if you marry that girl. And more than that; there are some things I can't hinder you having; but I can hinder you having my wealth, which is my own, and what is more I will, for I swear you shall never touch a penny of it if you carry out your absurd proposal. You, who could marry half the eligible ladies in the land, to go and throw yourself away on a bit of a retired grocer's daughter! I'm too ashamed, sir, to say more. You must take your choice, and if you don't please me, you go out of my house for ever, at least, whilst I live."

And Conrad didn't please him, and went. He and Carla got married and went out to Canada.

"We're better there, Carla," he had told her in London. "No one will know us, as no one will know where we have gone. It will be a nine days' wonder, my disappearance, and the papers will talk about it for a time, but it will soon cease, and we meantime shall have ourselves and our love. As for titles and estates, well, nobody gets to Heaven any sooner for a title that ever I heard of, and if thousands of acres of forest in Canada are not estates enough I don't know what is."

So they went and were satisfied. The story of the romantic marriage, of the mysterious disappearance of bride and bridegroom, of the anger of the latter's parents, interested England for some days, then gradually passed away from most people's memories.

And when Carla gave to Conrad their first little baby-boy their bonds of love were complete. It was with such a smile that she looked at her husband the first time he held the babe in his arms, and said:

"What shall we call him, Conrad?"

And the man answered gravely:

"'William,' my dear, at any rate. Every first-born of our family is a 'William' as I am; though now disguised with my new name."

The dark eyes of the mother looked lovingly on her boy.

"Yes, it must be 'William,'" she said. Then, after a pause, "Shall you ever tell him, Conrad, who he really is as he grows up?"

The husband looked thoughtful.

"Not so far as I think at present," replied he. "There may be circumstances demanding it, but, after all, happiness is the greatest thing in life, and if one is happy, what does it matter whether he is a backwoodsman or the heir to——"

And he laughed.

"You are happy, Conrad?" she asked.

"Perfectly, little one," said he. "I have never repented our coming here."

"Nor I, my love."

And that home happiness went on so serenely and beautifully till that dark day five years later when Carla, after a brief attack of pneumonia, passed from the world's happiness to the fuller happiness above, and left Conrad alone with the boy, sorrowful and heart-broken.

It took him a long time to get over the blow. Had it not been for thoughts of that young boy he would probably not have got over it at all. But the necessity of keeping up and looking after William, gave him strength, and at last time gradually softened the effects of the ruthless shock.

And William had grown and grown, year by year, till here he was at nineteen, tall and strong beyond his years, for the Canadian climate takes some beating for bracing one up.

But for some time now the father had felt his own strength failing, and with this came the serious question, oft-debated, as to whether he ought to tell his son of what was really his position and right, or whether it would be better to leave him in blissful ignorance, to go on, and spend his life in Canada, as he himself had intended him doing, before the death of the mother made all go wrong, so to speak.

It was a severe struggle, and was not easily decided. Perhaps a change of air would do even himself good. So he decided, as he sat by the boy's side on this summer evening, that he would have a holiday. He would go for a week or two to England and take the boy with him. It would be some consolation to feel that his son had looked over those estates which were now in another's possession, for his own father had died, so he had learnt from English papers, some years ago, and his mother, too; and another, a distant cousin, had come into that which should rightly have been his. Ay, and that which was his yet, if he only cared to claim it! And with this thought arose the oft-recurring question, as to whether he was acting rightly in keeping his son out of his due.

But he had now determined. He would go and see how things were going, and how all looked after this twenty years of absence. Nobody would recognise him or know his son. He could sleep and stop in the little county town itself without any fear of that, and he would benefit by his native air, no doubt.

Having finally made up his mind he spoke to the boy at his side, whilst he lovingly stroked the wavy chestnut hair, so exactly like what hers had been.

"William," said he, "would you like to go to England for a holiday?"

The boy's eyes gleamed, as he took his father's hand. "Oh, dad, it would be splendid! So grand to see London, and the Queen, and the Abbey, and all those lovely places you've so often told me all about. And the pretty house where you used to live, dad, in Durham, was'nt it, you said? Oh, I should like it, and no mistake!"

"Right you are, my boy," said his father, more gaily than he had done for some time. "We'll go, William; it will do me good, I daresay."

And a fortnight later the steamship Umbria, from New York, carried two passengers, whose berths had been taken comparatively late, booked for Liverpool. And more than one of those on board remarked on the close friendship, love, and resemblance that existed between the father and the son.

CHAPTER II.

The Honourable Eva Porton.

PORTON LODGE was situated some five or six miles north of the river Tees, which, as everyone knows, forms the boundary line between the counties of Durham and Yorkshire. It was an ideal stately home of the English aristocracy, going back in its chief building and design to the time of Henry VII., though it had had so many alterations and improvements made in it during the Elizabethan period that most people, at first sight, would have taken it for an Elizabethan house.

The building was of red brick, and on the front formed three sides of a large square, the centre part of which was occupied by a large fountain and well-laid-out flower beds, encircled by a wide carriage drive. In front of this square the ground sloped gradually down, facing the park, over which the eye ranged in a splendid view for miles, passing over the country, and finally resting on the large industrial town five miles away, where black smoke and dark sky indicated the never-ceasing energy of commerce.

Yet all was so tranquil and peaceful, so suggestive of rest and beauty in this domain of Porton Lodge, that it seemed scarcely possible to realise the nearness of that place to the town already spoken of. Far more in keeping was it with the old country town of Wellcaster, seen from the back of the house, at a distance of only two miles. Wellcaster was an ideal English country town, with all the usual concomitants of that factor of agricultural life. To-day, being market day, its chief street, about five or six yards wide, was filled with stalls of all kinds, whose proprietors were ready to do business in any shape or form. There was, besides, a horse or two for disposal; and some half-dozen cows, lying leisurely in the cobble-paved roadway, were also for sale, if anyone wished to buy.

Amidst all this busy and picturesque scene, the waggonette which run every market day between the industrial town and Wellcaster, came lumbering heavily into the market square. It was so usually empty that the spectacle of two passengers, with a fair amount of luggage, would have been sufficient to draw universal attention, had it not chanced that at that very moment the "hall carriage," as it was called, with the Honourable Eva Porton inside, had drawn up just before the door of The Bull, and the footman had descended from his perch, resplendent in yellow livery, to go inside the inn on some business of his master's. The waggonette, whose rendezvous was The Bull, drew on one side till the carriage had left.

The young lady inside the carriage saw the motion, and standing up whispered to the coachman to pull to the other side of the street, so as to let the waggonette come to its accustomed position. A lifting of the hat, and a profound bow from each of the two passengers of the waggonette, together with a "Thank you, madam," suggested to the lady herself that, despite their tanned countenances and evident familiarity with hard work, the visitors appeared above the average rank of country trippers.

She mentioned the subject to her father, the Earl, as they sat at dinner.

On their side it must be confessed that the young lady had very favourably impressed Mr. Conrad Walker and Mr. William Walker, for my readers will have guessed that the two passengers and our two Canadian visitors were identical. The beautiful, fairy-like girl of eighteen years, with her laughing brown eyes, her golden hair, and her plain yet charming white muslin dress, looked as pretty as any English girl possibly could, which is saying much.

But hers, as was evident to the two visitors, was not only a physical beauty; there was a beauty of even a higher range still in Eva Porton's face and figure—the beauty of a genial, happy smile; the beauty of perfect health and enjoyment; the beauty of trying to do good and help those who were not so well off as herself. And never had she looked better, or more lovely, than she did on this September day when first the eyes of William Walker—William "Porton"—had she and he only known, met her.

"Who is the young lady in the carriage?" asked Mr. Walker, the elder gentleman, of the ostler at the inn, as that worthy proceeded to take charge of the luggage.

"That's the lady from the Lodge, sir, the Honourable Eva Porton," whispered the ostler, as if half afraid she might hear him. "And a wonderful good'un she is, too, sir," he added.

"Well-liked?" queried the backwoodsman.

"I should just think so, indeed," said the other. "Folks half worship her. You see she's so vastly different from the ——, I mean from some in the family," muttered he apologetically, as if recalling to mind that discretion is often advisable.

"You mean the Earl?" asked the elder man, with a curious smile, and half hesitation, as he pronounced the last word.

The ostler gave a sickly grin and nodded; then, fearing he might be lured to further imprudence if he stayed, hurried off to attend to business, whilst the two visitors gave another look at the young lady, whose carriage, the footman's business being now concluded, was preparing to drive away.

The Hon. Eva Porton, on her part, had stolen more than one surreptitious look at the manly faces of the two strangers, and had seemed to find an especial interest in the tall, well-made form and face of Mr. William, if one might judge by her repeated glances at him. And through the whole of that day, though there were many things that occupied her mind, and many duties to which she had to give close attention, yet somehow or other there was constantly looming before her mental eyes, as she sat up in the dainty boudoir that overlooked the country town, the figure of a tall youth of about twenty years of age, grave, yet with keen, honest, dark eyes, and that bold, fearless look on his face which has won so many battles, and conquered so many foes, both in love and war. Eva Porton was wondering who the stranger was, and who the gentleman with him, evidently his father, was, and how she could learn their identity without disclosing her own interest.

How many women have studied this question in the history of the world?

She mentioned the subject to her father, the Earl, as they sat at dinner that evening, in a sort of casual way, after a question of his had nicely paved the way for it.

Digitized by Google

The Earl of Aldergate was not at all like his daughter, either in face or disposition. A hard, grasping man, with a very haughty mien, and a sort of "Don't you know I'm somebody particular?" air about him; and there were very few people amongst his acquaintances, and fewer still amongst his dependents, who cared for the Earl of Aldergate or for his wife either. He had come into the title and estates some fifteen years ago, when, after an interval of waiting, and no claimant appearing, on the death of the old Earl, on behalf of the only son William Porton, who had left home and never since been heard of, there seemed no reasonable ground for further belief that he or his heirs were living.

The present Earl had been a distant cousin, living in the extreme South of England, and never by any chance visiting the family in Durham; hence he had only once seen the missing William Porton, and that was when the latter was a child. At first, on coming to Wellcaster to Porton Lodge, he had done so with much pleasure, yet with some anxiety and misgiving, as there was no knowing when the missing heir might turn up and dispute his claim to the succession only too well.

But now that fifteen years, or nearly that, had passed by, these fears had long since gone, and his Lordship was now in no dread of that which had formerly cost him so many sleepless hours. He was in power, a landlord and a county man to be feared, and he knew it, and gave men occasion to fear him rather than to love him.

In this he was ably seconded by his wife, who was his second spouse, the Hon. Eva Porton being his only child by his first wife, who had died some years ago. There were no children by this second marriage, though Lady Aldergate had two sons by her first husband, one of whom—Herbert Blair—was not far from being the same age as Eva, being, in fact, some six months older. But none of these were at all in favour with the Wellcastrians or their neighbours, except the Hon. Eva herself.

All this and much more the two travellers learnt, by judicious inquiries, that night from the landlord of The Bull.

"She's a dear, Miss Eva, she is," repeated that worthy for the tenth time. "Why, bless you, gentlemen, you should have seen how she looked after old Mrs. Bridgeman at the lodge when the old soul had the fever, and how she spent the whole day after the colliery explosion last year, in going about helping and comforting the poor families whose sons and fathers had been killed or hurt. Didn't people bless her! And they do say"—here mine host lowered his voice—"as her father, the Hearl, who thinks the world of her, though he is not vastly loved himself, made a regular row with her about her doing such dangerous things, he called them, as bothering in fevers and such like. But she only laughed, and said she'd take no harm! Eh, bless you, she's a good 'un, and a regular Durhamite!"

Almost at the same time the Earl was saying, at dinner, "Anything new in Wellcaster to-day, Eva? I could not ride over there myself."

And the girl laughed—did she blush just a little?—as she replied,

"Oh, yes, great news for Wellcaster, papa! Two strangers came up to The Bull to stay a few days, I suppose, whilst Wilkins was in there. Oh, yes, Wellcaster will be busy."

"With their tongues, I suppose, of course!" said the Earl. "The strangers were only tourists, I expect!"

"I should think so," she said. "Two gentlemen, rather good-looking, I thought."

"Eva always talks of 'good looks,' instead of 'high-breeding,'" put in the Countess. "Really, if everyone were judged by their looks ——"

"Well, Eva, is young yet, my dear," said the Earl, who saw a cloud gathering, and hastened to try and stop its bursting.

"I'm aware of it," said the Countess, "and I hope she'll soon get settled and become wiser."

CHAPTER III.

An Adventure at the Church.

S has been stated, the Countess of Aldergate, second wife to the Earl, as he was her second husband, was not well liked in the district of Wellcaster. In fact, if the truth must be fully stated, she was very much disliked. The Earl himself had never succeeded in really gaining the affections of his tenants and neighbours, as other earls had before him. His disposition was not of that conciliatory mood which wins the respect of the inferiors for their superior in position, and makes them forget difference of rank, position, and circumstances in fellow-feeling for the man.

But the Countess was more than unpopular, she had many active enemies. And it must be confessed that she herself had made them so. From her first coming to Porton Lodge, on the accession of the Earl to his new dignity, she, who had only then been married to him for less than a year, at a time when she had had little idea of ever becoming a countess, since everybody expected that the real Earl would one day turn up, took upon herself to alter and change things and people which had been connected with the ancestral home of the Portons for more years than could readily be told.

There is nothing that sooner gains the ill-will, and dislike of old-fashioned country people, than to see some new upstart come and completely upset all their methods of procedure for years past; and if even the innovations be both more useful and practical than the older things they supplant, yet the country folk fail to grasp the beauty of the change, or its usefulness. But when it arises merely from pride, or from whim, there is apt to be a good deal more said than the delinquent would care to hear.

And Lady Aldergate had done all this, and gained the eternal disfavour of the Wellcastrians. Moreover, they had not forgotten the day when her Ladyship's carriage had run over little Tommy Wilkins, the son of Widow Wilkins, in the High-street, and when just as the coachman was going to pull up to see if the little fellow was badly hurt, her Ladyship had put out her head to beg him to drive on, and not keep her waiting there. And as her carriage rolled away down the High-street towards Porton Lodge, two miles away, there came into the market square a young lady on horseback, attended by a groom, who in obedience to his mistress's orders, assisted her to alight.

And the crowd, who had lately half hissed the Countess of Aldergate, gave a loving greeting to the Honourable Eva Porton, as she followed the man carrying Tommy Wilkins to his mother's house, and did not leave till she had seen that all had been done for him that possibly could be.

Digitized by Google

It was the repetition of such acts as the above that had made her Ladyship's name received with anything but favour amongst the people of Wellcaster.

The two strangers from Canada heard all about it from the landlord and landlady of The Bull. The latter was as vehement in her dislike of the Countess and her sons as she was strong in her approval of the Hon. Eva.

"Two impident brazened lads as ever you need want to see, Sir, they are," said the worthy woman, addressing Mr. Walker. "If cheek and impertinence, to say nothing of pride, can get anything, they, like their mother, are going to have it. Why, I have heard say as how"—and here the hostess dropped her voice—"as how her Ladyship is trying to bring about a engagement between her eldest son, Mr. William Blair, and the Earl's daughter! If impidence can go farther than that, I'll have nothing for it. Why, Mr. William isn't fit to take her shoes off, he isn't, let alone to be her husband! Eh, me, it wor a sad day that the young Earl—I mean Mr. William Porton, as would have been the Earl—went away, and was never heard of again. I can just nicely remember him myself, and a grand lad he wor; everybody liked him. You know the tale about him, I suppose?"

The oldest of her two auditors acknowledged, hesitatingly, that he had heard it. Then, pausing, he asked, "And what finally became of him?"

"Well," went on the landlady, "nobody ever knew any more. It was rumoured he had been drowned at sea; and, again, that he had been killed by Indians in 'Merica. Anyhow, the old Earl and Countess never knew more before they died; they always thought he must have been drowned, as was stated, in crossing with his wife to 'Merica. As for her, nobody knew anything further. . . . What we should have done with the new Earl's family but for Miss Eva I can't tell. She's the one real 'scion' of the Portons, as my man, Timothy, calls her—one chip of the good old block. And she's so good and sweet that it makes me wild to think of that old woman thinking she ought to marry that bragging muff of a Master William Blair. It's simply shocking to think of it. But there's one good thing—there's no fear of it's happening; Miss Eva will have a word or two to say about that. And they do say that, though the Earl always has to give way to what her Ladyship thinks and wants, yet in this he is very strict—that there's to be no interference with Miss Eva's tastes and ways. Her ways are not her stepmother's, and he knows it. Well, it's something to his credit, anyhow."

On Sunday, Mr. Conrad Walker and Mr. William Walker attended service at the church of the country town. By this time all Wellcaster knew fully who they were, and where they came from, or thought it did—which is about the same for gossiping purposes. It was confidently asserted that they were South African merchants who had made a fortune, and were travelling through England to see the sights. And, of course, Wellcaster included itself amongst the sights!

Mr. William Walker did not disguise from himself, as he sat in the pew into which the verger had directed him and his father, that he was looking somewhat eagerly for the possible advent of his "fair lady" of the previous week; and that, when the family party arrived from Porton Lodge, his gaze was much more turned towards them than towards the clergyman.

Yes, she was there—as beautiful a girl as ever Heaven's sunlight rested upon; and she walked up the aisle so modestly, so unconsciously graceful in every motion and step, that the elder man, looking upon her, acknowledged what a queen she was, and did not wonder that his son blushed, as he half stole glances at her fair form. She could not herself, of course, help noticing the strangers from her pew, which overlooked all the church, and so it was left to Mr. William's imagination to wonder what she thought.

She walked up the aisle so modestly.

When the service was over they met, by accident, outside in the country churchyard, the Earl's family and the two visitors. Eva carried her own prayer-book and hymn-book; it had been her gift from her own mother many, many years ago, and she valued it highly. What the cause might have been, she could not say—even in after years she declared laughingly it was a pure accident—but just as Mr. Walker and his son passed the girl, her prayer-book fell upon the path.

Probably it may have arisen from that agitation which does attack every daughter of Eve, however calm otherwise, at the sight of the man she loves; probably it may have been that her grasp of it was not as firm as usual; anyhow, it fell. And William Blair on the one side, and William Walker on the other side, both bent to pick it up, whilst the Countess looked round in half-disguised annoyance at what she called Eva's

Digitized by Google

"carelessness," and the elder tourist smiled gaily as he saw his son reach hold of the little book ere his rival could touch it.

The girl took back her prayer-book, as the young man offered it with raised hat, with her sweetest smile, and William Walker's heart beat a shade quicker. She thanked him gently, so gently and sweetly—what a wonderfully sweet voice she had—for his kindness, whilst Mr. William Blair looked daggers at him.

"Eva, are you coming or not?" petulantly asked the Countess. "Why do you stand bothering there?"

"Because I have no right to be discourteous, mamma," said the girl. And with another smile at Mr. Walker, she went on.

"I don't know, Eva," said Mr. Blair, as they turned into Porton Park, "whatever you see in such low people as yon tourists to thank them so effusively for what I should call 'blooming impertinence.' I should have picked up your book; he'd no need to have touched it."

"You may call it what you please," said the Hon. Eva gaily. "I call it kind and gentlemanly, and from the little I have seen and heard of these two gentleman in Wellcaster, they seem to me to be anything but low, and certainly not impertinent."

"Indeed," said Mr. Blair sarcastically, "indeed! I did not know you had taken them up amongst your friends! Perhaps we shall be having them as guests at your garden-party next Wednesday!"

"Perhaps you will," retorted the girl, stung by the insult as to almost forget what she was saying. "And if they were here, there would be two gentlemen more" —with an accent on the "gentlemen,"—"at any rate."

With which parting salute the young lady left him, and went to her own room.

The Countess said a few words to Miss Porton later on, on the same subject, not in a motherly way, but in a domineering, sneering manner. To her Eva returned much the same reply. "I knew," said her Ladyship, "I knew what it would be, and how you would receive my advice, Eva! I cannot, of course, make you do what I want, but I think you might consider what is due to me, due to the Porton family, before you put a slight on my son before strangers! And as to the garden-party, well, you'll do as you like, I suppose?"

"With father's permission I shall invite my friends, your Ladyship," replied the girl, "and you need not be afraid that either due deference will fail to you, or that the honour and pride of the Portons will suffer in my selection of guests for my birthday."

Of course the Hon. Eva Porton had never intended such a thing as inviting the two tourists, to whom she had not even been formally introduced, but when the Hon. Captain Jackson and Mrs. Jackson asked leave to bring two gentlemen friends with them, whom they were sure Lord and Lady Porton and the Hon. Eva Porton would be glad to know, the answer was naturally, "With pleasure," and so, to Eva's surprise, as well as inward joy, the next Thursday saw the two visitors at Porton Lodge.

CHAPTER IV.

The Garden Party.

THE Countess of Aldergate and the Hon. Eva Porton stood at the entrance of the hall of Porton Lodge receiving the guests who were invited to celebrate the eighteenth birthday of the younger lady. Some dozens had already arrived, and been welcomed. But the two visitors who were coming as friends of Captain and Mrs. Jackson had not yet put in an appearance, and Miss Eva stood somewhat eagerly watching for the arrival of their party. The Countess would much rather have preferred not having to welcome two "plebian fellows," as she had styled them in talking with her son, but needs must. She flattered herself that she was, after all, a lady and a member of the aristocracy, with whom all show of illwill or dislike was, to say the least, "bad form."

So having to make the best of a distasteful job, she had resolved to welcome them effusively as friends of the Jacksons, and then to monopolise Mr. Conrad Walker as much as possible for the rest of the afternoon. He must be exceedingly close and clever, she thought, if she, the Countess of Aldergate, could not get something out of him in the way of news or family matters that would repay her trouble, and serve to discourage the growing attraction that Miss Eva was finding in the younger man.

Strange to relate, though the usually sharp lady of Porton Lodge both felt and knew that some mystery attached to these two visitors, for whose stay week after week at The Bull she could find no adequate reason, seeing that Wellcaster's charms and attractions were soon gone over by most visitors, it never struck her at all to even think of the true solution. Years and years ago she had given up the idea of the real heir of Porton ever turning up again. She had made up her mind that he had died, childless, long ago, and years of unmolested possession with her husband of the estates and titles had only confirmed this view. So that the true solution of the mystery hanging around her two guests never presented itself to her mind.

They arrived at last, in company with the Jacksons, and were duly introduced by the latter to the Earl and Countess, as well as to the Hon. Eva Porton. The Earl received his guests in a quiet, gentlemanly way, as was to be expected from him. Even if he was not all that former holders of the title had been, yet his bearing on such occasions as this was beyond reproach.

As a garden party, with afternoon tea, the affair was a great success. Mr. Conrad Walker sauntered along the paths with a strange and curious feeling. All these scenes were so familiar to him, though it was twenty years ago since he had known them. How many times he had stood on that terrace, just as he stood now, and thought with pride upon the noble destiny that was before him, and upon the good he would try to do when, after his father's death, he should become Earl of Aldergate! All those walks in the shrubberies where he had, in younger days, played "hide and seek" with his nurse, and, when older, had paced with his school-book in his hand, vainly endeavouring to fix his mind on Roman History instead of cricket, he knew only too well again!

Those were happy days whilst they lasted. And then had come the separation, when, falling in love with Carla, his father and mother proving so obstinate, he had left them in anger to try his fortune in the New World, and discarded title and estates for ever, as he thought.

And he sighed deeply, so much so that the Countess, who was walking with him, rallied him on his gloominess and taciturnity.

"I beg your Ladyship's pardon for my forgetfulness," he said. "I was thinking of one of my old home-scenes, and how like to this it is."

Then ere she could reply, he motioned to a walk in the garden where his son and Miss Eva were strolling together, both looking thoroughly happy, and said:

Digitized by Google

"Let us go down there, and see how they are enjoying themselves, if you don't object. Ah, your Ladyship, enjoyment is not difficult when the heart is young and knows no cares!"

As they came up to the younger ones, they saw Eva smiling gaily at something William had said.

"You seem to be enjoying yourself here, Eva," said the Countess, rather sarcastically, "but you must not neglect your other guests."

"I beg your pardon, Miss Porton," said the young cavalier, bowing gracefully, "I had, in my selfishness, and the pleasure of your company, forgotten there were other guests. May I lead you back to the terrace?"

She took the offered arm, and they returned up the garden-walk.

"So you think you would like our Canadian life?" asked he, for it was that he had previously been describing to her.

"Oh, it must be splendid," she replied enthusiastically. "I am so fond of horses and of the woods, you know."

"We shall be very glad to entertain you if you care to come over any time for a holiday," said the youth, with a bright smile and a blush. "I think we can promise you some good sights."

"When are you thinking of returning, Mr. Walker?" she asked. And the eager listener would have detected a shade of quavering in her voice.

"Oh, I can't say yet, Miss Porton," he answered. "It depends on dad. But," and unconsciously he lowered his voice and spoke so gently, as she afterwards remembered, "I shall be very sorry to leave England—to leave this district."

"I shall be very sorry to leave England—to leave this district.

And even her maiden and aristocratic modesty gave way before her womanly curiosity and innate pleasure, as she asked with averted face,

"Shall you? Why, may I ask?"

He turned quickly, gave her a quiet look, such a look as always pierces to a woman's heart, and then replied with tremulous accents,

"Miss Porton, n ed you ask why?"

And as she silently withdrew her arm from his, they passed on the terrace amongst the other guests. Yet a great and fierce joy had taken possession of her heart, and she whispered with delight all through the day, "He loves me."

Many people made remarks on the loveliness and brightness of their young hostess that afternoon, and many also spoke with much pleasure of the two Canadian visitors, whose gracious manners and manly speech won all hearts.

"Do you know, Richard," said Mrs. Jackson to her husband as they drove home, after depositing their friends at The Bull, "I have such a feeling on looking at Mr. Conrad Walker's face that somehow I have seen it before. His son, too, gives me the same impression. And their very voices seem familiar."

"That is a feeling one often has, my dear," replied her husband, "with those one meets in various places. I quite understand it, though I am afraid it is only a feeling here, seeing that it is impossible you should have known Mr. Walker anywhere before, as he has lived in Canada all his life, I understand."

Digitized by Google

"Do you know anything more about him beyond Briggs saying he was a man of good position and fairly well-to-do?" persisted Mrs. Jackson.

Briggs was the Wellcaster solicitor, whose family, in the lawyer line, was almost as old and respected in the county as was the Earl of Aldergate's. And as it may be stated here that Mr. Conrad Walker had paid more than one visit to Mr. Briggs, it may be assumed that the lawyer knew of what he was talking, when he had introduced his client to Mr. Jackson as a man of "position and well-to-do."

"I know from what Briggs said," went on Mr. Jackson in reply to his wife, "that Mr. Walker is a man worth knowing, I can tell you. The lawyer speaks enthusiastically of him as a gentleman and a business-man."

"Well, of course, I can't say," persisted the lady; "but the face and voice, especially in certain circumstances, seem intensely familiar to me, and yet I can't think whom they resemble. But did you see Miss Eva's decided preference for young Walker's company? I noticed it particularly. And I also observed the looks of disgust and gloominess upon the countenance of Mr. William Blair."

"I can't say I noticed it," remarked the gentleman. "Eva was all the same with everybody, as far as I saw."

"Oh, was she? Richard, it's surprising to me where you men put your eyes! Now, just mark my words. Eva Porton is in love with this young Mr. Walker, and he is in love with her. There'll be bad blood between him and Mr. Blair yet, you'll see. For everyone knows what the Countess and her son are planning."

Then Mrs. Jackson, who had been thinking, resumed.

"The Earl would never give his consent, you may be sure; her Ladyship would see to that. And the Portons are high-spirited. Even his Lordship is, if he were not so much under her dominion. Eva has her grandfather's spirit, who was more like a Porton than even the late Earl. There may be a noise yet in the family about this affair, for Miss Eva is not likely to give way to the Countess's wish about her marriage. We might have another elopement, or some such thing, as that of twenty years ago."

"Oh, dear, Matilda, how you do talk and imagine!" said Mr. Jackson, with a loud laugh.

But the words "elopement" and "twenty years ago" had set the lady thinking. And what she thought may be judged from the incredulous smile which slowly crossed her face as fancy thoughts flitted through her mind, till at last a broad smile rested there, and an involuntary "Oh," was ejaculated.

"What is it now?" queried her husband lazily.

"Nothing," said she, "I was only thinking."

And a smile rested on her face as she surveyed her husband, but it was that superior smile of pity at a man's dulness and ignorance which women know so well how to use. And Mrs. Jackson kept her secret to herself.

(To be concluded next week).

Result of 15th Sovereign Distribution.

No one applied for the sovereigns in this distribution. The following were the names selected:

W. Brown, Church Street, Wilmslow; W. Dunn, 92 Ludford Street, Crewe; Mrs. Howard, 13 Victoria Road, Runcorn; Thos. O'Brien, 6 Shop Street, Glenamaddy, Ballinasloe; Jas. Powell, Edvin Ralph, Worcester; Jas. Walker, 25 Prospect Place, Gravesend; J. Anderson, 19 Mapier Road, Luton; J. Foster, Beoley, Redditch; Miss M. Johnson, 27 New Mill Street, Dudley; W. Morrison, 5 Greig Street, Inverness; T. Scott, 14 Atlantic Avenue, Antrim Road, Belfast; A. Ward, High Street, Westerham, Kent; J. Leighton, 4 Lincoln Street, Nottingham; Miss F. Church, 7 North Terrace, Wisbeach; W. Gambold, 72 Walkin Street, Swansea; H. Keeling, Sun St. Potton, Sandy, Bedford; Jos. Rose, 14 Frank Street, Leicester; Jas. Tilbury, Ship Street, Wycomb, Bucks; H. Collins, 5 Albion Road, Lewisham; W. Horton, Market Street, Oakengates; E. Abberley, 4 Albert Street, Shrewsbury; Miss Forde, 35 Roman Street, Cork; A. Vickers, 17 High Street, Nantwich; S. McAdam, 21 Spencer Street, Belfast; W. Bird, 5 Lowfield Grove, Stockport; Mrs. Harbord, Seaside, Aldborough, Hull; John Leslie, 8 Chappel Street, Lowestoft; H. Trigg, 25 Albert Road, Richmond, Surrey; C. Winter, Eastwich Rectory, Harlow, Essex; T. Alston, 2 Turrall House, Turrall Street, Worcester; Mrs. Chouler, Ingleside, Kingsley Road, Northampton; G. M'Innes, 52 Seafield Road, Dundee; H. Scull, 7 Oakfield Street, Cardiff; Mrs. Anderson, 38 Kirk Gate, Newark-upon-Trent; H. G. Davies, 7 Lambton Road, Hornsey Rise; C. B. Woolpack, Godmanchester, Huntingdon; J. Treanor, Hill Street, Newry; E Wright, High Street, Middleton; T. Burman, Tennants Bridge, Libsey, Boston; G. Cook, Chantry, Headcorn, Ashford; Jos. Barrett, 1 Thames Street, Oxford; J. Fryer, 33 Benson Street, Linthorpe, Middlesborough; F. Hicklin, 3 Gerard Street, Derby; Thos. Davies, 6 Great Eastern Terrace, Neyland; W. Bailey, 13 Church Road, Ilfracombe, Devon; Miss Wilde, 49 Richmond Road, Stamford Hill; W. Tailby, 19 Wardsend, Loughboro; Isaac Clark, 120 Vicarage Road, Plumstead; A. Wheeler, 54 Bridge Street, Worksop; M. Carter, 85 Crown Road, Yarmouth.

A UTOPIAN SCHEME

would be for every reader of a paper to be his (or her) own Editor. Each one would then have exactly the reading required. For fair woman, HOME NOTES has filled the gap, for in it are there not numerous competitions with huge prizes, chats about children, talks about health and beauty, hints on house decoration, serial and short stories, fascinating fashions, and matters too numerous to mention?

IF YOU KNOW OF A BETTER STORY

THAN THE

"KETTLE" ADVENTURE

IN THE

February "Pearson's,"

NOW ON SALE,

WE SHALL BE GLAD TO PURCHASE IT FROM YOU.

Digitized by Google

Tragedy of a Girl's Life.

A RATTLE of musketry came from the direction of the village. The old grave-digger, Boloski, wakened by the noise, sat up on his miserable pallet, listened a moment to the sharp, quick reports, then called aloud: "Milena! Milena!"

"Coming, father, coming," she answered, and already the little naked feet showed themselves upon the rungs of the ladder which led from the loft.

"Did you hear them, Milena?" he cried, "the sounds of the gun shots? They are fighting in the village—" a violent attack of coughing interrupted his words, and another rattling volley.

Milena had descended just as she quitted her couch of straw—a young girl, tall, vigorous, and scantily draped in a brief chemise. She had thrown about her shoulders a short pelisse of sheepskin, but her Amazon hips showed themselves firm and beautiful under their light covering, and her breasts appeared an instant, white as polished marble, against the dead black fur.

"It is true, then!" said she, leaping the last steps; "it has come at last!"

"What, my child?" demanded the sick man.

"The Revolution has broken out to-night, which has been expected so long."

"Yes, and a great misfortune it is too," mumbled Boloski and he crouched again upon his couch. Milena meanwhile hurriedly arrayed herself in a wadded petticoat and her father's long boots. Binding a scarlet handerchief about her abundant locks, she went out to learn what was passing.
pelisse closer.

Below, in the heart of the valley, the village had delivered itself up to strife and bloodshed, yet here upon this sacred ground all was peace. A large cross rose in the middle of the inclosure, to which was attached the figure of the dying Saviour—icicles pendant from the thorns which crowned His brow and from the nails which pierced His hands and feet.

Milena listened intently—not a murmur for the moment broke the stillness. She stopped and gazed up at the heavens, the vast blue vault which seemed to her a satin canopy, retained in place by the golden nails which sparkled and scintillated above her, while beyond there, on the other side of the forest, rode the red disc of the rising moon.

All at once a gliding, crouching form passed her like a flash, a pair of glowing eyeballs glared into her own.

"A wolf!" she murmured, and, with an energetic movement, wherein shone all the savage strength of this child of nature, she seized a stone from the neighbouring wall, and threw herself forward. A low howl responded to the stroke of her arm, and the hungry beast was gone as it had come—a shadow—through those files of tombs and spectral crosses.

A fresh crash of musketry sounded in the distance, another, and still another. Milena traversed at a run the slope of the road which led to the village, and, at the beginning of the first houses, met a neighbour and a wounded man, the wife, whom she knew well, supporting the husband, whose blood dyed the snow at every step.

"What is the matter?" demanded Milena.

"The peasants of our village," replied the man, "and of Mikonloff are struggling with the insurgents down by the café and the little wood. All goes well, however; the scythes are sharp and do their bloody mowing; the heads fall like grain!"

"So!" said Milena; and she aided the peasant woman to place her husband in his bed and to bind his wounds. Then she retraced her steps to tranquilise her father.

An hour later a loud knocking sounded upon the gate of the cemetery.

"See what it is, Milena," said the grave-digger again; and Milena, obeying the command, opened the wicket obstructed by frost, to find before it a row of sledges encompassed by horsemen, the barrels of their muskets and the blades of their sickles sparkling in the rays of the moon.

"Come, open the gate, old mole!" shouted a voice from the crowd; "open the gate, and open quickly. We bring you a score of distinguished guests!"

"But I want no guests," replied Boloski from the interior. "I am ill, as you know well; I dare not go out in a night like this."

"Ill or no," cried the voice again, "the work must be done."

"Well, bury them yourselves, then."

"We cannot—we have no time."

"In that case," said Milena brusquely, shutting the wicket to end the discussion, "tis I who will bury them for you." And she went out to open the gate to the four loaded sledges, bearing the dead bodies of the insurgents, and to the conquerors, armed with their bloody sickles and gleaming scythes.

"Throw them there upon the snow," said she to the mayor of the village, who greeted her as she appeared with a friendly nod; "I'll start business for you at the rising of the sun."

"No," said the mayor; "that would not be Christian—the wolves and ravens are already waiting to do their work—they must be buried now. You will receive for the job the usual sum in addition to that two quarts of brandy, and, for your back, a new pelisse. Is it a bargain?"

"A bargain," she answered. "I'll begin when you say," and with arms akimbo and robust fists upon her hips, she regarded the defile of peasants and sledges rapidly discharging their score of dead.

Her beautiful face remained impassive; pity seemed a stranger to those hard features, and yet what charm, what passion in those great black eyes, in that sensitive nose, in that firm, severe mouth.

The mayor counted the money into her hand, put the bottle of brandy on the snow beside her, and the sledges slowly drew on again, the peasants following in their wake as silently as they had come.

"But the pelisse?" demanded Milena.

"To-morrow, when the work is done."

And the mayor also quitted the cemetery, and Milena took up her spade, and with a great swallow of brandy commenced to dig the first trench, crooning as she worked, the words of an ancient grave-digger's song.

The sad melody, monotonous and slow as befitted the song of the dead, was accompanied by the dull ringing of the iron upon the frozen ground and the distant howling of the hungry wolves.

Another swallow of brandy, another swing of her muscular arms, and so it went till the trench was done, and Melina, waiting a moment to regain her breath, gazed on the corpses.

"'Twas doubtless you," said she to an old man, with long, white curls, clad in a rich cloak, trimmed with zibeline, and in whose girdle sparkled a superb yataghan, "'twas doubtless you who led the band. Well, this time too, you shall go before!"

And she took him in her arms like a little child, decended into the trench herself and gently laid him on the ground. With the others she was not so ceremonious, an arm, a leg, a shoulder—anything, in short, that helped to lift and toss them to their bed in the ditch, served her purpose.

"But Heaven help me!" she cried, as before her in the snow lay stretched a bleeding trunk, "Heaven help me, if it isn't the lord of Kamiez, that cursed Turk, and oppressor of the poor."

And she struck the face of the head that lay beside the trunk a blow which sent it rolling like a ball to the depths below. Another swallow of brandy, a new body in the hole, then the tomb securely closed, Melina was ready to begin the second.

In the meantime, the moon, rising higher and higher in the heavens, wrapped in its warm light the silent graves, the crucifix, the roofs of the now sleeping village and the vast and soundless plain.

And again the second trench ready, the gravedigger's daughter approached another group of dead. The face of the first one was covered with blood which had ran from a cut in the head. At the same instant she heard a sigh—a long, shuddering breath that came from this body. Melina drew back hastily; courageous as she was, she felt her hair rise upon her head; and soon she saw that rigid body begin to stir.

He still lived, then. There was no longer a doubt of it. She caught him in her arms in order to succour him, rubbing with snow that face begrimed with blood and powder, and chafing his frozen hands. In a moment his eyes unclosed.

"Valerian!" his name upon Milena's lips was half a scream and half a cry of menacing anger.

She shook her head brusquely, thrust him from her, and rose to her feet.

"Save you!" said she with a calm more terrible than either rage or the joy of a glutted vengeance, "when it is God who has delivered you into my hands! You betrayed me—you now belong to me. Pray to your God, Valerian; perhaps He will be merciful, but from me expect no mercy."

"You have forgotten, then, Milena, forgotten how I loved you!"

"No, I have forgotten nothing; but you, what have you done with all those vows? You! who ruined me—who then, in spite of everything, left me for another! I shall not spare you—be sure of that!"

"You will not kill me?" groaned the unhappy one.

"Kill you? No!"

She smiled with a glacial irony which made him shudder.

"I shall only do my duty—I shall bury you as I have received orders!"

"Bury me!" cried Valerian. "Bury me, living?"

"Why not?" responded Milena, with a burst of cruel laughter. "I must earn the sheepskin for my back which the mayor promised me!"

"Have pity, Milena; for Heaven's sake, have pity!"

"Did you have pity upon me?" she answered sternly. "You, who have vowed me to sorrow and to shame. This for your beautiful love—behold it."

And she seized him by the shoulders and sought to thrust him in; but he, with that frightful death before him, had risen to his feet, and a furious struggle began between them,—a hopeless struggle too, for soon Valerian renounced all thought of wresting himself from the embrace of this savage creature. From the loss of blood his strength was gone from him—he was but a child in her cruel hands.

"Mercy, Milena, I beseech you—mercy!"

She responded with a disdainful foot-thrust which sent him rolling into the gaping hole. A last time he struggled to his feet, his arms outstretched and clasping her knees with supplicating gesture.

But his prayers only rendered her more ferocious still. She caught up her spade and struck his hands—their grasp relaxed, she struck again, a second, a third blow—he fell!

And Melina?

Milena, with one hand clenched upon her spade, the other doubled upon her hip, stood there and heard him groaning—stood there and contemplated him with cold, fierce eyes and voluptuous pleasure.

"Now," said she, "now, Valerian, are you mine?"

Then she began to crumble the earth between her fingers and to fill the ditch, to fill it in and stamp it down, as she had filled and stamped the first, her voice firm and clear as ever, rising always in the chorus of her sinister song, and always accompanied by the sound of the clods falling one upon the other by the ring of the spade, by the cawing crows circling hungrily above the heap of the unburied dead. And, in the east, the first grey lights of the coming morning slowly spread themselves across the heavens, pale and cold as the smile upon the faces of the frozen clay.

Sacher Masoch.

Digitized by Google

With Her Own Weapons.

MARION meant to be sympathetic, after the manner of men, by uttering philosophical platitudes as a balm for sentimental heart troubles; but he quickly realised that the case before him was too genuine and severe to be cured by such superficial ointment as cynical quotations from Kipling. So he took another tack.

"Of course, old man, there are women and women. Some can be had for the asking, while others play for all the line they can get. It's just like fishing"—his metaphor suggesting an illustration from sport—"one fish will bite at almost anything; but another insists on a nice fly for an attraction, and, even after you've got it really hooked, you've got to play it until your patience is almost gone.

"Now, you'd rather have a girl with some spirit—one who'd stand you off for a time—than one who was all the time throwing herself at your head, wouldn't you?"

Warren vouchsafed a weak, doubtful "Yes."

"By-the-way, have you asked her?"

"No. That's the difficulty. I don't really get a chance. Just as I get myself spurred up to the mark some confounded interruption interferes, or she turns it off with some remark or other."

"You think the girl really cares for you?" asked Marion, dropping his raillery and becoming serious.

"I think she does," frankly answered Warren, "although sometimes I feel as if I didn't know whether she did or not," he continued, somewhat dubiously.

"Well, there's only one way to find out," remarked Marion, "and that is to—here, I have a plan," breaking abruptly into his sentence. "I have a plan," he slowly repeated, "and I believe it will work if you follow my advice. Put yourself in my hands," he continued, his face brightening, as his plan was unfolded to his mind, "and I'll bet that you'll win."

Then he buttonholed Warren, pulled him into a corner, and addressed him in a low, earnest tone, interspersing his remarks with emphatic gestures. When he had finished, Warren still looked dubious, but somewhat more hopeful.

* * * * *

"Good evening, Mr. Warren. I'm so glad to see you. We're just packing up—getting ready to go to the country."

"Indeed! Lovely weather. Hope you'll have a pleasant time." But he might have been a phonograph, or a Punch-and-Judy operator, for all the expression he put into his words.

"Oh! I've no doubt we shall," she answered, with a toss of her head. "There's so much going on there, and so many interesting people to meet," she continued, with a bored air, as if her immediate surroundings were productive of nothing but ennui.

"Yes," he assented, in a listless monotone, which might mean anything or nothing.

She pretended not to notice his abstracted manner and rattled on:

"My friends write me there are ever so many nice people there, and with golf and driving and boating, there'll be no end of fun."

"Yes."

Again that tone of polite indifference.

"Well, I'm going for a trip myself," he added, rousing himself from his lethargy, and almost blurting out his words.

"Indeed! Where?"

This was her turn.

"To Hong Kong."

"To Hong Kong?"

This time she was interested in spite of herself. She repeated his answer with distinct emphasis on the words, and a rising inflection at the end.

"Oh, come now, you're joking. Your——"

"No, really," he asserted; "there's an opening there in our firm. They want a young man to take charge of their branch banking house there, and I can have the place. It looks like a good opening, and I thought I'd take it. Of course, it means"—clearing his throat—"tearing one's self away from one's friends, but then, I shall probably not be greatly missed."

"Oh, Mr. Warren," broke in the girl reproachfully.

The coquettish manner was gone. The genuine woman was speaking.

"Well, for a day or two a few may notice my absence, and then——"

He finished the sentence with a careless wave of his hand, to denote the ephemeral nature of the friendship he conceived was felt for him.

"But there are no nice girls there," she remarked mischievously.

She was trying to get back to the coquette again, but her eyes were moist.

"That isn't a consideration," he answered gloomily. "There's only one girl in this world for whose smile I'd give the hopes I entertain for my business future, and I'm afraid that in her eyes I'm but as all the rest of the world."

"Who is the young lady, may I ask; do I know her?" she queried with an attempt at gaiety.

Warren glanced at her, but she wasn't looking at him. She seemed to be manifesting an extraordinary interest in picking at the end of a ribbon on her dress.

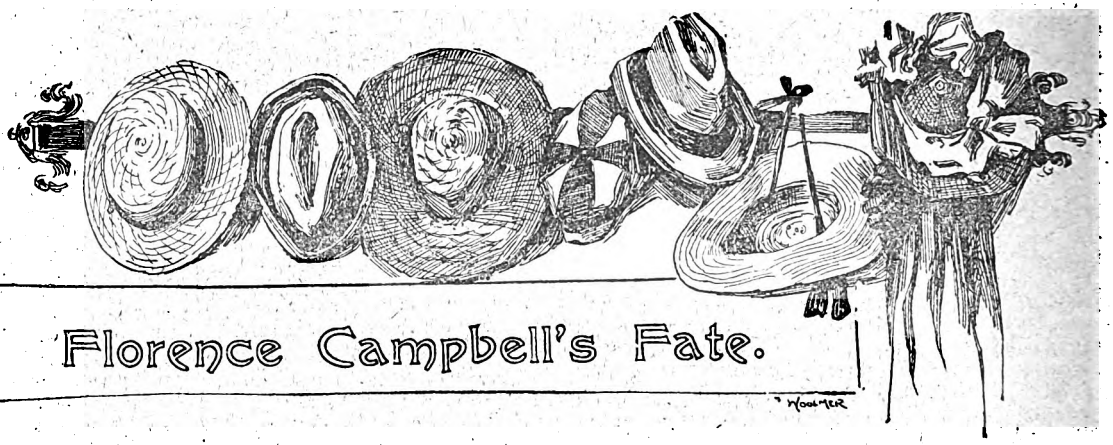
* * * * * *

"I have just been reading the social gossip," wrote Marion, who had gone north for a month on business, "and I congratulate you. But why in the name of all that's absurd did you hesitate so long? The game must have been in your hands from the first. One of these fine days you will want a crest. How would this suggestion meet your approval: 'A bold bluff painted on a field of blue?'"

And he underscored two words in the last sentence.

Digitized by Google

RALPH HENWOOD.



Florence Campbell's Fate.

I AM, as you know, not a young man, and in the practice of my profession I have learned to diagnose the cases that come under my care very slowly and by degrees. Every year has taught me that physical symptoms are often the result of mental ailments, and that, while cordials and powders are sometimes very useful aids, the first and all important thing is to understand fully the true history of the patient.

Now when I was first called to see Florence Campbell the message conveyed to me threw no light on the case, beyond what the most ordinary observer would have detected at a glance. The note read thus:

DR. H. HAMILTON.

DEAR SIR,—Although I have been here for several months, it is the first time since I came that I have myself felt that I needed medical attention. I have, therefore, not sent you the inclosed note (the history of which you no doubt know) until now. If you will read it, it will explain that the time has now come when, if you will come to me, I need your care.—Yours respectfully,

FLORENCE CAMPBELL.

The note inclosed was from a physician in Manchester whom I had known intimately many years before, but with whom I had held no communication for a long time past. It said:

MY DEAR DOCTOR,—One of my patients is about to visit London. The length of her stay is uncertain, and, as she is often ailing, she has asked me to give her a note to one whom I believe to be skilful, and to possess the qualities which she requires in a physician. In thinking over the list of those known to me in London, I have decided to give her this note to you. She is one of those rare patients to whom you can afford to tell the unvarnished truth, and from whom you can expect it. She has had no serious illness recently, but is rather subject to slight colds and sick headache. I give her sulph. 12. She always responds to that in time.—Yours, as ever, THOMAS C. GRISWOLD.

I do not know that I ever entered a more delicately perfumed room than the one in which Florence Campbell sat.

She rose from her deep armchair as I entered, and extending her hand, grasped mine with a vigour unusual in a woman, even when she is well.

"This is Doctor Hamilton?" she said in a clear voice; "I am very glad to see you, Doctor. I am Florence Campbell. You received a note from your friend, Dr. Griswold, telling how I came into possession of it."

Direct of speech, clear of voice, hand feverish, but firm in grasp, I commented mentally as she spoke. This was not what I expected.

She stood with her back to the light, very erect and well poised.

"Come to the window," I said. "Does your head ache?"

She laughed.

"Oh, I don't know that it does—not particulary, I fancy there is not much inside of it to ache much. Mere bone and vacuity could not do a great deal in that line, could it, Doctor?"

Then she laughed again. She looked me in the eyes, and I fancy she was diagnosing me.

She was evidently trying to gain time—to take my measure.

"It is always rather a trying thing to get a new doctor, don't you think so?" she asked, with another little laugh. "I always feel so foolish to think I have called him for so trifling a matter as my ailments are. I cannot expect you to furnish me with robust ancestors, can I? Just keep me out of bed,"—and here, for the first time, I noticed a slight tremor in her voice—"just keep me so that I can read, and—so that I shall not need to sit alone, and I think I shall be quite satisfied—quite!"

She had turned her face away as she said the last; but I saw that she was having a hard struggle to keep back the tears, notwithstanding the little laugh that followed.

I had felt her pulse; it was hardly perceptible, and fluttered rather than beat, and I had watched her closely as she spoke; but whenever she came near the verge of showing deeper than the surface, she broke in with that non-committal little laugh, or turned her face, or half closed her great eyes, and I was foiled. Her pulse and the faint blue veins told me one story; she tried to tell me quite another.

"How are you suffering to-day?" I asked.

She looked steadily at me a moment, then lowering her eyes, raised her left hand, looked at its palm a moment, held her lips tightly closed, and then with a sudden glance at me, as if on the defensive, said:

"I hardly know; I am only a little under the influence of the weather; I am weak. I am losing my—hold—on myself—on my—nerves. I cannot afford to do that."

The last was said with more emotion than she cared to display. So she arose, walked swiftly to the dressing-case, took up a lace handkerchief, and returned to a chair which stood in the shadow, and then, with a merry little peal of laughter, said:

"Well, I don't wonder, Doctor, that you are unable to diagnose that case. It would require a barometer to do that, I fancy, from the amount of weather I got into it. But really, now, how am I to know what is the matter with me? That is for you to say; I am not the doctor. I suppose it is malaria, don't you?"

Digitized by Google

I wanted to gain time—to study her a little. I saw that she was or had been, really ill; ill, that is, in mind, if not in body. I fancied that she succeeded in deceiving Griswold into treating her for some physical trouble which she did not have, or, if she had it, only as a result of a much graver malady.

The right branch may have been found and nipped off from time to time when it grew uncomfortably long; but the root, I believed, had not been touched, and, I thought, had not been even suspected by her former physician.

I believed that Griswold had not fully understood his former patient. "Sulph. 12" indeed! Then I smiled, and said aloud:

"Dr. Griswold writes me that in such cases as yours he advises sulph. 12—that it has given relief. Do you call yourself a sulphur patient?"

I watched her narrowly, and, if she did not smile in a satirical way, I was deceived.

"Are you out of that remedy? and do you want more of it?" I asked, with a serious face.

She did not reply at once. There seemed to be a struggle in her mind as to how she would let me know. Then she looked at me attentively for a moment, with a puzzled expression I thought; then an unutterably weary look crossed her face. She said slowly and deliberately:

"I have no doubt sulphur will do as well as anything else. Oh, yes! I am decidedly a sulphur patient, no doubt. I suppose I have taken several pints of that remedy in my time. A number of physicians have given it to me from time to time."

How far would she go, and how far would she let me go, with this nonsense? I looked gravely into her eyes, and said, "That remedy will do. It sometimes holds a patient until a doctor can decide exactly which complaint is to be treated. In your case I am inclined to suspect the—that it is—the heart. I shall, therefore, begin by asking you to be good enough to tell me what it is that affects your heart."

I had taken her wrist in my hand as I began to speak. My finger was on her pulse. It gave a great bound, and then beat rapidly; and although her face grew a shade paler and her eyes wavered as they tried to look into mine, I knew that I had both surprised and impressed her.

She recovered herself instantly, and made up her mind to hedge still further.

"If there is anything the matter with my heart, you are the first to suspect it. My father, however, died of heart disease, and I have always hoped that I should die as suddenly. But I shall not—I shall not! I am so wiry, so all-enduring! I recover! I always recover!"

She said this passionately, and as if it were a grave misfortune—as if she were very old. I pretended to take it humourously.

"Perhaps at your advanced age your father might have said the same."

She laughed. She saw a loop-hole, and immediately took it.

"Oh, you think I am very young, Doctor, but I am not. People always think me younger than I am—at first. I look older when you get used to me. I am nearly thirty."

I was surprised. I had taken her to be about twenty-three.

"In years, or in experience? Which way do you count your age?"

She got up suddenly again and walked to the dressing-case, then to the window. In doing so she raised her hand to her eyes. It was the hand with the lace handkerchief in it.

"Experience!" she exclaimed, and then, checking herself: "No, people never think me so old—not at first," she said, returning to her chair. "But I suppose I am not too old to be cured with sulph. 12, am I?"

"Miss Campbell," I said, stepping quickly up to her side, and surprising her, "you do not need sulphur. You need to be relieved of this strain on your nerves. Make up your mind to tell me your history to-morrow morning—to tell it all; I do not want some fairy tales. Until then, take these drops to quiet your nerves."

There were tears in her eyes. She did not attempt to hide them. They ran down her cheeks, and she simply closed the lids, and let them flow. I took her lace handkerchief, and wiped her cheeks. Then I dropped it in her lap, placed the phial on her stand, took up my hat, and left.

* * * * *

But I did not get her story the next day, nor the next, nor the next again.

Her tact was perfectly mystifying in its intricacy; her power of evasion marvellous, and her study of me amusing.

One morning she made a remark that seemed to show that she feared to die. I seized the opportunity, for I thought by a little adroitness I might get at least a part of the truth.

"So you are really afraid to die, and yet think that you must," I said bluntly.

She turned her great luminous eyes on me, and her lip curled slightly with real scorn before she forced upon her face her usual remark of good-humoured sarcasm.

"Afraid!" she exclaimed; "afraid to die! Afraid of what, pray? I cannot imagine being afraid to die. It is life I am afraid of. If I could only——"

She checked herself abruptly, and with an evident effort resumed her light air and tone.

"Ah, my child," said I, taking her hand, which was almost as cold and white as marble, "and there are Doctors deceived, and confiding persons who prescribe 'sulph 12' for the broken heart and over-wrought nerves of a little woman who tries bravely to fly her gay colours in the face of defeat and to whistle a tune at a grave."

I had called late, and we were sitting in the twilight, but I saw tears fall on her lap, and she did not withdraw her hand, which trembled violently.

I had touched the wound roughly, as I had determined to do; but, old man as I was, and used to the sight of suffering as I had been for years, I could restrain myself only by an effort from taking her in my arms and asking her to forget what I said. She seemed so utterly shaken. We sat for some moments in perfect silence, except for her quick, smothered little sobs, and then she said, passionately:

"Oh, Heaven, Doctor, how did you know?" And then, with a flash of fear in her voice, "Who told you?"

"I know nothing except what I have seen of your brave fight, my child. All the information I have had about you, from outside, was contained in that little note of introduction from Griswold.

Digitized by Google

"I have not watched you for nothing; and I never treat a patient without first diagnosing his case. I do not say that I am always right, but I am, at least, not blind, and I have always been interested in you. I should like to help you, if you will let me. I can do nothing for you in the dark." Then dropping my voice significantly:

"Does he know where you are? Does he know you are ill?"

There was a long silence. I did not know but that she was offended. She was struggling for command of her voice, and for courage. Presently she said, in a hoarse whisper, which evidently shocked her as much as it startled me, so unnatural did it sound:

"Who? My husband?"

"Your husband!" I exclaimed. "Are you—is there—I did not know you were married. Why did you always allow me to call you Miss Campbell?"

"I do not know," she said wearily. "It makes no difference to me, and it seemed to please your fancy to treat me as a child. But I really never noticed that you did always call me Miss. If I had I should not have cared. What difference could it make to me—or to you—what prefix you put to my name?"

"But I did not know that you were married," I said almost sharply.

She looked up startled for a moment; but recovering in an instant she said, smiling a little, and, with evident relief, plunging into a new opening:

"That had nothing to do with my case. There was no need to discuss family relations. I never thought of whether you were married or not. You were my doctor—I your patient. It would not be—edifying to talk about my affairs."

"You are tired out," I said, rising. I judged it prudent to go. "Go to bed now. Order your tea brought up. Here is an order to see to anything you may ask promptly. Beesley, the proprietor, is an old friend of mine. Any order you may give, if you send it down with this note from me, will be obeyed at once. I will come to-morrow. Good-night."

I put the order on the table at her side. I know my voice was husky; it startled me as I heard it. She sat perfectly still; but she laid her other hand on top of mine with a light pressure, and her voice sounded tired and full of tears.

"Good-night. You are very kind—very thoughtful. I will be brave to-morrow. Good-night."

That night I drove past and saw a light in her window at one o'clock.

"Poor child!" I said, "will she be brave enough to tell me to-morrow, or will she die with her burden, and her gay little laugh on her lips?"

* * * * *

The next day I called earlier than usual. I had spent an almost sleepless night, wondering what I could do for this beautiful, lovable woman, who seemed to be all alone in the world, and who evidently felt that she must remain apart and desolate.

What had caused her to leave her husband? Or had he left her? What for? What kind of man was he? Did she love him, and was she breaking her heart for him? Or did he stand between her and some other love? Had she married young, and made a mistake that was eating her life out? How could I help her?

As I stepped into the hotel office to send up my card, as was my custom, the manager escorted me with his perfunctory smile and said:

"Good morning, Doctor. Got so in the habit o' coming here lately, s'pose it'll take quite a while to leave it off. Eh?"

I stared at the man in utter bewilderment.

"Ha! ha! ha! I believe you'd forgot already she'd gone." And then, with a quick flash of surprise and intelligent, detective shrewdness, "You knew she was going, doctor? She did not let you in for her little bill, did she? Of course not. Her husband was in such a dickens of a hurry to catch the early train, they said he was ringing his bell the blessed night for fear they'd lose it. You hadn't gone five minutes last night, when he came down here with your cheque and order, and we had to make things lively to get cash enough together to meet it for her; but we made it, and so they got off all right."

"Have you got my cheque here yet?" asked I, in a tone that arrested the attention of the manager, who looked up in surprise.

"Good Heavens, no! Do you think we're made of ready money, just because you are? That cheque was in the bank the first thing after banking hours," said he. "You see, it cleaned us out last night. I told Campbell last night that you must think hotels were queer to expect us to cash a five hundred pound cheque at five minutes notice. Couldn't 'a done it at all if 't hadn't been pay-night for the servants and the rest of us. We all had to wait till to-day. But Mr. Beesley will tell you. Here he comes."

"Why, Doctor, old boy," said Beesley, coming up from behind and clapping me vigorously on the shoulder, "didn't expect to see the light of your countenance here again so soon. Thought we owed it all to your professional ardour for that charming patient of your's up in number 13. They got off all right, but if any other man but you had sent that order and cheque down here for us to cash last night I wouldn't have cashed it. Of course, I understood that they were called away suddenly, unexpectedly, and all that. He told me all about it, and that you did not complete the bargain until the last minute; but——"

"Bargain?" gasped I, in spite of my determination to hear all before disclosing anything.

"Oh, it was all right, my boy, as long as it was you—glad to do you a good turn any day. But what a queer idea for that little woman to marry such a man! How did it happen? I'd like to know the history. Every time I saw him come I made up my mind to ask you about them, and then I always forgot it when I saw you. He told me you had been his wife's guardian!"

I left the hotel abruptly, my brain in a whirl; I could not see through this maze. My name had been forged on a cheque, and I had in some way been duped, that was all I could grasp.

But not duped by her—no, no, I would never believe that. It was by this man who called himself her husband.

Later, when calmer, I tried to thrash it all out, but all I could do was to lay the blame on someone else, not upon her, whom I loved—yes, that was the truth; old man that I was, I had fallen in love with her.

Then I resolved to make inquiries, even though I hated myself for so doing.

How about Griswold's introduction — and that "sulph. 12." I looked through my desk for Griswold's note. It was certainly his handwriting; but I noticed for the first time that it did not mention her name.

Perhaps this was a loophole through which I might bring my fair patient—in whom I was beginning to fear I had taken too deep an interest—without discredit to herself.

Digitized by Google

Might she not have changed her name since Griswold treated her? I determined to give her the benefit of this doubt until I could be sure that it had no foundation.

I felt relieved by this respite, and heartily ashamed of the unjust suspicion of the moment before, I gave no hint of it in the letter I now wrote Griswold describing the lady, and in which I inclosed his letter of introduction to me.

The next few days I went about my practice in a dream, and it was no doubt due to fortuitous circumstances rather than to my skill that several of my patients still live to tell the tale of their suffering, and of my phenomenal ability to cope with disease in all its malignant power.

In due time Griswold's letter came. I went into my room to read it. I remember thinking vaguely that I usually took time to open my letters with more precision and with less disregard for the untidy appearance of their outing covering afterwards. I hesitated to read beyond the first line, although I had so hastened to get that far. I read: "My dear old friend," and then turned the letter over to see how long it was—how much probable information it contained. There were four closely-written pages.

"I never heard of anyone of the name of Florence Campbell, so far as I can recall. I certainly never had a patient by that name. Some months ago I gave the letter you enclose—which I certainly did write—to a patient of mine who was on her way to the Cape, and expected to stay some time in London on her way.

"She, however, was in no way like the lady you describe. Her name was Hatfield, and she was small, with dreamy blue eyes and flaxen hair. I understood that she did not stop but a few days in London. I have since learned from her brother that she made the acquaintance of a man whose name was Campbell—a man with a decidedly vague, not to say hazy, reputation; and that his wife, who was supposed to be an invalid, never appeared in public, and so was never seen by Hatfield, but was only known to him through Kitty's enraptured eyes. She was said to be bright and pretty. Miss Hatfield is the most generous child alive in her estimate of other women. However, he thinks it possible that she either gave her the letter from me to you and asked her to have proper medical care, or else that the woman or her husband got hold of it in a less legitimate way, which I think quite likely. Miss Hatfield thought that Mrs. Campbell was charming.

"Hatfield is so ashamed of his sister's friendship for the woman that I had the utmost difficulty in making him tell me the whole truth; but, from what I gathered yesterday, he thinks them most likely the head of a gang of counterfeiters or forgers, and——"

I read no further, or, if I did, I can recall only that. It was burned into my brain, and when a loud pounding on my door aroused me, I found the letter twisted and torn into a thousand pieces, the Vichy and wine bottles at my side half-empty, and the hands of the clock pointing to half-past ten.

"Doctor! Doctor!" called my man, "oh, Doctor! Oh, dear! I'm afraid something's wrong with the Doctor, but I'm afraid to break in the door."

I went to the door to prevent a scene. One of my best patients stood there, with Morgan, the man. Both of them were pale and full of suppressed excitement.

"Heavens and earth, Doctor, we were afraid you were dead! What is the matter?" said my patient.

"Tired out; went to sleep," said I; but I did not know my own voice as I spoke. It sounded distant, and its tones were strange.

They both looked at me suspiciously, and with evident anxiety as to my mental condition. I caught at the means of escape.

"I am too tired to see anyone to-night. In fact, I am not well. You will have to let me off this time. Get Dr. Talbott, lower down, if anyone is ill; I am going to bed. Good-night!"

It was two months later ere I heard the truth, and that was when called upon to make a post-mortem examination of the body of a woman found murdered. It was Florence Campbell!

The body was identified by Miss Kate Hatfield, and afterwards I obtained particulars from her.

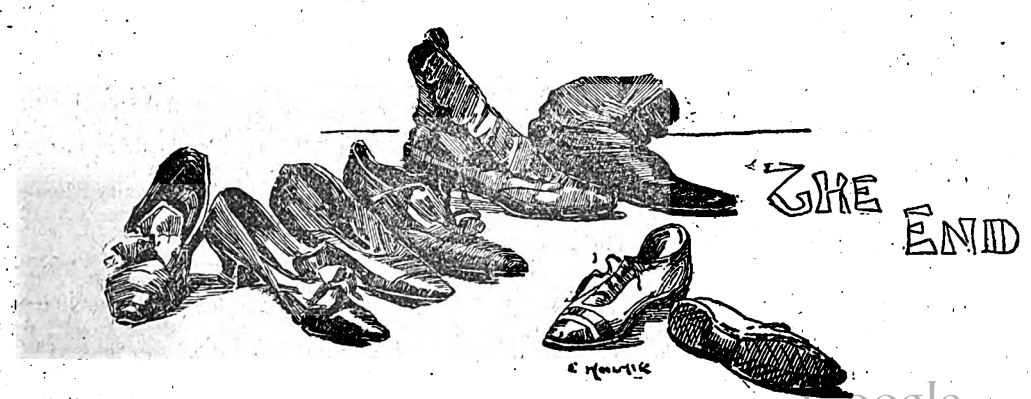
It was part of the scheme that Mrs. Campbell should be an "invalid," but the husband and wife were professional swindlers. They were kind to Miss Hatfield on purpose, and she was deceived by them and gave up the letter to them. She did not know at the time that they intended to rob me, but she heard it after they left the hotel.

She was so ashamed and afraid that she dare not go back to Manchester or write, and in her weak-minded state she had remained with them.

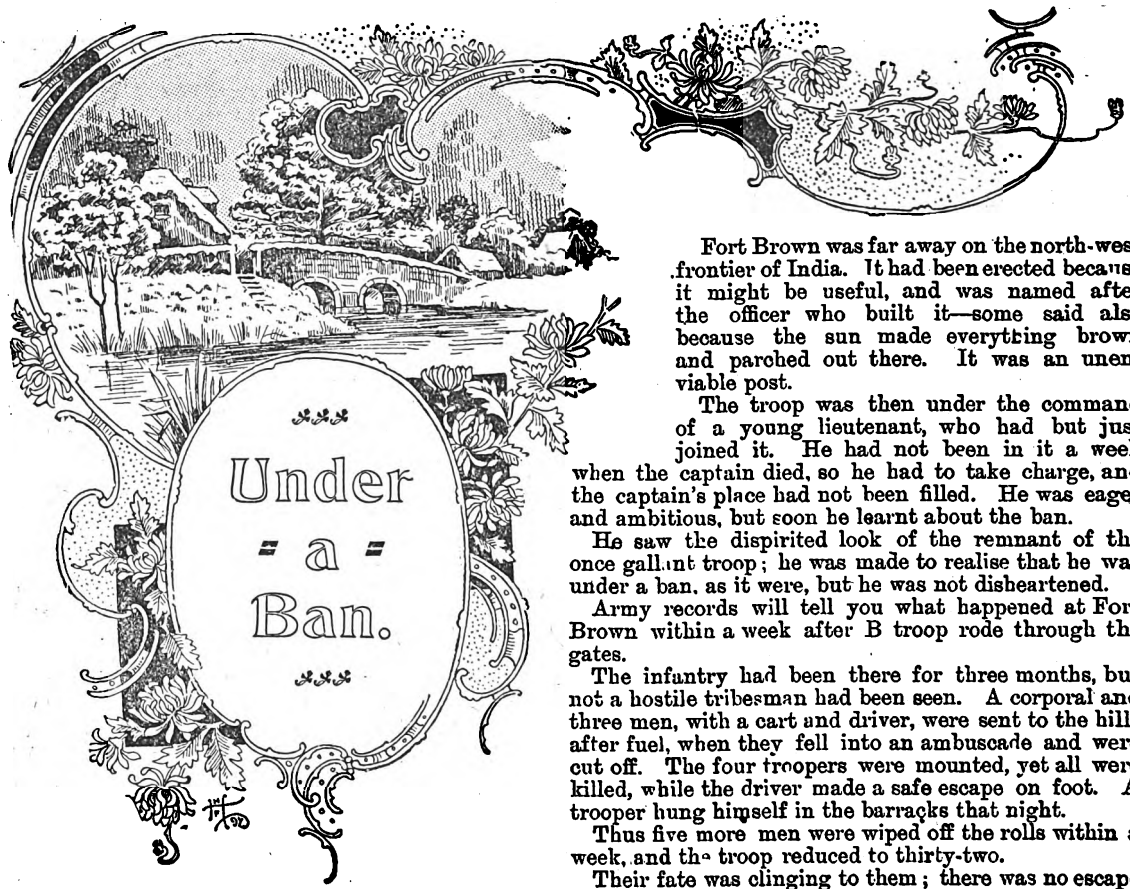
Who murdered Florence Campbell?

There was not enough evidence to show, but we all had our suspicions.

RALPH WINDSOR.



Digitized by Google



THE story of the spell that hung over B troop is not known to the outside world, nor does the public know that the troops of the 95th were re-named, and that A troop was called D troop, and so on. This is the story of the ban.

There was a time when the troop was high in favour, and officers liked to be drafted to it. Then its ill-luck began. It was sent to the frontier, and disaster after disaster overtook it.

It marched against some hillmen, and somehow—no one knew—it fell into ambush and lost forty men at one sweep. The troop was forced to retire, and disgrace clung to it.

After that, it was kept at a little frontier post at its reduced strength, but its ill-luck continued. Men died apparently while in good health, and three committed suicide at different times. If a party went out for any purpose, it was almost certain to lose at least one man, and yet it never really had an actual fight.

Its reputation became known to army men, and officers used their influence to avoid being drafted to that ill-fated troop. The authorities seemed impressed with the fact that a ban was upon the troop; at any rate, the number was not made up after a while.

Finally the number dwindled to thirty-seven, and it was at that point in its misfortunes that it was sent to Fort Brown, for no other apparent reason than to get rid of it—for there was no need to reinforce the infantry stationed at that solitary fort.

Fort Brown was far away on the north-west frontier of India. It had been erected because it might be useful, and was named after the officer who built it—some said also because the sun made everything brown and parched out there. It was an unenviable post.

The troop was then under the command of a young lieutenant, who had but just joined it. He had not been in it a week when the captain died, so he had to take charge, and the captain's place had not been filled. He was eager and ambitious, but soon he learnt about the ban.

He saw the dispirited look of the remnant of the once gallant troop; he was made to realise that he was under a ban, as it were, but he was not disheartened.

Army records will tell you what happened at Fort Brown within a week after B troop rode through the gates.

The infantry had been there for three months, but not a hostile tribesman had been seen. A corporal and three men, with a cart and driver, were sent to the hills after fuel, when they fell into an ambuscade and were cut off. The four troopers were mounted, yet all were killed, while the driver made a safe escape on foot. A trooper hung himself in the barracks that night.

Thus five more men were wiped off the rolls within a week, and the troop reduced to thirty-two.

Their fate was clinging to them; there was no escape from it.

The colonel at Fort Brown had received the young officer half in welcome, half in pity. He knew the history of B troop, and he realised that any connection with it must cast a shadow on the career of an officer.

The loss of the five men gave the colonel anxious thought. No one could be held to blame. It was simply one of the fatalities which had so persistently pursued the troop.

One day he received news which determined him to take a certain step, and he sent for the young lieutenant and said:

"A friendly native is in with the information that a band of hostiles is making for Brown's Valley. That is where the friendlies who came along two weeks ago were going to settle. I fear they will be unprepared for an attack and will all be massacred."

"And you will send B troop out to drive the enemy off?" eagerly exclaimed the lieutenant.

"If you could reach Amghir post, twenty miles away, before the hostiles, you might turn them back. If they get ahead of you——"

"I would push on after them and hope to save the friendlies. I can be ready in half an hour."

The colonel was a man of forty-five, the lieutenant not yet twenty-three. The older officer looked out of the open window, and thought of the long ride—the fight which must surely take place. Then he looked at the boy and wondered if it would be the last of B troop or the turn of its luck.

Digitized by Google

He was both a soldier and a man. As a soldier he desired to give a soldier a chance. As a man he feared to send out a boy like that where it needed an experienced head.

"You know the spell that is upon us," whispered the lieutenant. "The troop is slowly but surely being cleared off the face of the earth. The men are objects of pity and sympathy and have almost become children. Let me go. I will either win a victory or it will be the last of the troop."

The spirit of the old soldier was stirred. He had given many a young soldier opportunity to distinguish himself, and but for the spell he would not have hesitated in this case. Dispirited men, an officer who had never tackled these tribesmen, and the demon of ill-luck, which had walked at a company's heels like a ghost—no wonder he hesitated. He shook his head and decided that the scout must ride hard and fast, but ride alone, and warn the natives of their danger.

"I beg of you—we all beg of you!" pleaded the lieutenant. "Cavalry is needed to head those fellows off. If the friendlies are killed it will be said that you thought us cowards, and were afraid to order us out."

"There will be thirty-two of you and one hundred of the enemy," said the colonel.

"But we will turn them back, sir; we will fight them!"

"And if they are too many for you?"

"I know the history of the troop, sir," said the boy in trembling tones. "It has lost almost seventy men by desertion, suicide, and skirmish. It has not lost a man in a real fight. They shall say of it in the next three days that it has won a fight or been wiped out. I would rather be lying dead there than continue to serve in a troop which has such a record!"

"You may go," said the colonel. "If it is a mistake, then Heaven help me! Turn those tribesmen back, and I will recommend you for promotion. If they are too many for you——"

"Then you will know it by the fact that we do not return."

Half-an-hour later the men of B troop rode out of Fort Brown and made for the pass.

"There goes the last of B troop," muttered every soldier left behind as the troopers rode away, and as they said it they instinctively looked up at the flag as if expecting to see it at half-mast.

The troopers had received that order without enthusiasm. They knew they were to make a hard ride and that a fight was probable, but they were neither exultant nor despondent. Like the Arabs, they shrugged their shoulders and said, "Kismet."

They were in the hands of fate, and fate was likely to be against them. With scarcely a farewell, and with never a look over their shoulders, they rode away, two by two, and it was not until long after dark that the officer at the head drew rein and ordered the camp for the night. Before they slept he said to them:

"We shall be up and away at the first signs of daylight. Men, listen to me. We are riding to reach the pass ahead of a war party of one hundred. We shall get there first and beat them back or die fighting. I have promised the colonel this. You have had one disaster after another until your fellow soldiers sneer and pity and wonder if cowardice is not at the bottom of it. I do not believe it is. I believe every man of you to be game, and we will win a victory which shall place the old troop in the front!"

A cheer burst from every man—the first cheering heard in Troop B for many a day. Each man drew himself up more proudly. Their minds worked even as they slept, and when daylight came the officer looked from face to face and wondered at the change. There was an eagerness to make him glad and proud.

Breaking camp as soon as it was light enough to see, the troop rode at a gallop, and reached the gap ahead of the hostiles.

Only a short hour, though. Their horses had not yet ceased blowing when the advance of the enemy was made out.

Their destination was a narrow road through a mountain, and its southern end debouched into Brown's Valley, five miles away. The young officer knew nothing of war; but common sense and his veteran sergeant suggested a breastwork across the entrance to the pass.

One was constructed of rocks and logs and stones, and it was hardly finished before the skirmishers of the war party were firing upon it.

No man will ever read what is called "Cunningham's Defence" without his pulse quickening. One hundred and twenty tribesmen pressed forward against a force of thirty-two troopers. Three different times the enemy charged right up to the breastwork, but each time were beaten back with slaughter. The defenders did not escape death, however. When the last charge was driven back, eight of them were stretched out on the rock soil, and there were but twenty-four to fall back for a mile and build another breastwork.

This move was necessitated by the enemy working up the sides of the mountain, and securing a flank fire.

The second breastwork was evacuated the next morning for the same reason, and a mile in the rear of it another was built. When this had to be abandoned, only ten men were left alive.

When flanked out of their fourth defence, there were only five men. One of these was sent to the valley for help, but was cut off.

Of the other four, of whom the officer was one, they died at the fifth breastwork—died with carbines in their hands after firing their last cartridges, and died with cheers of defiance on their lips.

Of the war party sixty-two were killed or wounded, and it turned back.

One day a B trooper was seen coming on foot across the plain. He lurched and staggered as he walked. Soldiers ran to meet him and assist him into the fort. He had been without food or water for two days. The colonel looked at him for a long time without speaking. Then, with pale face and trembling lips, he asked:

"Lanigan, where is your officer—the troop?"

And Lanigan straightened up, saluted, and in a voice as hoarse as a raven's cry he replied:

"I have to report, sir, that B troop has been annihilated to a man, and Heaven forgive me, but I'm that man! They are dead in the pass—all dead—all dead! I was left for dead, but was only unconscious."

Sybil Sedgwick.

Digitized by Google

BOOK III.—CONCERNING THE RULE OF KING OLERON.

CHAPTER I.

How the three became convalescent: how they distrusted the chief sorcerer: and how they discussed their future prospects.

"'The ups and downs of outrageous fortune,'" quoted Sneyd, who was lying in a grass hammock, slung beneath two feathery-topped palm-trees. A cool, fragrant breeze blew from an orange grove close at his right hand. From the other side came up the gentle tinkle tinkle of a streamlet crossing over a bed of shingle on its way to the sea. Overhead, birds kept up a ceaseless melody. Scarlet dragon-flies and gorgeous butterflies winged hither and thither close before his eyes.

O'Neill was in another hammock close by. He was lying with one arm under his head, smoking placidly. At Sneyd's remark he withdrew the pipe, and turned his face so as to bring him into view.

"'Tis an up of fortune this, yer honour, I'm thinkin'. Now that y'are gettin' into a state of convalescence, I don't mind tellin' yez that when we got yez ashore, Sandy Sawbones here thought yez was goin' to slip yer cable for good. Ye were all wrinkles and bones. A hungry musquitty couldn't have made a male off yez, and there's plenty o' them pests here to try."

"You and Sandy saved my life. I don't forget it."

"Sorra bit o' savin' did either of us, yer honour. Where'd we ha' been if it wasn't for Mytto and his father Maantee? Stowed away in a shark-fish's belly, or else an albatross's. An' where'd we ha' been if it wasn't for King Oleron? Fattened till we was fit, an' then shoved into some o' these nay ur's insides, as the prastes wanted when we were landed."

"You never told me of that last," said Sneyd.

"No, yez didn't hear for yourself, and Sandy bade me howld me whisht. It was tonch an' go wid yer honour just then, any way, an' a plazin' little surprise like that moight ha' made it 'go.' It was meself that was wonderin' whether I'd be cooked wid cabbage or onions, or just eat plain wid spuds and a thrifle of salt. Wid yer honour, there was no doubt. There wasn't mate enough on yez for a sthew. They'd either have had to bile yez down for soup, or else ha' served yez up for supper as grilled bones."

"Ugh! O'Neill, don't be a beast. Tell me, though, is this really so?"

"Sorra lie about it, yer honour. It's the naked savage truth I'm tellin' yez. Ax Sandy av there was any mistake in that blear-eyed praste's meaning'."

"I'm afraid it was clear enough," Sandy admitted. "I guessed it at the time, and Mytto has said since that there was no mistake about it. He comes to teach me his lingo. It's pretty easy. I can make out most things he says now. We eke out with signs when we can't understand one another without."

"And what did he say about our being eaten?"

"Just this, Sir——"

"Half a minute," exclaimed Sneyd, sitting up in his hammock. "If you or O'Neill address me as 'Sir,' or by any title of that sort again, whilst we are on this island, I shall be seriously angry. Whilst we were on board ship, it jarred upon me; but O'Neill there said discipline demanded it. But here we are on a level footing, although so far I am showing myself the worst man of the three."

"But, yer honour——" began the Irishman.

"Mister Murtagh O'Niell," said Sneyd, laughing, "if you stick to that game, I promise you I'll Mister you on every possible occasion, and touch my hat when you speak to me. So you've fair warning. Come, Sandy, what was this about our being eaten?"

"Mytto said the sorcerers—they aren't priests exactly—the sorcerers decided on it the moment we came ashore; but the King, who has his headquarters at the next village——"

"Palace, ye spalpeen!"

"All right, O'Neill, palace if it pleases you. Well, the King said that there was an ancient prophecy which foretold that white men should come and help against the Dajians, who, it seems, are enemies of this tribe, and live on another island close by. The sorcerers pretended that they hadn't forgotten the prophecy, but said that we weren't white. We were brown—and they pointed to our faces. The King noticed this, and seemed doubtful; but when Maantee—Mytto's father, that is—pulled back our clothes, and showed that there was white skin where the sun hadn't darkened it, then the King said we should be saved. The old prophecy might have been partly forgotten. The men who were to come might be partly white; in which case we, being brown and white, would fit in with it. I tried to explain to Mytto," Sandy continued, with a dry chuckle, "that our normal tint was white, and that if we were shut up out of the sunlight, we should become the colour of that blinding beach down there, and he was polite enough not to contradict. But, for all that, I'm afraid he didn't believe me."

"We are all of us rather sunburned, an' that's a fact,"

Digitized by Google

remarked O'Neill, critically observing his huge red fist, and then, rolling up his sleeve, and comparing it with the hairy, muscular arm above; "but av we stay hard, at work doin' nothing, under these trees, as we have been since we came ashore, it's white as maley potatoes we'll all be, before the month's out. It's meself that's feelin' paler already."

As the Irishmen's face was still a fiery, brick-red, this may be taken as a figure of speech. But the trio of them certainly had been but little in the sun since they landed. The hut assigned to them was cool and shady, and the little cleared space outside it was sheltered by feathery palm frons, which filtered through nothing brighter than a dim twilight. The natives supplied their every food want—the acmé of hospitality in a primitive community, where food is the greatest necessity of life—and they wisely decided to remain quietly where they were till each was thoroughly recruited. The nervous shock, and the physical prostration due to that desperate spell of hunger and thirst, were not to be got over in a matter of hours. Even Sandy Carmichael, who had been the last to succumb to his privations, was very far from being his former self again, even after the lapse of a whole fortnight.

Parties of the islanders came from amongst the trees, and gazed at the newcomers from a respectful distance. Everything about the strangers was new to them—their dress, their complexions, their manners—but they did not exhibit any rude curiosity. They never made their visits obnoxious. In fact, one and all displayed a simple curiosity, that might very well have been copied by many of the soi disant higher civilisations.

The great majority stayed at a distance. Only the privileged few came up close. Of these last were Mytto and his father Maantee; and it was from them that our three Europeans were industriously learning the language of Erma and its sister islands. The tongue was, after the first few attempts, an easily pronounced one; and as its grammar was simple, and its vocabulary small, the trio made rapid strides. When one gives one's whole time and attention to learning a language, the task proceeds apace; but, even under the most favourable circumstances, there are some—"born linguists," one hears them spoken of—who pick it up faster than others. Sandy Carmichael was one of these, and whilst his companions were both labouring in the sloughs behind him, so to speak, he was able to reach back many a helping hand from the firm ground on ahead, and give them a friendly drag, which would help them on towards him.

"Have you found out what this king intends to do with us?" Sneyd asked him one day.

"King Oleron, so Mytto tells me, is waiting till we are all three thoroughly recruited. He does not wish to hurry us or anybody. 'When one year is finished,' he says, 'another begins. The world is very aged now, but it will be older before it dies.'"

"That's a lazy sort of motto," interrupted Sneyd.

"Faith, it has its charms, let me tell yez," remarked O'Neill, who was lying in his grass hammock, smoking placidly. "It's meself that never knew how pleasant doing nothing was before. Sure, it's born I was to be a gentleman, wid foive hundred a year, an' a man to stand at me elbow wid pipe-lights."

Being naturally one of the most restless and energetic men on the face of the earth, this remark of the Irishman's called forth a smile. However, when he had had his say, Sandy went on afresh.

"When we have got back our full health again, the King wishes us to visit him, and I think, from what Mytto and Maantee let drop, he intends to receive us with all the state he can summon up. That old prophecy rankles in his mind. He has got all the elder men to recall what they can of it, and all their accounts tally with his. The Ermans were warned centuries ago that white men should come to them from a great island in the east, and he is fully persuaded that we are the promised visitors. What he expects from us I cannot say, but that I suppose we shall learn in time."

"And about the priests," Sneyd asked; "what of them? Have they given up their amiable intention of making a meal of us, roast, boiled, or grilled? Or is all this high feeding simply to get us into good condition for the table?"

Parties of the Islanders came from amongst the trees.

"We need have no fears on that score," responded Sandy. "You saw that tall blear-eyed man who came to pay his respects to-day. Well, he is Ebry, the chief of them. His functions are not altogether priestly. He practises the profession I dabble in. He likewise exercises evil spirits, and he is also head sorcerer of the island. His business is a very lucrative one, and he holds a considerable deal of power in one way and another."

"He's a treacherous, evil-minded blayguard, if ever I saw one," exclaimed O'Neill, raising himself on one elbow and expectorating in disgust. "Those shifty, bloodshot eyes never look yez straight in the face. He's squintin' all over everywhere whilst he's talkin' to yez. Mark me now, we'll have throuble from that sneakin', dirty, feather-bestrewn cannibal yet."

"I didn't like the looks of him either," said Sneyd. "But it won't do to show we take a dislike to the fellow. If he set himself to work our ruin, we can rest assured we should have our work cut out to foil him."

"I think," said Sandy, "he has gained his power more by fear than by love. I pumped Mytto on the subject, but Mytto is either very close, or praises the man up to the skies. When I say anything unfavourable of him or any of the other sorcerers, Mytto looks uneasily around him, and either remains silent, or contradicts what I have been saying, and adds something complimentary about the fellows as a sort of counterpoise."

"I suspect," said Sneyd, "that Mytto has been told that sometimes trees and rocks have ears; or perhaps he has learned it from personal experience. However, the stocks and stones on Erma are deaf to English, whatever they may be to their own tongue, so we may make personal comments, in a crowd here as safely as we could in a desert elsewhere."

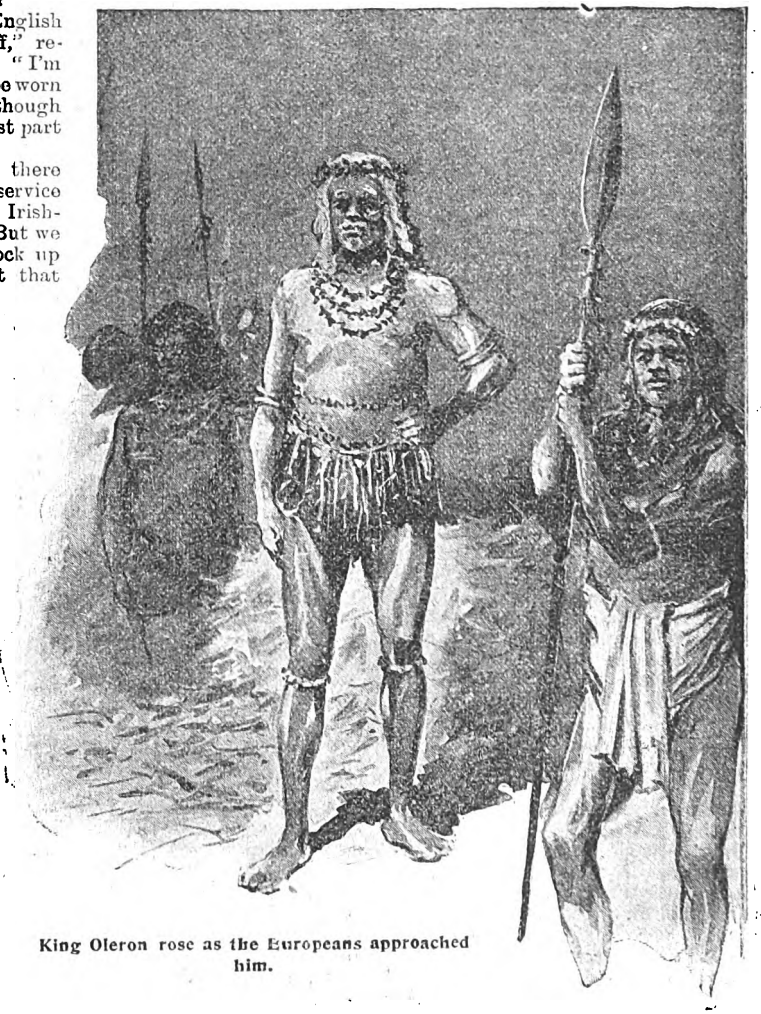
* * * * *

"I wonder how long," said O'Neill one day, "we are going to stay on this island?"

"If we wait for an English ship to take us off," remarked Sneyd drily, "I'm afraid our teeth will be worn out before it comes, although the food's for the most part soft."

"I didn't imagine there was a regular packet service runnin'," replied the Irishman with a grin. "But we should be able to knock up some sort of a craft that would carry us."

"And so go home, aftercalling at Callao for another cargo of dollars?" suggested Sneyd. "The plan is a brilliant one, but it needs a great deal of maturing. We may be able to build a vessel some day, if such a thing be possible with one's fingers, and without a scrap of metal; but that won't be yet awhile. For the present we are alive, and that is a a great deal to be thankful for. We are well treated, which is likewise a subject for gratitude. But on what footing we stand, time alone will show. We may be guests. We may be prisoners. We may be turned into soldiers. We may be made to air our Western knowledge and become tinkers, tailors, blacksmiths, carpenters. Everything depends, so far as I can see, on how Oleron receives us. If we make a good impression on him, so much the better; if not, so much the worse. I don't think our lives are in any danger, though in aboriginal communities, where human life is cheap, one can never be certain upon such a point. 'The favourite of to-day is the felon of to-morrow,' to quote one of Oleron's wise saws given to Sandy at second-hand by friend Mytto. But there is a vast deal of difference between a pleasant life and a hard one. Whilst we are compelled to live amongst these islanders, it would be far better to be their masters than their drudges. Besides, if we were the former, we might find means to build a vessel that would bear us away; but if the latter, we should have no chance whatever of doing such a thing."



King Oleron rose as the Europeans approached him.

"Then," exclaimed the Irishman, "it's meself that'll be dubbed knight at the very laste. Sir Murtagh O'Neill! Faith, it sounds dacenter than the names of better men I've heard. And we'll make Sandy a barrow-knight, and have as our one peer Lawrence, first Earl of Sneyd! Be the powers, av Oleron's got a crown to his name—av he's a rale king, I'm meanin'—'tisn't less he could do for such distinguished sthrangers."

CHAPTER II.

How King Oleron held a state reception: how the three principal visitors were invited to sorcery and luncheon: and how they criticised their host and his clan.

His Majesty King Oleron of Erma was sitting in state in the chief (and only) room of his palace. The palace was a wattle-walled erection some forty feet square, with a high-pitched roof, thatched with flat palm-leaves. It could be simply divided by hanging mats, into a number of smaller apartments; but at present all these barriers were taken down, and the whole was thrown into one large hall.

His majesty was seated cross-legged on a rush-strewn dais at the end furthest from the door. He was a venerable-looking man of about seventy, white-haired, and mild of countenance. On either side of him were grouped his chiefs, all armed with club and lance, and forming a sort of royal body-guard. Save for a gangway down the middle, the rest of the hall was filled with a crowd of islanders of both sexes. All these were decked out in their bravest gala attire—that is, in robes of vari-coloured tappa, with chaplets of lovely exotics, and necklaces of shells, for ornament. There were flowers everywhere. Beautiful orchids were strewn over the earthen floor; garlands of orange and lemon blossom hung from the rafters and perfumed the air. Even the King's venerable brow was not without its floral chaplet.

Up through this assembly the three strangers were conducted by the deputation which had been sent for that purpose.

"You do the talking, Sandy," whispered Sneyd, as they drew near the dais. "You are the best Erman scholar of the three of us."

"Oh, I can't," said Sandy, for once losing his habitual coolness. "I should never know what to say. No, you must answer him, and then, if you get stuck up for a word, I'll help you out. You know what to say. You're accustomed to this sort of thing. You've talked to the Prince when you were in his army. Whereas this is my——"

Digitized by Google

"First introduction to royalty, eh, Sandy? Well, I don't see that the court etiquette of unlucky Prince Charlie's camp, which is my only piece of experience in such matters, will be much of a guide for what to say and do here. However, we must try our best. I daresay they won't be over-exacting with strangers."

King Oleron rose as the three Europeans approached him, and laying his hands on the shoulders of each in turn, he touched the stranger's forehead with his own, five times, looking him steadfastly in the eyes meanwhile.

"White men," he said, "from the island whence is born the rising sun, from the land where we believe plenty reigns supreme, welcome to our shores. Though not unprepared for your coming, the exact time of your arrival was unknown to us. A prophecy, given from old to young through unreckoned generations, warned us that white men would come for our comfort, and long have we been expecting you.

"You yourselves doubtless knew not the fate that the gods had in store. Your frail bark got separated from the larger canoe which bore you to these seas, by accident. The finger of the gods led you out on to the trackless ocean. Food was withheld from you, and the clouds gave their rain but sparingly. Till my good Maantee and his canoes brought succour, you were in but sorry plight. Again, see the finger of the gods. Had you reached these shores strong, healthy, in full flesh, you would immediately have begun to repine. We are not as your countrymen. Our tribe is ignorant of many matters which are common knowledge with you. Seeing the depths in which we recline, you would straightway have longed to return. But coming amongst us weak, nerveless, and nigh unto death's door, you found rest, and all our hospitality could provide. No man withheld anything that was his to give. It has seemed to us that the fruits of Erma ripened but for our guests."

The King paused, and Sneyd replied in the most suitable words that came to his call. He thanked the King and his people for their hospitality, and hoped that he and his companions would find some way to requite at least a part of it.

King Oleron acknowledged this little speech, and then made a few more remarks, which Sneyd could not quite catch the drift of. Sandy, being applied to translated:

"His majesty says he will show us a short sorcery entertainment, and then hopes for the honour of our company at lunch."—At which free and easy rendering of the monarch's sonorous periods, Sneyd and O'Neill had much ado to restrain themselves from laughing outright. However, they preserved sober countenances, and, seating themselves by invitation on the daïs beside the King, watched what was going forward.

The crowd of spectators had pressed in closely to the wattled walls of the hall, leaving the vacant space in the middle occupied by Ebry and his two chief attendants only. Save for a scanty kirtle of snake-skin round the loins, the three were as naked as they were born, unless one counts heavy black hair, which hung lank and unbound as far down as the middle of their backs. Ebry himself was gaunt and lean. His eyes were lashless and bloodshot. His mouth was large and cruel. His nostrils were wide, and had a way of working in and out. Of the assistants, one was knock-kneed, tall, and melancholy-looking; the other, short, merry-eyed, and pot-bellied; an ill-assorted couple. But, as they soon showed themselves thorough adepts at their work, it may be taken for granted that Ebry knew what he was about when he enrolled them in his guild.

The whole stock-in-trade of the sorcerers was contained in a small covered basket of palm swathes. The ground was bare, and there seemed but little possibility of concealing anything about their persons.

I do not propose to give an account of the whole performance seriatim. But one item will serve to show how these knaves contrived to obtain credit for supernatural powers amongst their simple-minded fellow-countrymen.

A handful of short dry reeds was thrown on the floor, and the three sorcerers squatted round it (but at a respectful distance), and set up a droning, monotonous chant. The words were not "understanded of the people." They were not Erman. Very probably they were unadulterated gibberish. But they seemed to act as a spell, and have a creative effect; for presently the dry reeds began to rustle, and from them struggled out a small yellow snake. After a pause, a black snake followed, and then a white one with blood-red spots, and after him, a yellow one with green stripings. Once away from their apparent birthplace the snakes, wriggled across to Ebry, received a caress from his hand, and coiled down peaceably on the floor. Other snakes followed the first in rapid succession, the pile of dried rush diminishing gradually as they came; but at last, when there must have been at least a couple of hundred reptiles in view on the floor, the supply seemed to cease. There were scarcely a dozen of the dead straws left, and these were apparently incapable of metamorphosis.

The three sorcerers squatted around.

Having got this large supply of material before them, the three conjurors changed their chant to a livelier one, which set the reptiles into violent commotion. The three Europeans fancied that the first process was about to be reversed. But the play was not ended. There was apparently method in the writhings. By slow degrees, and after many futile attempts, a number of the snakes raised themselves on their tails, each twisting round and lending support to the others. More reptiles spiralled up, and got into position on the top of these, and others above them, till at last the whole two hundred had woven themselves into one living rope of gleaming, breathing bodies, supported solely by its lower end.

Ebry got up, and apparently tested the soundness of the column with his hand. It swayed. A frown crossed his face, and he set up a lively air, which seemed to make the living items of the column bind closer together. He tried it a second time. It was firmer now, but still apparently not strong enough for his purpose, for he broke out with the new song again with redoubled vigour. This at length seemed to have effect; for at the third trial the rope refused to budge, even though the chief sorcerer strained at it with his shoulder till the muscles of his spare body seemed to be bursting through his dark skin.

Standing erect again, and looking at his handiwork for a moment with a satisfied smile, he turned round, and nodded at his shorter assistant. The little pot-bellied man, scrambled to his feet, and advancing to the shining column laid his hand upon it.

"Howly Saint Pathrick!" ejaculated the Irishman, "av yez could have been spared to see this day, 'tis the great destruction yer honour 'ud have made. Av that Dutch bowed little haythen isn't climbin' them live shnakes, may I never handle honest blackthorn more!"

It was as O'Niell had said. With infinite trouble and caution, the stout little fellow was working his way up, finding resting places for toes and fingers in open jaws, and to judge by an occasional grimace which flashed across his rotund features, not unfrequently pricking himself on a projecting fang. Yet the living rope did not budge an inch to his weight, nor did any of the snakes composing it offer to do him the least harm. Unobstructed, he climbed to the top, and, sitting on the blunt point, wiped the perspiration from his brow.

Up to this point, except from the movements of their eyes which flashed and glinted like so many diamonds, it would have been impossible for an onlooker to declare that the reptiles were alive. But now Ebry set up a shrill whistling, and a strange thing happened. The outside snakes resting on the ground unravelled themselves, climbed up, and settled themselves on the fat man's body. One by one, the other snakes forming the pillar followed their example, till the fellow was enveloped in a mass of glittering, sinuous bodies which completely shut him out of sight.

And—here comes the weirdest part of it—the whole, reptiles and man, were apparently suspended in mid-air.

There was no support to be seen hanging from above, and there was certainly no prop from below. It was a marvellously clever piece of jugglery.

"Begob!" exclaimed O'Neill, who was all in a cold sweat, "he's never goin' to lave that dirty bundle stuck up in the air like a new moon, is he?"

"I shouldn't imagine so," returned Sneyd, "but if you wait you'll see. Look, he's lighting a fire now."

The sorcerer had produced a couple of neat little faggots of wood from his basket, which he set light to, apparently, by the simple process of striking them together. Waiting till they blazed clearly, he threw them on the ground, beneath that grotesque evidence of his handiwork which was still balanced in mid-air, and stood back to watch the result.

A clear, yellow, smokeless flame shot up to within a yard of the lowest snakes. In a minute or so, two or three, unable to bear the heat, fell off into the fire, which hissed, and burnt up more fiercely as each writhing body toppled into it. One by one, and sometimes in clusters of five or six, the remaining snakes fell into the blaze and were consumed, and, at last, all had come down. But where was the man? Nowhere in view. There was no visible means of scrambling on to the rafters, which were fully eighteen feet over his head. Indeed, he could not have escaped observation if he had done so, for the sorcerer's fire was a smokeless one, and even the tongues of flame, which were semi-transparent, did not mount more than eight or nine feet from the ground at their highest.

O'Neill had a solution of the mystery in his own mind, for he muttered, "Gobbled up by them sarpints, ivery bone of him, poor misdirected haythen;" but his two companions were not prepared to accept this, and awaited developments.

Ebry had extinguished his fire, and, whilst he carefully collected the ashes into a heap, his remaining assistant went outside, and returned with a large hollow sphere of closely-woven wicker-work. It was so light, that he threw it from the door to the centre of the hall with one jerk of the hand, and the one orifice in its surface was not more than an inch in diameter. Into this small hole, Ebry poured the ashes through a funnel of palm leaf, going over the ground with minute care, time after time, so that not a particle should be left behind. Then, extracting a gourd from his basket, he poured into the sphere a pint or two of colourless liquid—water, probably—and immediately squatted down on his heels, and began to chant. His knock-kneed assistant, vis-à-vis to him at the other side of the sphere, took up the chorus vigorously at intervals, and the pair of them then bawled so lustily, that the rafters above rattled again. At the end of a minute or so, the sphere began to tremble, its movements becoming more and more pronounced, till it rolled away a couple of yards, and remained still. The song ceased. A cracking noise was heard. The pot-bellied assistant tore aside the walls of his shell, and stepped out on to the hard, earthen floor.

Without waiting for applause or reward, the sorcerers left their traps, and marched out of the hall, and the crowd began to scatter.

"Well!" said the Irishman, "this beats all my goin' a-fishin'. What's a bhoy to believe av he can't thrust his own eyes? I see that fat little spalpeen go aloft, as clear as I see his honour the King sittin' down on his hunkers beside us. I see them bastely sarpints cover him up. I see the sarpints fall down, one by one, an' made sure it's ate he was. And now here he is again, as lively as a dog-fish, an' twice as ugly."

"Ebry is more than man," said the King in the Erman language.

"Ebry is a precious sight less than man, to my way o' thinkin'," remarked O'Neill in his own tongue. "There must be a sthrong cross of the snake in his breedin'. An' being brought up wid a dacent hatred o' reptiles, 'tis meself that's going to give him a wide berth."

"Well, don't pass any more comments just now," said Sneyd, "or some of these good people will be making a shrewd guess at the gist of your remarks. You've rather an expressive face, O'Neill, and there's Mytto I can see for one who has been reading it."

"Mytto's welcome to what he's seen. It's the dacent bhoy he is, and he'll not be afther runnin' about makin' mischief. But here's that ugly baste Ebry himself coming back, and whilst he's contagious I'll kape me figure-head as wooden as Sandy's own."—With which wise remark, Murtagh O'Neill relapsed into silence.

The scene of the feast was not roofed in by a cover of man's thatching. The Ermans ate their state repasts sub Jove calido. To ward off the too piercing beams of the tropical sun, they had chosen a spot in a palm grove, where the great leaves interlaced overhead, and formed a cool, deep shade. The soft, springy turf had been covered with freshly plucked ferns, whose aromatic stems, when bruised underfoot, diffused a delicious odour. Upon two long rows of sort brown mats the feasters reclined or sat, facing one another. Between these were thick, over-lapping layers of pooroi leaves, forming a neat green table-cloth. The table appointments were simple. Knives and forks there were none. A broad banana leaf, with the mid-rib withdrawn, served each feaster as a plate; there was a half cocoanut full of seawater at his elbow, by way of salt; and fingers did the rest, unless he liked to use a piece of bread-fruit, roasted crisp as toast, to assist in conveying the food to his mouth.

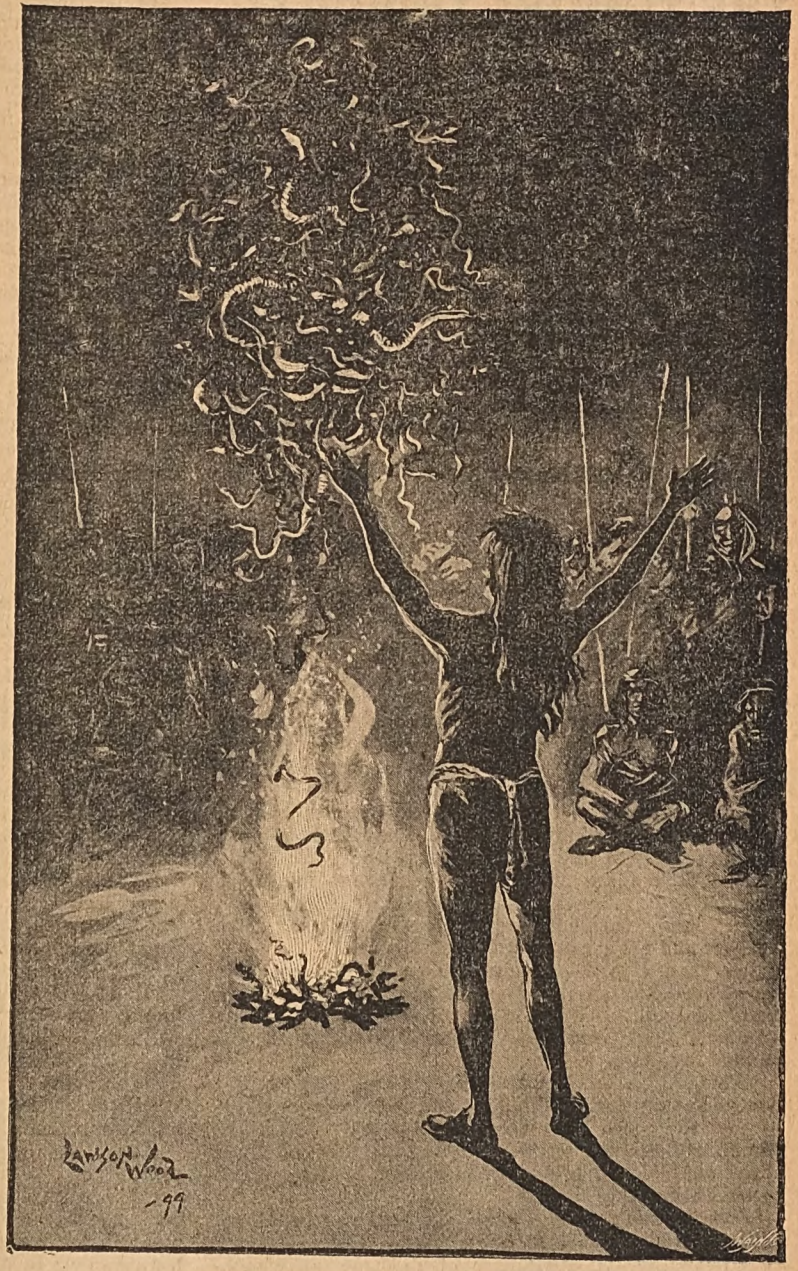
The food was in barbaric profusion. There were huge calabashes containing fowls, lobsters, prawns, and fish. Each portion was wrapped in folds of leaves, and was served up smoking hot from an adjacent earth oven, done to a turn. There were great gourds full of yellow poce, a pudding made from the mountain plantain. There were others of feeiis, a sort of turnip, pounded to pulp, and baked with cocoanut milk. There were pyramids of young cocoanuts, unhusked, and punched ready for drinking, piled up like shot in an arsenal yard. And in and amongst the other viands were great stacks of ripe fruit—portly bananas, in bright buff jackets; avees, with cheeks like a blushing girl; luscious guavas, with the shadows of their ruddy pulp flushing through a transparent skin; delicate, thin-skinned oranges, tinted in patches a rich nut-brown; and here and there a great, jolly alderman of a melon, which rolled about from very portliness. Such a heap! fairly bursting with condition, like the rich tropical soil from which they sprung.

The three Europeans could not use their fingers as the habitués did. The islanders conveyed each morsel to their mouths without soiling any part of the hand beyond the mere finger-tips. When the guests attempted to imitate them, they found the grease trickling down to their very elbows. But such trifling matters of detail affected nobody very much.

The excellence of the feast absorbed undivided attention. The prawns and lobsters were delicious. The fish and fowls were beyond compare. The method of cooking in the ground, though slow and tedious, preserves all the juices, and renders the meat so treated exceedingly sweet and tender. The roasted bread-fruit was as crisp as toast. The fruits were a poem; and the juice of the young green cocoanuts was cool and refreshing as iced champagne.

The feast ended, attendant Hebes spirited away the débris, and then others, a choir of island sirens, sang a rhythmical, monotonous chant, which, being in keeping with the surroundings, was thoroughly pleasing.

Everything had a restful air. There was no hurry and bustle, either in earth, air, or amongst the inhabitants thereof. The trade-wind soughed gently amongst the trees, wafting their scents across the grove. The pendant orchids swung slowly hither and back. The faint but deep diapason of the surf, pounding on the distant barrier-reef formed a fitting bass for the sweet tender treble of the singers.



One by one the snakes fell into the fire.

Sneyd and O'Neill, at any rate, were enjoying themselves.

There was a flavour of the lotus in the dish; but the taste was not displeasing to them. Sandy Carmichael alone of the company was restless. His recent life on board ship had not prepared him for such slothful indulgence; and certainly the former training of Duncan Carmichael had been far too austere to put him in tune with it.

(To be continued.)

Digitized by Google

THE TIMMINS TROUBLES.

VIII.

Mr. Timmins and the Sticking Plaster.

"My dear," cooed Mrs. Timmins as she rushed into her husband's dressing-room, tripped over the water jug, and butted him furiously in the back, "have you got them again?"

"Got 'em again," yelled Mr. Timmins, as he dug his razor into his chin, and upset the scalding water over his hand, "got what?"

"My keys, of course," put in Mrs. Timmins sweetly.

"That's it," gurgled Mr. Timmins, dancing round the room and pressing both hands to his chin. "D'ye think I've taken your keys to shave with? P'raps you think I can't scrape along without them. Don't stand grinning there, bring me some plaster. Quick! Don't you see I've cut myself? Can't you understand I've ploughed off half my chin?"

"Oh, let me see," screamed Mrs. Timmins, dancing up to him and grabbing at his arm. "Gracious, what a nasty scratch! Wait a minute and I'll get some plaster."

"Think it is, do you?" raved Mr. Timmins, grinding his heel on the floor. "Call it a scratch, do you? I like that. I like to hear you sweetly chattering whilst I bleed to death. Don't hurry. It won't make any difference, you know. You wouldn't like to say you left me at the last minute, would you? Maybe you like to see the blood. P'raps you think the colour suits me!" and Mr. Timmins stopped for want of breath.

Mrs. Timmins shot into her bedroom. "Where can I have put that plaster?" she moaned, as she trod on the cat's tail and knocked her head against the mantelpiece. "I put it—oh, where did I put it?"

"Hurry up, can't you," roared Mr. Timmins, rolling on the couch in agony. "No, on second thoughts I wouldn't hurry, it might spoil your record. You only want a little more steam, and Mr. Bosmo Consor as director, to be a South-Eastern express. Court plaster, I say. Bring me that court plaster before I pull down the wall and get some from the neighbours."

Just then, Mrs. Timmins remembered. It occurred to her she had hid the plaster in the clock. "Here it is, dear," she said. "Don't make such a fuss. I can't get it quicker than I can," and she snapped a bit off and handed it to him.

"That's it," cried Mr. Timmins, "p'raps you think I don't want my hand to hold my chin. P'raps you'd like to see the gore flow down my neck!" And Mr. Timmins took away his hand and a little drop of blood oozed out. Then he put the plaster on his tongue and pressed hard upon the cut.

When he had sucked off half the gum and swallowed it, Mr. Timmins picked out the plaster. "Come off that," he croaked, as the sticking plaster formed an attachment for his finger. Then it stuck to the other finger.

"Oh, you would, would you?" yelled Mr. Timmins, as he jabbed away at the cut. But the plaster was new at the work, and hung close to the digit. Mr. Timmins began to get a little ruffled. He was an amiable man by disposition, but this was a bit too much.

"What's the matter with the measly business? Come off, I say!" And as he plucked the plaster off his finger it grew to his thumb. "Stick, will ye?" he shrieked, pressing it to his cut with all the energy he could muster. "Leave go that thumb!" and he whirled round on his heel and pegged away again.

As he turned he caught sight in the glass of Mrs. Timmins giggling. He turned on his trembling wife.

"You think I'm a variety show, do you?" he yelled, stamping his foot on the ground. "Maybe you think I'm doing this for fun. What are you laughing at, anyway? Have you never seen a bit of plaster stick before? Who asked you to stop at all? How can I see to put the thing on while you're standing in the light? Perhaps you think you only want a piece of putty and a sash with the paint off to make you a window pane." And Mr. Timmins stopped for a minute to take breath.

"And who asked you for a leech?" he went on, his voice rising with his temperature. "Can't you bring me something that knows the difference between a finger and a chin when it sees 'em?" and he jammed his finger on the cut again.

"Shall I cut you another piece, dear?" asked Mrs. Timmins mildly. "Would you like to try a fresh strip with more stickiness on it?"

"No, I wouldn't," shouted Mr. Timmins. "D'ye think I want to make my dinner off that beastly gum? Haven't I sucked enough already?" He worked away again, and this time the plaster slipped off suddenly, and stuck to the corner of his mouth.

"That's right," said Mrs. Timmins pleasantly, hoping to secure peace in the family, "that's capital now."

"You think it is, do you?" raved Mr. Timmins with a fearful grin. "Maybe you think the mouth was cut by the razor. P'raps you're under the impression that this hole in my visage was meant to be shut up with a little bit of plaster. Come off, will you? Let go that mouth, or I'll call in the police!" And as he gave the plaster a wipe it stuck to the back of his hand.

"Let me try," put in Mrs. Timmins; "I know exactly how to do it."

"Then why didn't you say so before? Why didn't you do it at first?" roared the wretched man. "What did you want to wait for till I'd lost nearly every drop of blood in my body? Oh, you know how to do it! Of course you do!

"You only want a little Gregory powder and some death certificates to be a doctor. You'd just love to pull it all about, and make it bleed again. I know you. Stand off there, can't you? Stick, you grinning rascal!" And Mr. Timmins clapped the wrong hand over his jaw. "I'll hold you there till you do stick, if I have to hold you there till my wife learns something."

And Mr. Timmins pranced up the room again, his face full of emotion and expressive of the most stern determination.

"Do let me have a look, ducky," pleaded Mrs. Timmins, waltzing round him.

Gently she drew away his hand and substituted a piece of plaster with a deftness which did her credit.

"There, I thought my piece would stick that time," screamed Mr. Timmins with a delighted chuckle, looking at his hand and finding the plaster not there. "You always come in after the funeral. You're always only, only, only just too late. So like a woman."

"I fancy you'll find your bit of plaster on the other hand," said Mrs. T. pleasantly.

"Of course you know," snorted Mr. Timmins, having ascertained by a covert glance that his wife was right. "If I had your foresight and a glass I'd put a brass plate on my front and be a 'metalogical' office, and forecast the weather."

And Mr. Timmins, who evidently meant meteorological, wore that piece of blood-stained plaster all day rather than admit by taking it off that his wife had been right for once.

Digitized by Google

The - Final - War.

BY LOUIS TRACY.

CHAPTER LI.

The Electric Rifle.

A glance at the accompanying map will show that Lord Roberts had well chosen the position of his advanced lines. He practically held the whole of the Seine Valley in front of the forts at Marly and Cormeilles, two of the strongest fortified posts in the banlieue of Paris.

Had the French been wise enough to convert the Plateau de l'Hautie, on the north bank of the Seine, into another Plevna redoubt, as they had always intended to do since the Franco-German War of 1870-1, the British would not so easily have gained a footing in close proximity to the outer ceinture of the fortifications of Paris.

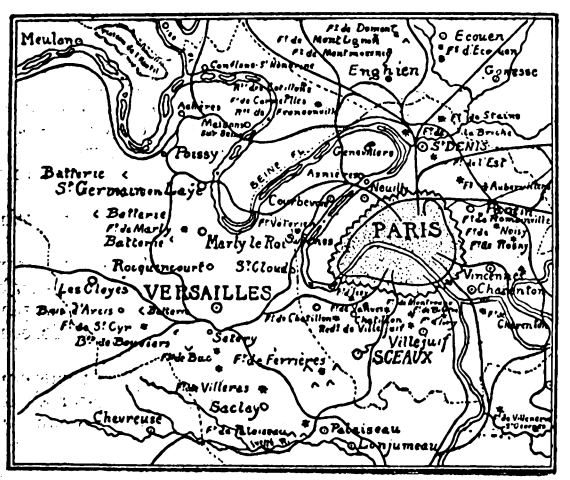
But the Germans were at Versailles almost before the Parisians realised that the investment of their beloved capital was really about to be accomplished, and now the English Moltke had gripped the city whilst its inhabitants were still talking of driving him into the sea.

Nevertheless, the task essayed by the British Commander-in-Chief was infinitely more arduous than that set to his predecessor.

The Germans were called upon to besiege a strong fortress which required investing lines of forty miles in length: Lord Roberts, to achieve his ends by the same means would need to inclose a circle of 125 miles.

To state the nature of the undertaking is to demonstrate its impracticability, and the hero of Kandahar was not the man to waste time upon the impossible. Paris was either to be carried by a coup, or not carried at all.

Already arrangements were in progress for strong reinforcements to be sent from the two German expeditions, now set at liberty, and Sir Redvers Buller was rapidly making his way through Southern France. But the skilled soldier who had borne the brunt of war well knew that if his plan succeeded he had enough troops and to spare for the purpose. If it failed, he was in no worse position than before, as he did not intend to uselessly spend the lives of his men once he became convinced of the inutility of his project.



Delay was consequently undesirable. It only gave the enemy time to put his house in order; and if the sole means of subjugating France was to ignore the capital for a time and continue to overrun the provinces, it was obvious that the non-success of an assault in no way altered the general situation.

General Saussier, the Governor of Paris, and generalissimo of the French forces, considered that his adversary had placed himself in an untenable position by occupying the Achères-Poissy line.

It will be seen that, as the bird flies, a direct assault upon the environs of Paris was out of the question. Three times does the Seine interpose its sinuous course between the Achères plateau and the walls of the capital.

Every position north and south of the river is covered by forts deemed impregnable. The French commander scouted the idea of an attack by the south, with Marly, St. Cyr, Versailles, Chatillon, and the rest blocking the way, whilst a rapid crossing at Conflans, with the objective of a northerly attack by the St. Denis side, although the only remaining method open for an advance, was surely impossible through country dominated by such strongholds as Cormeilles, Cotillons, Franconville, Montmorency, Montlignon, and Domont.

In a word, General Saussier and his staff were in absolute ignorance of Lord Roberts's intentions or their conceivable development, so they contented themselves with perfecting the telephonic and telegraphic communications between the outlying forts and the inner circle, with its three huge entrenched camps, and there waited impatiently until a definite move by the assailant might enable them to crush him with greater certainty.

They had not long to wait.

When Lord Roberts had armed two Special Service Corps, of 50,000 men each, with Mr. Thompson's electric rifle—this being its common but misleading name—and their commanders, Generals Massy and Alleyne respectively, were able to assure him that the troops were perfectly acquainted with its novel properties, he resolved forthwith to put the weapon to the supreme test of active service.

There could be no question of its efficiency. Repeated experiment had demonstrated this beyond the domain of doubt. The one point that could only be determined by a battle was its moral effect upon the enemy.

Here, it is true, opinions differed, but Lord Roberts believed in the invention as fully as did Lord Wolseley, and both distinguished soldiers were more enthusiastic in this respect than Mr. Thompson himself, for he modestly declaimed the authority of an expert in warfare.

It is now time to disclose the exact nature of this remarkable arm, whose prime quality was that it rendered hostilities by night far more deadly than during a similar battle by day.

Mr. Thompson had left the Lee-Metford magazine rifle untouched internally. He had only added a small but intensely powerful electric lamp, which fitted easily on to the flanges of the back-sight.

So far there was nothing in the idea save a neat adaptation of the search light, with its motive power derived from a simple, tiny, and well-constructed battery, charged with a voltage sufficient to burn for four hours if constantly in use. A spare coil, carried with the ammunition, could readily be applied by the soldier whilst in action. Thus eight hours of continuous service was secured, and it was computed that even in the hottest engagement the intervals obtained by the fact that each shot fired extinguished the light automatically until it was again brought into play by the user, would yield a total period of twelve hours' duration of service.

But Mr. Thompson was a skilled optician, in addition to his professional attainments as an electrical engineer.

What he had done, unaided, was to solve the many problems attending the refraction of light.

An ordinary search lamp invariably spreads its beams in a V, and even this concentration is only obtained by reflectors, which compel the rays to travel in a definite direction, rather than follow their natural diffusion towards all points of a sphere.

After years of untiring endeavour this quiet and unassuming genius had discovered a means of refracting, or literally breaking, the rays of light, by passing them through a double prism at their only avenue of outlet, whereby they all travelled in almost parallel lines.

The result was that at a distance of fifty, eighty, or even one hundred yards, the radius covered by the powerful illuminant within the lamp did not exceed a circle of six inches in diameter.

It was a mere matter of adjustment to obtain the subsequent result that a bullet fired from a rifle accurately fitted with one of these lamps should lodge in the centre of the area covered by the light.

It did not matter how the rifle was held or fired. Let that murderous ray rest for an instant upon any appreciable object the pressure of the trigger made it mathematically certain that in the same fraction of a second the projectile was lodged in the precise locality illumined by the lamp.

There could be no mistake, or deviation, or wavering.

If the holder of the weapon were gifted with ordinary eyesight, he could be quite positive that where the light fell, there could he strike.

No wonder, then, that Lord Roberts was eager to try this portentous arm under its own peculiar conditions—for the darker the night, the more effective it became—now that Lord Wolseley fully approved of his telegraphed resolution to attack Paris immediately.

There were no guns of position with the British army, for the reason already detailed—that a regular siege of the French capital at this stage of the war must have savoured of the grotesque.

On the fifth day after the memorable sortie, when Lord Roberts had received intelligence of the sailing from Hamburg of 50,000 men of the Duke's forces, and the whole of the recently arrived contingent from the United States and Canada, he gave orders for a strong artillery attack to be made on the French positions dominated by the Forts de Cormeilles, des Cotillons, and de Franconville.

To engage in a duel with the magnificent ordnance contained in those fortresses would, of course, only mean the annihilation of the British field guns. But by constant change of position, by utilising the cover of trees in the well-wooded ground on the left bank of the Seine, and by constant effort to discount the range of the stationary monsters in the fixed batteries, the British gunners were able to avoid considerable loss whilst very materially annoying the French infantry.

Two British divisions were also sent to the front to keep things moving, and when he heard the news General Saussier exclaimed, whilst being lifted on to his horse:

"St Denis, then! It is well. These English will be butchered."

In the north, the French army was agog with excitement. Train after train conveyed troops along the railway of the Grande Ceinture, and an imposing army of soldiers quickly gathered at Enghien, behind the fort now intermittently engaged by the British artillery.

Lord Roberts paid not the slightest heed to the proceedings in this quarter.

At midday he inspected the two Special Service Corps, which were drawn up on some level land close to the Seine at Poissy.

He was fully satisfied with the appearance and constitution of the twenty strong brigades into which they were divided.

At midday he inspected the two Special Service Corps.

They were soon dismissed from the parade and advised to take complete rest until 8.30 p.m., when a good meal would be served to them.

A general muster was ordered for 9.30.

It was eleven o'clock before the sounds of continuous firing by the French pickets at St. Germain en Laye apprised the defenders of any more towards the south. And it was here that the British received their first convincing impression of the terrible effect of the new rifle.

When they came to close quarters with a French division they found that instead of indulging in the desultory and uncertain nature of fighting in the dark, they could act with a precision that could not possibly be attained during the hours of daylight.

Not only did every missile lodge in the body of an opponent, but there was no wild and indiscriminate firing; ammunition was not thrown away, and effective response was impossible, as the piercing rays from the lamps blinded their opponents whenever they strove to come to close quarters.

To say that the French were seized with panic would be to do an injustice to brave and determined men. They were simply bewildered, amazed, unable to grasp the significance of the infernal device which smote them so infallibly, yet offered no tangible explanation of its frightful qualities to their scattered senses.

Regiments simply melted away before those demoniac rays that brought death the moment they were sighted.

A hasty retreat behind the Fort de Marly was not so much a terrified rout as a yielding to the unseen and inevitable. Men could not stand before this unknown element in warfare; they fled or died.

Prior to the attack the Commander-in-Chief had most carefully revised the complete scheme of operations with the divisional Generals and their brigadiers. The first division was charged with the capture, if possible, of the formidable Fort de Marly, with its seven huge batteries. Special brigades were told off to deal with the two strong redoubts on its left and the battery in rear.

The second division, led by Lieutenant-General Alleyne, when assured of the probable success of Massy's undertaking, in which it bore no part, was to march with all speed over the next five miles and attack the Battery and Fort of St. Cyr, the Batteries des Bouviers, and the two Forts de Buc.

By field telegraph the Commander-in-Chief should be constantly apprised of the progress of events, and 200,000 men were ready at midnight to march off to complete the occupation of all positions taken from the enemy.

Everything, of course, in this remarkable programme depended upon the demoralising influence of the new arm, but it was not to be expected that the troops could unaided climb bastions, cross outworks, and glacis, or swim ditches.

Each brigade carried with it a large number of light but solid gangways, constructed upon the principle of a fire-escape. With these the broadest moats and the highest walls could be surmounted either on the level or at a steep gradient. The wheels were so arranged that one gangway could cross over another, whilst three of these novel scaling-ladders, placed side by side, formed a fairly broad road.

The first experiment was made with the detached battery lying three miles north-west of the Fort de Marly.

It was taken whilst its guns were still roaring forth their opening message of defiance.

There was no earthly chance of a reasonable defence being made. No portion of a human body could show itself on bastion or in embrasure, but an ounce of lead was promptly planted therein.

A company of Zouaves flung themselves desperately down an escarpment to prevent a lodgment being affected by one of the scaling ladders. They were shot down to a man within half a minute.

The first real difficulty presented itself when the leading division reached the precincts of the gigantic Fort de Marly. Here a number of search-lights swept the landscape and gave the gunners an opportunity to make good practice at a distance.

They were shot down to a man.

The British loss was severe during the advance, but the moment that the attackers got within striking distance the position was at once reversed.

Acting under the orders of their officers, the men devoted their attention solely to the apparatus of the searchlights. When these were turned upon the assailants, both officers and men were promptly rendered powerless by the glare, but from precisely the same cause a strong shadow was cast on the machine for the benefit of those not within its radius, and a few telling shots sufficed to knock it to pieces.

Thenceforth the work degenerated into mere slaughter.

The hopelessness of the business infected even the bravest spirits in the French army. From out of the gloom a man suddenly perceived a jet of bright light dart towards him.

It flashed for an instant upon his breast, or arm, or head, or thigh, and quicker than consciousness itself came the dull crunch of a projectile, the vivid ray disappeared in the void whence it sprung, whilst the surrounding darkness deepened into insensibility, perchance into eternity.

So sudden and awful were the different attacks and so unexampled in the rapidity of their final achievement, that General Saussier might rave and storm as he chose at his telegraphists—they could seldom get a second answer from the locality indicated by the first message which announced the advance of the British.

From the Fort de Marly several communications of a vague and conflicting nature were received, as the extent of its area demanded a protracted conflict before it could be occupied even under the weird and uncanny conditions of this unprecedented conflict between helpless humanity and implacable science.

"The English are attacking in force, but are suffering heavy loss under our splendid fire," clicked the telegraph.

Five minutes later:

"Regret to inform you that No. 3 Battery and the Moscow Redoubt have been captured."

"What folly is this?" roared the astounded General. "Captured? Is it an affair of pigeons, then? Ask that ma'man to leave the instrument."

"It is but too true," came the reply in answer to a furious question. "Colonel Berthier attempted their recapture, but survivors say that everyone is bewitched Nos. 1, 2, and 5 batteries have fallen. The Commandant is here. He wishes to say——"

Silence.

Never again did General Saussier get word or sign from the superb fort that controlled the wide plateau of Marly, save the stern summons sent to him at dawn, when its guns were turned upon Mont Valerien and Meudon.

The telephone from Versailles was even more dramatic.

Although the chief of the staff of the Fifth Army Corps was in personal communication with his leader, he could say nought of value. The noise of the fighting to the north could be heard plainly enough, but the officer was quite unable to explain the sudden cessation of the big guns at Marly, or the wholly unaccountable collapse of its associated batteries and redoubts.

General Saussier was at St. Denis, many miles from the scene of action, and he was nearly beside himself with rage. He thundered fierce questions and fiercer denunciations along the wire, but his auditor could only answer that he had sent off many mounted messengers to make inquiries.

At last he assured the chief that there could be no doubt concerning the fate of St. Germain and Marly. They were held by the British, but how or why this unwarrantable collapse had occurred he could not tell.

Ha! more news. Versailles itself was attacked. Now he could promise precise intelligence. There was heavy firing at the front. Troops were being hurried up in support. They were so numerous and so skilfully disposed that the British must be hurled back.

What was this? A retreat! Yes, a disgraceful panic. Men rushed by saying that the English fought with bottled lightning.

Sorry, but he must really go outside and take his position with the troops.

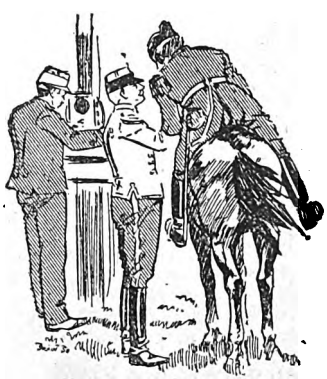
He did not replace the receivers upon the switches, and his perplexed inferior, now quite dumfounded with surprise, plainly heard the sounds of musketry, the cries of the combatants, and the indescribable noise of conflict.

But these indications of passing events soon died away and Versailles was thenceforth mute.

Saussier thought he must certainly be losing his wits when in rapid succession came news of irreparable disaster at Bouviers, de Buc, Bois d'Arcis, and Satory.

It was now almost dawn. Surely something could be done. Were the unparalleled fortifications of Paris made of gossamer then, that they fell thus before the breath of the invader's nostrils? He must go personally and ascertain the precise extent and significance of the night's transactions.

A special train brought the French leader and his staff by the inner circle railway to the Fort d'Issy, and here they awaited the growing daylight with an impatience and dismay ever heightened by the receipt of disjointed reports, all couched in the phraseology of unexplained but complete disaster.



He thundered fierce questions along the wire.

Troops might gallop, or march, or be carried by train across Paris from St. Denis, or Pantin, or Vincennes, pouring in seemingly countless multitudes towards the south-west—when they reached Chatillon and Vanvres they only found themselves subjected to a pitiless hail of lead from fortifications which yesterday were the brass bosses upon their apparently impenetrable shield.

And if one night of mysterious horror could achieve so much, what might not the next witness.

General Saussier hoped that his self-torturing questions would be answered by a friendly bullet.

CHAPTER LII.

Paris Taken.

"Will you not sleep, sir, for a little while?" said a member of Lord Roberts' staff, as he gazed anxiously at the deep lines and haggard expression in the Chief's face during a momentary lull in the furious artillery duel that had been in progress all day between the Forts de Buc and D'Issy.

They were seated in a bomb-proof building within the first-named fortification, and had been eagerly scrutinising a complete plan of the southern defences of Paris which was found in the Commandant's quarters.

Long had they pondered over different expedients, until the English general's weary eyes, which he had not closed in rest for thirty-six hours, refused for the time to carry to his active brain the meaning of the lines and dots and shaded sections that signified so much, yet were so complex in their minuteness.

"Try and lay down for at least an hour," urged his sympathetic companion. "You may break down to-night, and think what that means to us."

Lord Roberts smiled—so pleasantly that for an instant the shadow of overpowering responsibility was driven from his brow.

"It is very good of you, Everett," he said. "I will follow your advice if you tell me what rest means."

Rest, with his iron grip on Paris, with 400,000 British troops even now making final preparations for the supreme effort of the campaign, with half a million of frenzied opponents bracing every nerve to repel the blow which they knew must fall that night—rest, with the thoughts of the civilised world centred upon the undertaking to which he was committed — rest under such conditions could only be found in reckless abandonment to all-engrossing work.

To strive to court sleep would be but to yield to maddening anxiety.

So Colonel Everett did not press the point, nor did he attempt a definition.

After shading his eyes with his hand for a brief space, Lord Roberts continued:

"Saussier, of course, is cramming every available man into Southern Paris between the Seine at Point-du-Jour and the Pont National."

"That may be regarded as certain," assented the other.

"It is the best thing he can do, in our interest."

"May I ask why you think so, sir?" said Colonel Everett, somewhat surprised by the remark.

"Because his troops will learn more easily the full details of last night's operations. What should you think, Everett, if you knew that when darkness fell you would be attacked by a courageous enemy whose mere coming meant death, by some mysterious device, to every combatant encountered?"

"Well, sir," said that officer with a laugh, "for my own part I should look to you for orders."

The Commander-in-Chief waved aside the compliment. "Under such circumstances," he replied, "I fear that my only plan would be to head the first regiment detailed to meet the assault."

"If that be Saussier's notion," said Everett, "our men will oblige him readily, for he is as big as the side of a house. They can't miss him."

At this moment the conversation was interrupted by the entrance of Lieutenant-General Alleyne.

"I came along to assure you," he explained, "that the Special Service Corps is eager to be at work again. My chief difficulty has been to keep out the crowds of volunteers to fill our small casualty list, and Massy tells me——"

"Why aren't you in bed?" demanded Lord Roberts suddenly.

"In bed!" The divisional leader spoke as though he had never heard of such a locality.

"Yes. Be off at once and get some hours' sleep. A nice mess we shall be in if you are knocked up to-night. And tell Massy the same thing. Not another word, please. See me here at ten."

His lordship evidently feared that his companion might say something when Alleyne had retired, for he added peremptorily:

"Get me the parade states, Colonel Everett, from every division to hand, and ask the Intelligence Department to clearly mark on a sketch map the present location of every brigade."

Colonel Everett met the Adjutant-General outside.

"Don't say a word to the Chief about his looking tired," he whispered, "or he'll snap your head off."

The Adjutant-General got safely away, and was succeeded by Harington.

Now, Lord Roberts had a soft place in his heart for the handsome young guardsman, from whom all traces of his recent disablement had disappeared, and as he really felt thoroughly fatigued, he said, graciously enough:

"Tell me, Harington, what you would recommend. I cannot sleep, but I want a pick-me-up."

Teddy looked at his superior, and noted his utterly worn appearance. As usual, he came straight to the point.

"If I were you, sir," he said, "I would have a good wash."

The Chief was delighted with the notion. It had never struck him. By rummaging around they discovered the materials, and when a blissful moment of relief had come from a liberal application of cold water, his lordship suddenly cried:

"Had another letter from the girl to-day?"

Harington was ready this time.

"Yes, sir," he answered. "Irene is a marvellous woman. I don't believe anyone but herself could have got a note through from the hospital depôt to-day, or even found out where I was. But it turned up all right an hour ago."

"Did she say anything special?"

"Only that she hoped I would not be hurt during the street fighting in Paris to-night."

"Ah, she thinks we'll get there, then. Anything else?"

"Nothing of general interest, sir."

If anxiety blended with confidence and happy augury was thus to be found within the British lines, a very different state of affairs obtained in the beleaguered city.

Four of the five great railway termini on the north bank of the Seine were crowded with terrified fugitives. Pretence was now thrown to the winds, and distracted men, resolved personally to stay and give their lives in defence of the capital, were nevertheless madly endeavouring to dispatch their loved ones to places of safety.

Appalling scenes occurred at the Gare de l'Est and Gare de Vincennes, which were thronged with frenzied multitudes, and matters became so serious that at last the railway authorities imperatively demanded military protection, and refused to send out any more trains.

(To be continued.)

THE SUNDAY READER
is the smartest and most entertaining Family Magazine.
Published every Wednesday.
Price One Penny.

Digitized by Google

One Lady's Experience

is the experience of all, under similar conditions; for like causes produce like effects under like circumstances. Every lady knows, therefore, that common soap corrodes the fabric and coarsens the skin.

is a pure dainty soap for dainty users. Its ingredients are pure and sweet as the food we eat. Specially prepared for washing dainty fabric it is likewise a delightful soap for bath or toilet.

A Purer Soap is beyond the Art of Soapmaking.

KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR.

WHY INDUCE HEART DISEASE TO CURE YOUR HEAD

When you can get a real safe remedy like KAPUTINE?

Dr. Thurston, Licentiate, of the Royal College of Physicians, writes November 16th: "Knowing the formulæ from which KAPUTINE is compounded, I unhesitatingly recommend its use in preference to crude Antifibrin and other synthetic drugs which, unfortunately for sufferers, are so commonly used for Headache, and which have undoubtedly injurious effects on the Heart, Brain, and Vescicle tissues generally."

NOTHING LIKE KAPUTINE. NOTHING SIMILAR. NOTHING AS GOOD.

All leading Chemists sell it. Packets of 18 doses 1s. Sample 1d.

After 13 Years' Suffering, Cured for 1s.

The Rev. T. Taylor, Vicar of St. Bredward, Cornwall, writes: "Owing to a severe accident while riding, my wife has for the past thirteen years been subject to violent attacks of neuralgia. The relief she has experienced from KAPUTINE has been speedy and effectual. KAPUTINE, while it is efficacious in its use, is attended with none of the disagreeable after effects which she has experienced in the case of other drugs."

After 10 Weeks' Suffering, Cured for 1d.

From Rev. J. H. Burn.

Deer Rectory, Mintlaw, Aberdeen,
November 8th, 1897.

"My own cure with one dose of KAPUTINE was marvellous after ten weeks incessant neuralgia.

Used also by Her Grace the Countess of Cavan, Lady Dashwood, The Countess of Munster, Surgeon Lieut.-Col. Baker, etc., etc.

Nothing Similar. Nothing as Good. KAPUTINE CURES HEADACHE IN 10 MINUTES.

If you enclose stamped envelope to A. M. Kaputine Ltd., Huddersfield, you will get free samples by return.

KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR.

Digitized by Google

IN FRIENDLY CONVERSE

N. I.—There is no pay attached to the Premiership, because it is not an office under the Crown. The Prime Minister usually holds some office and draws the salary attached to the position. Thus, Lord Salisbury is Secretary for Foreign Affairs. The post generally occupied is that of First Lord of the Treasury.

Liber.—The public libraries of Europe contain a total of 23,000,000 volumes; those of America are credited with a total of 50,000,000.

S. C.—A German meteorologist says that the early years of the next century, now so close, will have extraordinarily hot summers. He arrives at this conclusion from a theory which he has evolved concerning the weather. During certain periods of time, ranging over something like fifteen years, there is a series of warm years and one of cold years, during which the summers become increasingly hot and the winters correspondingly mild, and vice versâ. Of course, when the height is reached the heat or cold diminishes, and he is of opinion that the maximum heat is approaching.

J. P.—Jaffa is the seaport of Jerusalem; that is, it is the port to which go and come those things which are sent to and from the Holy City. It is about forty-seven miles from Jerusalem, and is one of the oldest cities in Asia. Indeed, Pliny says it existed before the Flood, and others derive its name from Japhet, the son of Noah.

Dia.—The following is given by an expert as an easy way of testing the genuineness of diamonds: Make a dot with a lead pencil on a piece of paper and look at it through the diamond. If the dot shows clearly, the stone is good; but if it appears scattered, or if you see more than one dot, your diamond is not genuine.

B.—The only Poet Laureate compelled to resign the position was John Dryden, who was appointed in 1670, and resigned upon the accession of William and Mary. This was not for incapacity, but for religious and political reasons.

H.—The humming bird, according to an eminent authority, can fly backwards. The bird almost lives in the air, in which element it performs all kinds of evoluti ns with the greatest ease.

D.—Your friend is right; the county of Durham did not have the power of sending representatives to Parliament till 1673. That was owing to the fact that it was a county Palatine, and was under the jurisdiction of its Bishop. The supremacy of the Bishop was such that on several occasions an army was raised by him in the Palatinate.

H. F.—By no means. Many bacteria, instead of being harmful, are beneficial, and act as scavengers in our internal economy, thus preventing disease. We have it on high authority that the flavour of the butter and cheese made in Essex and Devonshire is due to the presence of bacteria, and up to the present time I have not heard that these products are particularly injurious.

Art.—It has been estimated by a large dealer in artificial limbs that about 30,000 persons in the United Kingdom have lost one or both legs.

A. T.—Bath money forms an important item in the Turkish marriage contract. The intended husband agrees to allow the lady a certain sum for bathing purposes; if this is at any time withheld, she has only to go to the cadi and turn her slipper upside down. That official at once investigates matters, and, if the grievance is not redressed, it is considered a good ground for divorce.

C. B.—The most costly tomb in the world is that erected for Mahomet. The diamonds and other precious stones with which it is decorated are worth £2,000,000.

Right.—The right hand, which is more sensitive to the touch than the left, is less sensitive than the latter to heat and cold.

"Who was it who said that he knew a city where the inhabitants dwelt on the tops of trees, and to which city did he refer?" Thus writes N. E. V. ———Erasmus, the philosopher, thus described Amsterdam. The tree-tops are the piles on which the buildings are erected. The palace, built in 1618 as the town hall, rests on more than thirteen thousand piles. Amsterdam, one of the most important of commercial cities, rests literally on tree-tops.

L.—The depreciation of the value of the silver currency, through waste of metal in circulation of the various pieces, is estimated to be equal to £11,000 annually.

N.—The system you mention is adopted in the German schools. There the bright pupils are separated from the less capable ones and pass to higher studies, while the others plod on to the best of their ability. In this way the dull pupils are not crammed injuriously, and their cleverer schoolfellows are not retarded in their progress. Medical men do the sorting.

H. K.—The custom of burying or depositing the heart of a prominent man in some place quite apart from the rest of his body is not altogether dead, even in highly civilised countries. The heart of Gambetta, the French statesman, was deposited under a statue erected in his honour eight or nine years ago in Paris.

D. W.—In the convent cemetery of St. Petersburg there is a grave or tomb which is simply a glass house with a crypt. In the latter rests the infant daughter of wealthy parents, who had the body embalmed and placed in a coffin with a pane of glass inserted in the lid just over the face. For years they visited the crypt daily. They are now dead, but are buried elsewhere.

O. D. is alarmed—unnecessarily—at the rapid growth of his finger-nails, and would like to know what is the usual rate of growth———Physicians say that the nails grow at the rate of about one thirty-second part of an inch a week, so that in eight weeks they will have grown a quarter of an inch. There is nothing to be alarmed at, however, in a higher rate of growth.

C. K.—The reduction of a penny per pound in the duty on a commodity like tea is a serious matter for the revenue. A few years ago, when the duty was reduced by twopence, it meant a loss of over a million sterling in the year, or about 1 per cent. of the total revenue.

K. L. P.—The reference you saw to the high prices of pieces of music was in Pearson's Weekly. Most of those you mention, however, you may obtain for the low sum of twopence halfpenny per copy from Mr. T. Holloway, of 78 New Oxford Street, London, who has arranged to supply them to readers of S. S. at this price. If you will send a postcard to the address given you will receive a complete list of songs included in this offer, and if you wish to obtain a large number of them, special terms are offered.

SHORT STORIES' ADVERTISEMENT RATES.

Single column, per inch, per insertion	£0 10 0
Double ,, ,,	1 0 0
Full page inside, facing page of matter, either whi e paper or 2nd or 3rd pa e of cover, or back page, per insertion	10 0 0
Half-page ,, ,, ,, ...	5 0 0
Quarter-page ,, ,, ,, ...	2 10 0
Eighth-page ,, ,, ,, ...	1 5 0
Front page, whole ,, ,, ...	12 10 0
,, half	6 5 0

All spaces above one-eighth of a page are charged at per page rate.

Series discount: 5 per cent. for 13, 10 per cent. for 26, 15 per cent. for 52 insertions.

Black blocks are charged 25 per cent. extra. All advertisements are subject to approval. All copy must be sent in by Noon on Tuesday, Feb. 7th, if intended for the Issue on sale Feb. 21st, and dated Feb. 25th. The Proprietors reserve the right to hold over or suspend the insertion of any advertisement without prejudice to other insertions on order. All communications should be addressed to the Advertisement Manager, "Pearson's Weekly" Offices, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Printed and Published by C. Arthur Pearson Ltd., at Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

See that this Label is on Every Box, and Refuse all others.

See that this Label is on Every Box, and Insist on having it.

DO YOU WANT

A GOOD COMPLEXION?

If so, we can only advise you to use LILLIE POWDER, the new medicinal face powder manufactured under the supervision of Her Majesty's Perruquier, Mr. W. Clarkson, from the original Recipe invented by Mrs. Langtry. The best Remedy for RED FACES, BLOTCHES, GREASY SKINS, and, indeed, ALL ailments of the Skin. Try it once, and you will always use it. If you go to a Chemist or elsewhere for it, be sure it bears this label, and refuse it if it does not. Order it direct if there is any difficulty.

HUNDREDS OF TESTIMONIALS.

The Very Best.
"I think your new Lillie Powder is quite the very best, and you may be pleased to know I have used it ever since I first went on the stage."—ELLALINE TERRISS.

Delicious.
"I find it delicious, and never use any other."—LETTY LIND.

Most Exquisite.
"I think your new Lillie Powder most exquisite."—ADELINA PATTI.

Most Beneficial.
"Lillie Powder is most beneficial to the skin, and I shall always use it."—PHYLLIS BROUGHTON.

The Nicest.
"Lillie Powder is the nicest I have ever used."—CISSIE LOFTUS.

SEND FOR IT AT ONCE.

THREE TINTS—WHITE, FLESH-COLOUR, and CREAM. To be had of all the best Chemists and Hairdressers

PRICE ONE SHILLING. By Post 1s. 2d.

THE LILLIE SYNDICATE (S.S. Dept.), 3 HENRIETTA STREET, STRAND, LONDON, W.C.

THE 'MONARCH' RECORD REDUCTION SALE.

ILLUSTRATED BARGAIN CATALOGUES OF CARPETS, HEARTH-RUGS, TABLE LINEN, CURTAINS, etc., POST FREE, if mentioning Short Stories 4/2/99 when writing.

A Stock of 10,000 PATENT WADDED QUILTS, TORALIUMS, OR BED COVERS

(as Illustration).

Covered with Oriental Reversible Soft Sateen with double border. Size 54in. by 60in. These Quilts are offered below anything in the Wholesale Trade, and cause the greatest consternation to the buyer, wondering how they can be produced for the money.

SPECIAL OFFER.

Three Quilts for 10/-, or Six for 19/6, or Twelve for 38/-

Sale Price 3/6 Each. Postage 6d. ea.

At an Enormous Reduction to Clear Out.

The Dowager Lady GUISE writes: Leyden Dene, Bournemouth, Dec. 19th.—Please send three more of the wadded Quilts for 10/-, cheque enclosed.

The "Queen's Royal" Household Carpets and Hearthrugs are extolled by all the Nations of the Earth.

Gigantic Sale of the "QUEEN'S ROYAL" Household

Sale Price.

2/- HEARTHRUGS Regd.

In REVERSIBLE RICH TURKEY PATTERNS, measuring 6ft. long, and 3ft. wide. These HEARTHRUGS have gained a world-wide reputation for MAGNIFICENCE, CHEAPNESS, and UTILITY, having no equal. Registered New Designs, and considered Works of Art. Thousands of Repeat Orders and Testimonials received, giving the highest satisfaction. SPECIAL OFFER.—Three for 5/9; Six for 11/3; Twelve for 22/-

The "Queen's Royal" Household Carpets and Hearthrugs are patronised by Royalty, Nobility, and Clergy from all parts of the Empire.

Gigantic Sale of the "Queen's Royal" Household Reversible Rich Turkey Pattern

CARPETS (Regd.)

Trade Mark on all Goods. Beware of Imitations.

Admittedly the Cheapest in the World. Woven without seam Altogether superior quality, with handsome border to correspond. A marvel for excellence and beauty. Thousands of Repeat Orders and Testimonials received, giving the highest satisfaction. When ordering, please mention if for Bed, Dining, Drawing, or Sitting Room, and any particular colour preferred.

6ft. by 6ft.	...	4/11	9ft. by 13½ft.	...	16/6
6ft. by 7½ft.	...	6/0	10½ft. by 12ft.	...	18/0
6ft. by 9ft.	...	7/6	12ft. by 12ft.	...	21/0
6ft. by 9ft.	...	9/0	9ft. by 15ft.	...	19/6
6ft. by 12ft.	...	10/6	12ft. by 13½ft.	...	22/0
9ft. by 9ft.	...	11/0	12ft. by 15ft.	...	25/6
9ft. by 10½ft.	...	13/6	12ft. by 18ft.	...	30/0
9ft. by 12ft.	...	15/0	12ft. by 21ft.	...	35/6

REDUCED SALE PRICE.

Octagon Villa, The Lizard, R.S.O., 15/8/98.—J. CARWARDINE, Esq., writes: "I am very pleased with the Carpet you sent me. I have saved 50 per cent. by giving you the order. I paid half as much again to a local tradesman for Carpets the same quality a year ago. I have never been so pleased of any former purchase."

Also RICH VELVET PILE STAIR CARPETS, bordered to match, 18in. wide, 1/8 per yard; 22½in. wide, 2/- per yard; 27in. wide, 2/3 per yard.

OUR NEW VENTURE.—Yes. Two different Pattern Hearthrugs or Carpets for the Price of One! (Copyright.)

H.R.H. Prince L. of Battenberg. H.R.H. Prince K. Bigit Siam. Marquis of Breadalbane. Sir Henry de Bathe. Sir Henry Bellingham. Sir E. H. Blair, Bart. H.I.H. Eugénie de Christoforo. Princess Paleologos Nicephoros Commence. Duchess of Wellington. Marchioness of Breadalbane. Marchioness of Hastings. Archbishop of York. Princess de Croy.

To Readers of "Short Stories," 4/2/99, on receipt of Postal Order or Stamps, value

4/6

(Regd.) We will send you THE LARGEST GENUINE REVERSIBLE CARPET in BRUSSELS PATTERN WITH RUG ever sold at the price, direct from the Looms to any address on receipt of amount. Suitable for drawing-room, dining-room, bedroom, etc., bordered and woven in Brussels patterns, as an advertisement for our goods thus saving any middle profit. Remember these are woven, and are made of a material almost equal to wool. Thousands of these Carpets have been already sold at double these prices.

SPECIAL OFFER.—2 CARPETS and 2 RUGS, 8s. [Cut this out.]

We rely upon Spontaneous Repeat Orders from our Clients for the maintenance of our Trade. Established nearly a Quarter of a Century. All orders despatched same day in rotation as they arrive by post N.B.—Foreign Orders executed and packed free, and shipped at lowest rates. Telegraphic Address: "ECLIPSE, LEEDS." Telephone, No. 948.

Cheques and P.O.'s payable to—

Colossal Sale of Rich Velvet Pile Real Sale Price

BRUSSELS HEARTHRUGS 5/6

In Rich Oriental and Indian Art Designs, measuring 6ft. by 3ft., which for price, real value, weight and richness of manufacture will be found unapproachable.

SPECIAL OFFER.—3 Rugs, 16/-; 6 for 31/-

"Melville Castle, Glasswade, Midlothian, June 1st.

The Right Honourable The VISCOUNTESS MELVILLE writes: "I am very pleased with the 'Royal' Velvet Hearthrugs to hand, and would like four more Hearthrugs. Her ladyship would also like two Velvet Carpets at 39/-, one ditto 60/6 to match them. Cheque £3 14s. inclosed."

COLOSSAL SALE OF RICH VELVET PILE

REAL BRUSSELS CARPETS

Extraordinarily Heavy, very Best Quality, Newest and Choicest Designs. In Old Gold, Sultan, Terra Cotta, Crimson, Sky, Navy, and the latest colours. With handsome border to correspond. Guaranteed to wear for years and give every satisfaction. The sizes and prices as follows (all ready for putting down):

REDUCED SALE PRICE LIST.

4½ft. by 7ft.	...	11/-	9ft. by 12ft.	...	38/-
6ft. by 8ft.	...	16/-	11ft. by 12ft.	...	47/-
7½ft. by 9ft.	...	23/-	12ft. by 13½ft.	...	59/-
9ft. by 9ft.	...	28/-	12ft. by 16ft.	...	69/-
9ft. by 10½ft.	...	33/-	12ft. by 18ft.	...	77/-

VELVET PILE BRUSSELS CARPET SQUARES. REDUCED SALE PRICE.

Altogether superior quality, with handsome border to correspond. A marvel of excellence and beauty. Thousands of repeat orders and testimonials received, giving the highest satisfaction. When ordering, please mention if for Bed, Dining, Drawing or Sitting Room, and any particular colour preferred.

Ramsden, Charlbury, 4/8/98.—Lady HICKS BEACH writes: "Will Messrs. F. Hodgson and Son send her one of their 'Queen's Royal' Carpets, 9ft. by 9ft., 11/-? Cheque enclosed. The other parcel received safely, and I am pleased with it."

PRODIGIOUS SALE of the "PRUDENTIAL"

TURKEY PATTERN CARPETS (Regd.)

Reversible, woven throughout, bordered, richly blended in several colours to suit any furniture. These goods cannot be distinguished from real Brussels when laid down, and cannot be excelled in durability.

Size.		Each.		Size.		Each.
6ft. by 6ft.	.....	2/11		10½ft. by 12ft.	.....	11/6
6ft. by 7½ft.	.....	3/11		9ft. by 15ft.	.....	12/6
6ft. by 9ft.	.....	4/9		12ft. by 12ft.	.....	12/9
7½ft. by 9ft.	.....	5/11		12ft. by 13½ft.	.....	14/6
9ft. by 9ft.	.....	7/6		12ft. by 15ft.	.....	15/9
9ft. by 10½ft.	.....	8/6		12ft. by 18ft.	.....	19/6
9ft. by 12ft.	.....	9/6		12ft. by 21ft.	.....	22/6

REDUCED SALE PRICE.

When ordering, please mention if for Bed, Dining, Drawing, or Sitting Room, and any particular colour preferred.

A Reversible "Prudential" Hearthrug (Reg.), to match above Carpets, sent for 1/6 extra, size 2yd. long and 1yd. wide. Special Offer, Three Hearthrugs for 4/3, or Six for 8/-, or Twelve for 15/6, sterling value.

Short Stories CARPET COUPON. 4/2/99.

On receipt of this Coupon and P.O. or Stamps for amount, we guarantee to send any goods as above to your address in any part of the United Kingdom. Cash returned in full if not satisfied.

(Signed) F. HODGSON & SON.

F. HODGSON & SON, Manufacturers, Importers, and Merchants, WOODSLEY ROAD, LEEDS.

SPECIAL 1899.

SPECIALLY REDUCED INTRODUCTION

SALE PARCEL WITH FREE GIFT

enclosed, consisting of 1 Magnificently Rich Cream-Coloured Curly Sheepskin Hearthrug, average size 6 feet by 3 feet, perfection in quality.

1 Beautiful Reversible Art Crimson Plush Bed Rug, Sofa Cover, or Table Cover, double warp, very heavy, size 50 inches by 78 inches.

2 Beautiful Silver Goatskin Door Mats, lined woollen cloth throughout, pinked edges, best finish, ornamental to any room.

1 Elegant Hair Brush, highly finished, with mirror back.

THE LOT 10/6

Postage 9d. extra.

"Given" Away.

Providing SHORT STORIES Coupon, 4/2/99, is quoted, a FREE GIFT will be enclosed—a very handsome Electro Silver Plated "OWL" PEPPER STAND with coloured eyes and gilt feet. Cash returned if not satisfied. (Signed) F. HODGSON & SON.

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

No. 528. FOR WEEK ENDING FEBRUARY 11TH, 1899. [ONE PENNY.

DR TIBBLES' Vi-Cocoa

THE WONDERFUL FOOD BEVERAGE.

A Food Beverage such as Dr. Tibbles' Vi-Cocoa, with its unique powers of nutriment and exceptional vitalising properties, is a means whereby strength and nervous energy is gained as a rational outcome of increased vitality.

It has the refreshing properties of fine tea, the nourishment of the best cocoas, and a tonic and recuperative force possessed by neither, and can be used in all cases where tea and coffee are prohibited.

Dr. Tibbles' Vi-Cocoa, 6d., 9d., and 1s. 6d. can be obtained from grocers, chemists, and stores, or from 60, 61, and 62, Bunhill Row, London, E.C.

DAINTY SAMPLE FREE.

But mention SHORT STORIES.

Digitized by Google

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

COFFEE WITHOUT DREGS.

GOOD! ITS MASON'S

MASON'S ESSENCE OF COFFEE AND CHICORY

EXPELS THE OLD METHOD

An agreeable, stimulating and sustaining beverage. Instantly prepared and most economical. Equal to the very finest coffee. Highly recommended by the Medical Profession.

Of all Grocers and Stores, or a Sample Bottle post free for 9 stamps.

ALSO TRY

MASON'S WINE ESSENCES

AND

MASON'S EXTRACT OF HERBS.

Sample Bottle of either sent free for 9d.; two assorted 1/3; three assorted 1/8. Agents Wanted.

Manufacturers—

NEWBALL & MASON, NOTTINGHAM.

"WORTH A GUINEA A BOX."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

FOR ALL

BILIOUS & NERVOUS DISORDERS,

SUCH AS

Sick Headache, Constipation, Weak Stomach, Impaired Digestion, Disordered Liver & Female Ailments.

SALE NOW OVER SIX MILLIONS YEARLY.

In Boxes, 1s. 1½d., and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.

Prepared only by the Proprietor,

THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.

Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere.

GOOD FELT HAT, Black, Navy, Brown or Grey 2/6. Carriage 4d.

THE John Noble

HALF-GUINEA COSTUMES

promptly sent by Parcel Post, safely packed, direct from the Largest Firm of Costumiers in the World, and made to look smart and yield faithful service.

TRIMMED HAT, as sketch, 5/11. Carriage 4d.

Model 984.

Exceedingly well-made and carefully finished Chesterfield Coat, and full-wide Tailor Skirt. Price complete Costume, 10/6; carriage 6d. Skirt alone, 5/6; carriage 5d. Good value. 10/6

Stylish blouse bodice and neat skirt. Bodice lined through, and made with prettily gathered front and shaped belt, as sketch. Lengths and Prices:

35 38 42 46 in. } Carriage
6/11 7/11 8/11 9/11 ea. } 5d. extra. 6/11

Lengths are from top of neck-band to bottom of skirt in front.

PRETTY MAID'S COSTUME Model 1016.

These Costumes are supplied in the following two good durable Cloths:
I. John Noble Cheviot Serge, weighty and weather-resisting.
II. John Noble Costume Coating, smooth-surfaced and of medium weight

PATTERNS SENT POST FREE,

together with the new Illustrated Annual Sale List. Please mention Short Stories when writing.

A FULL DRESS LENGTH of either cloth (6yd. 52in. wide) for 7/6. Carriage 8d. 7/6

COLOURS of all Costumes are Black, Navy, Electric, Brown, Ruby, Myrtle, Fawn, Grey, Moss, Sage Green, and Purple.

THE THREE SIZES IN STOCK are 34, 36, and 38 in. round bust (under arms). Waists 24, 26, 28 in.; Skirts being 38, 40, and 42 in. long in front.

Any other size can be specially made to measure 1/6 extra.

BANKERS: "London City Midland Bank Ltd." Please name "Short Stories" when writing to

JOHN NOBLE LTD., Brook St. Mills, MANCHESTER.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK

Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London.

INVESTED FUNDS £10,000,000.

The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free.

FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

6D. THE BAROMETRICAL LADY. 6D.

A real Barometer for 6d.! This little lady changes the colour of her dress according to the weather, and is a prophet of whether the day will be fine, wet or changeable; a pretty, charming and useful novelty. Price 6d., post free. Our Large Illustrated Catalogue of Novelties 1d.

Variety Co., Dept. G, Dalston, London.

Digitized by Google

No. 528. Feb. 11, 1899.] [One Penny.

SHORT STORIES

A POOR COURTSHIP, BUT—

"Ah, me!" sighed Margie Harrison. "Out there is blue sky, and sun, and fresh air, and a little farther on is grass—and trees. It is spring everywhere except here."

"Out there" was the glimpse of light that came to her, far down the crowded shop—just the little light that crept in under the awnings, and over the heads of the shoppers, to the cashier in her box.

"I know how a canary feels, now!" she went on, to herself.

She was not idle as she soliloquised, for her hands were busy making change for the cash boys. Below her platform, shoppers pulled about the goods and harassed the assistants who, in turn, hectored the boys and girls. Above the conversation, the rustle and clatter, came sharp cries of "Ca-ash!"

Margie was a slender little girl, with pale cheeks that hardly ever saw the sun—so pale that they accentuated the brightness of her dark blue eyes and the brown hair that Nature had roughened becomingly.

For the rest, her mouth would have been kissable, had there been anyone to attend to the matter; and her round chin was softly dimpled.

But no one ever stopped to think that she was good to the eye—that is, except the dapper young shop-walker of that department, and him she had snubbed into a secret enmity—for she was only part of a machine, a whirling, noisy beehive, with never a drone inside its walls.

They were not people; they were employées, and they worked under a masterly rule that made the great business a success, but stole the individuality of the workers.

"I can't stand it another year," she said despairingly. "I wasn't made for darkness. It isn't the work, for I expect to work; it's the withering—heart and soul. I'll go to work in somebody's garden; I'll—I'll wheel a barrow—anything to be outdoors!"

She sighed again, and glanced contemptuously at the light bulb above her, that seemed to make the atmosphere more smothering as she continued her duties.

She knew little about sunshine. She lodged with her only brother, who lived so far from the Emporium that she could not walk, but must reach her work by means of the omnibus. Luncheon was served the employées in a basement room where lights burnt all day; evening, found her riding home to the top room, where she slept.

All her stray glances were directed down the tunnel-like aisle toward the light, so she did not see a young man who stood near by, looking about in a half-confused way, until she turned and caught his eye. His cheeks were tanned, his eyes blue, and he looked kind and honest, so she smiled. He stepped forward and spoke over the heads of the cash-boys.

"I want to get a black gown for my mother—something thin, with violets on it, to look like the country. Can you tell me where to go?"

"Yes, sir," she answered, "Go down the next shop to the right—the end counter. There are lawns and muslins there with violets that you can almost smell."

"Thank you, Miss," said he, partly turning. Then, facing her again: "That's about the only kind of flowers you who serve in shops get a chance to see, I expect."

"Yes, sir," she answered, smiling again, "and it isn't living to shut ourselves away from the Spring like this."

"I know it," he replied with rather shy sympathy. "I couldn't stand this myself. I'm from the country—keep a farm. Give me a pasture with cattle in it, and grass just covered with blue spider wort, pink sensitive roses, larkspur. It beats a city."

"Oh-h-h!" gasped Margie at the thought of so much sweetness. "Think of flowers free for every one to pick, and——"

"Ca-ash!" called an impatient boy, and just then the shop-walker discovered the young man at the desk and stepping up to him touched him on the shoulder:

"Against the rules, sir." Then, to Margie, "Miss Harrison, you should know better than this."

Margie coloured as she explained:

"This gentleman wants to see figured black lawns and——"

"When another customer asks such a question, refer him to me," answered the shopwalker.

With a look of friendly regret, and a protestation that he, himself, was to blame for the breach of rules, the young man suffered himself to be directed to the other end of the shop.

The next morning the spirit of unrest burnt again in the girl's heart, and again she repined. But a wonderful thing happened. The tanned young countryman made his way down the shop towards her desk bearing a beautiful burden which he pushed through the window without a word, but with a sympathetic, brotherly smile on his face, and then turned and left the building.

It was a basket of pansies embedded in damp moss—wonderful, velvety faces in purple, bronze and yellow, looking smilingly at her.

It was the happiest day of her life, a never-to-be-forgotten day. She could not long for the woods when a marvellous bit of the woods had come to her.

The next morning a cash boy brought a great bunch of spring violets.

"A fellow from the country give me a copper to bring you these," he explained.

Digitized by Google

Again Margie was in transports, but—the stranger might have brought them himself. She missed his cheery smile.

An hour or so later, however, he strolled through the crowd and smiled from afar. As he was borne nearer, she smiled at him in return over the posies, and ventured, even under the jealous eye of her dragon shopwalker, to say:

"Oh, thank you so much!"

A smile in answer, as he passed on, and another perfect day wore away. At closing time that evening the same young man stood near the main entrance till long after the doors were closed, but the employées poured out of the basement entrance on the other side of the building, and he missed them, much as he would have liked to see one bright-eyed girl in shabby black, who sat in a 'bus holding a bunch of violets, her lips parted in a dreamy smile.

The next morning a bunch of fragrant, nodding lilacs was thrust through her window—the first of the blooms she had ever owned—and again she nodded ecstatic thanks to her unknown friend. That she might be doing wrong in accepting the favour did not occur to her, nor that the joy she felt night and day was not all in the flowers.

Then came a great handful of long-stemmed fleur-de-lis, in all the exquisite shades of purple, that brought to her, who had never seen them growing wild, a vision of pretty banks and rippling water, and again she nodded and smiled her thanks, under disapproving eyes.

The next morning her friend brought his offering in person, walking with determined step and with a decided expression on his face. This time he bore white tea roses—long-stemmed, heavy-headed, fragrance-burdened—and handed them across the desk. She blushed a rosy red, and before she could speak he said:

"I want to say a thing or two and it doesn't make any difference to me who objects," with a defiant glance at the glowering shopwalker.

"But—oh! sir, you have been so kind to me, but I can't talk—it's against the rules. I'll lose my place."

"Miss Harrison!" came the warning.

"Oh, please go!" implored Margie in a half-whisper. "I have twenty minutes for luncheon at one o'clock, and can see you at the back entrance for one moment, if you'll only go now."

On this promise the young man went away without a word, but, unfortunately, the shopwalker had heard her make the appointment, and wishing revenge for past slights, and resenting her apparent friendliness with another man, reported the affair in such terms that when luncheon time came an envelope was handed to the girl containing the amount of wages due to her and a notification that her services were no longer required by the firm.

In her distress she forgot all about her appointment with the man who had been the cause of her dismissal, so, as he stood waiting at the door, he was almost knocked over by a slender little girl with hat pulled down over suspiciously red eyes, and an altogether dejected appearance.

"Something has happened!" he exclaimed.

"The shopwalker reported me," was the answer, with an escape of tears, "and they have discharged me."

"No! Did they?" was his exclamation in lively tones, and with a most cheerful expression. "Come," he added, "let us walk down to a café I know, and let me talk to you a moment while you have your luncheon."

"But—I don't know you," demurred Margie.

"Nor do I you," he retorted, with a boyish laugh, "but I want to. Are you afraid to trust me?"

Margie looked in his face a moment, and then walked along beside him until the restaurant was reached. Her escort did not address her again until they were seated in a secluded corner and luncheon had been brought.

"I am Philip Douglass," he said briskly; "twenty-eight years old, unmarried, with three hundred acres of land—and one corner of my farm runs down into the river—a moist, shady little spot where almost every flower will grow if it is planted, and we have planted a good many. I live with the dearest, gentlest mother in the world, and I am worth enough money to do as I please. You are—" he paused "Margery Harrison," put in the girl.

"Margery—Margery," he reiterated softly. "A sweet name. What else can you tell me that will make me know you better?"

"Twenty years old," began Margery demurely, "stubborn, impatient and unconventional. I lodge with my brother Fred and his wife. I've worked at York's for five years, and now," remembering her trouble, with a quick rush of tears, "they have sent me away without a moment's notice and I must start out to hunt for my daily bread. And here I am, telling all this to you, when I must say good-bye, and thank you, a thousand times, for the beautiful flowers—the first I have ever had given me."

Philip caught her hand as she started to rise. "Sit down a moment, Miss Harrison—Margery—till I tell you what I meant by those flowers. They meant that when I saw you perched up there in that poisoned air, like a poor, forgotten and neglected flower, with your pale cheeks and eyes like velvet pansies, I felt such a pity for you that I wanted to transplant you out into the green fields and under the blue sky where the birds sing all day. And in a day or two more I began to feel a pity for myself, that I was not sure of transplanting you, and that you might slip away from me altogether. You'll come with me, won't you, Margery?"

Margie's hand was still in his, screened from the rest of the room by the long table-cloth, and as she searched his face wonderingly her cheeks crimsoned.

"But—but—you don't know me. I'm penniless, and haven't anyone in the world but Fred. It's all so sudden—you might change your mind."

"Never!" he exclaimed emphatically. "And as for your being friendless and penniless, you'll be so much the more mine. But you must know more about me. I'm a queer sort of fellow—what my neighbours call a 'book farmer,' but I've shown them that my book farming pays. But I want you to be satisfied with me—the man."

"I am satisfied," murmured the girl. "You carry your recommendation in your honest face, and in your eyes that I thought that first day were the kindest eyes I ever saw. I—I am willing to be transplanted."

Phillip did not say a word at first, just sat and held Margie's hand tightly, while he looked long and happily into her sweet, blushing face. Then, with a deep indrawing of his breath, he spoke with a tremble in his voice.

"My Margery, my Margery. It is a poor courtship, but it will be a long honeymoon to make up for it. I will love you and care for you so tenderly, that you will never regret this hastiness. I knew, the moment I saw your face, that I could make you happy, and the next time I knew I wanted you to make me happy."

May Garbutt.

Digitized by Google

THE LAWFUL HEIR.

By JULIAN FITZMORE.

PART II.

SUMMARY.

CONRAD WALKER, the only son of an English family of high reputation, married the daughter of a retired merchant. The anger of his parents knew no bounds, and Conrad was forbidden the house. Having his own estates in Canada he took his wife to that country, but after many years she died, leaving him with a son to look after. Thinking his son would like the trip, and being curious to see who had inherited his estates since his parents' deaths, Conrad Walker returned to England. He found his estates had been claimed by the Earl of Aldergate, a distant cousin. The Earl has a very beautiful and kind daughter—the Hon. Eva Porton—and by chance Conrad Walker's son meets her at a garden party and falls in love with her.

CHAPTER V.

A GOOD SAMARITAN.

'T was a few days after the garden party at Porton that Mr. William Walker set out from The Bull for a stroll round the district, after having spent the morning with his father in discussing various phases of their holiday.

"How long are you intending to stay yet at Wellcaster, dad?" had inquired the young man. "I thought we were only coming over to England for a week or two, with just a run down from London to see this place, and here we've been for some six weeks or so in Wellcaster alone, and we've yet got to go and see the house and town where you were born, and which you've often spoken of, near Durham."

The elder man's grave smile deepened, and his blue eyes rested lovingly on his son.

"Ah, my boy," said he, "I did not know you were in such a hurry to leave Wellcaster. I had thought you rather liked being here!"

"So I do, dad. I think it's a delightful old place, a splendid little country town; and Porton Lodge, you know—well, I never saw any house I think half so grand and baronial. How proud the family must be!"

"Including the Hon. Eva Porton, of course?" put in Mr. Walker.

"Yes, certainly, dad."

"I believe, William, you rather like that young lady?"

"Like! Ah, well, yes. But what's the good of liking what one can't get, dad? You've told me oft enough that it were better to be lowly born, and happy in love, than to be high-born and miserable. You've said how proud and exclusive the English aristocracy are, and how they resent all connections—from family ties or otherwise—with those they deem their inferiors; so if this is so, what is the use of my thinking of Miss Eva Porton, fairly well-to-do and respectable Canadians though we are?"

And the son's face suffused a rosy red. Yet it was as beautiful as it is unusual to see the confidence between son and father, even upon so delicate a topic. Probably the fact that there was no mother living to consult made the affection between these two all the dearer and the more communicative.

"William, do you love this girl?" asked the parent suddenly, after a slight pause.

The young man turned his frank blue eyes on his father, and met his gaze blushingly but fully.

"Yes, father, I do," said he. "And,"—he spoke slowly and deliberately,—"I would do anything for her! I love her with my whole heart and soul!"

"You have, of course, not spoken to her about such a thing?"

The few words said at the garden party did not seem to William to require recognition as being here referred to.

"No," said he "There is no use in so doing, to be refused," he went on, somewhat bitterly, yet with a laugh. "What could I offer her? And even if she loved me, what about the Earl and the Countess? No, dad, no. I may love, but it must be 'loved and lost,' I suppose."

"Ah, well, we'll talk of this later, William. Now I've some letters to write, and Briggs to see. You'll have a walk, I expect?"

"Yes," said the son.

And so it came to pass that on this day in question Mr. William Walker was strolling along the high road from Wellcaster to Porton, by the side of the park surrounding the Lodge. Unconsciously, as it seemed to him, he had taken this path, and yet he knew why he had done so, or at least, when he asked his heart it soon gave him the reason. It was because this way led to Porton Lodge, because there was just a chance of seeing Miss Eva Porton driving or walking somewhere in the neighbourhood on this fine afternoon.

He had almost reached the entrance to the park, when he heard loud voices in the shrubberies that surrounded it—voices that seemed from their tones to indicate anger and quarrelling amongst their owners. The latter were hidden from him by the stone wall bounding the park on the road side, which was just high enough to be above his head.

Without even a second thought, wondering simply what was taking place, William had at once climbed the wall, and there a curious sight met his gaze. The two contestants were Mr. Herbert Blair and a young country lad, doubtless from Wellcaster. The latter had, it appeared, been trespassing in the shrubbery, when he was caught by Mr. Blair, and having been ordered off, became insolent, owing to which the other was now trying to drag him out into the open park, a proceeding which the boy resisted as strongly as possible.

"I tell 'ee I worn't a-poachin' or a-bird-nestin'," said the lad sulkily; "And I won't 'ave 'ee a-draggin' me about either." With this he gave an extra tug that sent Mr. Blair sprawling against a holly bush, much to that gentleman's discomfort. But he did not lose his hold of the boy, and when he had recovered himself, raised his whip and struck the urchin heavily, twice across the body, making him fairly yell with pain.

All this had been done so quickly and unexpectedly that William had had no chance or time of interfering, and the combatants were so much engaged that neither of them were aware of his presence.

When, however, he saw Mr. Herbert again raise his whip, and strike the boy on the bare legs, he called out loudly:

"Here, here, don't be a coward. That's enough anyway!"

So saying, he jumped down hurriedly into the shrubbery from the wall, but in his haste and righteous anger he did not observe a stone standing out near the bottom. His leg caught it with such effect as to cause that member to begin at once to swell and go black, whilst for himself, unable to stand from the pain, he sank down on the ground.

Herbert Blair, whose face had become white as death with passion and hatred at the interference of this "low fellow," and who had advanced a few steps towards confronting him also as a trespasser, now smiled maliciously, as he turned on his heel, saying:

"Just serves you right, sir, for your confounded impertinence! Now you may stay there till you feel disposed to get up and walk home with your friend here."

And, giving the boy another threat of what he'd get if he were caught trespassing again, the Countess's son disappeared.

The pain of the injured limb had been so severe that William Walker had fainted, just as Mr. Herbert had passed out of the shrubbery into the park. For some minutes he lay quite unconscious to what was around him, despite the Wellcaster youth's vigorous attempts to "wake him up"—well-meant, but ineffectual. The latter, however, was sensible enough to stay by him till he came round, on which happening he was asked by the young man to go and get assistance from the lodge-keeper if possible.

In a few minutes that functionary, whose house was, as was said before, not far away, came up, and by his aid Mr. Walker managed to get to the lodge, where the injured leg was bathed and well attended to by the keeper's wife, whilst the boy explained, as lucidly as he could, that "it wor all along o' that there Mister Blair, who'd a-been thrashing 'im, when this 'ere good gentleman interfered, and said as 'ow it wor an awful shame, and 'ad jumped over the wall and sprained his leg, as to which Mr. Blair said as 'ow it sarved him right, and wouldn't help 'im one bit."

It was arranged that Mr. Walker should sit still for an hour or two, whilst the boy was asked to call at The Bull on his way home, and tell them to send on the trap for Mr. William Walker.

The Hon. Eva Porton was driving her pony carriage into Wellcaster that afternoon about three, when, as she was passing the lodge, she bethought herself of a little favour she had promised to do Mrs. Scrubbs, the keeper's wife, some time ago, and thought that she would just look in about it. So, knocking at the door, after dismounting from the pony-carriage, she astonished Mrs. Scrubbs on walking in as usual, by a sudden confusion and blushing as she saw the young man on the couch with his leg bandaged.

"Ah, Mr. Walker," said Miss Eva, advancing towards him, "you here—and hurt? What is this? What does it all mean?"

William held out his hand in response, saying quietly:

"An accident as I was walking on the road, Miss Porton, thank you. Nothing serious. I only climbed the wall, and caught my leg in jumping down."

"So you're a prisoner, and can't get back to Wellcaster? Well, I'm driving there. Will you accompany us in the pony carriage?"

And, without waiting for his answer, Miss Porton called John, the groom, who came and assisted Mr. Walker in.

Meanwhile, Mrs. Scrubbs's voluble tongue had given the lady a full account of the affair, for Mr. Herbert Blair was no friend of hers.

Eva Porton felt her blood tingle at the inhuman conduct of her so-called half-brother.

"I must apologise for his behaviour, if one can apologise for such treatment, Mr. Walker," said she, as they drove townward.

"Oh, please don't, there is no need, Miss Porton," he returned.

"No need!" ejaculated the girl warmly. "He ought to be ashamed of himself." Then, with a sudden burst of pride and wrath: "Anyhow, I'm glad he is not a Porton, Mr. Walker."

What would she have said had she known the man who sat beside her was a Porton?

Mr William was deposited safely at The Bull, to the relief of his father's anxiety. The latter thanked the Hon. Eva very much, as did also the son, but she laughingly repudiated any thanks as she drove away, hoping he would soon be better, and saying her groom should call to inquire to-morrow.

She let the Earl know what she thought of it that night, too, and his Lordship mentally ejaculated that "the girl was indeed a Porton!"

Mr. Conrad Walker had meanwhile spent a busy day resolving whether it was his duty to go back to Canada with William, or ——

And he finally decided to consult Briggs about it, and take him into confidence.

CHAPTER VI.

A Double Consultation.

T was early next day that Mr. Conrad Walker carried out his determination of the previous evening, and paid a visit to Lawyer Briggs, as everybody in Wellcaster called the local scion of the law.

Mr. Briggs had been in practice at Wellcaster for some years, and as the practice before his time had belonged to his father, and previous to that, to his grandfather, it may be assumed that the worthy lawyer knew most of the secrets of the families in and around the district. The Briggs family had long been the solicitors for the Earls of Aldergate.

He was a clean-shaven, keen-eyed man was Lawyer Briggs. Mr. Conrad Walker had consulted him before on some business affairs in London and Canada, without at first revealing his identity, though he did so later on, and it was thus that the lawyer had been able to recommend the two tourists to the kind notice of Captain and Mrs. Jackson.

But early this morning as the Canadian gentleman was, Mr. Briggs had been honoured with an earlier client, the lady who has just been mentioned. She had, after her thoughts of a few days before, resolved to see what the solicitor thought of the affair, at the earliest opportunity, and with a woman's usual idea, thought she should either learn if he was aware of the identity she had already established in her own mind, or if not, she would have the pleasure of putting it before him, and seeing how he liked the surprise.

Digitized by Google

Like a woman, too, when she makes up her mind, Mrs. Jackson was not long in coming to the point. She entered the office just after ten o'clock, before Mr. Briggs had had time to go through his morning's correspondence, quite taking even the astute lawyer aback by her early visit and evidently important mission.

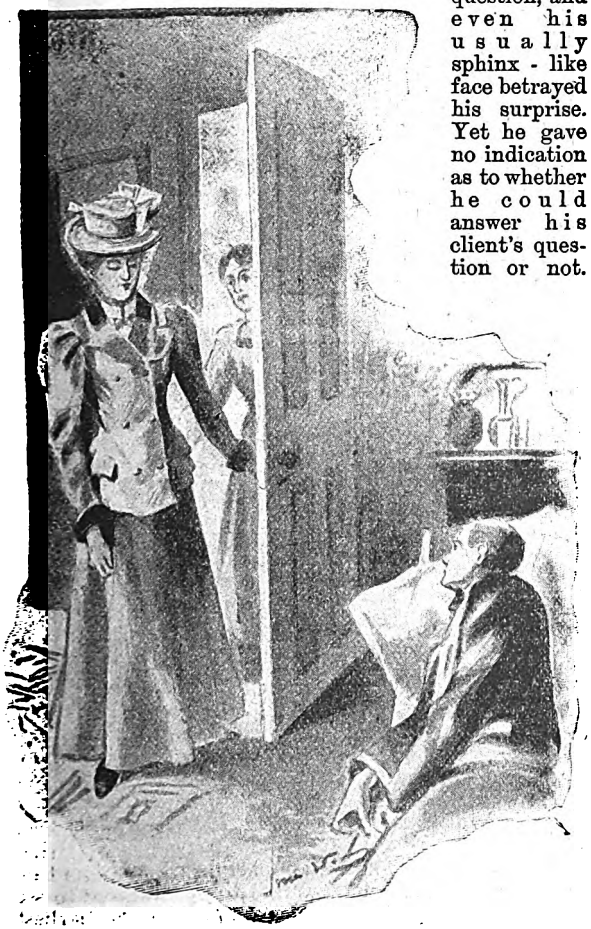
"You are early this morning, Mrs. Jackson," said the solicitor, shaking hands. "To what may I attribute the honour of your visit?"

"I want you to tell me something, Mr. Briggs," said the lady. "I have just been dying for the past day or two to ask you, but I've not been able to come till now, though I have taken the first opportunity. You'll promise to tell me, won't you?"

"Certainly, madam, if it is anything I can lawfully do," was the cautious reply.

"Well, these two tourists, Mr. Conrad Walker and his son, who are they?"

The lawyer was somewhat taken aback by the abruptness of the question, and even his usually sphinx-like face betrayed his surprise. Yet he gave no indication as to whether he could answer his client's question or not.



"Ah! Mr. Walker, you here?"

He simply looked at her, and then smilingly said, "Why, they are Mr. Conrad Walker, and his son, tourists from Canada, who are spending some weeks in England."

"You know them well? You've done some business for them?"

"I've had the honour of the latter, Mrs. Jackson. As to knowing them well—well, I've told you what I know."

"And you mean to say you don't know what they're doing in this district so long?" queried the lady, with a sharp glance.

"Oh, yes, they're staying at The Bull!" retorted he.

The lady laughed.

"How provoking you are, Mr. Briggs," said she. "You make me be plain and rude in my questions instead of telling me what I want to know."

"I've told you, madam."

"No, you've not. Now, look here, don't let's waste time further. I'm speaking in confidence. Do you know that Mr. Conrad Walker is Mr. William Porton, or rather is the Earl of Aldergate?"

If the lawyer had guessed such, or did know, he kept his face as inscrutable as ever.

"Whatever are you saying, Mrs. Jackson!" asked he.

"What I am sure is true, only I want you to confirm it. I found it out the other night after the party, but I've said nothing to anyone but you, and you need not fear my doing so."

"Well, if you are satisfied as to what you say, you scarcely need to ask me, who cannot even know that much. You see, Mrs. Jackson, we lawyers ——."

But the conversation was cut short by the entrance of a clerk, who said that Mr. Conrad Walker desired an interview, and the lawyer ordered him to be shown in. Mrs. Jackson, therefore, had to rise and say adieu, half satisfied only with the result of her visit, and yet wholly certain in her own mind. The new-comer bade her "Good morning" gaily as she met him at the door, and he promised to call on her before long.

"I suppose you have heard, Briggs," said he, on getting settled down into an easy armchair which the lawyer placed for him, "of this latest development of spleen and rudeness on the part of young Blair?"

"Why, yes, of course, it is all over the town. That young scamp of Mother Wellon's would see to that, you may rest assured, for he's praised up Mr. William through it all and run down Mr. Blair till all Wellcaster is eulogising the one and venting its spite on the other. Not but what he deserves it, too! The fact of the matter is, your Lordship——"

"There, drop that, Briggs, you know what we agreed. No 'Lordship' for me yet at any rate. Though, by the way, it's principally this I've come to have a talk with you about. At least something pertaining to it."

The lawyer sat and listened attentively.

"I have, as you know, Briggs, held back so far; should do all my life, I might say, if I could, from claiming my rights. You know all the story, and you may be sure that I'm not keen now on what I gave up even when my dear wife was alive. And when I came to England, I had firmly resolved that my son should know no more of who he is than he knows now, and that's—nothing!"

The lawyer betrayed his surprise at this by a start.

"But things have changed rather, and some unexpected developments have occurred. You see, I had no idea that the present possessor had no son, nor that he had a daughter such as the Honourable Eva Porton. And, Briggs, there's another and more startling fact. I find from private conversation with my son that he is in love with this young lady, and from more things than one I fancy she reciprocates his love. He is more severely hit than I thought. But he withholds telling her of his love because he fears refusal, probably from her—still more from her father—owing to, as he thinks, his inferior position. Now, you see, I know what William is; I know that he never loves lightly, and I know how this love has gone into his very life, and now, if we returned to Canada, he would never be the same again. And so, Briggs, I have been wavering in my mind as to not making any revelation, and I have wondered if it would be better to disclose to him who he is, so that he might not feel at all inferior in rank to the lady whom he wishes to make his wife. Of course it could not be made public till after the present Earl's death; as far as I see, there is no reason why it should. And I don't think the present Earl will be a long liver; he has never looked like one to me."

"His heart is affected, your Lordship," said the lawyer.

"There you are again, Briggs! Well, I myself am not likely to survive many years. So I wanted your opinion of the matter as to the wisdom of telling my son."

The lawyer rubbed his hands gleefully, whilst a smile of satisfaction crossed his face.

"I'm glad you've half-decided to do it at last, your Lordship!—Mr. Walker, then!"—added he parenthetically, as the other raised a warning finger. "It's only what is right and fair, and it will, I think, just about consummate the happiness of Mr. William and Miss Eva. How strange, when you come to think of it that it is he who is the titled one, the wealthy one, and she who is the——."

"There, that will do, Briggs! Miss Eva will never lose her title, I must see to that, if she accepts my boy. But he shall know nothing of it till I think it is the desirable time to tell. She shall love him for himself and his own good qualities alone. It would be advisable, however, that you should have all documents and papers quite in order and ready to prove my claims, &c., if at any time that should be necessary. So please see to that at once."

The solicitor promised to do so forthwith, and with many protestations of pleasure at the turn of events, accompanied his client to the door.

Meanwhile at Porton Lodge the Earl had expressed himself strongly to the Countess on the subject of Mr. Herbert's escapade, the rumours of which had reached even his ears.

"The fact is, my Lady," said he, "your son is getting himself into disrepute all over the country."

"There, there you go, my Lord," replied the Countess, "always grumbling at Herbert. But he will not have to stand the insults of those tourist people much longer. It is not the first time they have made themselves obnoxious. And I think you might have rather a word of praise for Herbert's looking after your rights by keeping trespassers and intruders off the land, rather than be constantly blaming him."

"It is his habit of disregarding what people will think that I oppose," said the Earl.

"Well, really, I'm sure I get tired of one thing or another. There's him on one side, and Eva on the other. What about the scandal of her driving that forward young Walker home in the pony carriage? Do you approve of that? Because if you do, I don't and I've told her so."

"Certainly not," said the Earl.

"Ah, I thought you surely wouldn't! You know, Porton, the fact is, it is time Eva began to settle down. She's getting too independent, has too much freedom here. Herbert has, as you know, for some time loved her, but really, since this last month or so, she's been that awkward that he's said nothing to her beyond what he was obliged."

The Earl's brow darkened. He evidently was not struck with the idea. "Eva must be free to choose for herself, Laura," he said, "If I do not approve of her choice, be sure I shall let her know it in no half-measured way."

And with this her Ladyship had to remain content.

CHAPTER VII.

A Repetition of the Old, Old Story.

T was a very beautiful day in the first week of September—one of September's loveliest days. The fields were all tinged with the decaying hand of autumn; the trees were all turning their foliage into various shades of yellow, whilst the bramble trailed its long, straggly tendrils over the other denizens of the hedgerows, and showed here and there a cluster of large, juicy blackberries hanging from a fruitful bough.

Yet the warm September sunlight, so very mellow in its influence, fell upon all these dwellers of the fields and woods, and made them look rich with its burnishing, and soothing to the eye and mind, just as is the reflected glory of the sunset after a hot summer's day.

The Hon. Eva Porton had taken her book, intending to walk through the park and to sit down to read quietly by the stream that meandered there. She walked along slowly, singularly uninterested in all the beautiful scenes of Nature around her, for Eva was one of those who generally are particularly attracted to the wonders that surround them in field or lane. But to-day she strolled lazily on, nor, when she reached the stream, did she sit down by it, as she had previously intended. She did not even attempt to read. Instead of that she turned off out of the park into a footpath that ran alongside the hedge, separating the fields from the road, into Wellcaster.

The grave thoughtfulness of her face showed that the Hon. Miss Porton was pre-occupied with thoughts, which, however, if judged by the way in which her countenance occasionally lit up, were not on the whole very sad ones. Now and then she stopped to gather some particularly striking plant or flower, though in her meditations she often, soon afterwards, pulled them in pieces, almost without knowing what she was doing. Sometimes she whispered, so to speak, a word or two to herself, and raised her head with a proud and happy look; once or twice she even laughed to herself, a low, sweet laugh of contentment.

"And why am I coming along here; why going towards Wellcaster?" she asked herself for about the tenth time.

Then she smiled again, and her heart answered for her, though she did not hesitate to put the answer into whispered words, whilst a deep crimson overspread her lovely face.

"It is because he once told me how he liked this path, and that he often came along it! Eva, Eva! Whatever are you coming to?"

Digitized by Google

But her heart only laughed the more, and she went happily on her way. Some yards further on a lovely spray of white convolvulus caught her eye. It was high up on the hedge, trailing over a privet bush, and falling down in a cluster of flowers on the other side towards the road. She tried more than once to reach it, but, though she could just touch it with her fingers, she could not get hold of it securely enough to break it off where she wanted.

Suddenly, she became aware that someone had come up on the other side of the hedge—come up unheard, from the fact of his feet falling so lightly on the soft turf by the roadside, and unseen, from the thickness of the privet hedge between them.

At the same time, she saw a hand break off the convolvulus bunch of flowers just where she wanted it doing, and immediately afterwards the form of a young man appeared above the hedge, he having climbed up the bank to hand over his prize to the desirer.

The mutual recognition surprised both, and brought a flood of rose colour to each of their cheeks.

"May I have the honour of giving you the convolvulus, Miss Porton?" asked Mr. William Walker, for he it was. "I saw the branch swinging from side to side, and someone trying to grasp it, so I came from the other side of the road to—well, assist, I suppose, though I had no idea that it was you, Miss Porton. I am so glad to have come up just in time to be of service to you!"

"Oh, Mr. Walker, really it was too kind of you altogether to trouble about so trifling a thing. I was just struck with the pretty bunch of flowers as I was walking along the path here, and reached out to get it, but it was rather beyond my reach."

"Are you going towards Wellcaster, Miss Porton?"

"Yes, Mr. Walker."

She said it half unthinkingly, for she had no fixed idea now as to which way she intended going, as she stood toying with her dainty parasol, and with her frank dark eyes glancing occasionally at his manly face.

"I am going there myself, Miss Porton," said he, perhaps a trifle eagerly. "May I have the pleasure of accompanying you?"

"If you care to do so," said she shyly.

"Care!" ejaculated the young man, as he came through a wide gap in the hedge a little way lower down. "Care! Don't you know by now, Miss Porton, that nothing is too much trouble for me to do for you, that you talk of 'caring'?"

They walked along side by side; he, eager yet calm in his love, with the true Canadian's ideas of equality and freedom, almost forgetting that the girl by his side was an Earl's daughter, and he, a Canadian farmer; she, shy, blushing, and yet so happy, though now and then smiling at what Society in London would think of her, if it saw her, or what the Countess would say if she caught a glimpse of the scene. She felt it incumbent on her to say something at last.

"I trust, Mr. Walker, that your leg is now quite better."

"Yes, thank you. It was kind of you to drive me to Wellcaster that day—it was almost worth straining one's muscles to be so humoured."

"There, don't joke, Mr. Walker."

"I'm not joking, Miss Porton," said he, with a grave look.

"Well, then, don't flatter," said she coyly.

"I'm not flattering you," returned he earnestly. Then after a long try to get a good look at her downcast eyes, he murmured, "You know I mean what I say, Miss Porton! You know what I think; what I wish; what I so eagerly long for!"

Her face was more hidden than ever under that picture-hat, whilst of the brown eyes he could scarcely

She tried more than once to reach it.

get a glimpse. Her heart was beating violently, and she trembled.

"Whatever do you mean, Mr. Walker?" asked she, recovering some words after a determined effort.

He took her small, daintily-gloved hand in his, and she did not withdraw it!

This encouragement enabled him to proceed, but the story came out now in a regular burst. He had forgotten now who she was; everything but that he loved her.

"Oh, Miss Porton, you know what I mean! You know that I love you! Yes, you must hear me, though I'm unworthy of you; I love you with all my heart and soul. Perhaps I ought not to tell you so—you, who are so far above me—but I cannot help it. I must tell you how I've loved you from the first, and shall love you till I die! There! And," after a pause, in which she had turned away her head, though the tears—tears of joy—had gathered in her eyes, "you, Miss Porton? I am not altogether wrong, am I? Surely you love me a little? You do, don't you?"

This time he bent and gazed right into those dark eyes. That gaze seemed to give their owner courage, for she lifted up her head proudly, and said, in a very low whisper, "Yes."

He clasped her to his breast, broad daylight as it was.

"Eva, my Eva! My own darling Eva!"

He seemed as if he could never tire of saying the name.

"There, Master William," said she at last, arranging her hat after at least a dozen kisses, "there, are you satisfied?"

"Not quite, my darling," laughed he.

Then they walked on, but oh! how bright and sunny the whole world was! And they were so happy, so deliciously happy!

Digitized by Google

It was she who first broke the silence of that hand-in-hand walk towards Wellcaster.

"William," shyly she breathed his name, "whatever will papa say? And the Countess! Good gracious, she will go on!"

The young man's reply was laconic and Canadian.

"Let her!" he said. "As to the Earl, you leave that to my father and me. Father somehow always manages to get people round who are awkward, and no doubt he'll help us."

"I must return to Porton Lodge now, dear," she said. "I am not going to Wellcaster. I am too happy."

"As you please, my darling," said he, turning with her. "It will give us all the more opportunity of telling our love to each other."

But their hearts were too full for many words. Her face was radiant with love and smiles, and Mr. William Walker just looked as happy as could be. They talked of the future with hearts beating high with hope, and the gentleman promised to call upon the Earl on the following day.

"I never dreamt, Eva, that I should win the love of an Earl's daughter," said William, as they stood, before parting, at the side gate to the park. "But I'll try to to make you as happy as any loving husband ever could," said he.

"And I'll try to be as good a wife as any husband ever had," said she, her great brown eyes resting on him lovingly.

Then there was a renewal of the "dozen kisses" ere they parted, two hearts as full of love and happiness as Heaven's sunshine ever rested on.

CHAPTER VIII.

The Countess of Aldergate Receives a Shock

IT may be safely said that the Countess of Aldergate had never received such a shock in her life as when, being called into the library the following morning, she was acquainted by the Earl with the news which he had just learnt from the lips of his daughter herself, which was meagre enough in all conscience, seeing that it was to the effect that Mr. William Walker would call upon his Lordship about eleven that morning, and formally propose for the hand of the charming Hon. Eva!

The Earl himself had gone red in the face, and stared at his daughter as if she were not in her right mind, when, with some natural hesitation and shyness, she had broached the subject, thinking it would better prepare the way for her lover. Then he had become angry, so far as he ever was angry with her, and said,

"Surely, Eva, you have not considered what you really are doing by this? You, whom I had intended for some nobler marriage than that with a wandering Canadian!"

"There is no nobler marriage than that which springs from true love, papa," the girl had nobly answered. "I am high-born enough as it is, and am wealthy enough, too. So that all I see is necessary is for me to be happy and loved, and I am sure that is what I shall be with Mr. Walker."

She had hesitated at the name, but in the end surrendered "William," as being perhaps too familiar, as yet, anyhow.

"Of course, Eva, I want you to be loved and happy, and I would not wish to force on you a disagreeable marriage, but you must allow me to say, before this has gone too far, that the other ideal alliances I and the Countess have had in view for you would be much more preferable."

"I don't think so, papa," said the girl, "Mr. Walker, like his father, is a thorough gentleman, and that is more than can be said for all my suitors—titled or untitled. And papa," she added coaxingly, going up and putting her arms round his neck in such a sweet way as half to disarm his perhaps justifiable resistance, "papa, you know, I love him, and he loves me, and I should be so unhappy if you refuse your consent. You can't tell how miserable I should be!"

"Well, well, this is an affair!" said he, "But naturally it is our duty to consult your mother. We must ask her to come here."

He rang the bell, and bade the footman request the Countess's attendance.

She came. Eva had expected a scene when her stepmother learnt the state of the case, but even Eva's expectations fell short of what happened.

The Countess held up her hands in righteous horror.

"Ernest!" she said, "you are surely not going, for one moment, to listen to any such absurdity. If Eva has no more sense than to go and make a laughing stock of herself, and a disgrace of us, by marrying a low-born adventurer from the Far West, instead of a real English gentleman, there is no need we should add to the folly by giving our countenance to it. Those people have been far too presuming for my fancy all along. Herbert did right in trying to make that impudent young man keep his proper place."

"A coward!" whispered the roused girl. "A despicable coward!"

"Eva! You forget of whom you are speaking!" said the Countess indignantly. "You are speaking of my son!"

"I can't help it," said the other, with her brown eyes blazing. "You make me say it."

"Ernest," said his wife, "you had better ask Eva to leave the room if we are to talk of this."

The father looked at the daughter, who, without further noticing her stepmother, remarked,

"I will go, papa. But you must not forget what I said."

She went, and retiring to her own room, burst into tears. Yet she was happy in her heart, for she knew that no Countess or anyone else could take away the love she felt and the love she had won.

For a long time her Ladyship talked with the Earl, and as she talked her influence began to make itself felt, so that Eva's chances of success gradually declined, and the Earl had practically settled not to assent to this proposal, when the footman announced that Mr. Briggs wished to see his Lordship on a matter of importance.

"Show him in," said the Earl.

Then putting out his hand, as the lawyer entered, and the Countess rose to retire, he greeted him with:

"Good morning, Briggs. You're early to-day. Anything important?"

"Very important, I think, your Lordship, or I should not have troubled you. Ah, your Ladyship,"—as the Countess was leaving the room—"it might, perhaps, be well if you could give us your presence and advice for a minute or two. Your Lordship doesn't mind my asking, I hope?"

"Certainly not! But what has my wife to do with our business, my dear sir? She knows nothing of my affairs, you know."

Digitized by Google

"Her Ladyship may be useful, however, in this case," said the lawyer.

So the Countess returned and sat down, whilst both she and her husband waited eagerly to know the cause of Mr. Briggs' strange proposal.

"Your Lordship may well be surprised at my early visit this morning," began the lawyer, resting his arms on the table, where he had placed his packet of documents in due order, "but I assure you it is of the utmost importance, or I would not have troubled her Ladyship and yourself. You will pardon my speaking plainly, but I must do so in order to explain the position. Your Lordship will, I believe, this morning have an interview with that young tourist now staying at The Bull—Mr. William Walker—on a matter of importance. Probably, too, his father may call upon you."

"You are mistaken, Briggs," interrupted the Earl. "I know to what you allude, and as to which it would seem they have thought it necessary to consult you, but it is useless. I have quite resolved that I shall not interview Mr. William Walker, a mere boy, on any such subject; it is simply absurd." Here he was fortified by the gracious smile and nod of the Countess, in her superior scorn of such persons. "As to his father coming! Why, that is even more absurd. I never heard of a youth whose proposal had to be seconded by the presence of his father! 'Pon my word, if it didn't bring Eva in, it would be as good as a comic opera."

And the Earl and Countess laughed boisterously.

But the lawyer looked grave.

"Your Lordship must pardon me," said he, "if I look upon this as a more serious affair than you suppose. You will act, to my mind, somewhat incautiously if you refuse to see the gentleman in question, even on a less important matter than this."

"And pray, why should I have to receive any person at Porton Lodge unless I choose, Mr. Briggs?" asked the Earl. "Cannot I do as I like in my own house?"

The lawyer coughed ominously and hemmed once or twice ere he spoke.

"That is just it, your Lordship," said he slowly. "You see—pardon my putting it so abruptly—it is not your own house—since Mr. Conrad Walker this Canadian tourist, is the long-lost Mr. William Porton, Earl of Aldergate!"

The solicitor had watched closely to see the effect of his words. And what an effect it was! The Countess laughed hysterically, declaring that it was all absurd; an impossible story; a lie, in fact! And she ended by going into hysterics pure and simple. The Earl—so we may still call him—became ashy white and looked at the man opposite him with dazed glance and open mouth. A great blow had fallen on him, and instinctively he knew the truth.

"Briggs, is this true?" he whispered, when he could speak. "Are you sure, have you positive proofs that this man—eh—this gentleman, is my long-lost cousin, and the real owner of—of—you know?"

"There's no doubt whatever about it, my Lord," said Briggs. "I have all the documents here, marriage certificates, birth certificates, and everything required to prove the claim. In fact the court would decide in ten minutes in his favour. It's somewhat strange now one can trace the family resemblance in his face that none of us ever noticed it—none except one lady."

"Ah," said the Earl slowly, "that was Eva, was it?"

"No, sir. It was Mrs. Jackson, of Netherthorpe. She recognised it, and spoke to me of it, but I tried to put her off."

"Then Eva doesn't know Mr. William Walker—Porton, rather—is her cousin, and heir to these titles and estates?"

"Not at all; nor does he himself!"

"What!" exclaimed the Earl. "Is he ignorant of his identity?"

"Perfectly," said the lawyer.

Then, after a pause, "Well, what do you advise or propose, Briggs?"

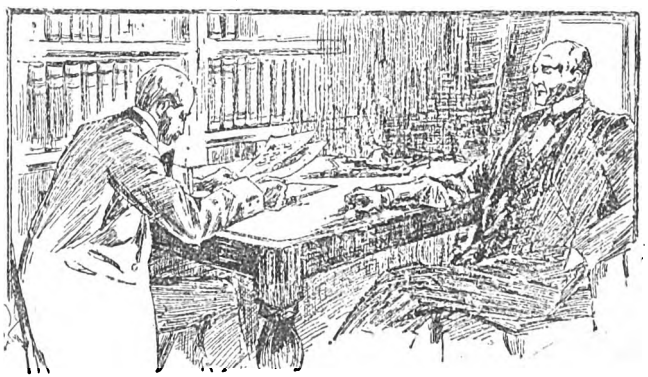
"Mr. Walker—yes I'll call him so—has requested me to put before you the following offer. You shall sanction the engagement and marriage of his son with Miss Eva—for they really love each other, I understand, deeply—allowing them, when they have the desire, to reside at Porton Lodge with you, though they'll no doubt mostly live in London. If you agree to this Mr. Walker, who is not ambitious to take up the title, is willing to leave the whole estate in your possession for life, as at present, excepting a third of the income which is to go to Mr. William and his bride. You would still retain all titles and power during your life; at your death he, if alive, would declare his title; and, if dead, Mr. William would of course be the new Earl. I must say I think it an extremely generous proposition, nay, a magnanimous one. There is only one other stipulation, which you will see is best for all—the two Blairs are to live elsewhere than at the Lodge here."

It need not be told how delighted Mr. William Porton—we can call him that just for once—was, on receiving an unexpected welcome and approval from the Earl, on his formal proposal for Eva's hand, nor how that young lady was also extremely astonished at the change in her father's demeanour.

But it was none the less welcome, and at last two loving hearts were happy.

They were soon afterwards married; but not till the Earl died suddenly, some nine months later, did they learn the truth; and when Mr. Conrad Walker became the new Earl in reality, then no one was more surprised than the two young people at finding that after all, Porton was their true name and dignity!

Happy indeed in love was their married life, and happy they made everybody around them, both as the heirs, and afterwards, when, a few years later, they in turn came into the titles and estates as Earl and Countess of Aldergate.



He looked at the documents.

Digitized by Google

A Tale of Two Daggers.

My friend Bert Paget has a nice place on the heights of Pasadena. When I am in the vicinity, I make it convenient to drop in on him, sometimes, for weeks at a time; and when I am not in the vicinity I make it convenient to have business there.

Bert and I understand each other, and Bert's wife happens to be my youngest sister, and a great favourite of mine, which may, in some measure, account for the mutual understanding existing between her husband and me. Bert is passionately fond of his wife, in which I don't blame him.

One evening Bert and I were sitting in his study enjoying our after-dinner cigars. I had just returned from Jamaica. The lamp cast a soft, orange radiance over the room, dimly outlining the odds and ends that Bert had picked up in various quarters of the globe during his ante-marriage wanderings, from a Damascus blade here to a boomerang there; a Sioux war bonnet in one corner, and a group of South Sea war clubs in another. The window before which we sat in the soft glow of the twilight, overlooked a balcony and the surrounding hills dotted with lights, while the brilliant stars twinkled in the sky, making a picture of fairylike beauty. Over the mantel-piece were a Zulu shield and a half dozen assegais, while beneath these latter were two crossed daggers.

I had not, to my remembrance, seen them before, and after glancing at them for a moment, rose from my chair and stepped closer to examine them. They were a pair, and each bore along the blade a number of characters of some written language.

The hilts were of a metal resembling gold, in which were set a great number of jewels that sparkled in the lamplight.

After a moment's inspection, I turned towards Bert with the intention of asking him their history; when, as I did so, I saw him looking at me with a frown, something unusual with Bert.

"What's the matter?" I asked in surprise.

"Nothing, only I suppose you'll ask me to tell you about those things next, and I've got tired of them," he answered in an irritable tone, turning towards the window.

"You had better wait till you're asked, before you jump into a fellow like that," I retorted, with some asperity.

"Excuse it, Rob," he replied; "I meant nothing, but there's an odd tale there," nodding towards the weapons, "and, oh, pshaw!" he concluded, as if the subject were unworthy of further discussion.

"If you have no objection, I'd like to hear it," I said, keen for a tale of mystery.

"I knew you would," he replied, moodily.

"Not if it annoys you," I responded quickly, "perhaps Nellie——"

"Nellie is the only one who knows, and she is bound to secrecy," he interrupted.

"Then why not tell me yourself?" I asked, for I fancied that he was in the mood, and therefore, pushed my advantage.

"You wouldn't believe me," he answered briefly and sulking.

"Try me," I said, insinuatingly, blowing out a cloud of fragrant smoke.

Without a word, he rose from his chair and going to a cabinet, brought out a small decanter and glasses. Setting them on the table, he drew his chair near, filled the glasses, threw his head back so as to keep his eyes on the daggers, and began.

"I never believed in spiritualism, occultism, or any other heathenism, Rob; and I don't say that I've changed my mind or my views regarding them one and all, but something strange has twice happened to me, and I'd like to have some one to explain it—if they can. It was about the time you went to Jamaica that the first of these two things happened; let's see, yes, it was three years ago, that makes me right.

Digitized by Google

"I was sitting here in this same room at just about this time in the evening. Nellie was over at Grattley's, and I had promised to call for her at eleven. I sat in this chair and looked out of the window at the lights and stars, and after a while noticed that the evening star seemed particularly bright, looking for all the world like an electric light hung above the hills.

"I began to conjure up all sorts of ideas regarding it, wondering if it was inhabited, and if it was, what the people were like.

"Of course you have heard the theory that a man can hypnotise himself sometimes by looking at an object long and steadily, especially if the object be placed or held in such a position that it is a strain to keep it in sight. Well, I had fallen back in the chair and grown drowsy, but my mind still persisted in dwelling on the planet, and my speculations in no wise abated with the desire for sleep, but my thoughts grew confused, and presently I must have fallen asleep.

"Yet it seemed to me that it was a gradual transition from one state of life to another; I seemed to drift from the material things of this life into the spiritual ones of another. That is the only way I can explain it to you, for I really did not lose consciousness, but simply changed my point of observation, and began to look on new and strange scenes.

"I seemed to be walking leisurely along a handsome street in a strange city; the myriad lights sparkled and glittered along either side, and down the middle extended a broad tree-shaded footpath. Public places of entertainment and refreshment lined the sides, in front of which sat hundreds of people laughing, talking and drinking. I recall being impressed with the resemblance of the street to one of the avenues of Paris.

"The dress of the people banished the thought as it came. Their garb was a tunic and hose, belt and sandals for the men, while the women were arrayed in a style closely resembling the classic drapery of ancient Greece, and were bejewelled in dazzling splendour.

"Such a prodigal display of wealth no Arabian Nights' entertainer ever dared dream of; diamonds and rubies; sapphires and emeralds were everywhere in reckless profusion; even the goblet from which I quaffed a delicious drink when I sank on to a divan just without the portals of an elaborate place full of the sounds of exquisite singing, was thickly encrusted with them. I felt no surprise at my surroundings. It all seemed familiar to me, yet I could not identify it.

"No one paid any attention to me as I sat there enjoying myself.

"I was suddenly aroused from my reverie by a commotion near at hand, and turning my head quickly, observed with a shock that a desperate encounter was taking place behind me.

"A young man was standing with his back against the wall, a dagger uplifted in his hand, while before him were three adversaries, each trying to distract his attention in order that the others might finish him.

"A great crowd surrounded them, but no one offered him aid. I saw at a glance that it was but a question of seconds ere his one blow would be drawn, and the coup de grâce given.

"My blood boiled in that instant at the unfairness of the fight, and I sprang to my feet. With one bound, I had thrown myself at the nearest man and caught him by the legs, and as we came to the earth in a heap, myself underneath, I heard the thud of a dagger as it was buried in his back.

"In an instant I was on my feet, but not a fraction of a second too soon to evade a desperate blow aimed at me by one of the survivors. As I dropped and he swung past me, the young man, with a movement like a flash, struck his dagger to the hilt between his shoulders, and as he fell I drew it out quickly and faced the one remaining foeman.

"He made no effort to escape, but faced us both with astounding bravery. At this exhibition of cool nerve I took a step backward, leaving him with the man I had been championing.

"The encounter was brief, and the last of the three fell dead on the marble floor.

"From the time I sprang from my chair to the end could not have exceeded two minutes, and at its conclusion, the victor, his face wreathed in smiles, came to me and took my hand in silent gratitude. He then placed his arm in mine and we peacefully left the place.

"Not a soul interfered; not one but gave a cheer as we passed, and yet not one had offered my companion assistance against his apparently overwhelming odds.

"My new-found friend thanked me for my timely aid, and chatted amiably with me in a tongue that I had never heard before in my life, and yet I understood perfectly!

"Now mark; the place was strange, yet familiar; the language I had never heard before in my life, and yet I understood its every syllable, and talked with him in it as if it were my native tongue.

"Mechanically I thrust the dagger I carried through the waistband of my trousers, giving it no further thought. After a short stroll we came to a splendid house within a spacious garden, and entered. In a room off the hall, we disposed ourselves on couches, while numerous handsome girls served wine and cigarettes, somewhat after the Turkish style.

"As my friend reclined upon his couch smoking, and while the strains of beautiful music floated in on the redolent air, he took occasion to renew his thanks, and to add that if at any time or place I needed him and earnestly called him by his name, which was 'Tolia,' he would be instantly at my side.

"Under the combined influence of the wine, the smoke, the heavy fragrance of the atmosphere, and the dreamy music, a drowsiness overcame me, and I fell into a deep and dreamless slumber, which was only broken by a mellow chime, and upon opening my eyes, still having in mind my experience, my astonishment may be imagined when I found myself sitting in my chair in this room, awakened by yonder clock striking eleven.

"Recollecting my appointment to call for Nellie, I rubbed my eyes, jumped up, and was off in a moment, the realism of my dream clinging to me as I went. This I was notable to banish, and I explained my abstraction to Nellie by telling her that I had fallen asleep. When we reached home and I was preparing to retire, still thinking of the vivid dream, something fell from my clothes to the floor. It was shadowy in that part of the room, and I brought the lamp.

"Before me, on the floor lay the dagger of my dream!

"It were useless to try and tell you of the emotions engendered by the sight of the actual presence of this object of my fancied dream, a thing that I could no longer believe merely a dream. I slept little that night, nor for months could I forget it long enough to do any deep work. It never left me for more than an hour at a time.

Digitized by Google

"Nellie is a sensible girl, and after a while I told her of the circumstances under which I came into possession of the weapon."

"Don't you suppose you could account for it by an attempt at burglary?" I asked, excitedly.

"Would a burglar deliberately come and stick a valuable weapon in my waistband?" he queried disdainfully.

"That's true," I replied, thoughtfully, not a little wrought up over the uncanny tale.

"But you have heard only half the story; there's a sequel," he said; "and when I have finished I think you will be more puzzled than ever, but you wanted to hear it, and I don't do things by halves, besides, I'm getting interested myself."

"A sequel!" I cried. "Oh, do go on with it."

He smiled as he refilled his empty glass, then, having moistened his rather husky throat and lighting a fresh cigar, continued:

"That happened three years ago. I had not forgotten it by a good deal, and many an hour have Nellie and I spent in trying to understand it, but whatever theories we evolved were as quickly dissipated by some new idea. Of course where all was mere guesswork, and nothing could be proved these discussions were endless in their possibilities of scope.

"Last autumn we were returning from a trip through Canada with Bennett's family. I left Nellie to come on alone with them, while I joined a party of friends from different points for a three weeks' hunt.

"There were about twenty of us in the party, and we made as pretty a camp as you ever laid your eyes on, about seventy miles south of the railway.

"There was no lack of game, and we got a couple of bears, after we had been on the ground a week. We had a glorious time and for those three weeks I forgot all about that dagger.

"But the end came and we were to break camp on the morrow. I had been off on a long jaunt after a cinnamon with two cubs that I had spied early in the day, but, losing the trail, I was making my way back to the camp along the edge of a deep gorge with the creek a good five hundred feet below me, when I heard a stone fall into the cañon, and stopping quickly looked for the cause.

"Directly in front of me, about thirty yards away, were two men, the worst looking cut-throats I had ever had the misfortune to see in all my life, and as I made this mental observation, I found myself looking straight along the barrel of a Winchester in the hands of the one in advance.

"'Throw up your hands!' he said in tones of calm desperation.

"Now, Bob, I am no coward, but I know what the order means when the one who gives it has good backing, and I didn't waste a second, I assure you. There is always time enough to learn the why and wherefore later; that is if you don't stop too long to try and reason it out before hand. As I stood there with my hands over my head, the smaller of the two came quickly towards me under cover of his partner's rifle, pulling a cord out of his pocket as he advanced.

"Close inspection intensified the brutish face, and I was not the happiest man in the world as he proceeded to pull my arms down and tie them.

"A cornered man can think pretty quick, and he is apt to take desperate chances. I asked myself why two men should want to tie one simply to rob him, and I answered the question like lightning.

"'Dead men tell no tales!'

"They meant to kill me as a finishing job.

"He had one arm down as I thought this, and when he reached for the other, I reasoned that if I suddenly whirled and knocked him down, his partner would riddle me before I could turn. Well, I did whirl, but I had him in a bear-like hug between me and the other before the latter could wink an eye.

"Then came a pretty struggle for my rifle, while the other fellow covered the thirty yards between us, yelling to throw me over the cliff. That was easy enough to say but I was the better man, and would have sent his partner there in a jiffy if it had not been for the fact that the act would have been my death-knell.

"It doesn't take a man long to run thirty yards, and I had not succeeded in getting that rifle when he reached us and aimed a blow at my head with the evident intention of knocking that useful member clear across the gulch. But I slid aside and let my friend have it.

"The blow was a good one, and I held a dead man in my arms. In an instant the big one lowered his rifle, and in another I had dropped my man and had the barrel in my hands. But here I found my master. He was a giant, and he threw me round like a baby.

"We fought for that rifle like wild beasts for flesh, and we were perilously near the edge of the cañon. I was growing weak, while my opponent's strength seemed to increase with his rage, and he was forcing me toward the edge of the precipice!

"I tried to regain my lost ground, but I might have as well fought against a grizzly. I felt that it would be all over in a few seconds, but still I fought on.

"At that moment, when hope had forsaken me, and my ebbing courage almost fled, the thought of the friend of my dream came into my confused ideas, and I quietly, without definite notion of what I was doing, called:

"'Tolia—Tolia! come to me now!'

"The words had scarcely left my lips when there suddenly appeared, solidified from the thin air of the mountains, a figure in white; a keen-bladed dagger flashed in the air and then sunk to the hilt between the shoulders of my gigantic adversary!

"As he fell, I staggered towards my preserver, he caught my hand, and bowing his head over it in silence, touched it with his lips. The strain had been too much for me and I fell in a half swoon, I had not wholly fainted, but lay there to recover from my exhaustion.

"After ten minutes I was all right once more, and raising my head, looked about me. On one side lay the man with the crushed skull; nearer at hand, the brute who had nearly finished me, the dagger projecting from his back. Not another thing was in sight. My friend had vanished as he came.

"I withdrew the dagger and made my way to camp. The next day we came home. I did not mention my adventure to my friends. When I saw Nellie, I told her the whole story. You now know as much about it as either of us. If you can, I should like to have you explain it; neither of us can. There are the two daggers above your head."

CLAUDE MATHERSON.

Digitized by Google

The Bride of Faliero.

THE palace of the Doge of Venice was flaming with lights and brilliant with colour, ablaze with torches and lamps, and gay with the sounds of festival music, and with the gorgeousness of magnificent costumes, flashing jewels, velvet masks, and lovely flowers, and merry with the company of gallant cavaliers and beautiful women intoxicated with the whirl of the dance.

Marino Faliero, the Doge of Venice, received his guests with all his natural pride and haughtiness of manner, blended with the condescending gallantry toward the ladies, and urbanity toward the gentlemen, that was characteristic of his imperious nature.

He had been Doge of Venice scarcely more than seven months, and was a man then of seventy-six years of age, but never man looked back upon a larger course of magnificent triumphs during a lifetime than he.

He had been a soldier, and had routed the King of Hungary and his eighty thousand men with less effort than many a commander requires to put a squad through the ordinary military evolutions.

He had been commander of the fleet. He had been Ambassador at Genoa, and at Rome, and while there it was that he received news of his election to the dignity of Doge.

His was not a nature of simplicity and gentle dignity, and by long years of command his fiery spirit had been raised to an arrogant imperiousness, that had finally become a passion sweeping everything before it.

His courage was that of the magnificent wild beasts of the forest, but not so his magnanimity. He allowed no rival to stand in his way, nor was any opponent of sufficiently small consequence to escape his vindictive notice. He had but one vulnerable point—his young and lovely wife.

Among the brilliant company of masqueraders was a young man of noble blood and handsome person and fine bearing. At length, during the festivities, this youth of patrician birth, having looked too many times upon the wine when it was red, too many times did his gaze fall upon the bewildering beauty of one of the Dogessa's ladies in waiting. He whispered his ardent admiration into her unwilling ear, and her real or feigned displeasure attracted the Doge, who witnessed the scene. With eyes aflame he stepped forward, and commanded him to instantly withdraw from the scene of the festivities.

This public insult because of what he, the offender, who was Michael Steno, pleased to consider but a trifling indecorum, infuriated him, and he withdrew as he was commanded, only to put his wits to work to devise some way of avenging so great an insult to his pride.

At length, after wandering about some time, he found himself alone in the Senate hall, and there across the throne in the dim light, Steno wrote with a piece of chalk a few words that were destined to bring about a tragedy such as even he at that moment little dreamed of.

After writing those staring words full of insulting significance, he quietly went away. The evening passed far into the morning hours, and just before daybreak the guests departed.

The inscription written across the front of the throne first met the horrified gaze of an official of the palace, whom it confronted as he entered the Senate chamber the next morning, and he, affrighted, sought his master.

No words can describe the wrath and unbounded fury of Faliero, as, hastening to the chamber, he beheld the daring insult. That the young and beautiful Dogessa was as spotless as virgin snow is not doubted, but the malicious and cowardly innuendo took the desired effect, and the mind of Faliero was poisoned by the malicious shaft, whose wound was more than he could bear. It was not difficult to decide who was the probable offender. Faliero had not forgotten the infamous conduct of Steno, and upon him the accusation of this dastardly deed was laid.

Digitized by Google

Officers were instantly sent out, and Michael Steno was arrested and brought up before his peers. The task of the tribunal of the forty was not hard, for Steno at once admitted the offence, and stood for judgment with all the monchalance of impudent moral indifference, and left the facts to answer for themselves. The words he had written were in effect these:

"The Doge has a beautiful and young wife, but she is not for him."

Steno was sentenced to two months' imprisonment, which was to be followed by twelve months of exile.

The only fault to be found with this sentence was its exceeding lack of severity, yet to a patrician, a dungeon cell and a year of banishment was a penance bitter to be endured; but Faliero was beside himself with insulted rage because of the lenity of the sentence.

Nothing could have satisfied him other than the beheading of Steno, which punishment, according to his own judgment, Steno richly deserved for so gross a misdemeanor, and Faliero had expected nothing less than this from the decree of the tribunal.

He was stung to the quick because of what seemed to him added insult that Steno was to get off so easily, and he turned his fury from Steno himself to the signory, who had, he believed, betrayed their trust, in order to shield Steno because of his noble birth.

At once and instantly the entire patrician order loomed up before his wrath-distorted vision as a hydra-headed foe before which he, for the first time in all his triumphal life, felt his own impotence. He longed for super-human power that he might with one sweep of the knife sever that hydra-head of his foe and thus put out of existence the signory of Venice, but how could he do this, how might it be brought about, for rest he would not until he had in some way accomplished it.

Like Caligula, he sat brooding over his wrongs.

That evening, as he was alone in his chamber, stern and gloomy and resentful, and full of malice toward those he believed his enemies, a man came on foot and breathless to the gates of the palace and asked to see Marino Faliero at once, as he desired to speak with him regarding a case of justice. Faliero bade them show the man in, and a moment later the stranger stood in his presence.

That he was a plebian was evident from his dress and general appearanc. His face was bruised and blood-stained, and his clothes betokened something like a hand-to-hand encounter with an enemy. He was fairly bursting with wrathful emotion and shaking with the force of the anger that was consuming him. As soon as he found himself in the presence of Faliero he burst into an uncontrollable torrent of impossible speech.

"And who are you?" demanded Faliero, as soon as the flood of the man's tempestuous words could be stayed.

"I am Israel Bertuccio," he replied.

"And your complaint is—"

"I am a workman in the arsenal, and I bear on my face the imprint of the blow given by one who came demanding the service of my men in his own private behalf, and to him I returned answer that he could not have them since they were already engaged in the government's employ and upon its ships, whereupon he struck me full in the face, and I am come hither to learn if I may not be avenged. I appeal for justice!"

"For justice," replied Faliero, with bitter sarcasm, "justice and against one of the signory! That even I cannot procure for myself!"

"Then let us find a way to avenge ourselves!" said Bertuccio, savagely.

An idea struck Faliero. He had in this man an able weapon. Through him might be brought about exactly what he desired of all things to be wrought—revenge upon the signory of Venice!

He found that Bertuccio belonged to a brotherhood—a secret order, and that all his class regarded the signory as implacable enemies. They had been stung by wrongs, and were driven to a spirit of willingness to adopt almost any means to avenge themselves. The hour had come, they would endure no more; this last insult to himself, Bertuccio declared, should serve as the incitement inspiring others to take action for their rights and for justice.

Nothing could have delighted Faliero's secret soul more than did this information. Revolt of the lower classes seemed imminent; why should not the lower classes serve him in this his hour of need, and become his strength and power in this the time of his greatest impotence.

Hours wore away, and Marino Faliero and Bertuccio still remained closeted in secret conference. The night wore to daybreak, and the day lengthened toward another night and yet these two strangely-united confederates sat perfecting their plans. When finally Bertuccio took his leave it was beyond midnight, and the understanding was that he should return the following night.

He came according to appointment, but he did not come alone. His companion was a sculptor, by name, Filippo Calendro.

The Doge and his nephew, Bertuce Faliero, were waiting for them. And together these four laid their plans for one of the most tremendous and vengeful schemes that ever emanated from the brain of man, and the beginning of one of the heaviest tragedies in the history of the world.

Three days were deemed sufficient in which to complete all preparations and on the 15th of April the plans were to be carried out.

The scheme was this, sixteen of the most bloodthirsty of the order were to be chosen as leaders, and each leader was to choose sixteen followers, and arm them to the teeth.

At daybreak on April 15th the bell of St. Mark's, which never struck except by the command of the Doge, was to ring out a loud alarm; at this signal the sixty-four conspirators, rushing from various parts of the city were to come together at St. Mark's, shouting aloud the exciting news that the Genoese fleet had been descried at sea.

The senators, who would be aroused by the tumult would at once come to council, and at that moment, while they were assembled in the piazza, they would be hewn down together, not a man being spared.

Everything went well with the conspirators. Their men were well and wisely chosen and ably drilled, and victory seemed promised to them. All would have gone admirably had it not been for the troublesome conscience of one man who had been shown many personal favours by one of the senators. He hesitated and wavered, and a thousand times was minded to go to Lioni, his benefactor, and warn him against impending danger, but his hesitation he kept carefully concealed, for were there not watchful eyes and vengeful hearts, and hands ready to plunge the knife into his vacillating heart at the least sign of treachery on his part?

Digitized by Google

At last the long expected day came to a close. Upon the following morning the signal would be sounded and the dire deed would be consummated.

It was now midnight. Faliero was sleepless; he was impatient for his vengeance. He paced the floor and watched the flight of the moments.

As the clock struck twelve, a figure shrouded in black disguise, slipped from by-way to by-way like a shadow, and made its way to Lioni's dwelling.

It was Bertrando, the traitor to his order, and him of the troubled conscience, who could no longer hold out against its pleadings, come to warn his patron and benefactor that haste must be made instantly, or the blood of the senators would flood the stones of the piazza,

He roused the household of Lioni and tried to warn them in a few words and escape; but a torrent of questions met his information. They could not understand the necessity for mystery; why did he not speak out? They evidently suspected him of treachery.

Even Lioni grew suspicious of his fond solicitation and ordered him held until he grew more explicit.

There was no other way out of it, Bertrando saw that plainly, and to clear himself he determined to uncloak himself, turn King's evidence, and have his reward. He threw off his disguise and stood forth as a hero and a saviour among them, but first he secured Lioni's pledge for his own personal safety, not only, but for his reward. This Lioni readily gave.

Lioni was paralyzed with horror and amazement. As he listened his amazement rivalled his horror. He ordered Bertrando to be held a prisoner, and he himself hurried out in the darkness of the night to arouse the other members of the senate.

The first two he aroused stealthily hastened to the other senators, and they all went to a chamber in St. Saviour's Convent, and sent for Bertrando, and in a body listened to the same story that he had told to Lioni.

Guards were sent out to the palace of the Doge, and also to St. Mark's.

At the hour when Faliero was expecting to hear the great bell ring out the signal for the execution of the fiendish plot, there came the sound of the tramping of feet, and before he could realize what had happened he was seized and held a prisoner. At the same time the chief confederates were seized by the guards and hurried to the Convent.

To add to the further complication they had been taken even while their weapons were in their hands.

A rack was also brought, and under its tortures their lips found utterance, and they told everything, then they were removed to cells, and shortly afterward an excited crowd of spectators saw their bodies swinging from a gibbet in the gallery of the palace overlooking the piazza.

Over four hundred of their conspirators were also discovered, but did not at once meet their just punishment.

Great and formal preparations were begun for the punishment of Faliero befitting his crime.

A council of ten was formed, by whom crimes against the state were tried, and these ten elected twenty of the signory who should sit with them in consultation. The court of thirty judges was called the Giunta.

At eventide Faliero was led into the hall of council and stood face to face with those whose wholesale massacre he had planned.

It was a pitiful but dramatic scene. Marino Faliero looked about him and saw many there whom, as his guests, he had greeted at the brilliant festivities of so short a time before at the palace. Lips that had smiled upon him there were now muttering imprecations upon him, and every eye looked upon him with the fires of hatred burning within them.

The scene would have moved some men to a softened emotion, brought thus face to face with those, who, had not his schemes been thwarted, would now have been in eternity; many men would have been overcome by the realization of stupendousness of the awful crime from which their hands had been stayed, but not so with Faliero.

In this supreme moment of his downfall and humiliation, and with the penalty of his attempted deed confronting him, he retained all his usual haughty demeanour, and all the fiery vindictiveness that had had possession of him, was now but redoubled, since all was lost to him. There was, perhaps, something sublime in his indifference to everything of this world. He had lost all; he had nothing more to lose, and what remained now was but the death-dealing vengeance of those to whom he would have dealt out the same.

The place of execution was chosen to be the Giants' Stairs, the place where succeeding Doges were invested with the robe and crown of state, midst all customary pomp. Besides this it was agreed that the place for Faliero's portrait in the council hall should be left vacant and veiled in black.

It was now midnight again. At daybreak he must die.

At that hour all Venice was abroad. Men sought for places round about the piazza at the grated bars because from there the topmost stair could be seen, and the topmost stair was the exact spot where, only a few brief months before, Marino Faliero had been crowned. It was now draped in black. The gates below the Giants' Stairs were closed.

In the centre of the top stair of the piazza rested the block and sword.

At the break of day the procession issued forth from the palace and approached the landing in the following order; the ten came first, the members of the senate and the forty; then walked a guard of soldiers, and after them Marino Faliero.

At his right was his confessor with the crucifix in his right hand; at the left hand of the Doge walked the headsman.

They reached the block, and the headsman swept the crown from the head of the fallen Doge, and the mantle of sovereignty from his shoulders.

As he did so then came the first solemn peal of St. Mark's bell that was to toll the knell of his death. As the great brazen tongue clanged a second time he cast himself on his knees and placed his head upon the block.

An instant later the gates were opened amidst the tumultuous shouts of the crowd and the blood of Marino Faliero's headless body drenched the stairs of the spot, where only a few short weeks before he stood vested in the robes of official dignity, amid the acclaim of the throngs and the cheers of the multitude, and where little children had cast their votive offerings of fragrant flowers upon the Giant' Stairs, his head came rolling downward toward the gates.

Luici Cenci.

Digitized by Google

BOOK III.—CONCERNING THE RULE OF KING OLERON.

CHAPTER III.

How the three Europeans built a villa residence, replete with many modern conveniences: and how they re-invented things they had been familiar with all their lives through.

It was the morning after King Oleron's feast, and our trio were engaged in making themselves a residence which accorded more with their European tastes. They had made up their minds that a stay on the island was inevitable, at any rate for an indefinite time, and perhaps for ever.

"There's worse places to lay one's bones in than Erma," the Irishman had observed, "although 'tisn't exactly anxious I am to spend the balance of me days here. There's hapes o' little things one'd like, an' can't get. But 'if yez can't be aisy,' so me father used to say when he was hidin' in the woods, 'be as aisy as yez can.' An' bein' me father's favourite son, that's what I intend to do. So, shipmates both, I propose we build us a house fit to live in, an' not a shanty like this one here, where the walls are only put up to help inthruders to get inside."

"This is an excellent framework to start upon," remarked Sneyd, pointing to their present abode. "With a little adding to, it will answer capitally."

The rustic house was situated in a narrow valley. The trees on the steep hill sides sheltered them. A merrily tinkling stream ran before their door. The place smiled with lovely tropical flowers. Yet Nature was the only landscape gardener who had touched it.

They all felt that it was impossible to conceive a fairer spot.

"Well, Sandy, lad!" exclaimed the Irishman, "yez haven't had yer say. There's something on yer mind."

"I was thinking," said Sandy slowly, "what would happen supposing these good people took offence at anything we did, and came down the valley and set upon us?"

"Why, it's kilt we should be! though perhaps a good handful of them 'ud get knocked on the head before we were settled an' done for. But 'don't go for to conjure up a black bogie when the sun's shinin',' as his honour the King remarked yesterday."

"I don't want to. But still there is no harm in looking at possibilities ahead. These aboriginal people are proverbially fickle. Now, do you see that ledge a couple of hundred yards up the hill-side yonder? I've had my eye on it for some time, and the day before yesterday went up to look at it. The rocks are steep below and unclimbable, but there's one path which leads to it at an easy slope. Once there, you'll find the ledge bigger than it looks from here. It's a hundred feet at least, and quite fifty yards long. At the back the rock rises up almost sheer. There are trees enough on the ledge for shelter, and a spring of good water spouts up amongst them. We should be cooler with our headquarters there, for what breeze there is we should be certain to catch; and, besides, we should be on healthier ground. These mists that rise in the valley at nights chill one to the bone, and cannot but be liable to do harm. They breed fevers and calentures, so I've read in Dr. Menteith's book, and once these diseases or agues get into the system, they're never thoroughly shaken out."

"We've been healthy enough so far," said O'Neill, "but it was bred in a bog I was myself, and so perhaps I'm hardened to mists an' moisture."

"An abode that would serve as a fort on occasion isn't to be despised," observed Sneyd thoughtfully. "Sandy's right. These islanders are friendly enough at present; but they might turn round on us. If that blear-eyed Ebry thought it to his advantage to do so, I've no doubt he's got influence enough to stir up a strong feeling in our disfavour."

"But," objected O'Neill, "it would look suspicious if we started building a fort. They're sharp enough. They'd twig it at once. And when they saw we distrusted 'em, why, they'd very likely give us reason for distrust."

"Who spoke of a regular fort, man?" laughed Sneyd. "Sandy didn't mean us to build a redoubt with a glacis, and embrasures to put guns in. We haven't any guns to mount in 'em, if we did build the fort. What he meant was that the ledge was strong by nature, and if the need came, we could block the one path which leads to it, and hold the place easily against a considerable force. Meanwhile the house will be an ordinary house to us and to all observers. It will be situated on high ground, which we believe, very sensibly, to be healthier than the low. And if we have a few hundred feet farther to walk into the rest of the village, well, that is our own look-out, and nobody else need grumble."

"'Sense triumphs over ignorance,' to quote his honour the King again," said the Irishman. "I suppose there's no paper to be signed for ground rint. We may as well go off and look at the demesne at once."

The "demesne," as O'Neill chose to term it, proved very much as Sandy had described. Natural fissures, which very little labour would make a neat path, zig-zagged up the face of the cliff, and the little plateau was barely five minutes walk from their present habitation. Half of the little level flat was one thick jungle of rich, rank, tropical vegetation, which, as Sneyd showed, might be easily cleared away to make room for taro, feeiis, or other crops. The rest of the ground was occupied by a banana clump, with the great leaves torn to tremulous ribbons by the constant breath of the trade-wind. The natural space, formed by half-a-dozen trees which had fallen in some storm and lay rotting on the ground in the middle of this little copse, offered a convenient site for the hut. The foliage overhead would form a cool shelter from the sun, and away down through an aisle of tree-trunks, they commanded a view of the low mangrove-fringed shore, the calm lagoon, the white breakers which ever thundered on the reef, and beyond, the restless waters of the deep blue Pacific Ocean.

Digitized by Google

But the trio did not waste time in admiring all the wealth of beauty around them. Opportunity enough for that hereafter. With sheath-knives they cut the lianes, which twined and intertwined everywhere, and with strong arms they lifted away the litter of those and of the prone, dead trees, piling the whole into an indiscriminate heap, and converting it into a smoking, self-destroying bonfire. It took a couple of days to get the ground cleared, for tropical vegetation grows apace, and the luxurious wealth of undergrowth was almost a solid mass. Then they set to work cutting bamboos on the lower ground, stripping off the delicate, green foliage, docking them to various lengths, and transporting them on to the plateau.

By a unanimous vote of the other two, Sandy had been chosen architect. There had been various discussions as to what form their house should take, and Sneyd and O'Neill had propounded several plans, all more or less unsuitable. But when each had had his say, Sandy produced a piece of bark, on the white inner surface of which was a rude sketch done in charcoal. It represented a house, modified somewhat from those of the islanders, but still on the native lines. There were two rooms in it, each fifteen feet square. There was an eight-foot-wide verandah round them, and the whole was covered by a high-pitched roof, thatched with leaves. Each room was to have a doorway, and two shuttered windows. The walls were to be high, and made of wattle, faced on the inside with broad leaves. And the space above the cross-rafters would serve as a store. One room would be amply large enough for three hammocks. The other room was for a day-dwelling. Or they could sit under the wide verandah.

The other two were enraptured with the plan. "Sandy, bhoy!" cried O'Neill, "av King Solomon could have got yez when he was putting up the pyramids, 'tis a dale handsomer an' usefuller he'd have made 'em when he was about it."

They set about building without hesitation, as soon as the poles were cut, and in a couple of days the framework of the dwelling was complete. The wattling of the walls with flexible lianes, the making of doors and window-shutters, and the thatching of the roof with broad banana leaves, was a far longer process. But by constant hard work in early mornings and cool evenings, with a rest during the midday heat, these matters were completed—bamboo floors were laid down, and the internal walls covered with a smooth layer of the great leaves, which improved both their appearance and utility.

The house was finished. A flowery creeper sprouting almost visibly, had twined itself round a verandah support, and covered a large patch of the roof. Everything was ready for a shift of quarters. So, burdening themselves with their one or two household utensils—the hammocks, a few calabashes, and a smouldering stick—they moved in forthwith, and settled themselves down for a prolonged residence.

They set about building without hesitation.

By daytime they worked at clearing the ground destined for their crops of its tangled growth of bush and scrub, a lengthy and tedious process; at tilling the soil as best they could with the rude instruments at their disposal; at getting hold of their daily food in one way and another, and preparing it as best they could. In evenings, when the moon's yellow rays or the silver starlight stole through the interlacing tree-tops, they busied themselves with making one thing and another—chairs, tables, and what not. The light was feeble, and, like blind men, they worked mostly by feel and touch. Their tools consisted of their sheath-knives alone. Their material was mostly bamboo, jointed, mortised, and pegged with laborious care.

O'Neill was the cleverest carpenter. Sailors can turn their hands to anything, from painting a figure-head to making elaborate mats for the cabin door. And where neatness was required he was well to the front, although Sandy was not far behind him. But Sneyd's more varied experience of household furniture led him to make useful suggestions and designs that the other two would never have thought of.

The ex-cornet's reading came back to him, moreover, and by dint of countless hard raps at the door of his memory, he was able to call to mind how certain things of ordinary everyday English use were made or procured.

Take pottery as an instance.

There was not such a thing as a piece of delf in the whole island of Erma; but clay existed; and Sneyd knew that delf was made out of clay. How these last two facts were connected he couldn't think at first, but the details of the process came back to him little by little, and having got his inspiration he proceeded to act on it. A bluff of stiff white clay existed in the valley; that he knew. So he set himself about designing a potter's wheel. The making of this with the primitive appliances at his command was beyond him; but Sandy and the Irishman caught up the idea, and produced a rude but effective apparatus such as he required.

Mytto was watching Mr. Sneyd at his toilette, and wondering over it.

Manipulating the clay was the next thing to be learnt, and this was not done in a day. But by dint of doggedly sticking to the task, vessels were at length produced, which, not exactly beautiful, were at least of useful shapes.

The next thing was to burn them; and many were the futile attempts before a suitable kiln was produced. But at last all obstacles were overcome, and the first bit of pottery ever made on Erma was produced. That it was misshapen, dirty-brick red, and porous, is true; but the makers viewed it with satisfaction, and the natives looked upon it with admiring awe.

"Av we'd only got a glim to light us while we shmoke our pipes," sighed O'Neill one evening when the sky was overcast, and the verandah was clothed in Stygian darkness.

"Are you sticking the pipe stem in your eye?" Sneyd asked him.

"Ah no, 'tisn't that. I can grope the way to me potatythrap aisy enough. But it's so lonesome sittin' like a litter of foxes in the dark. We'd be merrie by ten times wid an incho' candle to see one another spake wid."

"Have a fire lit," suggested Sandy.

"Too hot."

"Yes," said Sneyd thoughtfully; "I wish we could contrive a lamp of some sort. A torch would do at a pinch, a torch of resinous wood. But then there doesn't happen to be any resinous wood on the island so far as I've discovered. And there's no fat to be got hold of either, or we'd soon make some rushlights. No, I don't see how it is to be contrived. The islanders turn in soon after sundown, and don't need it, but I must confess to a sneaking love for sitting up after dark. At the present moment, now, I want to finish cutting out this spoon, and here I am at a dead lock for want of light to see what I'm doing."

There was silence for a minute or so, which Sandy broke by saying, "I've heard o cocoanut oil. Do either of you know how it's made?"

Neither of them did, so Sandy went on. "It must come either from the shell or the milk, or the white solid stuff; and of the three, the last seems most likely. But the question is how?"

"Boil it in water," suggested Sneyd.

"Squash it," said the Irishman.

"We might try both," said Sandy meditatively. "If the oil's there, either process ought to bring it out."

It was found impossible to conduct the decocting process on a large enough scale for practical use, and so squeezing was decided upon.

The first thing to be done was to make a press. This took some thought, but eventually one was made from cocoanut tree itself. A section of trunk some three feet long was cut out, and the pith extracted. One end of the hollow cylinder thus obtained was plugged securely, save for a small orifice intended as an exit for the oil, should any deign to appear. A piston of solid wood was fitted to the cylinder, and a stout tree some twenty feet long was rigged lever-fashion, so that it could exert great downward force on the upper end of the piston.

The cylinder was packed full of the white contents of old nuts, the piston placed into position, and pressure applied. The contents were compressed to a certain degree, and then weights were fastened to the end of the lever so that the enormous squeezing power would be continuous; after which the apparatus was left. This was at night. By next morning the experimenters were delighted by the sight of a quart of yellowish semi-solid oil—it looked very like butter—in their receptacle; and of a further supply oozing in drop by drop. In the evening it was tested as a luminant. A half cocoanut held a wick of wild cotton fastened to a supporter of delf, and drawing sustenance from oil below. It lighted certainly, and gave out a yellow, smoking flame. The result was not very brilliant, but it was a vast improvement on the era of utter darkness that had gone before it; and so it was prized accordingly.

This, too, was received by the natives with feelings in which astonishment was mingled with awe. The palm tree had been most things to them before—it was the source of more than half the articles they had in daily use—but, otherwise than by burning it bodily, they had never extracted illumination from it. And now that they saw how this could be done, they marvelled much, and revered the white man's genius more than ever.

CHAPTER IV.

How Erman sorcery failed to make water run uphill: how Murtagh O'Neill solved a simple problem in hydrostatics: how matrimony was suggested: and how a festival was interrupted by the ominous arrival of Dajian emissaries.

Mr. Laurence Sneyd was engaged in washing his hands. The dressing-room of his establishment was situate under the back of the verandah. There was a large basin with water laid on from the spring through bamboo pipes, which terminated in a bamboo stop-cock. There was a dressing-table, also of bamboo; and on it there were hair-brushes and tooth-brushes, made from fibrous palm stems, which had been slightly unravelled, and then served round with a fibre lashing, to prevent their unravelling further. Add three combs, fabricated from the inevitable bamboo, and you have the whole of the dressing-table.

Digitized by Google

Mytto was watching Mr. Sneyd at his toilette, and wondering over it. Mytto admired the white men intensely, and rendered sincerest flattery by imitating them in every way that lay in his power; and at present Mytto was wrapped up in awe by the sight of the water-supply. When he wanted to wash his date-coloured skin, he went down to the stream; or else he journeyed a little further, and indulged in a swim in the lagoon. He always went to the water, as his forbears had done before him. So this notion of making the water come to you appealed to him with great force. And the idea was so simple too—as, in good sooth, most valuable mechanical ideas are.

So Mytto took himself off, and busied himself during the next few days in cutting lengths of bamboo with an obsidian knife, and jointing them into a continuous pipe, whereof one end lay in a running stream and the other led to his own front door.

But, to Mytto's dismay, no gushing fountain of water answered his call. Everything was like the white man's. Bamboo tap and all were an exact copy of the original. The machine seemed perfect; the result alone was wanting.

Mytto had not been working on the quiet. The whole of the scattered village knew what he was about, and when the last length of piping was laid in place, there was a strong audience in attendance.

Mytto hailed to them when he made the last connection, and they one and all pressed eagerly forward, to see the first supply spout forth—as crowds will do for similarly unmomentous reason. But there was no gushing stream of cool, sparkling water; it didn't even trickle gently; in fact not a drop appeared.

The crowd looked disappointed, and turned to Mytto for an explanation. Mytto scratched his head perplexedly, gazed at his handiwork, but could not see wherein the fault lay. It was, as far as he could make out, an exact counterpart of the white men's on the Ledge higher up the valley. The problem was beyond his powers to solve.

Just then, as fortune would have it, another spectator joined himself to the outskirts of the crowd. He was one of Ebry's assistant sorcercers—the taller of the two.

Mytto saw him, and was imbued with a happy idea. He beckoned to the melancholy-looking knock-kneed man, who came to the front, nothing doubting. Mytto explained the situation, said the pipe-line was an exact counterpart of the original, and asked for a reason why it wouldn't act.

The assistant sorcerer pondered awhile, with his face hidden in a corner of his tappa robe, and then pronounced that the white men had uttered a spell over their tube, which had set it a-going.

"Then," said Mytto, "will you say a similar spell over mine?"

The assistant sorcerer felt himself somewhat cornered. "I know not the white men's spell," he observed.

The crowd, fickle as aboriginal crowds usually are, began to murmur. They were losing faith in their assistant sorcerer.

"Why," exclaimed Mytto in surprise, "if you do not know their spell, then are the white men more powerful than you?"

"Not so," replied the knock-kneed man, making what he considered a bold stroke. "But the white men's spells are different from ours."

"They must be more powerful," suggested Mytto.

"They are not so," repeated the assistant sorcerer, feeling that he must uphold his own branch of the profession.

"Then," said Mytto simply, "say that which will make the pipe-line carry water, and pour it out through the tap."

The assistant sorcerer might have anticipated so obvious a retort, but he was not prepared to meet it.

The whole profession of sorcery on Erma was at stake. Perhaps Ebry's master-mind could save it. If Ebry was not discredited, all might yet be well. So he said: "O Mytto! This is beyond my powers. The white man's spell belongs to a section to which my learning has not yet advanced. But Ebry knows all these matters. Let us send, therefore, for him. He who has so many marvels at his command will not be foiled by a trifle such as this."

So a running messenger was despatched, who presently returned with the chief sorcerer in his company.

Ebry heard the tale, and pronounced unhesitatingly that the tube was occupied by a water sprite, who was maliginantly blocking the way.

The crowd spoke its angry feelings against the spiteful water sprite, and asked their chief sorcerer to remove it.

He, wary man, had expected such a request, and was ready for it. He said, "The wicked imp is not of my creation. It is a white spirit, over which I have no jurisdiction. Even though I ravelled the tube to pieces, inch by inch, I should not find it. When it saw the pipe-line being destroyed, then it would know its mission was fulfilled, and would depart below to the place whence it came. For it is the familiar of the white men, set in the pipe by them as an invisible obstruction, because they are jealous lest the Ermans should learn all their mystic knowledge, and so become as clever as they."

A running messenger returned with the Chief Sorcerer in his company.

Digitized by Google

There was a buzz of approval through part of the crowd at this ingenious explanation, but a small section received it silently. Mytto was their spokesman. "The white men," he said, "have voluntarily taught us all their arts. They have shown us how to make pots, how to make an engine they call a 'plough,' which will till the ground far better than our hoe, and a hundred other things. Of their own free will they described to me the working of this water-pipe. Maybe our chief sorcerer, in his infinite wisdom, is right. But before we make a final decision, let us ask the white men themselves."

"Here comes he of the sun-like hair," exclaimed a woman on the outside of the crowd, who had a special admiration for O'Neill's fiery locks.

"Well, bhoys," said the Irishman, coming up, "an' what's in the wind? Is it a wake ye're holdin'? Av it is, it's meself will be proud to jine yez."

No one quite understood this address, but its drift was caught, and a dozen fingers pointed to the bamboo tubes, and a dozen voices shouted out for explanations.

O'Neill held up his hand. "Wan at a time," he said, "av' yez plaze. Here, Mytto, decent man, as this is your holdin' we're on, do you tell me what all the bobbery's about."

Mytto explained in as few words as possible. The Irishman grinned. "Mytto," he said, "'tis but an ignorant haythen y'are afther all. Have yez never grasped the fact that wather won't run up the side of a house, unless you've a squirt to help it? Why, man dear, yer tube's all ridge and furrow, and half of it falls the wrong way. There, I don't believe yez see what I mane now. Ach, but yez are an ignorant lot. Here, give me your mattock, or whatever you call it, an' I'll fix yer watherworks meself."

The good-natured Irishman took a native hoe and set to work. He wielded the clumsy instrument with vigorous arm, scattering stones, clods, earth in liberal profusion, and making the fall a regular and continuous one from the stream to Mytto's door. In an hour and a half he had done this, had thrown a slight dam across the rivulet, so as to improve the bend of water, and had butted all doubtful joints with clay; and then he came and turned the tap.

The crowd had been waiting meanwhile, chattering and expectant. Most of them had their minds evenly balanced between Ebry and the white men. Upon the result of O'Neill's tap-turning would depend their verdict.

The Irishman, with the instinctive wit of his nation, was more or less aware of this, but, confident that the pipe-line was now properly laid, he nipped the bamboo plug with finger and thumb, and gave it a sharp turn.

Water gushed out in a solid stream, turbid and muddy at first, but soon clearing down to a transparent crystal.

Scoffing, sneering faces turned round towards Ebry from all parts. But the chief sorcerer exhibited no outward discomposure. "The white man has exorcised his own devil," he said.

"The white man," retorted O'Neill, who had overheard the words, "the white man has used a little commonsense, which some other people don't appear to possess. He saw that half the pipes slanted uphill, and so just set himself to work to rectify the same, that's all. There's yer watherworks in full swing, Mytto, me bhoy, an' never a penny o' rate to pay for the workin' of it. I'll just take a dhrink to wish yez luck, an' av yez can dish it wid a little palm-wine, it's meself that'll be obliged to yez. Thanks—wheu! Here's more power to yer elbow, an' speedy release from the humbuggin's o' them misdirected sorcerer fellows."

Shortly after this discomfiture of the sorcerers, a message came from King Oleron that he was anxious for the three Europeans to pay him a visit. They did go to see his majesty occasionally, being treated at these times with great deference, as though they were visitors from a higher sphere. But as the Ledge was situated on the outskirts of a village some five miles distant by the coast-line from the royal headquarters, and as the King always received them with all the pomp and circumstance he could muster, they never attended court without a special invitation. They felt that if King Oleron had wanted them he would have fixed their residence near his own; and as he had not done this, but had left them in the village presided over by Maantee and Mytto, his son, they concluded that his majesty had reasons for his action, and respected them without endeavouring to find out what they were.

On this special occasion they patched up their already much-patched clothes with scraps of tappa, and, making themselves as tidy as their slender means permitted of, set out to the royal hamlet.

King Oleron had, it seems, commanded their audience more for the pleasures of conversation than for business matters. The old man had a keen eye for the welfare of his subjects. He had encouraged, nay, ordered, the imitation of all those articles of European use that the white men had manufactured for themselves. But he had intended this meeting as an intellectual treat for himself. He wanted to hear more about the histories of men and tribes in that great island whence a new sun rose every morning.

The sun was to King Oleron the greatest and most wonderful object in his universe. He venerated it almost to idolatry. And so he thought that the people who lived round the sun's birthplace ought to be exceptionally favoured.

It is a dangerous thing to be the first to point out the world's rotundity. Galileo found that out; and the Pope and his cardinals at Rome were better prepared—at any rate by education—to receive the news than was this potentate of Erma. So the white men, knowing that they would only be discredited if they broached such a theme, wisely held their tongues, and so tacitly admitted that the sun popped out of the ground before their front doors every morning, thereby doing nobody any harm, and leaving the Kings mind unshaken in its pretty innocent belief.

But they did gently draw away the rose-coloured spectacles of fable, which showed King Oleron Europe as an elysium where the millennium was already in full sway. They told him how the sword was always unsheathed in some corner or other; how the scabbard was often thrown away; and how wars were often as bitter as that old one between Erma and Daji. They assured him that food was not to be had for the asking. There were no banana trees, bread-fruit trees, orange trees, from which any one who hungered or thirsted might reach up his hand and be satisfied.

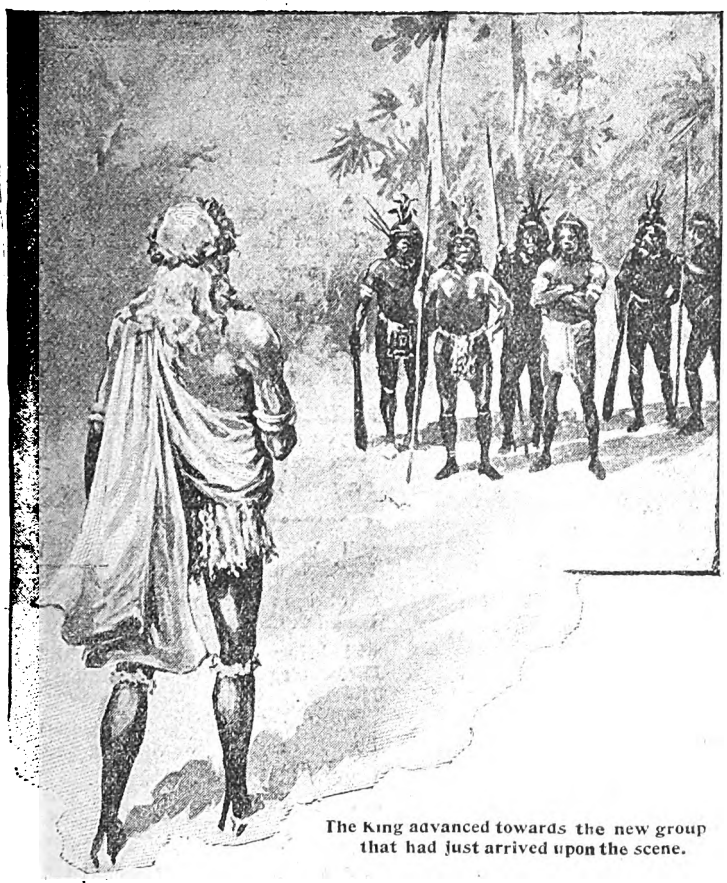
In fact, they showed him that on the whole he had little cause to be dissatisfied with his own lot, or with that of his people. The little state of Erma was not perfect—no state ever will be this side heaven—but from what they had seen there were, they assured him, few places which offered the chance of so idyllic an existence.

King Oleron was pleased at this great compliment his guests had seen fit to pay him, and said so with courtly phrase. He had somewhat naturally feared that they would be dissatisfied with their surroundings. It gave him great joy to know that they were happy and contented with their lot.

"Erma will be your home now, for always; for many long, peaceful years, I trust, after my old bones have been laid beside my father's. You have no wish to leave us. You will marry and settle down. Look around you. There are in the villages many maidens, comely and amply dowered; you have but to make your choice. Any one of them would be overjoyed to cast in her lot with one of you, and become a faithful, loving wife; and parents would be only too glad to surrender a daughter to such a husband."

"Begob!" exclaimed O'Neill, "a bhoy might do worse,

Digitized by Google



The King advanced towards the new group that had just arrived upon the scene.

yer honour. It s mighty sorry we was for ourselves when first we landed. But, bating that blear-eyed son of a snake, Ebry, who wanted to ate us at first, an' 'ud like to still, I daresay, for that matter, there isn't a soul in the place we don't get on wid. All the men have a pleasant 'morrow to yez,' an' all the maids an' matrons a smile when we meet. We've plenty to ate, an' lie soft o' nights. As to marryin' one o' them olive-skinned beauties, well, I had thought of it before; but, now yer honour puts the idea afresh into me skull, 'tisn't a bit unplasin'. There's Mytto's second sister —Norah, I call her; the name's a bit like that, and she favours another Norah I once knew in County Fermanagh —Norah might say, 'Yes, Murtagh, dear,' av I axed her; an' she'll bring nigh on a score yards o' good dyed tappa to the man she weds. So, yer honour, av it's convenient to all parties, I'll go to church wid Norah any day."

The Irishman's matrimonial aspirations had been known to his two comrades for some time. The girl had been in love with him ever since he was brought ashore; that was evident to everyone. And he was extremely fond of her. She was a bit of a beauty in her way—regular features, with large brown eyes and heavy lashes, and a complexion not darker than many a belle of Seville or Granada; limbed like a statue, and adorned with such a wealth of thick, wavy black hair, that, when loosened, it fell below her knees. And, if birth counts as anything in such a community, she was daughter to a village chief, whose authority was second only to King Oleron's. O'Neill had drawn down upon himself a large supply of chaff on account of this attachment; but he took it good-naturedly enough, and pursued his attentions all the same.

King Oleron nodded approvingly at what the Irishman said, and then asked if neither of his companions had wishes in the same direction.

Sneyd laughed and said he admired a good many of his majesty's spinster subjects, but as yet he had no very special preference for one above another. And Sandy Carmichael blushed through his brown skin, and said that he also had not thought of marrying—just yet.

At which his majesty was pleased to make a facetious reply, and a stream of lively talk ensued that was light, frivolous, and enjoyable in the extreme.

King Oleron had arranged a dance for his guests' enjoyment, and presently they moved off to the glade where the feast had been held on their first introduction to the Erman court. Here, in the midst of a crowd of expectant natives, the dancers, some five-and-twenty young girls, were standing in a picturesque group. The arrival of the King was the signal to commence. Accompanied only by the sweet sounds of their own voices, they started a slow, rhythmical measure that was very different to anything either of the Europeans had ever seen before. The three of them looked on entranced. Every gesture of the supple-jointed dancers was studied, yet modest and graceful. The maidens passed and repassed before them, their nimble feet moving noiselessly over the short, soft turf, and their lithe comely forms and arms swaying in perfect unison to the music. It was a lovely sight. Each girl's head was decked with a chaplet of beautiful flowers. Each wore necklaces and bangles of brilliant shells. Each swept her tappa robes with grace unsurpassable.

Admiration was plainly stamped on the face of each of our trio. Even Sandy's grim young countenance relaxed into a look of decided approval. They knew the Ermans were fond of the dance, but they were unprepared for such a wonderful display as this.

"Beauty of form and beauty of movement speak in a universal tongue," remarked the King sententiously.

"Begob, his honour's right!" exclaimed O'Neill, "An' it's meself that doesn't wonder at a Turk takin' a dozen wives, av he's trated to sights half as foine as this."

"You polygamous rascal," said Sneyd, with a grin; "and is this the way you show your constancy to the lovely Norah?"

"Arrah, get out wid yez," responded the Irishman. "I said a Turk might be carried away by his feelin's. An' is it a dacent Fermanagh bhoy yez would compare to a haythen Mussulman, that ates no pork an' dhrinks no whiskey? It's meself that'll stick to me Norah like tar to a pair o' new canvas breeches. But there's no harm in looking at another pretty girl betwixt an' between whiles is there?"

"Not being an engaged man myself, I couldn't say," replied Sneyd. "You'd better ask Norah for her opinion. She'll give it you freely enough."

"Faith," said O'Neill, with a merry twinkle in his eyes, "I've no doubt about the same. But, sakes alive, what's the matter?"

The dance had stopped on the instant. The dancers had fled like so many scared deer, and were seeking shelter behind their friends and relatives. The pleased looks had vanished from the islanders' faces. Every countenance showed fear, anger, hatred, or all three combined. The change had taken place as if by magic, and the three Europeans, unable to account for it, looked at one another in hopeless bewilderment. They turned round to ask the King what was the cause of this sudden commotion, but found that his majesty had risen to his feet, and was moving away from them. He was advancing towards a new group that had just arrived upon the scene. There was Ebry and his two assistants, and with them four strangers, truculent-looking ruffians, with feathers in their hair, the white stain of sea-salt upon their naked bodies, and club and lances in their hands.

Digitized by Google

The word "Daji" was murmured by voices behind them, and the Europeans knew what was the strangers' errand.

King Oleron came back to them, his face sad, but under command. In the old war, the Ermans had been forced to purchase peace by promising a yearly tribute of boys and maidens to their cannibal conquerors.

"I must ask you to go back to your dwelling. This is our black day which comes to us yearly. Fate, who walks amongst all men blindfold, has made it arrive on a festival. No," he continued, seeing that Sneyd and O'Neill were going to speak, and judging from their gestures the tenour of their remarks, "No, we cannot avoid the tribute. We are powerless. It must be paid. Go quietly, or they may make still further demands."

The King took his leave.

"The last is a hint that these new-comers may want to take us back with them," said Sandy. "Ebry was suggesting it, I'm certain. I saw him point this way, drawing their attention to us."

"Then," said Sneyd, "as we can't do any good, and as our own skins are in danger, we'd better be off. But it is a dark look out for somebody."

"It will be a dark look-out for one of those blayguards if I man-handle him," remarked O'Neill, turning back, with clenched fists and furrowed brow.

"We might knock them on the head," replied Sneyd, "and do it easily. But where's the good? We'd have the whole island of Daji down about our ears within the week, and what would happen then? The old scenes of horror would be acted over afresh."

"I've me doubts about that," said the Irishman. "But still we may as well foot it back to the Ledge now. Maybe the night, an' a pipe or two o' 'bacca, will rub up our brains a bit; an' who knows but what by to-morrow we mayn't have got some plan for circumventing the man-ating divils?"

So back the three of them trudged to the Ledge, very sick and sorrowful in heart at the thoughts of the awful trouble that had overtaken their kindly friends and neighbours.

(To be continued.)

Its Value.—"Is your picture in the Academy a success?"

"That's what I am wondering. Someone said it was worth the price of admission."

"Somebody has just invented a noiseless cannon."

"That's just the way with science—always giving help where it isn't needed. Why don't some of those cranks invent a noiseless alarm clock?"

A lady desiring to make the most of her choice tap of table beer, the merits of which her servants had discovered, for it disappeared rapidly, thus addressed her butler:

"Daly, what do you think would be the best thing to do in order to save this beer as much as possible?"

"Well, ma'am," replied the butler, "I don't think you could do better than to place a barrel of good strong ale close by the side of it."

SOME SALIENT POINTS YOU SHOULD BEAR IN MIND.

If you don't want 100 Books you may have 50.

If you don't want certain among the 100 mentioned, you may select from an extra list.

If you don't want to pay £7 or £3 15s. cash down for the 100 or 50, you may pay £7 10s. or £4 by instalments.

If you don't want the Books bound in red cloth, you may get them bound in half morocco for a few shillings extra.

If you don't want to pay carriage on the Books we will do so to any part of the United Kingdom.

If you don't want the Books at all after our offering you all these tremendous advantages, you may take it that you are ignoring a good thing.

Ten Shillings will bring along 100 Splendid Books bound in Cloth.

Ten Shillings will bring along 50 Splendid Books bound in Cloth.

Ten Shillings will bring along 100 Splendid Books elegantly bound in Half-Morocco.

Ten Shillings will bring along 50 Splendid Books bound in Half-Morocco.

ACCORDING TO YOUR INSTRUCTIONS.

The Chance of a Lifetime.
For a Limited Period only.

A Library in Itself.
An Embellishment to any Home.

THE BOOKS ARE SENT YOU AS SOON AS POSSIBLE AFTER WE RECEIVE YOUR ORDER.

A post-card addressed to the "BEST BOOKS DEPARTMENT," PEARSON'S BUILDINGS, Henrietta Street, London, W.C., will bring along a complet list, and the necessary forms to fill up. The list you will find interesting and useful anyway, and you are under no obligation to purchase the books if you don't care to.

A LIFE'S WORK.

How Can It Be More Pleasantly and Profitably Passed?

This is the title of a new series of capital articles starting in PEARSON'S WEEKLY published on January 28th.

The idea is to assist parents to select a career for their children, and each week an article will appear dealing with one subject. This week treats of a clerkship in the Civil Service.

These articles are of intense interest, not only to parents who are anxious to know what to do with their children, but to those who even at the present time occupy situations and are anxious to improve their positions.

P.W. is published every Saturday and costs a penny.

Digitized by Google

The Battle of Tooting.

THERE is a general impression that the real estate business in London and its suburbs is painfully dull. In fact, it is said that there are houses almost without number for which no tenants can be procured, even though our leading novelists and poets are employed to write the advertisements, setting forth the beauties and conveniences of which the fortunate tenant will become possessed.

To own but one house which brings in no return for its costs, but upon which taxes must be paid and repairs be made, is a severe strain upon the finances of any man; but the man who owns three or four houses is thereby reduced to abject beggary. Such are the remarks which are daily made concerning the real estate business, and yet it was the impression one day last June, among the inhabitants of Middle Tooting, that a sudden and spirited revival in the real estate had taken place.

About a month ago a real estate agent, whose name is suppressed in order to give him time to reach the sheltering shores of Spain, undertook to obtain a tenant for a house situated in Middle Tooting. To his surprise he was one day called upon by a man who actually wanted the house, and was willing to pay as much rent as would be equivalent to nearly two-thirds of the taxes of the place. The happy agent promptly landed his prey by making him sign the lease, and told him that the house would be ready for him on the 24th of June.

Five days later another man appeared, and expressed a strong desire to rent the house in Middle Tooting for a term of three years, and to make his own repairs. Probably the agent had no intention at the time of indulging in illegal practices, but it was such a novelty to have two persons applying for the same house that he refrained from mentioning to the second man that the place was let, and permitted him to think that it was still in the market.

When the new applicant asked what the rent would be the agent named a price much larger than the price he had previously asked, and remarked that a year's rent must be paid in advance. Doubtless the agent thought that this unusual demand would render it unnecessary for him to undeceive the customer, but the latter unhesitatingly agreed to all the agent's terms, and promising to call the next day and sign the lease, went his way.

Before he fell asleep that night the agent had decided that he would let the house for the second time, pocket the year's rent, and visit Madrid and Grenada, places which he had long desired to see.

It was a wicked resolution, but the agent was a wicked man, and it must be remembered that there are few house agents whose brains would not reel at finding two successive tenants in two days, one of whom was willing to pay a years's rent in advance.

When the second applicant appeared the next day at the agent's office he found a lease waiting for him, bearing a signature which he supposed was that of the owner of the desired house. He paid his advance rent, pocketed the lease, and promised to move into the house on the 24th of June. After he had left the office the agent closed his shutters, locked his door, and disappeared, and by this time is probably on his way to a refuge where no extradition treaty can reach him.

It was about noon on the 25th of June (the 24th having fallen on a Sunday) that two large vans loaded with furniture, and escorted by two cabs, each containing a separate family, drew up at the door of the Middle Tooting house. The two families were those of the two tenants, and the two vans contained the first instalments of their respective household goods.

Mr. Smith, the earliest tenant, was an irascible man, and he lost no time in demanding to know what Mr. Brown, the other tenant, wanted. Mr. Brown sarcastically replied that what he wanted was his house, and what he did not want was any "cheek" on the part of Mr. Smith.

In a short time the conversation between the two became lively. Each shook his lease in the face of the other, and denounced him as a combined swindler and burglar. Meanwhile the cartmen wished to know what they were to do with the furniture, and the inhabitants of Middle Tooting, delighted to find that a free entertainment was in progress, turned out in great force, and filled the street for some distance above and below the contested house.

Foreseeing that argument would neither mend or end the matter, Mr. Smith finally ordered his cartmen to carry his furniture into the house. Mr. Brown instantly issued a similar order as to his furniture, and both enlisted strong contingents of the Middle Tootingers to assist in the operation.

Each tenant felt the importance of occupying the house in advance of his rival and the two heavy vans were unloaded with unprecedented speed. Mr. Smith's gang stormed the front drawing-room with the piano, upsetting the Brown piano on the front steps. The Brown party threw a cloud of skirmishers, armed with chairs, bedsteads, and crockery, into the bedrooms on the first floor, locking the door of each room as fast as it was filled.

Their rivals, however reached the third storey by way of the back windows, and with the help of storming ladders in advance of the Brown forces, and also occupied the cellar with a heavy column of books and rolls of carpeting. The dining-room was the scene of a severe contest, but Mr. Smith hurled iron pots through the windows, and, having thus demoralised the enemy, charged at the head of his forces with pokers and coal-scuttles, sweeping the foe before him in triumph.

The doors of the dining-room were then strongly barricaded with stoves and mattresses, and garrisoned with six dozen bottles of stout. Of course these successes were not gained without heavy losses, and there was scarcely any article of furniture which was not wounded. One of Mr. Brown's cartmen had three ribs broken at the moment of the defeat of the Brown piano, and two Middle Tootingers of the party of Mr. Smith emerged from the dining-room battle with their clothing in rags, and their eyes in the deepest mourning.

When hostilities were suspended, owing to the exhaustion of the stock of furniture, the position of the rival tenants was as follows. Mr. Smith occupied the cellar, the front and back drawing-rooms, the dining-room, and the third storey. Mr. Brown occupied the whole of the second storey, and held, with the remains of his piano, the front yard. There is no doubt that, on the whole, the advantage lay with Mr. Smith, but Mr. Brown and his entire family slept on the field of battle, or, to be precise, in the second-storey bedrooms, while Mr. Smith, owing to the loss of his entire stock of toilet crockery, retreated to a neighbouring hotel for the night.

Digitized by Google

It was the intention of both combatants to send for fresh supplies of furniture early the next morning, and to resume the battle until one or the other should be completely defeated, and ready to surrender at discretion. Mr. Smith was, moreover, resolved to lay in a supply of cases of paraffin oil, with a view of accidentally breaking them on all the more valuable pieces of Mr. Brown's furniture.

The next day, when he arose from his sleep, he was in a less combative and more reasonable frame of mind and decided to hire a lawyer, and leave with the latter the responsibility of conducting future hostilities. The same idea occurred almost simultaneously to Mr. Brown, and accordingly the Middle Tootingers who assembled to witness the resumption of the battle were disappointed to find that lawyers' clerks, bristling with writs of injunction and writs of dispossession, were encamped on the front steps of the house, waiting to serve their papers on Messrs. Smith and Brown.

When the various and intricate law suits which have already begun between Mr. Smith and Mr. Brown will be ended it is impossible to say. In the meantime each party is forbidden to occupy the house or to place any more furniture in it.

The people of Middle Tooting are firmly convinced that there has been a great revival in the real estate business, and householders are forming an association for the purpose of offering the absconding real estate agent a large reward if he will return and undertake to let their houses for them. The memory of the last 25th of June will long remain in Middle Tooting, and the inhabitants, while they are divided into a Brown party and a Smith party, will never cease to be united in admiration of the skill and business capacity of the vanished house agent.

Wm. Lang.

THE CAVALRY OFFICER AND HIS UNKNOWN LOVER.

The period of Napoleon's career when at its zenith is full of romantic adventures as connected with the history of the officers' lives that served under the great captain. He was quick to observe merit, and prompt to reward it, and this it was that made his followers so devoted to him, and so anxious to distinguish themselves by prowess in battle, and strict soldierly conduct in the Emperor's service.

Colonel Eugene Merville was an attaché of Napoleon's staff. He was a soldier in the true sense of the word—devoted to his profession, and brave as a lion.

Though very handsome and of a fine bearing, he was of humble birth—a mere child of the camp, and had followed the drum and bugle from boyhood.

Every step in the line of promotion had been won by the stroke of his sabre, and his last promotion from major of cavalry was for a gallant deed which transpired on the battlefield beneath the Emperor's own eye.

Murat, that prince of cavalry officers, loved him like a brother, and taught him all that his own good taste and natural instinct had not led him to acquire before.

It was the carnival season in Paris, and young Merville found himself at the masked ball in the French Opera House. Better adapted in his taste to the field than the boudoir, he flirts but little with the gay figures that cover the floor, and joins but seldom in the giddy waltz.

But at last, while standing thoughtfully and regarding the assembled throng with a vacant eye, his attention was suddenly aroused by the appearance of a person in a white satin domino, the universal elegance of whose figure, manner, and bearing convinced all that her face and mind must be equal to her person in grace and loveliness.

Though in so mixed an assembly, still there was a dignity and reserve in the manner of the white domino that rather repulsed the idea of a familiar address, and it was some time before the young soldier found courage to speak to her.

Some alarm being given, there was a violent rush of the throng towards the door, where unless assisted, the lady would have materially suffered. Eugene Merville offers his arm, and with his broad shoulders and stout frame wards off the danger. It was a delightful moment; the lady spoke the purest French, was witty, fanciful, and captivating.

"Ah! lady, pray raise that mask and reveal to me the charms of feature that must accompany so sweet a voice and so graceful a form as you possess."

"You would perhaps be disappointed."

"No, I am sure not."

"Are you so very confident?"

"Yes. I feel that you are beautiful. It cannot be otherwise."

"Don't be too sure of that," said the domino. "Have you never heard of the Irish poet Moore's story of the veiled prophet of Khora san—how, when he disclosed his countenance, its hideous aspect killed his beloved one? How do you know that I shall not turn out a veiled prophet of Khorassan?"

"Ah, lady! your every word convinces me to the contrary," replied the enraptured soldier, whose heart began to feel as it had never felt before; he was already in love.

She eludes his efforts at discovery, but permits him to hand her to her carriage, which drives off in the darkness, and though he throws himself upon his fleetest horse he is unable to overtake her.

* * * * *

The young French colonel becomes moody; he has lost his heart, and knows not what to do. He wanders hither and thither, shuns his former places of amusement, avoids his military companions, and, in short, is as miserable as a lover can well be, thus disappointed.

One night, just after he had left his hotel, on foot, a figure muffled to the very ears stopped him.

"Well, monsieur, what would you with me?" asked the soldier.

Digitized by Google

"You would know the name of the white domino?" was the reply.

"I would indeed!" replied the officer, hastily. "How can it be done?"

"Follow me."

"To the end of the earth if it will bring me to her."

"But you must be blindfolded."

"Very well."

"Step into this vehicle."

"I am at your command."

And away rattled the young soldier and his strange companion.

"This may be a trick," reasoned Eugene Merville; "but I have no fear of personal violence. I am armed with this trusty sabre, and can take care of myself."

He soon found the vehicle stopped, and he was led blindfolded into a house.

When the bandage was removed from his eyes he found himself in a richly-furnished boudoir, and before him stood the domino just as he had met her at the masked ball. To fall upon his knees and tell her how much he had thought of her since their separation, that his thoughts had never left her, that he loved her devotedly, was as natural as to breathe—and he did so most gallantly and sincerely.

"Shall I believe all you say?"

"Lady, let me prove it by any test you may put upon me."

"Know, then, that the feelings you avow are mutual. Nay, I have something more to say."

"Talk on for ever, lady! Your voice is music to my heart and ears."

"Would you marry me, knowing no more of me than you do now?"

"Yes, if you were to go to the very altar masked!" he replied.

"Then I will test you."

"How, lady?"

"For one year be faithful to the love you have professed and I will be yours—as truly as Heaven shall spare my life."

"Oh, cruel, cruel suspense!"

"You demur?"

"Nay, lady, I shall fulfil your injunctions as I promised."

"If at the expiration of a year you do not hear from me then the contract shall be null and void. Take this half ring," she continued, "and when I supply the broken portion I will be yours."

He kissed the little emblem, swore again and again to be faithful, and pressing her hand to his lips, bade her adieu. He was conducted away again as mysteriously as he had been brought thither, nor could he by any possible means discover where he had been, his companion rejecting all bribes, and even refusing to answer the simplest question.

* * * * *

Months roll on. Colonel Merville is true to his vow, and happy in the anticipation of love.

Suddenly he was ordered on an Embassy to Vienna, that gayest of all European capitals, about the time that Napoleon is planning to marry the Archduchess Maria Louisa.

The young colonel is handsome, manly, and already distinguished in arms, and becomes at once a great favourite at Court, every effort being made by the women to captivate him, but in vain; he is constant and true to his vow.

But his heart was not made of stone; the very fact that he had entertained such tender feeling for the white domino had doubtless made him more susceptible than before.

At last he met the young Baroness Caroline Waldorff, and in spite of his vows he loves her; he secretly reviles the engagement he had so blindly made at Paris.

She seems to wonder at what she believes to be his devotion, and yet the distance that he maintains. The truth was that his sense of honour was so great that, though he felt he really loved the young baroness, and even that she returned his affection, still he had given his word, and it was sacred.

The satin domino is no longer the ideal of his heart, but assumes the most repulsive form in his imagination, and becomes, in place of his good angel, his evil genius.

Well, time rolls on; he is to return in a few days; it is once more the carnival season, and in Vienna, too, that gay city.

He joins in the festivities of the masked ball, and what wonder fills his brain when about the middle of the evening the white domino steals before him in the same white satin dress he had seen her wear a year before at the French Opera House in Paris.

Was it a fancy?

"I come, Colonel Eugene Merville, to hold you to your promise," she said, laying a hand lightly upon his arm.

"Is this a reality or a dream?" asked the amazed soldier.

"Come, follow me, and you shall see that it is reality," continued the mask pleasantly.

"I will."

"Have you been faithful to your promise?" asked the domino, as they retired into a neighbouring saloon.

"Most truly in act, but alas! I fear, not in heart!"

"Indeed!"

"It is too true, lady, that I have seen and loved another, though my vow to you has kept me from saying so to her."

"And who is this that you thus love?"

"I will be frank with you, and you will keep my secret?"

"Most religiously."

"It is the Baroness von Waldorf," he said, with a sigh.

"And you really love her?"

"Alas, only too dearly," said the soldier sadly.

"Nevertheless, I must hold you to your promise. Here is the other half of the ring; can you produce its mate?"

"Here it is," said Eugene Merville.

"Then I, too, keep my promise!" said the domino, raising her mask, and showing to his astonished view the face of the Baroness von Waldorff!

"Ah, it was the sympathy of true love that attracted me after all," exclaimed the young soldier.

She had seen and loved him for his manly spirit and character, and having found by inquiry that he was worthy of her love, she had managed this delicate intrigue, and had tested him, and now gave to him her wealth, title, and everything!

They were married with great pomp, and accompanied the Archduchess to Paris.

Napoleon, to crown the happiness of his favourite, made Colonel Eugene Merville at once General of Division.

Digitized by Google

Ewart Irwin.

The - Final - War.

BY LOUIS TRACY.

CHAPTER LII. (continued).

PARIS TAKEN.

THESE things became known in the Chamber of Deputies, which, with the Senate, was in perpetual session, and Ministers quailed before the furious interpolations hurled at them from all quarters, without order or decorum, or semblance of debate.

At last M. Bourgeois managed to gain a hearing. He had the courage of his convictions, and uttered that which was in all men's hearts, but which none had hitherto dared to speak.

"M. le Président," he cried in ringing tones, "France has been led into abysmal depths of folly by the incapacity and wilful arrogance of her self-styled rulers. This is a war of individuls, not of nations. These soldiers thundering at our gates are the avengers of a crime; our citizens, who are being shot down in the streets by their own brothers, are the sad victims of a ministerial blunder. Shall no one save France? Is my life to be taken as a traitor because I proclaim these awful truths? Be it so, I will die cheerfully if thereby my voice shall prevail in the cause of my oppressed and distracted country!"

A fierce outburst of denunciation drowned his speech, but he stood coldly impassive through it all, and it was a highly significant fact that when a member of the Extreme Left rose and moved the adjournment of the Chamber until 9 p.m.—it being then six o'clock—there was hardly a dissentient.

The representatives of the people wished to take counsel with each other before they committed themselves in open debate.

When the House re-assembled, it was noted that neither M. Bourgeois nor M. Hanotaux were present, which was odd, for between such antagonists rapprochement was surely impossible? It was even rumoured that they had met to fight a duel forthwith, but reasonable men scouted the suggestion.

Meanwhile some comfort was taken from the sensible appeal made by a subordinate Minister. He asked members to give their support to the Government, at least, until the morrow. The Chamber would not adjourn throughout the night, and half hourly bulletins of a thoroughly authentic nature would be issued.

All knew what this statement signified. An attack was expected that night. If it was successfully repelled the Government would still strive to grapple with the situation. If not—ah, who could say what would happen?

General Saussier was more energetic than ever.

He felt sure that the Porte de Versailles would be the ultimate objective of the British advance, and he placed the district between the Fort d'Issy and Vanvres in such a complete state of defence that even under the demoniac conditions of the previous night's fighting, anything like a sustained assault would be out of the question. Still uninformed as to the exact nature of the weapon used by the English—which, as Lord Roberts surmised, was discussed with bated breath by every human being in Paris—he realised its properties sufficiently to endeavour to minimise it by preparing huge bonfires at every available point, and these were to be lighted at the first sign of an attack in force.

When, therefore, two divisions of the British Army came in touch with the French outposts a little before midnight some very desperate and determined fighting took place without any definite result being achieved.

The Chamber of Deputies were cheered by the report that their soldiers were holding the position with splendid effect, and Lord Roberts was almost unmanned by the knowledge that his brave troops were suffering so grievously with no apparent hope of success.

Their mission was to spend themselves and be spent in the hopeless task of striving to carry an impregnable position, but they were in reality contributing as fully towards the ultimate victory as were the gallant comrades whose happier lot it was to first surmount the inner line of the fortifications.

For Alleyne's and Massy's Special Service Corps were now marching swiftly towards the real point of the attack, through the suburb of Montrouge, with its triple roads to Paris by the Portes de Chatillon, d'Orléans, and de Montrouge.

News of their progress reached General Saussier at his station in the Rue de Vaugirard shortly before one o'clock.

Three small forts en route had been captured with the same exasperating ease that had accompanied the attack on their mighty neighbours twenty-four hours earlier.

Quick to scent the new danger, the French Commander-in-Chief galloped along the Boulevard Lefévre and Boulevard Brune, followed by his staff. Collecting all the available troops in the locality, and ordering two divisions which were bivouacked in the Parc Montsouris to come up at the double, he flung open the three gates and poured thousands of men into the congeries of houses and gardens that make up this well-known suburb.

In so doing he unwittingly created the very conditions desired by his adversaries.

The astounding effects of the electric rifle, to call it by its common but inaccurate title, were soon demonstrated when a hand to hand struggle commenced.

At Vanvres and Issy, where the combatants were equal in arms and valour, the loss was heavy on both sides; and, if anything, the French had the better of the fray owing to the strength of their position.

But in Montrouge the odds were entirely in favour of the British. Strive to picture what it means in a battle when every shot fired on one side cannot fail to maim or kill an opponent. There was no opportunity for faulty marksmanship. The Englishmen were now so wholly imbued with belief in their invincible weapon that they were as cool and methodical in action as though they were going through the manual and firing exercise on a barrack square. There was no hurry or confusion, or indiscriminate firing. The more nervous their foes the more rapidly they fell. Line after line of determined assailants withered before the all-devouring rays of piercing light. Men were mortally struck, they knew not how or whence. They strove madly to burst through the deadly zone of death that environed them, but a planet might as well seek to depart from its predestined path through space.

Hours afterwards, the majority of the attacking force found that their hands were badly blistered with the heat of the rifle barrels, but of this they knew nothing during the stress of the fight.

Digitized by Google

General Saussier, impetuously urging on his men to stem the steady progress of the British, was unconsciously giving effect to the views expressed by Lord Roberts in the case room of the Fort de Buc. He was now convinced that the sustained conflict at Vanvres was but a feint, and that the real attack was being delivered here.

But he also realised that the end had come, so he spurred onward his powerful charger, whilst he shrilly vociferated: "En avant, mes enfants, en avant." Better to die in front of the walls of Paris than live to see his beloved city again occupied by the foe.

The momentary glare of a French volley revealed his gigantic frame to the eyes of an officer of the 42nd, who was directing the fire of his men.

"Shoot the horse!" he shouted in the ear of a brawny Scot, who was about to cover the general's colossal frame. The order came just in time. A second later the powerful animal which carried the Governor of Paris jumped into the air, with a bullet in his brain, and crashed to the earth with his unwieldy rider.

It was sufficient. When General Saussier regained his breath and his senses two hours later, he was able to sample some Scotch whisky, and take an intelligent interest in the mechanism of the new rifle, which was explained to him by an old acquaintance, Major Harington, ex-junior military attaché at the British Embassy.

—— and crashed to the earth with his unwieldy rider.

Within a few minutes after the fall of the French Commander-in-Chief, the Colonels of the 42nd Highlanders, the Royal Fusiliers, and the 18th Royal Irish, which regiments respectively led the three avenues of approach to the walls, perceived that the psychological moment for a resolute advance had arrived.

Unable to communicate with or see each other, they were individually led at the same time to form this conclusion by the obvious demoralisation of the troops to which they were opposed.

For, truth to tell, the incident of Rouen had repeated itself.

The best soldiers in the world are the most difficult to control when reason and discipline alike fail to hold men to their duty.

Stupefied, frantic, demoralised by the supernatural method of the British attack, the battalions which General Saussier had hurried into Montrouge were now rushing back into the city by the three gates through which they made their exit. When the guards made an effort to raise the drawbridges and barricade the double entrance to each gate, they were ruthlessly cut down by the infuriated masses of men who saw their only avenue of escape from death thus threatened.

Heedless now of the flying enemy, the three British regiments raced along the chaussées to find their progress practically unhindered, and each set up a wild yell of triumph as they found themselves within the walls.

Which of the three was the first to enter Paris is a question that cannot be determined here. It formed a fruitful subject for discussion at mess dinners for decades. In the canteens of Aldershot and the Curragh it led to many a darkened optic and damaged nose. The newspapers of the respective countries vehemently declared that national prejudice alone prevented the others from admitting the just claims of England, Scotland, or Ireland, as the case might be, to the distinguished honour of having first gained the interior of the city.

Even Lord Roberts shied at a definite decision.

"The leading regiments of General Massy's division," ran the words of his famous dispatch, "entered Paris simultaneously, so far as can be learned, about 1.25 a.m."

This nice point did not trouble the Chamber of Deputies when the news came by telephone, from the Station de Montrouge, that the Porte d'Orléans ("a tremendous argument in our favour," said the Fusiliers afterwards) had been forced, and that British troops (undoubtedly a mixed force of Highlanders and Irishmen) were even then advancing along the Avenue du Maine.

But a check was now experienced.

Lord Roberts had laid his plans entirely upon the presumption that the assault would be effective. What would happen were it otherwise, he never asked himself, for that way madness lay.

When Major Harington taxed the splendid powers of his hunter to the utmost in the delirious race back to the spot where he knew he should find the Commander-in-Chief, the latter was even then superintending the advance of the relief divisions.

He kept on pouring brigade after brigade into Paris, and sent Harington back as quickly as he had come to ascertain if the flanking movement towards the Porte de Versailles had been efficiently carried out, whilst other aides were dispatched with imperative orders to Generals Massy and Alleyne to entrench themselves in the streets between the Boulevard d'Italie and the Rue de Vanvres.

So implicitly did Lord Roberts trust his lieutenants, and so important did he deem the work of expediting the march of the reserves, that it was not until 3 a.m. that he personally entered the city by the Porte de Montrouge.

Stubborn and persistent street fighting had been in progress during the interval. As the first faint streaks of daylight rose over Paris the position was still critical and dubious. The whole of the fortifications from the Seine at Point du Jour to the Porte d'Orléans were in the possession of the British, but the men were almost exhausted by the heavy marching and the strain of the fight, whilst fresh troops were still swarming across the river from the north and north-east.

When his lordship reached the front at the Gare de Sceaux it was more than probable that the advancing day would witness another big battle, and the outlook was anything but promising. Indeed, were the issue left to the army, France was still defiant and even dangerous.

But other elements were at work, and in the ultimate clash of events they predominated.

At 2.30 a.m. the Government had resigned. A Ministry of Conciliation was hastily formed, and at 3.15 a.m. an officer bearing a flag of truce rode down the Boulevard Raspail bearing a letter from M. Bourgeois, countersigned by the President of the Republic, which he handed to Lord Roberts.

"For the sake of our people and of yours," read this brief message, "let there be peace."

"Is M. Bourgeois the Premier?" said his lordship.

"Within the hour," was the reply.

"Tell him, then, that I will meet him here within half-an-hour," said the British Commander-in-Chief, "and communicate to him the demands of England, if he be empowered to accept them."

In less than the allotted time, the President and M. Bourgeois both made their appearance.

It was no season for diplomatic fencing or laboured civility.

"My instructions are definite and explicit," said Lord Roberts, "I can only ask you to spare France."

Digitized by Google

when the two notable Frenchmen were introduced to him. "I can offer no terms save those of unconditional surrender."

"I can only ask you to spare France," said the President. "She is not to blame. Punish her rulers if you will, for I am chief of them."

"Unconditional surrender means anything or nothing," exclaimed M. Bourgeois. "Who shall fix a limit to its significance."

"England and America," replied Lord Roberts.

"An honourable tribunal. I accept," cried the President.

"France accepts," said M. Bourgeois.

And whilst the fateful words still rang in the ears of the British General, there came through the open doorway of the room in which the meeting was held the fitful sounds of distant firing towards the Champs de Mars, where the intelligence of the armistice had not yet penetrated.

They were the last tokens of warfare between Christian races, the dying cries of the horrific demon which had waged so deadly and so prolonged a conflict with civilisation.

The war was ended.

CHAPTER LIII.

How England Received the News.

It was a clear calm morning, one of those serene morning of September which are the glory of the English climate. London looked cool and fresh, and there was a joyousness in the air as her citizens cracked their million eggs, took their innumerable 'buses, and rolled by devious routes from all points of the compass to the city. There was an omen in the placid beauty of the day, did they but know it. For the war was at last over, and peace—universal peace—reigned over the entire world. The last echoes of the cannon had died away, and no man raised his sword against his brother.

But shortly after nine o'clock extraordinary excitement convulsed every newspaper office in Fleet Street. News editors lost their calmness, foremen printers turned pale and trembled, and even the phlegmatic compositor affected agitation. For a telegram of supreme importance had just arrived, and the battle of armed men was changed now into a battle of journals. Who should be the first to announce the news to an unsuspecting world?

"England is saved!" exclaimed the too impressionable sub-editor of the Evening News as he read, in feverish excitement, the tantalising tape.

"Never you mind about England being saved," observed his superior firmly, throwing away the end of his eighteenth cigarette, "what you've got to do is to scoop the Sun!"

It was a hard, unsympathetic saying; but it was business. And everyone proceeded to scoop.

Who shall describe the contest in all its alternations of hope and despair, its fluctuations of failure and success? If the Sun was first at Piccadilly Circus, the News reached Tottenham Court Road three minutes before. It was the Echo's boast that the inhabitants of Shepherd's Bush would have remained unenlightened for hours save for itself, whilst the pallid Star gleamed proudly and solitary at Clapham Junction. But no one, other than a judge trained in Jubilee handicaps and Royal Hunt Cups, could determine which newspaper first rounded Cheapside or touched Charing Cross, or triumphant gained the Bank—although it was the boast of the News that it accomplished this last feat by half a neck.

Nor did it matter. The machines could not print fast enough to meet the demand. As first was heard the miraculous cry: "The fall of Paris," there came a shock of bewilderment which was followed by a wild rush for the papers. With shaking hands and beating hearts, the excited crowds seized them and tore them wildly open. It was true! There, beneath prodigious headings that sprawled half down the column, was the brief but all sufficing paragraph.

"Last night Field-Marshal Lord Roberts, under cover of a feint towards the Seine, made a strong attack upon the southern lines of the fortifications of Paris. The attempt was completely successful, and early this morning the city fell into the hands of the British troops. The President of the Republic has capitulated and there is now cessation of hostilities."

Perhaps—in Paris—but in triumphant London there was fierce fighting for the newspapers. No one gave heed to the price demanded. Shillings, half-crowns even sovereigns were tossed to the happy newsboys by exultant citizens who now learnt for the first time that England's power was supreme and her mighty empire safe beyond possibility of attack. As the news rushed along, the tension of public excitement became stronger and stronger. The wildest evidences of rejoicing were to be observed. Everything was forgotten, all business laid aside, no word spoken save on this marvellous and glorious news which breathed peace and prosperity once more upon a stricken and suffering people.

There was complete and absolute derangement of traffic and business. No one wanted to go anywhere. No one wanted to do anything. Where each one learned the news, there he stayed in eager discussion and warm felicitations with such strangers as he met. The approaches to the City were thronged with crowds reckless of time and place, feeling nothing but the pulsations of a common patriotism and the common joy of a national deliverance.

News is sometimes laggard in its flight, and with broken wing flits feebly to distant suburbs. But in grave affairs there is something mysterious in its incredible speed. London was not long in feeling to its uttermost parts the thrilling ecstasy of the glorious intelligence. That modern Perseus, the ubiquitous newsboy, borne along by train or cart, or rushing on bicycle, woke up Kensington from her dreams, pierced the slumbers of St. John's Wood, fluttered the placid bosom of Brixton, and, even in the indefinable solemnity of Finsbury and New Barnet, brought irregular and disturbing agitations. The tumultuous swirl of excitement in the City sent forth its ripples to the outermost regions, and in a moment the six millions of greater London were convulsed with the same delirium of joy.

Words are vain and ineffectual to paint certain moments of high-pitched emotion. Nor can they describe the strange, restless, inexplicable mood which drove from every suburb and every district the people of the capital into its main thoroughfares. It was as if to be away from the burning centre of national rejoicing were unbearable. There was a fierce desire to take an individual share in public demonstration.

For this unwonted thing had at last occurred. London so torn and divided, so scattered in its parts, so separated in its interests, so lacking in a common centre of public life—with every township regardless of its neighbour, each street indifferent to the next one—like some grotesque animal that has a hundred nerve centres, each self-sustaining and independent in a large measure upon the main seat of life—this inorganic city had at last become one, organic and homogeneous. All its private interests were fused by the fervent heat of patriotism into a common feeling. Distinctions and differences were lost. The single impulse was to gather together, to express in one vast note the cry of mutual exultation.

Thus there flowed into the centre of London great crowds anxious to catch the enthusiasm of others and to express their own. Every face was bright; it was more than a happy city, it was a happy nation.

Beyond all, the Mall—that noble boulevard that stretches through St. James's Park—was crowded with expectant throngs. Before Buckingham Palace a dense mass of people waited patiently with excited speech and much cheering, each one eager but contented, awaiting some sign of royal recognition.

Copyright

And such sign was not wanting. When the Ministers had met as hurriedly as might be, and with heartfelt thankfulness heard the news—oppressed in some cases by an emotion that was almost overpowering—the leading members of the Council of National Defence drove to the Palace to give official tidings to the Queen.

Hence it was that at twelve o'clock those who occupied the roadway and stretched far down the lovely avenue of the Mall, had the satisfaction of seeing Her Majesty appear upon the balcony with the Prince upon her right and Lord Wolseley upon her left, whilst around her were her Prime Minister, Mr. Gladstone, Lord Rosebery, and Mr. Balfour. Deafening cheers rent the air, renewed again and again, as with a bright smile Her Majesty bowed to her people. It was a fresh evidence of her graciousness that she did not forget the man to whom the splendid victory was mainly due, and as she gave her hand to the Commander-in-Chief, who kissed it respectfully, redoubled enthusiasm prevailed, until the incident, almost overburdened with the strain of excitement, was terminated by the withdrawal of the royal party. It was impossible to subdue the feelings of personal emotion by commonplace activity. Everyone roamed through the streets and discussed in public places or met in drawing-room and studio, full of the one topic.

And so the day sped. There was sadness, no doubt, in the purlieus of Soho, but it was not manifested with undue emphasis abroad. When a Frenchman made his appearance, the good-humoured Englishman treated him with a consideration that did him infinite credit.

Sometimes the temptation of a little badinage was too strong to be resisted. A distinguished French savant made his appearance in St. James's Restaurant, and was moodily drinking his claret when a couple of healthy, hearty Britons took up their places at his side.

M. Trochu—that was his name—sighed deeply, and, after a few diffident glances at his companions, asked in hesitating tones and in broken accents:

"It is, gentlemen, that you can tell me vot ze condizions are of truce in my belofed Paris?"

His voice trembled, and there was something pathetic in his earnestness which even touched the hearts of his listeners. But the devil of mischief sprang in, and one of them answered:

Sometimes the temptation for a little bandinage was too strong to be resisted.

"We have only heard a few details, sir, and they do not amount to much; but it appears that the Bridge of Austerlitz is to be demolished and the Eiffel Tower torn down. But, of course, you can build others in their place."

"Mon Dieu!" he exclaimed. "What next?"

"The Venus de Milo and your Elgin Marble are, of course, to be removed to the British Museum, and it is proposed to take down and re-erect the Church of St. Germain L'Auxerrois in Brixton."

The Frenchman groaned and hid his face in his hands.

(To be continued.)

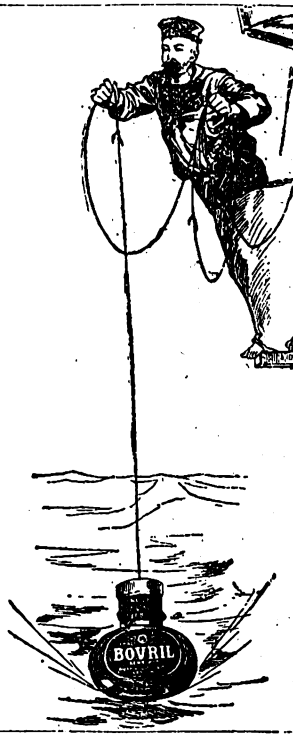
A Sound for Safety.

As the sailor, to avoid the dangers of shallow water, finds his safeguard in the sound, so the human constitution, threatened by the treacherous changes of the winter season, finds a safeguard in "Bovril."

BOVRIL

supplies the bodily heat necessary to throw off the colds and chills of winter, to ward off the lurking danger of influenza, and to fortify the system against the attacks of disease.



Digitized by Google

THE TIMMINS TROUBLES.

IX.—An Impromptu Excursion.

"Now, my dear," exclaimed Mr. Timmins, as he dashed into the room, "bustle about. It's now eight o'clock; the boat for Clacton starts at nine thirty, and I'm going. I'm not the man to go pleasuring alone. I want society, and there's no society, Mrs. Timmins, that I admire so much as yours."

Mrs. Timmins flushed up with pleasure. "That gives me an hour and twenty-five minutes to dress. I can do it in that time," she said.

"I don't see how you can make that out. The boat leaves from the Old Swan Pier, Mrs Timmins; it doesn't leave from our front door, there, and you haven't mor'n an hour to dress. I'll shave while you are getting ready, and we'll take dinner to-day within the sound of the surf, right within the sound of the surf, you know."

Mr. Timmins stropped his razor, and shaved himself carefully. Mrs. Timmins went from one cupboard to another, and threw everything out on the bed. In half an hour Mr. Timmins was prepared for the voyage, and admonished Mrs. Timmins to bestir herself.

"But I haven't commenced yet?" objected the lady.

"Haven't commenced! What have you been doing all this time? What have you been up to? Do you know it's half-past eight?"

"Well, my dear, you were at the glass shaving, and I didn't want to disturb you."

"Oh, you didn't! Of course not! You can't put on a frock without the glass, can you? You've got to have a looking-glass to button your boots. D'you suppose you can get ready in half an hour? Why weren't you ready when I came in?"

"Never mind, dear, I'll be in time. You go down in the parlour, and I'll be there in a minute."

Mr. Timmins growled his way downstairs. Mrs. Timmins hurried on her skirt, put on her hat, and then prepared to dress herself.

"Are you ready?" bowled Mr. Timmins, when he'd waited about three minutes.

"In a minute," piped Mrs. Timmins, feeling round the small of her back after an invisible string.

"Perhaps I'd better go over and tell the boat to come round for you in the morning. Maybe you're acquainted with the steamboat. P'raps you've got influence enough with that steamboat to make it wait a month or two for you," and Mr. Timmins went out on the steps and glared up and down the street.

Mrs. Timmins took off her hat, brushed her hair, and screwed herself round like a giraffe to find another string. Then she opened the top drawer, and pulled half a dozen pieces of lace out of a green box. Putting her fingers to her lip she began to consider which piece she had better wear.

"If you're coming with me, you've got to start!" bawled Mr. Timmins. "What do you take me for, a season ticket, that you can go on any time? Are you coming?"

"In a minute. I'll be there in a minute," gasped Mrs. Timmins, clutching the piece of lace she didn't want. "I'm only looking for my parasol."

Mr. Timmins thumped the balusters for about a minute.

"What's the matter with you now? What under the sun are you up to? Do you know I asked you to go to Clacton about six weeks ago? How many clothes are you putting on? How much toggery do you need? If I can find an engine powerful enough, I'm going to have you dressed by steam hereafter until the fuel gives out. Are you going to Clacton with me or not?"

"Yes, dear, I'm ready," and Mrs. Timmins rustled downstairs. "Won't you please pin the centre of my overskirt to the centre of my dress?"

Mr. Timmins went at it. Mrs. Timmins pulled her hat round straight and drew on her gloves, and then glanced down her back to see how her liege L. was getting on.

"Stand still, can't you? How d'you suppose I can tell the middle of anything while you're twisting round like a grindstone? Stand up straight. I don't know what—hang the thing!" and he ran the pin into his thumb.

"Oh, dear, I'm so sorry!" said Mrs. Timmins.

"Oh, yes! You're sorry! Why weren't you sorry before I began? What d'you come down here half dressed for? What d'you suppose I am, a broken-backed seamstress. That thumb won't be well for a year and a half. Hang the dress! Don't you know how to pin yourself up yet? You wait here, I'll be back soon; I'm just going for a pile-driver to fasten you together."

"Never mind, dear; it doesn't matter if it isn't pinned."

"Doesn't matter!" howled Mr. Timmins, "doesn't matter! What d'you ask me to pin it for, then? What d'you do it for, just to see me mutilate my thumb? Look here, are you going with me, or going to stand here like an eight-day clock? It's past nine, and you've seven more hours' dressing to do, haven't you?"

"I'm ready, my dear. I'm only waiting for you."

They took a cab, and as they got out, Mrs. Timmins rushed for the pier.

"What's the matter with you now? Can't you see there's plenty of time?" reasoned Mr. Timmins.

She accommodated her steps to his, and in due time they reached the pier with fifteen minutes to spare.

"Another time when I want to go anywhere, Mrs. Timmins, you just be ready the moment I speak. I won't be kept waiting all day for anybody. You hear me, do you?"

"Yes, dear," said Mrs. Timmins, beginning to realise that she had left her fan, smelling bottle, parasol, veil, and handkerchief at home in her hurry, and had forgotten to close the window in case of rain.

Digitized by Google

Messrs. Nicole Frères'

Regina and Polyphon Self-Playing Musical Boxes

Are the Finest in the World.

They Play over 1,000 Tunes, and give universal satisfaction.

A Revelation to Lovers of Good Music.

They have only to be compared with other boxes to establish supremacy over all. They have every improvement that ingenuity and skill can conceive, and are wonderfully brilliant and sweet in tone, with strong but very simple mechanism that cannot get out of order. Play music of every description—grave and gay, sacred and secular—and as an entertainer, at home or in public, are without equal.

Boxes of every description, from 16/6 to 100 guineas.

SPECIAL LINES.

"INFANTA" POLYPHON, with 6 Tunes, £1 12s. Extra Tunes, 5d. each.
"KLEBERG" " " £2 11s. " 8d. "
"GORDON" " " £4 5s. " 1/4 "
"EUGENE" " " £8 10s. " 2/6 "
The "HAVELOCK" POLYPHON (56 Notes), in fine Walnut Case, with Marquetrie Lid, and 24 Tunes, £5 5s.
The No. 19 REGINA, 112 Steel Tongues, richly carved Walnut Case, and 24 Tunes, £12.

ALL DEALERS: Inspection Invited at Show Rooms, or write direct for FREE No. 3 Catalogue.

NICOLE FRÈRES LTD. (Dept. 3),
21 ELY PLACE, HOLBORN CIRCUS, LONDON, E.C. Estd. 1815.

COMFORT, CLEANLINESS AND CURE

FOLLOW THE USE OF

Dr. PAUL'S WHITE PILE OINTMENT.

Gives ease at once and effectually removes Piles, Cracks, Fissures and Ulcerations. In boxes 1/- & 2/6 each. Post free 1/2 & 2/9

PENN & CO., 89, BLACKFRIARS ROAD, LONDON, S.E.

PALATABLE SUBSTITUTE FOR COD LIVER OIL.

Devonshire Cream

(REALLY GENUINE.)

In Patent Air-tight Tins.

Quarter Pound 10d.
Half Pound... 1s. 4d.
One Pound ... 2s. 4d.

(including Tin and Postage).

MRS. CONYERS,
MORCHARD BISHOP,
DEVON.

HAND ORGANS from 20s.

Made in 3 sizes, in Ebony and Gold Case. Full organ tone. Can play Songs, Hymns, or Dance Music. Sent on receipt of P.O. 5s.; balance 5s. monthly. Send for List of Tunes and Catalogue.

ATLAS CO., 184 High Street, Camden Town; 63 Seven Sisters Road; 14 High Road, Kilburn.

SULPHOLINE LOTION,

For clearing the skin from Spots, Blemishes, Redness, Roughness, giving a Beautiful Complexion and pleasing appearance.

SHILLING BOTTLES.

GIVEN AWAY

HUNDREDS OF POUNDS IN PRIZES - EVERY COMPETITOR GETS ONE OR A £5 HOUSE

LIBERAL PAYMENT FOR WRAPPERS. PARTICULARS WITH EACH 2½d AND 3d BAR.

CHANCELLOR SOAPS

Send ½ stumps for Sample to 13 Clerkenwell Road, E.C.

KEATING'S LOZENGES

THERE IS NO BETTER REMEDY IN THE WHOLE WORLD FOR ALL COUCH AND THROAT TROUBLES THAN KEATING'S LOZENGES. ONE GIVES RELIEF. THEY WILL CURE, AND THEY WILL NOT INJURE YOUR HEALTH. THEY CONTAIN ONLY THE PUREST DRUGS.

Sold everywhere in 1/1½ Tins.

NOSE MACHINES as worn by Nobility. Shape altered permanently by few weeks' wear, from 9/9 each. Red Nose Cure, Medically Approved, 3/9. Pamphlet, "Cause and Prevention," 1/-; particulars for stamp. Mention Paper.
LEES RAY, Specialist, South Castle St., Liverpool.

£20 Hairdressers fitted up. Estimates free.

Tobacconists Commencing. See Illd. Guide (250 pages) 3d. How to open a cigar store, £20 to £2,000
Tobacconists Outfitting Co., 186, Euston Road, London. The largest and original house (50 years reputation. Mgr., H. Myers

VARICOCELE.

Every man suffering from Varicocele and the allied troubles, or Varicose Veins, should send for treatise, describing their Causes, Symptoms, Results, and Successful and Painless Treatment without surgical operation or the use of cumbersome trusses and electrical appliances. Will be sent sealed, post free.

S. S. MURRAY,
7 Southampton Row, London, W.C.

ZOX

CURES

NEURALGIA

Toothache, Headache, Sciatica, and all Nerve Pains.

PURE, HARMLESS, AND NON-APERIENT.

Do not be persuaded to take a substitute, there is nothing as good as ZOX.

Of all Chemists, 1s. and 2s. 6d. per Box.

ZOX Co., 11 HATTON GARDEN, E.C.

THE ELECTROPATHIC BELT

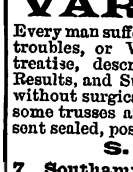
WILL PROLONG LIFE!

Rev. W. Smith, of Zion House, Kirton-in-Lindsey, writes:—"I had a severe illness, accompanied with bronchitis; my voice was quite gone, when a friend brought me one of your Electropathic Appliances. I was soon restored to health and strength. I have recommended your appliances to many of my friends, and have never known them to fail in giving relief and prolonging life."

BRONCHITIS CURED.

Stop physicing and send for the Electropathic Belt, and obtain relief. Pamphlet and Book of Testimonials POST FREE.

Medical Battery Co. Ltd.
489, OXFORD ST., London, W.



ALL FAT PEOPLE

Readily Reduce Weight and Cure Corpulency Permanently by taking TRILENE TABLETS (Regd.) for a few weeks. They are very agreeable, harmless, and never fail to PRESERVE both HEALTH and FIGURE without change of diet. Reduction begins immediately.

An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

MISS HEYWOOD, 77 Hindhill Street, Heywood, Lancs., says: "I am 21lb. lighter, and my rheumatism also seems cured."

MRS. WEAVER, of Greenpits Villa, Station Road, Ross, Hereford, says: "Am reduced from 13st. 8lb. to 11st."

MR. CANHAM, 87 Alexandra Road, Norwich: "Tablets cured my wife of extreme stoutness; it has never returned."

LADY CONSTANCE CONRAD writes from Wiesbaden: "I am very pleased with the Tablets."

PRINCESS LIECHTENSTEIN writes from Laudsberg, Austria: "Pray send your excellent Tablets directly."

COUNTESS G. FURSTENBERG, Stammheim, Germany, writes: "They act speedily and well."

MR. BUTLER, Surgeon, Hampton Manor, Evesham, says: "My patient lost more than a stone."

Send 2/6 to THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION, 66 Finsbury Pavement, London, E.C.

PIANOS. UPRIGHT IRON GRAND.

Complete Iron frame, Brass Pin Plate, Nickel-bolted Wrest Plank, Check Action, Full Trichord, Full Compass, Rivetted Hammers, Handsome Walnut Case, Inlaid Marqueterie Panel, Sconces, Trusses, etc. Tone and touch perfect. Guaranteed 25 years. 23 guineas, at 10/6 per month. Delivered free on payment of 10/6. Approval. Catalogues Free.

ORGANS. GENUINE AMERICAN.

Imported Direct. Solid Walnut Case, Mirror Top, Music Case, 2 Knee Swells, Mouse and Dust Proof, 8 Stops, 3 Sets of Reeds, 14 Guineas, at 6/- per month. 10 Stops, 3 Sets of Reeds, 2 Octave Couplers, 15 guineas, at 7/- per month. Illustrated Lists Free. Kindly mention this paper.

THE LONDON AND LIVERPOOL PIANOFORTE CO., Granby St. & Selborne St., LIVERPOOL.

Agents wanted where not represented.

I'VE FOUND IT AT LAST.

H. T., having heard that there are a large number of coal and iron mines in Spain, asks me to tell him the respective numbers.———There are 1,027 iron mines and 461 coal mines.

J. YOUNG thinks that boys are not so fond of the sea as they used to be. At one time, youngsters were always threatening to run away when they couldn't do as they liked at home, but one does not hear this so often now.———There may be some foundation for the statement, but the applications for admission to the Navy do not confirm your opinion that British boys are losing their love for the career of a sailor. There were 4,600 applications last year, although the height and chest measurement have been increased.

B. S.—You mean the baya bird of India. This bird has the curious habit of fastening fireflies to its nest with moist clay; at night such a nest looks like an electric street lamp.

F.—Foolscap paper was so named from the fact that the first that was made bore the mark of a jester in cap and bells. The mark has long since disappeared, but the name remains as the indication of a certain size of paper.

A. M.—The inhabitants of Sydney, New South Wales, seem to be pleasure-loving people. There are about 400,000 persons in Sydney, and to gratify their desire for amusement they have eight theatres and the same number of music halls. Outdoor sports are very popular, yachting being in high favour.

G. K.—Peach stones are readily sold in New York, where they are bought up by merchants, who obtain perfume, flavouring essence, and prussic acid from the kernels.

P. L.—The pulse of the average healthy human being varies greatly in different parts of the globe, according to the temperature, barometric pressure, the height of the individual and other conditions. The rate for the average man in this country is 72 beats a minute. The Teutonic races, being taller, have a slower pulse; the rate for the Andaman Islanders, probably the smallest people on the earth, is 40. A savant who climbed Mount Blanc found that his pulse at that elevation recorded 120, whereas the normal figure was 60. In the tropics the pulse has been known to rise to 140.

WHEAT.—Wheat from Chili and Argentina reaches us long before our own crop is ready, for the simple reason that in those countries it ripens in January. In Peru this cereal is ready for cutting in November.

G. N.—In no country in the world are infectious diseases so fatal as in Russia, and this is especially true in regard to children. Measles, scarlatina, diphtheria, and small-pox carry off large numbers of infants every year. Official figures show that more than a million and a half children and adults die every year from infectious diseases, and there is every reason to believe that most of these might be saved if proper precautions were taken.

R. O.—The "Oratory of Gallerus" is a remarkable structure at Dingle, in County Kerry, Ireland. Who Gallerus was, and the exact date of the erection of this edifice, history does not tell us; all we know is that it is a relic of the early days of Christianity in Ireland and that it has existed for more than 1,000 years.

D. M.—In the city of Mexico the natives act as beasts of burden; they carry tremendous weights on their backs for miles, and charge very moderately. Occasionally they drag a kind of cart with enormous wheels. In the surrounding country, mules are used; you can see droves of them come into town in the morning, laden with farm produce.

A. G.—It is estimated that there are now 200,000,000 Bibles, in different languages, in the world. This estimate is arrived at, after making due allowance for those that have been destroyed or have disappeared in some way or other.

S. M.—The art of starching linen was introduced into England by a native of Flanders in 1553.

STOTTER.—A German physician has invented a new treatment for stutterers. He says that the cause of this distressing affliction is a rush of consonant sounds to the vocal apparatus and the consequent exclusion of the vowels. He makes his patients utter words and sentences in which the long vowel sounds predominate, and after a few lessons there is a great improvement.

WHITE asks why the White House at Washington is so called.———Because it was painted white to hide the marks of the smoke and other traces of the onslaught by the British in their war with the States. It was partly destroyed on that occasion, and when it was restored, the whole was painted white. It was at first proposed to call it the "Palace," but the idea was rejected, and it was known as "Executive Mansion," until its coat of paint gained for it the present designation.

L. E.—Kissing the hand of great men was the common custom in ancient Greece. This token of homage and admiration is with us confined to the kissing of ladies' hands by gentlemen.

A. D.—The Spanish have the most polite form of address. To those whom they do not know, or with whom they are but slightly acquainted, they say not "you," but "your Grace." The butcher will ask: "Does your Grace want a leg of mutton, madam?" At the end of a letter—even a business communication — they write the initials of words that signify "who kisses your hand."

E. D.—Norway is the country you mean. In Norway the idea of equality among the different classes is very strong; the driver of a conveyance considers himself every bit as good as his fare, and many of the peasants have coats-of-arms. They are so proud that it is looked upon as derogatory to accept alms. It is therefore a lucky thing that there is but little poverty in the country.

T. A.—The man who can claim to have the most tattoo marks on his body is Professor Frank Howard, an American citizen. He is decorated with 780 designs in red, blue, and black, and the materials used in the colouring included soot, charcoal, brickdust, Indian ink and Prussian blue. It took 154 days to tattoo him all over.

W. G. asks: "Is there any plant or vegetable that will give you an electric shock?"———Yes; there is a plant called the phytolacca electrica, growing in hot climates, which will give you a shock that will make you sit up. Animals, birds, and insects all shun it. If a magnetic needle be placed within six yards of the plant it will be sensibly affected. It has been noticed that the energy of the plant increases during the day time.

SHORT STORIES' ADVERTISEMENT RATES.

Single column, per inch, per insertion	£0	10	0
Double ,, ,, ,,	1	0	0
Full page inside, facing page of matter, either white paper or 2nd or 3rd page of cover, or back page, per insertion	10	0	0
Half-page ,, ,, ,, ...	5	0	0
Quarter-page ,, ,, ,, ...	2	10	0
Eighth-page ,, ,, ,, ...	1	5	0
Front page, whole ,, ,, ,, ...	12	10	0
,, half	6	5	0

All spaces above one-eighth of a page are charged at per page rate.

Series discount: 5 per cent. for 13, 10 per cent. for 26, 15 per cent. for 52 insertions.

Black blocks are charged 25 per cent. extra. All advertisements are subject to approval. All copy must be sent in by Noon on Tuesday, Feb. 14th, if intended for the Issue on sale Feb. 28th, and dated March 4th. The Proprietors reserve the right to hold over or suspend the insertion of any advertisement without prejudice to other insertions on order. All communications should be addressed to the Advertisement Manager, "Pearson's Weekly" Offices, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Printed and Published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON LTD., at Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

Every Good Nurse Uses and Recommends

HOLLOWAY'S

PILLS AND OINTMENT.

Thousands of Testimonials bear witness to their marvellous efficacy.

They have held front rank during the past sixty years.

The combined use of Holloway's Pills and Ointment will speedily Relieve and Cure RHEUMATISM, SCIATICA, LUMBAGO, INFLUENZA, LIVER AND KIDNEY COMPLAINTS, SKIN ERUPTIONS, AFFECTIONS OF THE THROAT, CHEST AND LUNGS.

Manufactured only at 78, New Oxford Street, London; sold by all Chemists and Medicine Vendors.

WATSON'S MATCHLESS CLEANSER.

ENORMOUS PRIZE SCHEME

Distribution during the Three Months ending March 31st, 1899, of

12,000 Or more, Handsome Prizes, Value over £5,000

The principal JANUARY WINNERS will be published as early as possible in the February Newspapers and Journals.

LIST OF PRIZES TO BE COMPETED FOR EACH MONTH.

COLLECT YOUR WRAPPERS.

1	Cash Prize of £100	£100	0	0	400	Ladies' Umbrellas, value 5s. ea.	£100	0	0
4	Cash Prizes of £25...	100	0	0	2,000	Boxes of our famous "Nubolic Soap," packed in fancy boxes containing 18 12-oz. Tablets, value 4s. box...	400	0	0
8	Cash Prizes of £12 10s.	100	0	0
16	Cash Prizes of £6 5s.	100	0	0
20	Sewing Machines, value £5 each.	100	0	0	1,000	Pictures of the famous "Charge of the Light Brigade," in gilt frame, value 4s. each	200	0	0
33	Cash Prizes of £3 each	99	0	0
100	Cash Prizes of £1 each	100	0	0
200	Cash Prizes of 10s. each	100	0	0
200	Ladies' Umbrellas, value 10s. ea.	100	0	0
600	Cash Prizes of 5s. each ...	150	0	0
4,582		per month £1,749	0	0

COLLECT YOUR WRAPPERS.

CONDITIONS OF COMPETITION.

Cut off the top portion of wrapper, with the words Watson's Matchless Cleanser and send, postage or carriage paid, to Joseph Watson and Sons Limited, Whitehall Soap Works, Leeds, not later than either February 28th or March 31st. Wrappers arriving after April 1st will be valueless. Be careful to see that the full postage is paid, any parcel arriving postage or carriage not being paid, will be refused. The Prizes will be awarded in above order to the senders of the highest number of wrappers. The wrappers must be in bundles of 50, and each parcel must contain the full name and address of sender, and the number of wrappers sent must be marked on the same paper. The packages must be marked on the outside, "Prize Competition."

SPECIALLY NOTE.—Wrappers of unsuccessful competitors will be added to those sent in by them in the following month. A list giving result of competition will be enclosed with each prize, when it is sent out. All possible speed in counting the wrappers will be made, and Joseph Watson and Sons Limited hope they will be able to dispatch all prizes not later than the 21st day of the month following the competition. The decision of Joseph Watson and Sons Limited to be final. Every wrapper must have first contained soap. No employee of Joseph Watson and Sons Limited will be eligible.

WATSON'S MATCHLESS CLEANSER

Has the Largest Sale of FULL-WEIGHT 1-lb. TABLETS in the World, and has proved itself to be one of the best Soaps ever used. Sold by all Grocers, Oilmen, and Co-operative Stores, throughout the United Kingdom.

Digitized by Google

ASK FOR & INSIST ON HAVING
HARRIS'
DELICIOUS & ABSOLUTELY PURE
MADE ONLY BY HARRIS AND Co
GOLD MEDAL
BRYANSTON CAKE FACTORY, LONDON, W.
OF STORES & GROCERS EVERYWHERE
CAKES
APPLICATIONS FOR SOLE AGENCIES INVITED

"MATCHLESS"
"WARNING TO LADIES."
Beware of Polishes that set up injurious acids. They impregnate your cloths with verdigris and spoil your hands.
"SIMPLE TEST."
Dab a small quantity on a penny and leave it overnight. If it sets up acid the surface will become green with verdigris.
"MATCHLESS" METAL POLISH will not turn any metal green, and is therefore free from acid.
FREE FROM ACID POISON OR GRIT
LARGEST SALE IN THE WORLD
METAL POLISH.
PATON, CALVERT & Co MANUFACTURERS LIVERPOOL.

"LOUIS"
VELVETEEN

See that the name spelt L.O.U.I.S is stamped on every Yard.
TRADE MARK
RODS ASPERA JUVANT
LOUIS XI KING OF FRANCE 1461-1483.

HALL'S COCA PELLETS
TRIAL SAMPLES GRATIS.
PREVENT FATIGUE from WALKING,
TRAVELLING
STUDY
CYCLING
SINGING
SICK NURSING
BUSINESS WORRIES
&c., &c.
CURE
SLEEPLESSNESS
BRAIN FAG
NERVOUSNESS
NEURALGIA
DESPONDENCY
EXHAUSTION
MENTAL STRAIN
&c., &c.
SEND POSTCARD FOR A FREE SAMPLE.
PRICES: 1/2, 2/11, 4/9, & 11/3 POST FREE.
SOLE MAKERS:
GILBERT & HALL,
CHEMISTS,
BOURNEMOUTH

RED WHITE AND BLUE
SOLD EVERYWHERE
FRENCH COFFEE
DELICIOUS FOR BREAKFAST OR AFTER DINNER

ZEBRA
Grate Polish.
In Packets or as a Paste in Tins.

M. A. P. THE BEST SOCIETY PAPER. EVERY WEEK, 1d.

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

No. 529. FOR WEEK ENDING FEBRUARY 18TH, 1899. [ONE PENNY.

A Weak Stomach.

This is probably the most prevalent Disorder under the sun. Women especially have Weak Digestions.

A Weak Stomach means a weak Frame, weak Nerves, and weak Energies, because only incomplete nutrition takes place.

Weak Stomachs can be gradually made strong by the use of Guy's Tonic, which exerts a corrective, curative, and tonic influence in a variety of ways.

Guy's Tonic promotes Digestion by furnishing in itself a portion of digestive fluid. It also stimulates the natural flow of the gastric juice by which Stomachic Digestion is performed, and it further restores tone and tension to the mucous Membrane of the Stomach itself.

The heavy weight at the pit of the Stomach, with a bearing-down pain, the darting pain under the Shoulder-blades, the furred Tongue, unpleasant breath, Acidity and Heartburn, all indicate clearly enough that Digestion is at fault, and needs correction and help. By taking Guy's Tonic an aid to the Digestion of what you eat is at once supplied, and the food is therefore eaten, digested, and assimilated with greater ease and comfort.

This improvement continues day by day until enjoyment in eating returns, while a sharp Appetite at regular intervals indicates clearly enough the restorative power that Guy's Tonic has so well exerted. In every phase of Stomachic Disorder Guy's Tonic is recommended as always doing good.

One Example:

Mr. ROBERT SPROT, of 51 Orchard Street, Galston, Ayrshire, writes:

"Guy's Tonic is the best Medicine my Wife has ever "taken for Stomach Disorders. She has been ailing "more or less for the last Twenty Years, and Guy's Tonic "is the finest Digestive Medicine that she has ever "obtained."

A new Size (Six Ounce) Bottle of Guy's Tonic, price 1s. 1½d., is now on sale at all Chemists and Stores.

10/6 ALLEN FOSTER & CO., 10/6

SOLE MAKERS OF THE

'ALFOSCO' COSTUMES.

Buy Direct by Parcels Post from the Leading Firm of London Manufacturers.

CLEARANCE SALE.

Great Bargains for Everybody.

ALLEN FOSTER & CO. offer at ridiculously low prices their surplus Stock of last season's designs in Costumes, Mantles, and Costume Skirts. Price List of Bargains post free on application. A pretty Brooch will be given away to each purchaser during Sale.

Design No. 94. 10/6

Design No. 885. 10/6.

This is a favourite "Alfosco" Costume, made in the Spécialité Serge, all colours. The bodice is shaped to the figure, and has a pleated front, and trimmed with a frill of cloth carried over the shoulders, and pretty fancy buttons. The bodice and sleeves are lined. The Skirt is cut full and fashionably. Costume complete, 10/6. Carr. 6d. Skirt alone, 5/6. Carr. 5d. extra.

PATTERNS POST FREE.

Design No. 885. 10/6

A BARGAIN IN COSTUME SKIRTS. These Skirts are made in a good Black and Navy Serge, lined throughout. Price only 3/11. Carr. 5d. extra. Send for one.

Design No. 94. 10/6.

A smart Velvet Trimmed Costume.—Consists of a fashionably-made Skirt and Bodice, tight-fitting at back, with full front, tastefully trimmed with Velvet and Buttons. This Costume is made in the Spécialité Serge in Black, Navy, Electric, Brown, Fawn, Myrtle, Blue, Grey, Cardinal, Bronze-Green, and Purple. Price only 10/6, carriage, 6d. extra. Skirt alone, 5/6, carriage, 5d. extra.

PATTERNS POST FREE.

ALLEN FOSTER & CO.,

The London Manufacturers,

17 ROSCOE STREET, GOLDEN LANE, LONDON, E.C.

Digitized by Google

"WORTH A GUINEA A BOX."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

FOR ALL

BILIOUS & NERVOUS DISORDERS,

SUCH AS

Sick Headache, Constipation, Weak Stomach, Impaired Digestion, Disordered Liver & Female Ailments.

SALE NOW OVER SIX MILLIONS YEARLY.

In Boxes, 1s. 1½d., and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.

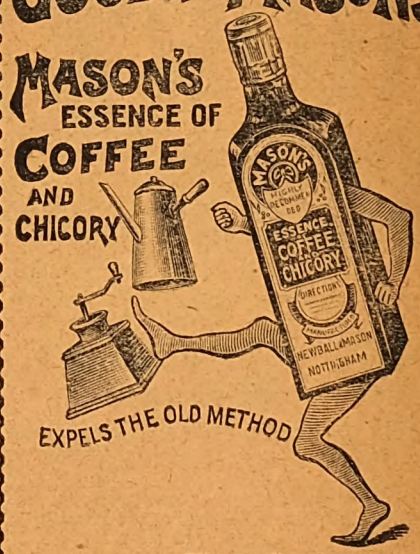
Prepared only by the Proprietor,

THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.

Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere.

COFFEE WITHOUT DREGS

GOOD! ITS MASON'S



An agreeable, stimulating and sustaining beverage. Instantly prepared and most economical. Equal to the very finest coffee. Highly recommended by the Medical Profession.

Of all Grocers and Stores, or a Sample Bottle post free for 9 stamps.

ALSO TRY

MASON'S WINE ESSENCES

AND

MASON'S EXTRACT OF HERBS.

Sample Bottle of either sent free for 9d.; two assorted 1/3; three assorted 1s.

Agents Wanted.

Manufacturers—

NEWBALL & MASON, NOTTINGHAM.

A Magnificent Complexion Guaranteed

By the free use of LILLIE POWDER. It nourishes, heals, soothes, and brings Health and Beauty.

Prepared from the original recipe invented by Mrs. Langtry, under the strict supervision of Her Majesty's Perruquier, Mr. W. Clarkson.

Order it of your Chemist and refuse all substitutes, as they may be injurious.

THREE TINTS: Blanche, Naturelle, and Rachel.

Of all Chemists, Hairdressers, Stores, etc.

THE LILLIE SYNDICATE,

3 HENRIETTA STREET, LONDON, W.C.

VARICOCELE.

Every man suffering from Varicocele and the allied troubles, or Varicose Veins, should send for treatise, describing their Causes, Symptoms, Results, and Successful and Painless Treatment without surgical operation or the use of cumbersome trusses and electrical appliances. Will be sent sealed, post free.

S. S. MURRAY,
7, Southampton Row, London, W.C.

PASTIMES

A WEEKLY MAGAZINE OF SPORT & ADVENTURE

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK

Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London.

INVESTED FUNDS £10,000,000.

The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free.

FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

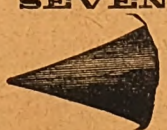
SEVEN PRIZE MEDALS.



C. BRANDAUER & Co's CIRCULAR POINTED PENS

These series of pens neither scratch nor spurt. They glide over the roughest paper with the ease of a soft lead pencil. An assorted sample box for 7 stamps from the works, Birmingham.

12,000 Stitches a Minute.

A LADY writes of the NEW AUTOMATIC KNITTER:

"I earn my living entirely by the machine."

A FATHER writes: "My little girl, nine years of age, earns as much as Five Shillings some days."

Knits Socks (a pair in 35 minutes) and Stockings, Underclothing, Fancy Goods, &c.
Easily learned. Lessons free.
Cash, Hire, and Work Terms from
Sorres, Dept., 67 Southwark Street, London, S.E., or 58 Union Street, Glasgow.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

No. 529.
One Penny.

For the Week ending
February 18th, 1899.

A TRAMP FOR A WIFE.

I HAD this story from a dear friend who told it to me one day when we were talking of the accidents of life—more astonishing and romantic a hundred times than the inventions of fiction. He had seen this little drama enacted under his eyes, and had known the actors in it.

"My father lived in High Street. I can still see his house with its slate roof and its jutting beams, a hospitable house if ever there was one. Poor people know how good it was to stay there; they never went away empty-handed.

"We were seated one evening by the fireside, my father smoking his pipe and gazing into the sparkling ashes on the hearth, my mother ironing the family linen, I reading, when suddenly outside, near the street door, a great noise was heard, and we saw a lad with a face of terror, enter hurriedly.

"'What is the matter?'

"'A soldier has fallen at your door—overcome by fatigue,' answered the lad.

"My father loved soldiers. He sprang from his seat and rushed out of doors, and before I had taken half a dozen steps to follow him he was returning with a young soldier so well supported that my father was carrying him like a sack of corn.

"My mother hastened to wheel a big armchair near to the fire, and the young man was assisted to sit down in it or rather he was laid down in it and my father, looking at him pitifully, said:

"'Is it possible you can be tramping the roads in such a condition?'

"The young soldier was indeed very pale and thin, his hair glued to his forehead with perspiration, the veins on his temples swollen, his face begrimed with the dust of the highway.

Edited
By
C. Arthur Pearson

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

"He must have had a long walk; his shoes were worn out, the leather cut to pieces with sharp stones as we could see. The upper leather of the left shoe had been torn from the sole and the foot within was bleeding.

"My father was on his knees before the poor fellow, pulling, cutting, tearing off the fragments of the boots. The young soldier's feet were terribly swollen and blistered. My father dipped his handkerchief in vinegar, washed and dressed the wounds.

"The soldier had by this time come to himself. He looked at us—at my father, mother, me, and two or three neighbours who had by that time arrived. We could see that he was trying to comprehend what was taking place about him.

"Then he raised himself, resting on the arm of the chair, and said to my father in broken accents:

"'But, monsieur—you—you—do not know me!'

"'We'll make each other's acquaintance at table, then,' said my father smiling.

"We had already dined but my father wished to keep the soldier company. He placed himself at the table facing the young man, and examined the regimental buttons of his tunic. The soldier ate with great appetite, helped by my mother, my father filling the glasses which did not rest long empty.

"'So,' he said suddenly pointing to the tin tube box which hung suspended by a cord to the young soldier's neck, 'you have served your time since you have got your discharge. But what in the name of misfortune are you doing—trying to kill yourself on the roads? I see how it is—you haven't any money to pay for a place on the coach?'

"'I,' said the soldier, 'I have been paid my discharge money and my mother would have sent me more than enough to pay my fare if I had wanted it; but—well I couldn't ride.'

"'I understand,' replied my father, who did not in the least comprehend the meaning of what the soldier had said. He called for another bottle.

"The meal ended, the soldier tried to walk; but he staggered on his feet, uttered a stifled cry and fell back into the chair. I saw tears start to his eyes. He was a young man, thin, wiry, dark-complexioned and nervous, with a look of energy in his face—not a man to weep at trifles. Those tears in his eyes puzzled me.

"'I shall not be able to walk before to-morrow!' he cried in a tone in which anger was mixed with mortification.

"'Walk!' exclaimed my mother in alarm.

"'Continue your tramp!' cried my father.

The soldier shook his head.

"'You do not know,' he said, 'I must do it!'

"I saw my father look intently into the young man's face, with a dumb, questioning gaze.

"'I'll tell you all about it,' said the soldier, 'for you have perhaps saved my life, and I owe it to you to tell you who I am.

"'My name is Jean Chevaucheux and my father is a lathe-splitter at Mezieres—an honest man resembling you, monsieur. Seven years ago, when I was drawn for the conscription, I was wildly in love with Marguerite Servan—a girl as good as she was pretty. I had already asked for her hand and her father had not said me nay; but at the same time as myself Pierre Puvioux had asked to be her husband.

"'Pierre is about my own age, a good fellow who carries his heart in his hand, as the saying is. I ought to have detested him, but he remained my friend. Judge for yourself!

"'Old Servan held out his hand to me, and said:

"'"You are worthy to become my son-in-law; but you must get Marguerite's consent."

"'When the question was put to her, Marguerite said she would willingly have me for her husband; but she said exactly the same in regard to Puvioux. She loved one as well as the other and could not decide which of us to select.

"'One evening Servan took Pierre and myself by the arm and led us to a public-house, and then said while we emptied a bottle of Moselle:

"'"My lads, you are a pair of worthy fellows, equal in merit, and I love you with all my heart. One of you shall be my son-in-law—that's a bargain. For that Marguerite will wait seven years. She has no preference either for you, Puvioux, or for you, Chevaucheux; but she loves both of you and will make happy which ever of you Fate shall select for her. This, then, is the condition on which one of you is to marry my daughter. You will go away on the same day, and it is probable that you will come back on the same day; well, which ever of you is first to shake hands with me, and say to him, 'Holloa! here I am—I've served my time!' I swear he shall be the husband of Marguerite!"

"'Truly there are odd accidents in life,' Jean Chevaucheux went on. 'Quitting our native place at the same hour, we were, Pierre and I, put into the same regiment. At first I was annoyed at that. I would rather have had him at a distance for, as you may easily imagine, I could not feel very friendly towards him. But I reflected; having him near me I should at least be able to talk of Marguerite, and that would be a consolation. Then I said to myself; "Seven years! After all, that will not kill me!"

"'In the regiment I became fast friends with Pierre Puvioux—a good fellow, a bar of gold! We often talked of the native peace, of old Servan, and of Marguerite—as a way of killing time, you understand. We frequently wrote to Mezieres, each confiding to the other what he had said in his letter. It was a struggle, of course, but it was carried on loyally. When Marguerite or Servan answered, the answer was addressed to both of us, wishing us equally good luck, giving to each of us an equal dose of hope. So you may be sure we went on hoping.

"'The seven years came to an end. I do not need to tell you my story day by day—our discharge and return route papers, all properly signed, were handed to us.

"'"Well," I said to Puvioux, "at last our time is up; we must set off for home."

"'"Yes," he replied; "they are waiting for our return there."

"'"You know," I said, "that the game will not be finally won before we both get back to Mezieres and the one of us who loses declares that the struggle has been fairly carried through."

"'"All right," cried Puvioux.

"'We shook hands and one morning—the other day—with good shoes on our feet and a stout stick in hand we set off for Mezieres.

"'We set off in company, talking little, thinking much and walking more. It was terribly hot, frightfully dusty, the air as heavy as lead. Half way through one of my daily tramps I threw myself down by the roadside unable to go any farther, my legs stiffened and worn out with fatigue.

"'"Are you going to rest there?" asked Puvioux.

Digitized by Google

"'"Yes," I replied.

"'"Good-bye, then," he said, going on.

"'I watched him out of sight walking with a firm step, as if he had only just commenced the journey. When he passed round the bend in the road and I could no longer see him—left alone, as it were, abandoned—a feeling of overwhelming despair came upon me; I made an effort. I rose and continued the march; the rest, short as it was, did me good and put fresh courage into me. I pressed on, on, on, and made such progress that after a while I came up with Puvioux and passed him.

"'But by the close of the day, though I had got well in front of my antagonist, I was done up. I went into an inn and lay down, intending to sleep a little—ah, a little! I slept through the whole night! I awoke only at daybreak, and then I was furious. I called out:

"'"Have any of you seen a soldier on foot go by?"

"'"A soldier? Yes, monsieur—very late last night. He asked for a glass of water."

"'Ah! in turn he had passed me.

"'I hurriedly set off. At three o'clock in the afternoon I had not come up with Puvioux—nor at six o'clock. In the evening I took a rest while eating. The meal finished, on I went again. This time Puvioux should not be much ahead of me! I walked on late into the night, but there is a limit to a man's strength; once more I was obliged to halt.

"'I knocked at the door of a roadside public-house and was admitted. Puvioux was there, seated in an arm-chair, pale as death. He started with irritation on seeing me—not unnaturally. We did not say much to each other; what, indeed, had we to talk about? Then too, we were so horribly tired.

"'It was who should rise earliest next morning—and it was I—and that morning was this morning. All day I have been walking, resting from time to time, but very little; for you know we are near the end. This village is near the end of the tramp from Angers to Mezieres. I know my map of France now!

"'The last tramp—Oh! If I should arrive too late!'

"My father advised the soldier to go to bed at once, and the poor fellow desired nothing better. The bed was ready. Chevaucheux shook us all by the hand and went to the room which had been made ready for him.

"Next day before dawn my father, already up, looked out of the window to see what weather it was. While he was looking up at the sky he heard, down in the street below, the sound of heavy footsteps, and in the uncertain light dimly made out the form of a soldier painfully making his way towards Mezieres.

"'Already en route?' asked my father.

"The soldier halted.

"'Well,' continued my father 'are you off?'

"The soldier raised his head and tried to make out who it was who was speaking to him.

"'Are you Jean Chevaucheux?' asked my father.

"'No,' answered the soldier; 'I am Pierre Puvioux.'

"And, as if the name of Jean Chevaucheux acted upon him like a spur he went on his way with increased speed and quickly passed out of my father's sight.

"'Halloa!' said my father; 'poor Chevaucheux will have to bestir himself if he wants to outstrip that sturdy young fellow!' and he went at once to the room in which Jean had been resting.

"The young soldier was already up. He was examining his feet by the light of a candle.

"'Victory!' he cried, on seeing my father. 'I am fresh and vigorous. I am out of pain. En route!'

"'And quickly!' replied my father. 'Puvioux has just passed through the street.'

"'Pierre Puvioux?'

"'Yes; I have just spoken with him. He passed under my windows, and is pushing forward like a madman.'

* * * * *

"For three or four years we had no news of Jean Chevaucheux; but we often spoke of that evening when the young soldier entered, bleeding and exhausted, into my father's house. What had become of him? How had ended that love romance so strangely begun?

"One day my father had to go to Mezieres on business, and he took me with him.

"At Mezieres he entered the first barber shop he came to, to get shaved. At the door of the shop was seated an infant, enjoying the sunshine, but at the same time blocking the way with his plump outspread legs.

"'Won't you let me pass?' asked my father, pleasantly.

"'No, I won't let zu pass,' cried the child.

"At that moment a man in his shirt sleeves appeared in the shop—the father—and taking the young gentleman up in his arms, removed him out of the way, saying as he did so:

"'What are you about, Pierre? Do you want to drive away the customers?'

"I recognised the voice. So did my father.

"We looked at the barber, and he looked at us; and suddenly, my father, and I uttered a simultaneous exclamation. The barber was Jean Chevaucheux. He instantly held out his hand. He was flushed and his face beaming.

"'Is it indeed you? Ah, when I think that I have never written to you—how ungrateful I must seem! Have you never heard? It was I who won the bride! I arrived first—first, you know!'

"And rushing to the back of the shop he called:

"'Marguerite! Marguerite! come quickly!'

"He appeared to be out of his wits with joy.

"A young woman appeared, pretty, fair-complexioned with blue eyes; her air gentle, pensive, a little sad even.

"'You see this—this gentleman?' he cried. 'Well, it was he who saved me, the night before I arrived at your father's—of whom I have spoken so often—Monsieur Decary!'

"'Ah!' cried Marguerite, with a sweet smile.

"And, turning upon us her large, calm eyes, she bowed and thanked us gently. Then, as her husband continued to call up the past she looked at him beseechingly, even a little reproachfully.

"But Jean did not see this.

"'Ah!' he cried, 'and it is to you, monsieur, I owe my happiness! My son—my little Pierre—look at him It was by my wife's wish that he was named Pierre—isn't he a fine fellow? My shop, which is going on as well as possible, my wife whom I worship, and my little Pierre I owe all to you!'"

R. Wilson.

An editor of a Western paper says that he has three times put on a clean shirt for the purpose of calling on the Mayor of his town, but did not see him, and concludes an account of his disappointments with the following:

"His worship is respectfully informed that we cannot afford to make another such run on our linen, and if we have the honour of making his acquaintance, he will have no reason to complain if we are not altogether in trim."

Digitized by Google

The Armoured Train.

It was a risky task, and the chances were one in a hundred of making a success of it; but nobody stopped to think of that, for the game was well worth the candle, and there was enough excitement to satisfy the most adventurous and daring spirit among us.

The following were Major Leoncio Vidal's plans:

We were to set out at daybreak on the following morning, ride down to the Camajuani Railroad, block the morning train with its load of guardia-civiles, compel them to surrender, dress ourselves in their uniforms, enter the town by the train, disguised in that manner, burn it, and then beat a retreat.

All this was to take place in broad daylight, with only thirty men at our disposal, and on the sixteenth day of March, in the year eighteen hundred and ninety-six.

Fun enough, we all thought, and that night, as we sat round our camp-fires, the woods resounded with the voices of our little band, all laughing merrily at the joke we were about to play.

The following morning, at the first note of the "réveillé," the men sprang to their feet, and in a few minutes we were all ready, every one eager for the coming lark.

In a little while we were en route for the appointed spot, Major Vidal and I making our number a round thirty, but no one thought of our strength, feeling sure a victory.

Major Vidal was greatly feared by our foes, being a great guerrilla fighter, and as brave a man as ever wore the rebel cockade. He would strike a blow and be miles away, laughing over its success, almost before the drowsy Spaniards awoke to that fact that he had been in their midst.

Before the war he was a resident of Camajuani, a town noted for its loyalty to Spain, and he never lost an opportunity of reminding them of that fact, keeping the inhabitants in a constant state of terror by frequently dashing into the town or firing on the forts—"keeping up his circle of acquaintances," as he called it.

The men looked fighters, every inch of them, dressed in their rough duck suits, and with their broad panama hats thrown back off the forehead; even the horses—faithful little friends—many of which bore the scars of former escapades, looked eager for work as they rattled their bits, wondering where we were going and impatient to arrive.

It was one of those mornings which can never be forgotten. Overhead was the beautiful clear blue sky of the tropics, the air was cool and full of the perfume of wild flowers, and the birds chirped merrily to one another from the branches above—a morning which makes one's thoughts fly back to home and peace, and causes a sigh to escape from the lips as one awakes to the stern reality of war.

Vidal and I rode next to each other at the head of our men, he giving me his orders for the day's work.

"What's that tin can doing there strapped to your saddle?" I asked, noticing a long cylindrical affair hanging by the side of his leg.

"That," he answered, with a broad grin, "is a secret. You will learn its use soon enough."

A short time afterwards we arrived at the line; the troop dismounted, tied their horses to trees and formed, awaiting orders.

I looked at my watch; half-past five. Our train was not due before eleven o'clock, so we had plenty of time in which to do the work carefully.

Vidal had chosen a spot which, if made to order, would not have suited our purpose better. On one side of the railway rose a high embankment, while on the other the earth lay smooth and bare as a billiard-table. Fifty yards further up, the line curved sharply round a wood, which would screen us from view until it was too late for the engine-driver to avoid the trap. Away in the distance loomed the church steeple of Camajuani, from the cross of which floated Spain's flag.

Sentinels were posted some distance apart on both sides of the line, and the men rapidly set to work loosening nails and heaping obstructions upon the metals.

Let me describe for the benefit of the reader what an armoured Spanish train means.

A few months previous to the time of which I write General Gomez had issued a proclamation stating that he forbade traffic of any kind upon the railway, and that fifteen days after date disobedience of orders would be at the risk of life.

The Spanish Government pooh-poohed the idea, but saw fit, however, to take their precautions, which they did in the following manner. An accident, such as being blown up by a dynamite bomb, could not, of course, be avoided, and they decided to fortify the trains so as to make their capture a thing almost impossible—by placing behind the engine a carriage full of soldiers, thoroughly equipped to do battle with a regiment.

The four sides of the carriage were covered with steel plates punctured by diamond-shaped loop-holes, but, in their sagacity, or probably not deeming it necessary, the Spaniards forgot to cover the roof in a like manner.

This was their only vulnerable point, but one of which we meant to take advantage, the blockade being so placed as to bring the protected carriage directly underneath the embankment from which we intended to fire.

At eight o'clock the work was finished, and the order was given to prepare breakfast.

Now, a morning's ride and work like that which we had done would sharpen the appetite of any man, and I felt in a condition to do justice to the most doubtful morsel.

When I had finished I walked over and joined Vidal, who still lingered over his frugal breakfast.

"We ought to make a success of this job," he said, looking with a suspicious eye upon a "shady" morsel. "Those beggars will not see the block until it is too late to stop."

"But," I exclaimed, accepting and lighting a cigarette, "suppose they run their engine into that block? It will jump the metals, and then we shall not be able to enter Camajuani as you intend."

"Why, that stuff would never cause the engine to jump the rail. Of course, the driver will see it the minute he comes round the curve, and he will reverse the engine. The obstacle will only serve to bring the train to a complete stop. What we must do is to fire as accurately as possible through the roof and blow the the scoundrels out of the carriage if they don't surrender. The rest is mere child's play."

I didn't quite see where the "child's play" came in, but of course I refrained from saying so.

Digitized by Google

"That train is due in twenty minutes," he said, later, glancing at his watch, "so you had better call in the sentinels and post the men."

I turned to obey his orders, noticing as I did so, that he took a long fuse out of his pocket, and I wondered where he had obtained the dynamite, and why he had not mentioned its acquisition to me.

The work had been well done. Enough rubbish was piled on the track to hinder the progress of the engine without causing a derailment, while further back several nails were loosened, to enable us to remove a rail after the train had passed, and in that manner prevent it from shunting out of the trap.

The sentries were soon collected, each man allotted his position, ordered to lie flat on the ground, and when the signal to fire was given to blaze away at the top of the carriage.

By this time "Old Sol" was getting almost unendurable, the back of my neck feeling anything but pleasant, and I mentally blessed the tradition which makes all trains late as the hands of my watch marked eleven and no signs of the train could be seen.

Suddenly the puffing of the locomotive could be heard in the distance, and we knew that the train would soon arrive. Laughter and jests ceased as if by magic—death was in the air.

Now the roar of the wheels could be heard tearing along; another second, and round the curve swung the engine.

In an instant the driver saw his peril and reversed the engine; too late, however, to avoid dashing half-way through the heap, where the engine stuck and the train came to a stop, with the armoured carriage directly beneath us.

"Diablo! what's the matter?" shouted a voice from the rear door, followed by a head imprudently stuck through the opening.

The questioner never found out, for a well-aimed bullet killed him. That shot had been the signal, and the men poured their fire through the roof of the car, to the disgust and rage of the Spaniards, who now found the tables turned, being shot down without seeing or firing upon their assailants.

Never had I felt so queer under fire. Here we were pumping lead into a pack of howling, panic-stricken men, while we ran comparatively no danger.

One of our men, carried away by the ludicrous situation, jumped down on the carriage, and in a second lay prone upon his face, pierced by innumerable bullets. He paid dearly for his foolhardiness.

A few moments later the man by my side was wounded, and after placing him in a safe position I returned to my post.

Hardly had I done so when I noticed Vidal making for the top of the bank with the tin cylinder in his hand, leaving in his wake a thin streak of smoke, caused by the fuse which he had lighted.

"This is adding insult to injury," I thought, as I watched him crawl down the embankment; but I consoled myself with the idea that they would have done the same to us, and I proceeded to watch the major.

On reaching the line he drew from his pocket a handkerchief, and holding it above his head, shouted:

"Hey! you men there, stop your firing! I wish to negotiate a small loan which will not inconvenience you in the least."

I repeated the same order to our men, who ceased firing, and were now watching their leader. A strange sight, to be sure, as he stood there, armed from head to foot, holding in one hand the flag of truce, while in the other he carried the bomb, with its spluttering and sizzling fuse.

Out of the door came a pale, horror-stricken face, with eyes that blinked incessantly as they peered through the smoke; a little red line down his chest showed where he had been hit, and I pitied him, as I watched him stand there, waiting for Vidal to speak.

"Now, look here," said the latter, in his commanding manner, "you are all in a pretty bad stew in there"—here the man worked his mouth into a smile which was positively painful to behold—"and I feel for you all. So, after consulting with my captain"—pointing at me, which gesture I acknowledged by saluting the officer, who returned it in a very dignified manner—"I have determined, provided you surrender, to free you all upon the following conditions:

"First, that you pass out all your guns; second, that you exchange your uniforms for ours; and third, that you take up the positions which we now hold."

"And if we refuse, señor, what will happen?" replied the lieutenant, for such he was.

"Why, you will not be in a condition to regret it fifteen minutes later," answered Vidal, as he placed the bomb directly underneath the carriage.

"Here, put that thing out!" cried the Spaniard. "I will agree to your terms. It means dishonour and death to me, but I will do it for the sake of my men."

"It is a soldier's duty to die," replied Vidal, sarcastically. "Make haste," he continued, "for that match won't last all day."

And quick work they made of it, for in ten minutes we stood dressed in the Spanish uniforms, and a pile of arms lay on the ground.

By this time someone had hauled the driver and fireman from beneath the carriage and ordered them to start the train. Placing our prisoners on the embankment, we tipped our hats, and, with farewell words of consolation and advice to them, we started on our way to Camajuani, happy at the success of our venture.

But we shouted too soon, for hardly had we gone a mile when we saw coming towards the line a large body of infantry and cavalry, and we knew that the game was up.

For a moment Vidal thought of attempting to pass as friends, but the risk was too great, the enemy outnumbering us by ten to one; so the train was stopped and the order to retreat given.

The Spaniards saw us, and in another moment the bullets commenced to drop in our midst. It is hard enough work for a cavalryman to run, especially loaded down with the accroutrements of two men, as the majority of us were. I mourned the absence of my little horse, and as I jumped fences and cleared ditches I wondered if André had had sense enough to place him in a safe spot.

Fortunately, the enemy did not pursue us, and after a mile or so we were all brought up breathless in a sheltering wood.

We had lost two men and had three wounded—small pay for such a rich capture of arms and ammunition as we had made.

"Where is that can?" shouted Vidal, after he had recovered enough breath to be able to speak.

No one replied.

"Confound it all!" he continued, "that thing held my only pair of extra trousers; and here I am, dressed in this uniform, with the bright prospect of going through all the war in it."

Cyril Humphrey.

Digitized by Google

A REVOLT.

A STORY FOR CHILDREN.

THE forest was awake, and the light mist that floats in the morning air began to shimmer into silvery flakes under the sultry rays of the August sun.

"It is going to be a lovely day," said an early-rising Daisy as she lifted her dainty little head from out a tuft of grass. She drew a long breath, filling her lungs with the balmy air, and stretched her tender green stem, after having bathed in the life-giving dew of the morning.

"Oh! oh!" exclaimed an old white-headed Nettle that lived a few steps off under a grand old oak, and had observed with a grave, experienced eye the morning toilet of her neighbour. "More plans for conquest, my dear Daisy? I fancy that our good friend Buttercup won't be a bachelor much longer judging from the style you are carrying on, you little coquette!"

"Oh, is that you, Granny Nettle? Good morning to you!" and young Miss Daisy bent her delicate head in respectful salutation to Mother Nettle, whom everybody loved and venerated because she always gave such good, sensible advice.

Just then an old thistle, who had fixed his abode between the great stones which made a sort of fortress for him, uttered an exclamation of joyous surprise. Having glanced at his feet on waking up, he had perceived that a family of Violets, to whom he had offered his hospitality, and whom he protected by his influence had been increased by some pretty little ones, who smiled up at him with their sweet amethyst eyes.

During all this the handsome Buttercup had been strolling about with his sweetheart Daisy and flirting lovingly, while a foppish Wood-lily was holding an animated conversation with a Sweetbriar, that blushed with pleasure and bent over him to hear the better his honeyed compliments.

A couple of wild Strawberries lived modestly, a little retired, and watched affectionately the gambols of their numerous and restless offspring, who pushed their noses into everything, as children will do.

"Look out! Look out, my friends!" suddenly cried a young Grasshopper, approaching with hurried bounds. "Another picnic party is coming, like the one that killed so many of you last month; let us form some plan of defence, and not submit to be slaughtered by these human beings without pity or remorse."

This terrible news affrighted all the little groups of flowers, and each one fell to lamenting the hard fate that was impending.

"No! no!" cried the little Daisy, struggling from the arms of the Buttercup, who was trying to kiss her. "I will not submit to be murdered like my sisters—to have my petals torn out one by one to that monotonous litany, 'He loves me! a little—much, dearly—passionately—not at all;' when, unfortunately, the 'not at all' falls on my last leaf, and they throw away my poor mutilated body, and trample furiously upon it to wreak their vengeance. Vengeance for what?—because for the most part I tell them the truth, and should be worshipped as an oracle, instead of slain like a traitor. Let us defend ourselves! War to mankind!"

"For once Daisy is right," said the Nettle. "Look at my case! Do you think that I like to know beforehand that I'm going to be stewed to make a cooling draught for sick people? That has been the fate of all my race for centuries. Vengeance is my cry; I'll show these savages that I can sting!"

"Right," said the Thistle. "I'm with you, and this very moment I will sharpen my thorns to pierce the invaders."

"No murder, I beg of you," said the Mother Violet. "Rather than see the blood of my friends and fellow-citizens flow, I will die myself, with my children. Mr. Thistle, you who are so good, and have so generously given us an asylum in your castle, do not expose yourself to ruin. These people are more powerful than we. Hide yourself under yon great rocks and you will pass unnoticed and escape being torn from our affection and gratitude." And she gazed at him with her great blue, supplicating eyes.

The Thistle, under his rude exterior, had a tender and generous heart, and was deeply moved by this proof of friendship; but he was far too loyal and brave to desert his comrades, and basely seek safety in ignominious concealment; so he insisted on Madam Violet and her daughters taking refuge beneath his tough and well-armed leaves, and promised to be cautious and prudent.

"As for me," said the Buttercup, who would not show cowardice before the martial eyes of his Daisy, "I shall go and seek a family of Ants that lives in my neighbourhood, and to whom I have been able to do many a good turn. Ants are very ingenious people, and may serve us at our need."

"And I," cried a young Daffodil, who was imprudently leaning over the edge of the pond to admire his own image, "I have only to make a sign to our friends, the Frogs, and the entire nation will help us."

Some wild Vines that climbed about the old oak-tree promised their aid also, which was the more welcome, as it was precisely the shelter of the massive tree and its thick foliage that attracted the merrymakers whose advent was so dreaded.

The Lily had been busy while the others were talking, and a whole army of Wood-ticks were already marshalled for the fight.

Some tardy Bluebells that were just opening their eyes and yawning, offered a hiding-place in their blossoms to a legion of Gnats, who were detailed to fall foul of the enemy immediately the battle should begin.

The doughty Grasshopper went to call forth his brethren, promising to be back in good time to spring upon the foe.

An old Squirrel, who had been listening intently to the proceedings, approached near and volunteered for the defence.

"You shall see," said his furship, "how I propose to help you, for I hate these invaders as much as you do—these barbarians, who catch us and put us in a cage that goes round and round every time we try to move—a treadmill for innocent people—horrible!"

"War! war to the knife!" shouted all.

"Silence!" cried the Nettle. "Everyone to his station; no noise; concentrate your strength, and don't begin the attack till the enemy is settled down to gorge! Then we will teach the savage a lesson; nevermore shall they dare to invade our solitude or disturb our peace. No mercy! no quarter! Flowerland expects that everyone this day will do his duty!"

Digitized by Google

* * * * *

Two big wagonettes drew near. "There's the very place they told me of," exclaimed a voice, "there, at the foot of that great oak, on the borders of the pond. Halt!"

Everybody got out of the vehicles, quickly or slowly, according to age or corpulence. Two footmen in livery betook themselves to laying a tablecloth on the grass, and spreading on it all sorts of delicacies—pastries, terrines of foie gras, roast fowls, delicate pink hams, lobster salad with hard boiled eggs and lettuce, fruit, cakes, to tempt all tastes; wines, from humble claret to royal champagne; even boiling water to make coffee; nothing was neglected.

The sharp woodland air had given everyone an appetite; the company hastened to sit down on the grass, not without some jostling, with peals of laughter and rustling of silks.

"Good gracious!" cried a little dimpled fair one all at once, who had sat down near the Nettle, which began the fray by stinging her on the bare arm, "somebody pull up this horrible weed!"

As if these words had been a preconcerted signal, and before the servants could execute the order, a host of Frogs leapt upon the table with a horrible croaking, followed by an army of Ants, and a cloud of Gnats, which attacked the necks, the eyes, and the faces of the holiday makers, who uttered the most lamentable cries of pain and terror. The Wood-ticks fell upon the servants, who literally disappeared from sight under the mass of insects, and were quite unable to attend to the numerous and agonised commands of their superiors. One gentleman, who had torn off a branch from the oak to disperse the Gnats, was so vehemently pricked by the Thistle, that he ignominiously deserted the fray, and ran for dear life.

Then fell on the devoted heads of the company an avalanche of nuts and acorns that pelted them like a hail-storm.

It was the good old Squirrel who sacrificed his winter store in the cause of his friends.

Now came up the Grasshoppers in myriads to reinforce the rest of the attack. There was a terrible battle.

"Let us fly, let us quit this accursed place," screamed everbody; and they fled, routed, and indefatigably pursued by the swarms of insects, the most timid of which plucked up courage to sting and bite—so true is it that "it is only the first step that costs."

After their escape the fugitives stuffed themselves higgledy-piggledy into the wagonettes, which started at full speed, even the very horses being driven to madness by the stinging of the infuriated Gnats, who could not forbear the battle, even though victors.

A few moments after, the Wild-wood Flowers danced a saraband on the damask table-cloth, while the Squirrel, aided by all his family, stuffed his hole in the oak tree with a plentiful provision for the winter, discussing, as they worked, various delicate cakes and unknown dainties, which the unlucky owners had not had time to touch.

The Ants, always provident, did not neglect the possibilities of the occasion to fill their underground storehouses, and a whole macaroon was pushed, dragged, and rolled patiently into their abode, where there was a general indigestion that night.

The Daisy could not contain herself for joy, and allowed her sweetheart Buttercup to embrace her to his heart's content, which condescension so elated that "gilded youth" that his face shone like the sun with rapture; while, to complete the general happiness, the Thistle proposed that the wedding should be celebrated at once, he himself officiating as parson, and making some very poignant remarks at the conclusion of the ceremony. All drank the happy couple's health and prosperity in foaming brimmers of the captured champagne, which unaccustomed beverage caused most of the company to tangle their stalks in great confusion.

Towards evening the forest-rangers, passing by the battlefield, saw with astonishment the pell-mell confusion in which were scattered silver, china, provisions, hats, umbrellas, and shawls; they gathered them up, and took them to the lodge, to be re-claimed by their owners, little suspecting the terrible battle that had caused all this rich spoil to be left on the field.

As they carried these things off they were greeted by a peal of mocking laughter; they looked round, but did not discover that the laugh proceeded from Buttercup and Daisy, who were in good spirits, naturally.

Nobody ever appeared to claim the abandoned property, and, since that memorable event, not a single picnic has dared to disturb the peace and content of the valiant flowers and the gallant allies.

Fred Lyster.

A WORD TO THE SPORTSMAN.

Perhaps the characteristic which, more than all others, is common to every Anglo-Saxon is his love of sport and adventure. Not only does he spend his leisure at home either as an active participant or as an onlooker at one or other of our national games, but his roving spirit carries him into the furthest and least explored corners of the earth in search of game of another sort in pursuit of which he meets with many stirring adventures and hair-breadth escapes.

It is, however, only the fortunate few who possess the time and the means to indulge their tastes in this direction, and most of us have to content ourselves with reading of these things in expensive books or magazines. This will be so no longer, for each Wednesday in future, every reader of these lines will be able to purchase

"PASTIMES"

A Weekly Magazine of Sport and Adventure.

Pastimes is a publication which will appeal to every sport-loving Briton; it will deal with sport and adventure in all parts of the world as well as at home. There will be special articles by experts upon the questions which are uppermost in the minds of followers of games, interviews with leading lights in the sporting world, sporting stories and tales of adventure—all these and more will be found in Pastimes, which is our old friend Pearson's Athletic Record in a new and greatly improved form.

At the same time the old popular features of the Athletic Record will be retained, while the paper will be made more attractive by the addition of a cover and greatly improved artistic treatment.

Don't fail to buy next Wednesday a copy of Pastimes—it is still only a penny, for which you will get, both as regards the quality and nature of its literary contents as well as its artistic treatment, what its sub-title claims for it,

A Magazine of Sport and Adventure.

BOOK III.—CONCERNING THE - - RULE OF KING OLERON.

CHAPTER V.

How Murtagh O'Neill essayed the rôle of Theseus: how war was decided on: and how the Ermans refused to learn a "complete art of war" other than their own.

In the olden days, so the fable runs, there was a vast building in the island of Crete, so full of rooms and winding passages that it was named the Labyrinth. In it was imprisoned the Minotaur, a monster half-bull, half-man. The Minotaur's food was human beings, and to supply this delicacy King Minos levied a yearly tax on the Athenians who were tributary to him. They had to send over seven chosen boys, and the same number of maidens, who were thrust into the Labyrinth as food for the monster. Bitter was the wailing of parents; but their tears were of no avail, till Theseus killed the Minotaur by the aid of Ariadne, Minos' daughter.

In like fashion, Murtagh O'Neill was destined to deliver the Ermans from their Minotaur, and, though there was a woman mixed up in the case also, it was for her sake, and not through her instrumentality, that he did the deed.

And this is how it came about.

The trio of them had departed very sorrowfully to their abode on the Ledge, and discussed the situation most thoroughly until far on into the night, but without hitting upon any definite plan. They all agreed that the human tax was iniquitous, savage, and unworthy of the darkest of the dark ages. But how to evade it they could not decide. There seemed, as far as they could tell, but one possible alternative to prompt payment. The envoys might be sent back empty-handed. But what would be the result? Beyond a doubt, Daji would descend upon Erma in all its martial array, and the point would be argued out vi et armis. There would be numbers slain on either side—and, alas! eaten by either side—and in the end, could the gentle Ermans hope to triumph over their hardy, warlike adversaries? Even the sanguine Irishman was obliged to admit that case would be hopeless. Man for man the Dajians were the stronger, and they could put a larger force in the field by two to one. Erma was women-swamped still. The ranks of males, thinned by slaughter in the late war, had not yet been refilled.

No. To start such a war, would only be to make matters far worse than they were at present.

So the three turned sadly into their hammocks, and tried to forget their sorrows in sleep.

Morning came, as it will whether raven grief or gaily plumaged joy is on the wing; and with the dawn the three Europeans got to their feet, heavy-eyed, unrefreshed. They didn't speak to one another, but had their morning meal in stolid silence. Each felt the shame put on his manhood, and dared not trust his tongue.

The village below was already astir. The hum of that human hive reached them over the tree tops. With tacit consent they all took their way down the steep path, and then along the stream's side. The birds were singing their sweetest, the flowers were dressed in their most brilliant array. White-bodied kingfishers, with azure heads and wings, were wading in the rivulet. The jewel-backed lizards had come out for the daily sun-bath. Nature smiled and went on with her work as usual. Only man, Nature's eldest child, was in mourning

They came into the village, still garlanded with its lovely orchids, still revelling in the background of brilliant tropical vegetation. But the beauty of the place was repulsive to them; it seemed a malignant mockery to the misery of its human inhabitants.

Married women were sitting down, rocking themselves to and fro, crooning mournfully. Gloomy-faced men were standing about in knots of twos and threes, talking in moody undertones. The young of both sexes seemed almost beside themselves with terror—as well they might be.

The Europeans, unused to so violent a display of outward grief—justly called for though it might have been—could not have stood the scene for long.

Mytto came up to them. "Ebry has been trying to persuade the King to have you sent," he said. "But Oleron made reply that if a white man went to Daji, the chief sorcerer should go with him."

"I guessed Ebry would try that," replied Sneyd. "It was a foolish move on his part."

He said no more then, but the chief sorcerer's amiable intentions on their behalf was not likely to be forgotten by either of the three white men. However, the individual in question put in his appearance just then, and the ghastly object of his visit put all other questions on one side of the nonce. He had with him two bags of tappa, and in sight of every one he placed into each four scarlet beans, and then added into one as many white beans—less four—as there were unmarried girls under the age of twenty; and into the other a corresponding number for the boys. All under the age of thirteen were exempt from the drawing. The rest poor trembling things, were thrust, or came of their own accord, into the centre of the green.

The boys drew first. Ebry called the names, and one by one they came and hazarded their lives. Four got the fateful colour, and remained silently and stoically by the chief sorcerer's side. The others ran joyfully back to their relatives.

Digitized by Google

Then came the girls' turn. Poor shrinking things they were plucky enough too when it came to the point, and dipped their little fingers into the unlucky bag with scarcely so much as a tremble. Ten passed the ordeal unscathed. Then Ebry called for Mytto's sister.

Poor Norah went forward, walking with head proudly erect and unfaltering step. Into the fateful bag went her slender arm. She drew it out again, held up a scarlet bean, and stepped back without a moment's hesitation amongst the four doomed lads at the chief sorcerer's side, she glanced in O'Neill's direction. His burning glance met hers, and in three bounds he was beside her.

"Beware," cried Ebry, "lest you share her fate," and tried to snatch the girl away. The Irishman's great hard fist drove through the air, and the chief sorcerer went to earth with a thud that could be heard all round the circle.

Instantly there arose a scene of wild uproar. The older men, with the memory of that awful war still green upon them, were for sending in their eight victims. The younger men and most of the women were on the side of the whites. Some ran to their homes for weapons, others snatched anything heavy that was at hand—hoes, logs of wood, stones even. O'Neill, with Norah beside him, was standing back to a great cotton-wood tree with his drawn sheath knife clutched in a brawny fist, and a look upon his face that boded ill for anyone who interfered with him. Sneyd and Sandy were at hand similarly armed, ready to back up their companion if he was molested. It seemed as if civil war would be added to the other horror.

The chief sorcerer went to earth with a thud.

The chief of the village saw this. He had been wavering between the two parties with muttering lip and puckered brow. He was drumming restlessly on the ground with a heavy spiked war-club he held in his hand, and was evidently arguing out what course of policy he ought to pursue. He looked at Ebry, who had picked himself up, and was standing in the midst of an excited group of elders. And then he looked at the tree which was the opposite faction's rallying-point. His friends, the three white men, were there; his best loved daughter was with them, saved at any rate for the present; his only son, who would succeed him in the chieftainship, had just thrown in his lot with those who were seeking to protect his sister from hurt.

Maantee's mind was made up. He walked across to the cotton-wood tree, and planting himself in front of the group, leaned moodily upon the end of his club, and awaited developments.

The villagers had most of them been waiting for a lead. They were simple-minded folk, and unused to making up their minds on so momentous a question as one which would mean peace or war for the entire nation. But now that their chief had made his decision, most of them were contented to follow it. He was a man who never stepped in the dark. The move that he had taken, if good enough for him, was sufficiently well considered for them. So some singly, others in knots, they walked across the space, till nearly three-quarters of the excited crowd gathered round the cotton tree.

The few who were left stayed in the middle of the green, with Ebry exhorting vehemently amongst them. But they were far quieter than they had been before the division. They had no wish to resort to arms now. The disparity of numbers was too great. And so they let their weapons hang idly in their hands, and awaited the course of events.

Maantee stood forward. The murmuring voices of both groups were hushed. Every ear was strained expectantly The chief plunged in medias res without any useless preamble.

"So far as my village is concerned," he said, "the die is cast. An attempt has been made to levy the human tribute, which the emissaries of Daji are waiting for. Some of us have shown conclusively by our actions that we intend to resist the demand to the uttermost. The majority of us have declared in favour of this move and so the whole are involved. There are two courses left open for King Oleron to take. Either he must band together the other villages and make war on this, so as to subject it and make it render up its quota of victims; or he must bid the others make common cause with us, so that we all stand or fall together as one nation. Those who remember how kind and fatherly is King Oleron's rule, can have small doubt as to which alternative he will take. This terrible tribute has long weighed upon his mind with burning force. He has oftentimes consulted with us, his chiefs, how the island might be released from the cruel impost. And now that a firm stand has been made, I do not think he will be slow to seize on the opportunity of throwing off his chains altogether. So let every man go to his house, and make ready his tools of war. I will away to lay our case before the King. Mytto will have my charge till I return to take it up again."

Long accustomed to the system of patriarchal rule, the villagers received their chief's words with implicit confidence, and departed to their several abodes without delay; and the three whites, after satisfying themselves that there was no immediate fear of any fresh attempt to drag Norah and her co-unfortunates away, took themselves off forthwith to the Ledge.

"Whatever happens we're in for a scrimmage now," said O'Neill, "so we'd better be afther looking to see what there's in the armoury."

They had thought of this subject of lethal weapons before, in the quiet days when there was no immediate prospect of using them. The natives had long slender lances tipped with stone, or fish-bones; arrows similarly headed, and weak bows; shields made of light flimsy wicker-work, and great clumsy clubs. These they despised. Broadsword, hanger, or cutlass they would have been contented with; but none of these was forthcoming. The only steel blades available were their sailor's sheath-knives. But these were all worn thin with constant use, and even at its best a short one-edged dagger is but a poor weapon to wield in a regular bonâ fide battle, whatever may be its excellences in an indiscriminate hand to hand mêlée.

Digitized by Google

But they were not resourceless. On the 17th of January, 1745, Sneyd and O'Neill had seen the furious rush of the highland clansman at Falkirk break through the centre and left of King George's cavalry. They had seen those same kilted mountaineers doing wonders to avert defeat on the awful 16th of April at dark Culloden Moor. And they had seen them fight at other times besides. They were armed, some of them with musket, dirk, skene, and pistols, but few put much reliance on these. It was on claymore and target they placed their trust; and it was with the small round shields on their left arms, and the heavy basket-hilted broadswords in the other hands, that their furious charges were driven so remorselessly home.

The claymore was a cutting weapon. Its blow depended much upon the weight of blade and hilt, and upon the strength of the arm which drove it. So at a pinch a heavy wooden cudgel might be substituted with almost as good effect.

"You and I are very strong, O'Neill," said the ex-cornet, when they were discussing this point; "and Sandy here is a tougher handful than many of the natives would care about tackling If we can get well-balanced bludgeons, not too light and not too heavy, we ought to make fair stick-play with them; and a light strong target will help to keep our own heads safe, whilst we are endeavouring to break other people's."

There was no bull's-hide available wherewith to make the targets, nor iron plates, nor brass nails, nor steel spikes. But a disc of the iron-bark tree would be hard enough to turn either the point or the edge of a native weapon; and from this material they set about making their shields. The work took a considerable amount of care and patience, but they stuck to it, and got the three targets completed within a day and a half.

O'Neill contemplated his handiwork with a look of comic dismay. "I've fit wid most things from fists to sixteen-pounder carronades," he said, "an' have been in all sorts of scuffles, from pitched battles betwixt kings to chape scrimmages afther a cock-fight, but I've never tried to carry a bulkhead like this in front of me. Begob, but it's a terrible impediment."

"You won't think it an impediment," said Sneyd drily, when you want to parry blow or thrust. "You'll find the wooden bulwark come in more usefully than your unprotected arm could do, tough as shoe-leather though its skin may be."

"Maybe you're right," admitted the Irishman. "Many's the time I've fingered blackthorn at weddin' or wake. But that was always for breakin' heads in a friendly sort of way. With this shillelagh"—he posed his new club thoughtfully —"there's different sort of business to be done. Don't yez think now, that the hard end might be ornamented a thrifle? I've heard me father say, that in the auld days a half-fut or so of scythe-blade let into the end made a very sweet wapon. There's no scythe handy, o' course, but I was thinking that a few nate spikes of this same ironwood would make a handmoser tool of it."

Sneyd shuddered. "War always had its ugly side," he said, "but you are showing up some very inartistic details. Don't be so confoundedly bloodthirsty, man."

"Bloodthirsty is it!" exclaimed O'Neill, with sudden energy. "And why not? I don't deny it. I am going to be bloodthirsty when this business comes on. Look you, I'm going just to kill as many of them Dajians as ever strength an' luck will let me. Dirty, savage-minded cannibals, they cumber the face of the earth."

"They are cannibals, certainly. But, then, remember the Ermans are no better. This is a bad business, anyway. There will be some wild, awful scenes after the fight."

"You mean?" said Sandy.

"I mean that our quiet, gentle friends down in the village yonder will turn to tigers when once they have smelt slaughter. Look how the savage instincts glared from their faces when the row started over that infernal bean-bag. If one blow had been struck, don't you think there would have been a general mêlée? And if we three happened to have gone under, aren't you sure that the very men who dined with us yesterday would have dined upon us to-morrow? The reason is obvious, according to their lights. We are reputed clever. We are clever, compared to them. They hold—the teaching of ages has told them—that the brain, the wit, the soul of the eaten is taken up by the eater. Add to which belly is one of their chiefest gods, and human flesh the greatest delicacy. As to the social crime of cannibalism, that has never dawned on them. We were at fault there. Whilst the land was quiet, and we had influence, we should have inveighed against it. Now, I fear, it is too late. They are over-excited to listen to calm and dispassionate reasoning. However loudly we expressed our loathing for such practices, I fear they would never quit the feast, if human flesh was steaming in the ovens."

The other two felt the sad truth of what Sneyd had said, and made no attempt to controvert it. Whatever way the tide of war might turn, there would be black, awful scenes enacted on that fair tropical island before another month had passed away.

But it was no time for unavailing regret. King Oleron had decided for war. The younger and more hot-headed spirits had been for opening the ball by killing and eating the Dajian envoys there and then. But the old King forbade this. His motives for doing so were perhaps not very high ones. He said that, if the men returned to Daji empty-handed, but with sound skins, their countrymen would think that the Ermans felt themselves strong again, and were prepared for the consequences of their act. This idea might take hold, and so war would be averted. On the other hand, if their envoys were—or—disposed of, the news would soon leak out, and then war would be declared for vengeance, if for no other motive. So the scowling savages were put into their canoes with very scant ceremony, and found themselves making for Daji, not at all sorry to find their skins were safe so far.

In the meanwhile no time was lost. The hope that Daji would not seek to reimpose the tribute by force was too slender a one to be much relied upon. War preparations were set on foot without delay, and the whole island was in a bustle.

It must not be supposed that the military re-organisation was anything after the European style. There were no regiments to fill up to a war footing. There were no factories where extra pressure could turn out arms and ammunition in rapid, hourly stream. There was no arsenal full of warlike stores and other necessities for a campaign. Each man provided his own weapons, and held himself in readiness to do whatever his chief ordered. Each man would, more or less, fight for his own hand. There was no mobilisation.

The Ermans had numberless canoes. I suppose one might say they had a fleet. But the Dajians had established such a reputation for naval prowess, that it was decided to make no attempt to give them battle on the seas. So the canoes were drawn up high and dry, and most of them hidden, as far as possible, amongst the mangrove bushes, in swamps, where nobody was likely to come across them.

The three Europeans, with the energy that was their birthright, tried hard, but vainly, to get the chiefs to settle on some definite plan of defence. The Ermans had fought for ages according to circumstances which cropped up on the day of battle, and military manœuvres were beyond them. There was not time, when the war trumpet had sounded, to teach tactics to a whole nation utterly ignorant of them. Sneyd laboured earnestly to instil the rudiments of drill into the villagers in his own immediate vicinity. Some of them attended to him at first, out of mere curiosity; but even those soon tired, got listless, and finally strolled carelessly off, and refused to trouble themselves further.

Digitized by Google

"We have done our best," said Sneyd disgustedly, after giving up his attempt. "But they are just hopeless. If I'd authority I'd brain two or three, to teach the others discipline. But that's the worst of it. I have no real command over them. Mytto would back me up, I believe, if he were chief. But Maantee thinks drilling mere foolery; and although he was too polite to stop me, he's far too apathetic to make the beggars try and pay any useful attention. I even went over and expostulated with Oleron about it, but he's as bad as the rest. He shrugged his shoulders, said something about it being useless to alter what's bred in the bone, and clearly showed he didn't see the use of interfering."

"Things look blue," remarked O'Neill, and then there was a silence, which Sandy broke. "You have omitted one thing from your calculations," he said. "The Dajians are probably just as undisciplined as these fellows are here. So, as regards that, we shall stand on an equal footing of disadvantage."

CHAPTER VI.

How the Dajian canoes landed on Erma: how a great battle was fought: and how Sandy Carmichael discouraged anthropophagy.

The shores of Erma were of two kinds, approachable and unapproachable. The latter consisted of those portions which were fringed with mangrove bushes. These grew in deep, slimy, stinking mud, with the salt water oozing in and amongst them, so that it was hard to tell where sea ended and land really began. No one would think of landing amongst the mangroves. But on the other portions of the coast there was a foreshore of coral shingle, on which one could beach a canoe with the greatest ease.

The shores of Erma were deserted by all human beings. An enemy was hourly expected, but no Erman ever dreamed of turning out on sentry-go during the hours of darkness; and it was night now. The moon had raced her course, and had sunk out of sight under the horizon. But the stars were out, twinkling like little sparks of white or yellow light through the purple darkness overhead. Beyond the black waters of the lagoon one could see a fairly continuous and ever-moving line of white. That was the Pacific swell breaking itself on the jagged coral of the barrier-reef, and spreading into shrieking, yeasty surge. Further out all was veiled in the velvety darkness.

Gradually the blackness began to become less opaque, to thin, as it were. Morning was coming. But it did not rise gradually, after the manner we are accustomed to in our temperate zone. It comes almost as rapidly as the smoke clears away after a gunshot. A grey spectral shadow was cast over the labouring rollers; that was the dawn. Then followed the first rays of light, flashing into view at the far and calm edge of the ocean. A live ember shot up from below, rested for a moment on the rim, and then, in a matter of seconds, the red sun stood full and round on the level east, and the long tropical day had begun.

There were men to see the sunrise on this special day, which was something out of the common. Ocean was as a rule deserted, and land asleep. But although Erma was as usual still wrapped in slumber, there had been some bold mariners piloting their night's course by the stars. When day broke, there might have been seen eight-and-forty canoes, all more or less large, standing in for the entrance of the reef. They were all under sail, and were all lashed two and two in a manner which has been previously described. They were in no particular order or formation, and the sternmost craft was at the end of a broken line that straggled quite three miles away from the leaders. But this seemed to concern no one. Canoe after canoe slipped out of the heavy ocean swell into the smooth waters of the lagoon. Steersmen aroused their sleeping crews, and sail was run down. The double canoes were separated into their component vessels, each manned by a complete crew of paddlers who were also fighting men.

There was no hurry exhibited. The shore was apparently (and really) still deserted, but the first invaders showed no immediate inclination to disembark. They sat in their narrow craft eating up the remainder of their sea stores, chatting, inspecting their weapons. Not until the last laggard had come in through the barrier reef, and leisurely prepared for action, was the word passed round to head in for shore.

To view the combat from the side of the Ermans.

All the males of the island, save the aged and very young, had been turned out at the first alarm, and mustered on the beach. They were in ample time to receive the invaders. They could have done nothing by being earlier. The white men's notion of planting sentries was new, and therefore absurd. As it was, by sticking to tradition, no one of them had lost their night's repose; and if one or other of the whites had been on the watch all night, well, there was no doubt as to who was the loser by such a piece of foolery. Why, they had even had time to send the women and children away into tolerably safe hiding in the woods, in case of—well in case of any awkward contingency.

So they stood on the shingle, and wasting their wind by calling out insulting names to the advancing Dajians, which the Dajians on their part returned with interest. These preliminary vollies did no one any harm, and did no one any material good. But the interchange of verbal courtesies of this kind is a necessity to savage nations before they feel in fighting trim, as we learn from Homer and other writers who have chronicled their deeds.

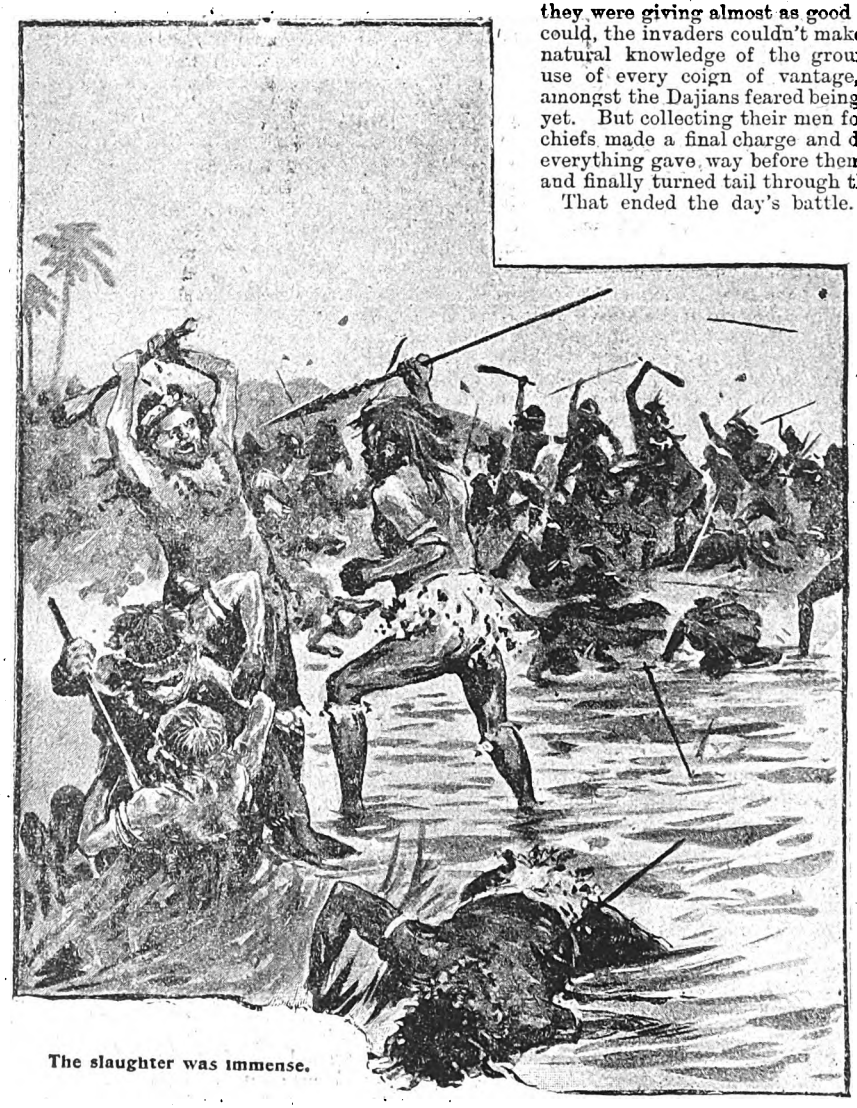
When the canoes were within range, or a little before, missiles began to be exchanged. The Dajians heralded their coming with a few arrows, but most of them were too busily engaged in paddling for the supply to be large. The Ermans, on the other hand, having no other occupation, relieved their excitement, which was naturally intense, by firing as rapidly as their muscles would let them. They shot their arrows, which did but little harm; they threw lances, which, for the most part, fell wide of the mark; and they hove jagged prices of coral, which, if true to their aim, either bruised or benumbed, but never killed.

And so the keels of the canoes grated on the shingle with but few casualties amongst their occupants.

However, there had been enough shouting, and enough of ugly matters hurling about to get men's blood up; and so there was little hesitation in commencing the next phase of the combat. In the canoes in the water, on the white shingle, the battle sprung into red cruel life. It was hack, hew, thrust, and parry; and as the savages grew savager, it grew to be hack and hew, and thrust alone, for each panted to get a blow home in his adversary's body, rather than to guard his own head from fracture.

The slaughter was immense. It always is when men fight hand-to-hand, instead of aiming at one another with fire-arms, which they can't hold straight. It was a case of kill or be killed, and very often of kill and be killed. The combat reddened as it proceeded. The white coral strand was crimsoned in the places where it wasn't hidden with still or writhing bodies. The ruddy wavelets washed corpses to and fro at the water edge. There was no sparing of wounded men. If any one went down some one was sure to smash in his skull with a mace, or slash him with a heavy wooden sword, and then the rest of the combatants would trample him thoroughly under foot to make sure that he wouldn't come round again. It was a hot thing whilst it lasted.

Digitized by Google



The slaughter was immense.

Gradually—none could say when or where it began—the field of battle began to move. At first it drifted slowly, but once the mass of men had gone on the move, its own momentum helped to keep it going. Indeed, till they found themselves amongst the outermost scraps of the vegetation, few on either side knew that retreat and pursuit had in effect commenced. But the change from cool, splashing water, to scratching stubborn shrubs was too marked to pass by unnoticed even in such a tropical fight as that was; and so, whilst it filled the Ermans with feelings akin to despair it raised the hopes of the men of Daji even above what they were before.

But the battle was not finished yet. Disputing stubbornly every inch of the way, the Ermans fought on with stubborn fury, and many a stout man went to earth in cover that was too thick to make sure where the lethal blow came from. Nor was the day lost or won. That the Ermans were in retreat—compulsory retreat—it is true, but they were giving almost as good as they took; and do what they could, the invaders couldn't make them run. Indeed, from their natural knowledge of the ground, they made such thorough use of every coign of vantage, that the more faint-hearted amongst the Dajians feared being driven back into the sea even yet. But collecting their men for one berserk effort, the Dajian chiefs made a final charge and delivered it with such fury that everything gave way before them. The Ermans wavered, broke, and finally turned tail through the trees.

That ended the day's battle. There was no pursuit. The Dajian leaders knew too well the danger of ambushes in such thick jungle as that into which the Erman army had filtered away. Besides, their men's skins were too full of wasps' stings to chance them near any more wasps' nests. So they drew them off, and taking possession of a deserted village on the coast, overhauled the field of battle, licked their wounds, and spent the rest of the day and much of the evening eating—well, if you can't guess what, I'm not going to tell you.

It is a strange thing, but if a bagged fox be set down in his own neighbourhood, he will run (if circumstances permit of his running long enough) for his own earth. He may start off in a totally different direction. But in the end he is sure to make for the old familiar cavity.

And so with the Ermans. Many of them ran a long way through the woods; many hid there for a considerable number of hours, out of wind, out of spirits; but by nightfall, all who were capable of doing so instinctively moved back towards their own proper villages. They advanced to them cautiously, carefully, suspecting ambushes, trembling at a sound, hiding from their own friends, dodging their own brothers. But they reached their homes—all save those unfortunates whose settlement was occupied by the Dajians—and then they, too, must need start their orgie.

Again details are needless. And for comment we may say that they didn't know any better.

But in the village which was under Maantee's patriarchal government there was a row about the matter, and the three Europeans were at the bottom of it. It happened in this wise. They had fought for all they were worth so long as fighting was going on, had each done more than his share of damage to the invaders' limbs and bodies, and then when everybody else ran, they ran too. Having nowhere better to go to, they followed the fox's plan and ran home. There they turned from killing men to curing them. At this latter practice Sandy added to his already great reputation, and bandaged, sewed, splinted, and amputated with as much coolness as he had done on board ship with a proper case of tools, and every piece of special tackle ready to hand.

He was in the act of relieving Maantee of a couple of badly-smashed fingers, when a great shouting arose close by, of which he naturally inquired the reason.

Digitized by Google

"They're bringing in some Dajians."

"Prisoners?"

The chief smiled. "No, they're dead."

"What are you going to do with them. Bury 'em?"

Maantee signified that portions of the deceased would shortly be entombed in his own stomach.

Sandy Carmichael went stolidly on with his operation; amputated the fingers, and dressed the stumps. Then he wiped his knife on a tuft of grass, replaced it in the sheath slung to his belt, and addressed his patient.

"Maantee," he said, "why do you wish to eat those dead men?"

"To obtain their strength and their courage," replied the chief, promptly, "and to add it to my own."

"You can do no such thing. The notion is an utterly mistaken one."

"My fathers believed it," said Maantee, significantly.

"Then your fathers were in error, as they were about many other things. Continue this horrible custom, and the war will go against you. Give it up, and you will triumph over the men of Daji, who still continue it."

The chief shrugged his shoulders, and showed signs of going away. Sandy laid a restraining hand upon his arm. "Maantee," he said, "I would that you had accepted a warning from my mouth. Now I must use a force known to the white men from the East alone. Your sorcerers have it not. They have not so much as imagined its existence. I am going to make those dead Dajians speak, and confirm what I have said."

Maantee's brow darkened.

"It is ill to make jest of some matters," he said, and again made as though he would move away.

"Wait," exclaimed Sandy. "For the second time you have despised my words. Now I will not spare you any part of the ordeal. All your warriors are collected there on the green. Come to them, and cry for silence."

The chief did as he was bidden, and being somewhat angered at the manner in which he had been taken to task, added maliciously that the youngest of the white men could by sorcery make the corpses speak. He made no comment on the avowal, but the simple statement was sufficient. An instant hush fell upon the assembly, and every eye was turned upon Sandy Carmichael.

In the centre of the green, a wood fire was burning and crackling away in a pebble-lined pit. The naked corpse of a Dajian lay on the soft mossy turf beside it. The juxtaposition was suggestive. Sandy took his stand near there, and the villagers grouped themselves in expectant semicircle opposite him. Sneyd and O'Neill, seeing that something was going on, came up and stood near their companion.

Sandy was very nervous at first at having to speak before so large and attentive an assembly, but he gained confidence as he went on, and before a dozen sentences had passed his lips he was fully warmed up to the work.

"I want to warn you against the horrible food which lies here before me," he said, "ready for the oven, which is even now heating for its reception. The island teems with provisions. Your meals are got for the plucking. You do not desire human flesh because your frames are wasted through scarcity of food. You would feast upon the body of your fellow-creature through a mistaken notion that with the flesh you take up the qualities. You think to swallow a share of the dead man's courage, his strength, his nerve, his wit, and add it to your own——"

"And so we shall do," exclaimed the crowd. "Our fathers have told us that it is so."

"Your fathers told you many things; but, being men, they were liable to err. They erred in this. It is impossible to take from a dead man his good qualities. They fly away into the air as soon as ever the body is killed. It is only the bad qualities that remain; cowardice, treachery, fear. And these it is that you gain when your stomachs have received the horrible meal."

A strong murmur of dissent hummed from the crowd, and more than one fist was clenched in menace.

Sandy held up his hand for silence, and proceeded:

"You do not believe me," he said, "and perhaps it is not to be wondered at that you refuse to take my single word against the united testimony of all your forefathers. But I will bring evidence to your ears that will convince them even against their strongest desires. See this Dajian beside the oven. His skull is smashed to a pulp with a club blow. He has been stark and stiff for hours. It matters nothing to him whether his body is buried in Erman ground or in Erman stomach. He has no cause to lie now. If he speaks you will believe him?"

The assembly replied with a contemptuous affirmative. They had little fear that speech would pass from those cold dead lips.

Sandy Carmichael bowed, as though accepting a challenge to make good his words, and then, turning, walked away into the shadow of the trees. Presently he came back bearing with him an armful of leafy branches. He proceeded to cover the corpse with these, taking care that no portion should remain exposed. Then, taking the burning logs from the fire, he threw them on the branches, till the dead Dajian was covered with a pile of blazing wood.

"The cold body is being warmed with the heat," he said, "and presently it will be able to answer my questions."

There was no reply to this observation, save for a contemptuous laugh from one or two of the villagers. But of this Sandy took no notice. He was gazing intently at the fire, and making signs with hands and arms to something in the flames visible apparently to himself, but unseen or unnoticed by all besides.

The chief shrugged his shoulders and showed signs of going away.

There was a ten minutes' pause. The natives' superstitious feelings were thoroughly worked up. Everything was mysterious. The surroundings fitted the scene. Night had fallen, darkly and suddenly. The great fire blazed in the middle of the clearing; hissing, crackling, throwing up wavy tongues of flame into the smoky gloom overhead. Beside it was the white man, making his incantation. Around was a ring of savage figures, partly lighted up by the glare, partly in deep shadow. Beyond were the thick woods.

Digitized by Google

The crowd of natives shrunk back in superstitious horror.

Not a human sound was heard; each breath was checked. Every man of Maantee's village was ripe for receiving wonders.

Suddenly a noise as of a sigh arose from the burning pyre. The white man bent down his ear, said something in a low voice and in his own tongue, and then moved a pace or two backwards.

A thin querulous voice, proceeding apparently from the very heart of the flames, broke upon the stillness of the assembly. The tones were faint at first, as though the speaker was weak and weary, but they increased in strength to loudness as he went on.

"Why do you wake me?" asked the voice. "Have I not lived my earthly life, and passed from it hardly enough? I have been weary, weary, weary; and this blow on the head gave me sleep. 'Tis hard to be roused now. Let me rest again."

"The Ermans," said Sandy, "would eat your body."

"Ha! ha!" The voice gave vent to a horrid grating laugh. "I daresay. I should be eating Ermans now, were I alive. We of Daji were as ignorant as they."

"How mean you, ignorant?" inquired Sandy.

"We thought that with the body we caught the spirit, that which nerves the arm, and fills the brain, and makes wit, courage, skill in war. Poor dolts that we were!"

"Then where is this spirit?"

"It sits beside my head. You cannot see it, though it is visible to me. It is a colourless shape, clear as water, light as a breath, untouchable as that which exists not. Water cannot harm it, nor fire, nor any power that is in man's hand. Yet in it is all that was ever good in me. Only the bad qualities remain in my body. You can have them if you will. Eat this dead flesh, and they are yours. And now, O mighty sorcerer, let me sleep again."

"Sleep!" responded Sandy, and coming near he kicked away the burning brands, and exposed to view the corpse in exactly the same condition in which it had been before.

The body was uncharred; the face was unblackened; not a hair was singed from the head.

The crowd of natives shrunk back in superstitious terror. The white man's authority over fire, and his power over the dead, was to them something superhuman.

They accepted what they had heard without question. Such evidence could not be gainsaid.

"So, Sandy," said Sneyd, when they had got back to the Ledge, "you have stopped cannibalism in Maantee's village by a little bit of conjuring. I don't care for trading on people's ignorance as a general thing, but in this case the end fully justifies the means. The ventriloquism I could understand; but what beat me was, how you managed to build a bonfire on the top of that poor Dajian fellow which didn't roast him."

"Well," said Sandy, "that was a trick that I got hold of by accident. Whilst I was cooking the other day, the glare of the fire made my eyes ache; so I plucked a branch from a shrub near at hand, to shelter them. Imagine my surprise to find that it completely warded off the heat as well.

"I made more investigations with the foliage of the same plant, and found that by waving branches of it round me, I could actually walk through a fire, or even sit in one without getting scorched. The shrub is a fairly common one,* though I don't know its name; but none of the natives seem to know of this particular property it possesses. And so that is why I ventured to turn it to profitable account."

(To be continued.)

* The shrub is Tii. It was very well known to the idolatrous priests of Tahiti. They made use of this property of quelling the heat of flames, to assist in the performance of miracles, which otherwise would not bear a close scrutiny. They used to perform conjuring séances in the middle of a zone fire; and holding branches of the Tii plants, they were rendered impervious to the fiery tongues of flame with which they were surrounded.

Digitized by Google

SHE BOUGHT IN QUANTITIES.

MR. AND MRS. DASHER had not gone on a honeymoon; they had determined to stop at home and economise. The father had given her a cheque for fifty pounds, and Uncle Openpurse one for a hundred.

When hubby had gone away to business after breakfast she rushed upstairs and put on her bonnet, while her fingers trembled with suppressed excitement and a scarlet flush intermittently suffused her damask cheeks. Looking into her purse for the three-hundred-and-forty-fifth time to see if the notes were all right, she tripped down the stairs and sought the butcher's shop.

"I want some beef," she smiled.

"I have an excellent cut here, madam; sweet as a nut; it weighs about three pounds."

A brilliant flash of scorn came out of her eye, and struck the portly butcher.

"What is your lowest wholesale price for an ox?"

He quoted twice the amount he had given, and awaited results.

"Please send me two of them round as soon as possible to this address—stop, you can make it three. And now I would like some liver; I do so love liver and bacon."

The price, to her mind, being moderate, she paid for twenty pounds of liver, and for ten pounds of pork sausages, and a quarter of a ton of ice to keep it all cool.

Then she sailed down the street to the grocer, and asked the sum required for butter.

"The best is eighteenpence a pound, m'lydy; can't be beat anywhere."

Her sweet little nose was lifted high in scorn, and the grocer shivered before a withering glance.

"I shall require four tubs, if you please; also seven Cheddar cheeses, and a barrel of moist sugar. If you will quote your lowest wholesale price for treacle, you may send ten pounds, and I should also like a dozen hams, and a box of eggs. This is the address. Good-morning."

The grocer sank into a tub of margarine as her dainty form melted through the doorway. And as he sat there, in a state of collaspe, she returned hurriedly, and added an order for two barrels of flour and fifty bladders of lard.

The fishmonger wiped his hands on his apron, and began flopping about a fine hake, when she started to interview him.

"I want rather large quantities of fish, if you please," while her eyes glistened with a strange and glad light. "What are your bloaters a box, a chest, or barrel, or however you sell them? I want some whitebait, too. I love whitebait. I also shall require four or five dozen eels, if you can let me have them; my husband loves eels. Also, if you have some crabs and lobsters, you might let me have six dozen of each, only they must be alive."

The tradesman swallowed a shrimp, and his wonderment, and made entries in a large book, and when she had given him the address, she left for the live poultryman's place of business lower down the street.

Mrs. Dasher had a theory of her own about poultry. She was fond of a nice duck, and still more so of a cut from a goose, while she was a perfect Russian in her hankering after turkey. But she never had swallowed any part of one that had been bought dead, for, you see, she had been brought up on a farm.

So, after much scrupulous examination, she decided that three dozen roosters, together with a score of ducks, and thirty-three turkeys (the odd three being thrown in because of the quantity bought), and forty-seven geese would suffice her purpose for the time being.

But, you will say, kind reader, is this economy? Read on. Strange and unfathomable are the ways of woman, especially the woman newly married. Mrs Dasher was economy itself.

On her way back she met a man with a barrow selling oranges. They were large and ripe-looking and mouth-watering, and she asked the price (just as a matter of form), and paid for the lot, and told the man where to take them.

Outside the building where she and her hubby rented four rooms were arranged some half-a-dozen carts, the practical and satisfactory result of her morning's hard labour. Her eyes glistened, and a glad smile played about her lips as the sight met her gaze.

As she swept round the corner, two men were carrying in the carcase of an ox, followed by three others supporting a block of ice in a blanket, and in their immediate footsteps followed a man struggling with the bloaters.

At length they went, and she, despatching a messenger for her husband, nimbly scrambled over the purchases, and tried to make things a bit straight in the drawing-room, where most of the goods had been lodged, owing to want of supervision before she had come.

After a time she thought she heard her husband calling, but the fowls were singing so sweetly to the accompaniment of the turkeys, that she could not discriminate.

He came through the window at last, for the doors were blocked with goods. He stepped on some split whitebait, which were slippery, and sat down, shooting his legs into the crate of crabs, and bringing down two blocks of ice on his lower chest, while seven geese resented his efforts to strangle them, and one eel went down the back of his neck and another up the sleeve of his coat.

After the ice had melted, he was able to get up, and then he made his way to where his wife's voice sounded high above the feathered chorus. She could not come to him because, through some mischance, she lay on a bed of eggs with a sheet of treacle, and a counterpane of calves' liver over her.

Mrs. Dasher began to get unhappy. She whimpered. She grumbled. Mopping the treacle out of her sweet mouth, and shaking a calf's liver out of her back hair, she tried to explain.

"Oh, I'm so miserable," she said, drawing a bloater out of her belt and dashing it in a tub of butter. "I didn't know it was going to be like this. I don't think your plan is good. I wish I had taken ma's advice. Oh, I am so miserable."

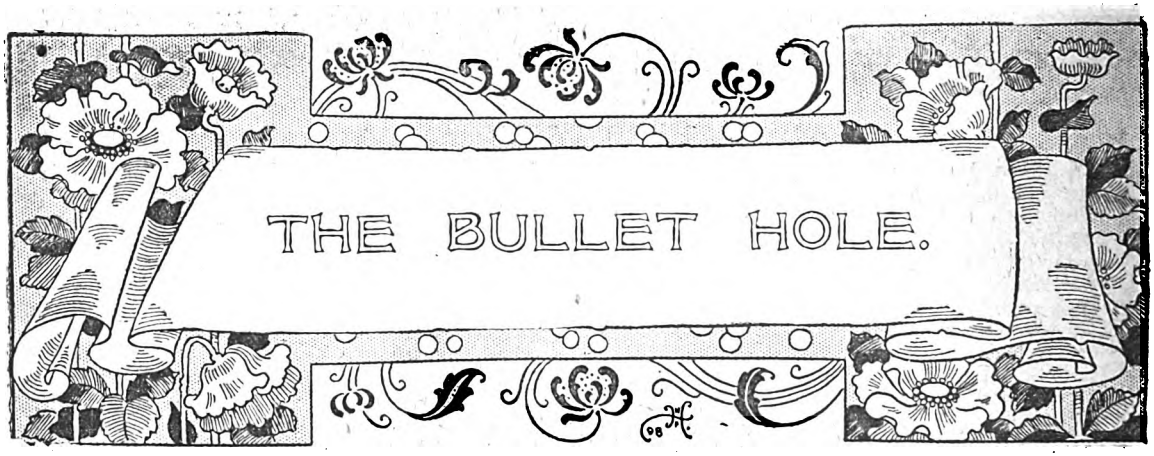
Before he married her, Dasher had impressed upon her the fact that, to economise, goods should always be bought in quantities.

"Strive to do a wholesale business as much as possible," he had said. 'For you get things much cheaper that way. Yes, strive."

She had striven.

JOHN MARTIN

Digitized by Google



CHAPTER I.

The Insult.

The lustres sparkled in the faint bluish light that filled the drawing-room. It was so still that you might have fancied the place unoccupied, if a woman's low laugh had not broken the oppressive silence. By following the shining panels on the wall in the direction of the bow window, you caught first a glimpse of a jewelled hand twisting the fringe on the portière, and the red glint of a ruby necklace on a woman's white throat.

She was talking in musical monotone to someone in the shadow at her side. The voice that answered her from the semi-gloom belonged to Austin Gerard, the much-envied and much-maligned millionaire, whose escapades are still the talk of the town.

There was something soothing in the sound of her voice—a cooing intonation that fell upon the ear pleasantly.

When he spoke the tones were cold and passionless, and he kept up an incessant drumming on the arm of his chair with his long, white fingers as though he were nervous.

Had the lights been brighter, you might have seen that the lady was as dainty in colour as a panel by Carlo van Leo. The searching sunlight might have revealed some tints endowed by a not altogether beneficent nature, particularly about the eyes and cheeks, but at night she was adorable, from the sparkling slippers to the fairy foam of laces on her shoulders skilfully disarranged. Why this languorous light, these whispered words? What were they to each other?

"Ah!" It was the first exclamation she had uttered aloud. Gerard turned towards her hastily. She had risen, and was regarding him with a peculiar look in her eyes that baffled him. Surprised, he turned towards the drawing-room door. A man had entered noiselessly, and was standing before the fireplace warming his hands by the burning logs. Gerard started, and at that moment his companion struck him heavily across the mouth with her ringed hand.

"Coward—scoundrel!" she cried in a loud and angry voice.

Stung with surprise, before he could say a word she had glided from the room, her eyes blazing, her whole nature in a tumult.

Gerard stood looking after her dumbly, as if he half hesitated whether to follow or not. Then his eyes turned towards the fireplace and the stolid figure standing there. The man was now facing him, and his voice trembled with anger when he spoke.

"I shall not ask the meaning of this, to-night, Mr. Gerard. You are under my roof, and have a claim on my hospitality."

"But, my dear Drayton, I——"

"Enough! I prefer to hear the truth from my wife's lips. If affairs are as I believe, I shall demand an explanation from you to-morrow. Go!" And he pointed imperatively towards the door. "Go!" he repeated.

Gerard laughed nervously, picked up his hat and coat, and turned away. At the door he paused, and looked back. Drayton was still standing by the fireplace, as still as the alabaster caryatides that upheld the mantelpiece, though in his eyes there was an expression that Gerard did not care to see. But he shrugged his shoulders with an affected carelessness, buttoned up his coat, and went out into the snowy night.

After the door slammed, Drayton still stood in the same place. Once in a while his eyes wandered towards the embrasure where he had witnessed this strange scene—strange, and yet he seemed to understand it thoroughly. He threw his cigar, which had gone out, into the grate, and turning out the gas, laboured heavily upstairs.

"Marian," he called softly at the door of his wife's boudoir, "Marian."

She had taken off her evening dress and assumed a tea-gown of dark blue Chinese silk. She looked like a violet with a heart of gold. He saw that she had been crying, for tears still trembled about those eyes he had so often kissed to sleep. His heart grew hot within him as he thought of the scene that had just happened below. He drew her towards him, and kissed her softly on the forehead.

"Was he—did he?" stammered the poor fellow.

She laid one finger softly on his lips.

"Forget it—forget it—what you saw," she murmured. "You frighten me with that terrible look in your eyes."

"I want to know all—all," with sudden vehemence, "or——" He laid his hand half caressingly on her arm, and led her passively to a lounge in the corner. "Come, you shall tell me everything in your own way; take your own time, darling. Why, you—you don't think I am angry with you? Why——" and he kissed her again, as if that were more expressive than any words. "Come, tell me—tell me," giving her a gentle shake.

Digitized by Google

"I cannot—cannot," turning her face away again, and covering her eyes with a lace handkerchief.

There was an angry contraction of his features. He spoke now in a hard voice.

"You must! I will have a complete explanation of this strange scene. Now, why did you receive this man? You know his character; why did you receive him? Why not send down word you were ill?"

"I was alone in the house. I knew you had gone out without your key, so I answered the bell."

"Hum." His face cleared a bit. "Let us come to the point. What did he say to you?"

"I cannot tell you."

"He insulted you?" Silence. He pulled the handkerchief away from her eyes. "Answer me."

She answered him by bursting into tears upon his shoulder. He was satisfied. He felt a remorse that he had questioned her so severely now. He had done wrong to torture her so, and begged to be forgiven. There was some cologne upon the dressing-table, and he bathed her face softly, soothing her meanwhile with tender words, while he stroked her beautiful hair caressingly.

"My poor darling," he murmured brokenly, "how you have been injured! What pain you have suffered!"

She had grown more composed now; her sobs were fainter.

"Forget it, dear, as I shall try to do," reaching out her hand towards him.

"Forget it," he echoed, looking at her in a way that frightened her. "I will settle accounts with him to-morrow."

"What do you intend to do?"

"I will kill him, or he shall kill me!"

"A duel; impossible. You are not in France; the survivor would be called a murderer."

"I can arrange it so that no suspicion need be excited; so that it can be proved that the one who falls committed suicide."

"But, Arthur," faintly.

"Well?"

"To fight with him would be going to your death. He is an unrivalled shot. Have you no thought of me—of leaving me alone in the world? What is this man's life worth to yours? Better endure a thousand insults than to lose you." And her arms were again about his throat, and tears filled her beautiful eyes.

"I am determined," he said, "and something assures me," as he brought his teeth tightly together, "that I shall not be the one to fall." There was a short cry; she shuddered in his arms. "Be calm, my love; the right will conquer wrong," he added softly.

Her eyes opened slowly as he put her gently from him, and began walking slowly up and down the room. Her glances followed him with painful persistence as she leant back against the cushions, breathing heavily.

"I will leave you now," he said finally, pausing in front of her; "there is much that I must do before the morning."

Then a sudden strength seemed to seize her. She rose and moved towards him with resolute steps, standing between him and the door.

"You shall not leave this room until you have promised to give up this mad scheme," she said firmly.

"I have made up my mind."

"You shall not risk your life; no, nor take another's."

He made a step towards her, his eyes bent intently on hers, as if to read some new revelation in the strange light that filled them.

"Marian"—he paused and looked at her again; her figure seemed to flatten out against the door as if that glance were crushing her—"if you do not let me go, I shall think that you are afraid of the consequences to him!"

She clutched at the portiere as he passed out at the door. Then she turned, with set eyes looking into space. "If he should die!" came the husky whisper; "if he should die!"

CHAPTER II.

ALONE.

It was late in the morning when Marian awoke. She had taken some sedative to make her sleep. The clock chimed the hour of ten, and through her drowsy brain flashed the scene of the night before. She shivered as she hurried through her toilet. Perhaps there was still time to stop this dreadful affair.

"He will be killed! I know it—I feel it," she murmured, brushing out her lustrous hair with a trembling hand. The mirror was before her, and she could not help seeing how wan and grey her face looked in the dim light that filtered through the Madras curtains.

"I have aged ten years since last night," she thought, as she turned away.

The door of her husband's room adjoining was standing open when she reached it. There was no one within. Everything was in order. On the secretary by the window lay a large package addressed to her. She looked at it for some moments as if fascinated.

"To be opened to-morrow if I do not return," she read on the edge of the envelope.

"If I do not return," she repeated blankly, with a shudder. "If I do not return."

The sight of that white envelope seemed to irritate her. She picked it up and threw it hastily into the drawer of the secretary, locking it and placing the key in her bosom. Then she sat down on the sofa again. Her eyes roamed here and there about the room. She saw on the wall the portraits of her husband and herself in a morocco frame. The picture had been painted during their honeymoon, three years before. A handsome couple, people had said, and now—she turned her face away and closed her eyes.

She saw that face in a changed light. It was pallid and contracted, and on the broad white forehead there was an awful stain of blood. And then the closed eyes seemed to open, and a wavering finger pointed towards her, while the cold lips uttered one awful word.

She screamed and fled from the room to her own, where she locked and bolted the door. It seemed to her as if that shadow which her brain had conjured up was following her, and its rolling eyes were turned with sad intent upon her, while the lips muttered that terrible word in her frightened ears.

She stumbled towards her dressing-case and took a bottle of some brown fluid out of a little drawer. When the cork was withdrawn, it emitted a strong, sickening smell, that filled the room. She looked behind her with a furtive shudder, hesitated a moment, then lifted it to her lips. When she laid the little bottle down it was half empty. Keeping her eyes steadily away from the door, she moved slowly towards the sofa and lay there, face downwards, her face buried in the cushions.

Digitized by Google

Someone was bending over her, she was sure. Her husband with his livid face stood before her, with that dreadful wound on his brow. His cold lips were close to hers; slowly his rigid arms were reaching towards her. She screamed aloud and beat upon the walls with her hands. The diamond rings he had given her seared her fingers; the stones had become coals of fire. She drew them off and flung them from her. Where was that music? In the street? No; in the room. How soothing it sounded in the quiet room! She did not turn to see whence it came, lest this magic music might cease and the spell be broken.

Her terrors have been deadened by these delightful melodies. They revived all that was beautiful in her life, with none of its distress. The light drives away the darkness.

No longer that terrifying figure of her husband stands before her. It is her lover kneeling by her side, and in his eyes there is a divine light that is not of earth. Kisses burn her lips and fill her with a glorious exultation. He leads her away, and the walls melt before them into thin air. They pass through jewel-studded colonnades into a wondrous garden where all is musical and bright, and where iris-tinted birds flit here and there by waving palms and tinkling silver streams. And lulled by the perfect air in this Lethean land she lays down dreamily by a glistening pool among fragrant blossoms that fall in rosy showers from the tree above her head.

The balmy breeze caresses her floating hair. Above her head a bird with jewelled wings pours out its soul in song, as sweet as if the very spirit of love inspired each note. Lapped in this atmosphere of perfume, love and song, she rests her tired head upon her arm and drifts away into oblivion's sea.

CHAPTER III.

The Reckoning.

The night closed in with sleet and snow. Marian stood by the window peering out between the curtains on the street. She had lit all the lights in the chandelier and the candles in the sconces on the wall, it was so much more cheerful to banish all the shadows from every corner. Oh, if there were only some light to dispel the shadow from her heart that was bearing her down! She listened, but no one came.

Once a man paused in front of the house, but he passed on through the snow. Few carriages were abroad, but every one that passed sent a shudder through her heart, and she would lean faintly against the wall and press her hands tightly against her breast, that seemed full of burning pains. But the carriages passed by, and the hours, and no one came. She had eaten nothing all day, and at last she found herself too weak to stand at the window and watch.

Her untasted supper lay on the table where the maid had left it. She must have strength for what was certain to come. She dragged herself forward by leaning on the chairs, and lit the spirit-lamp to heat up the tea in the samovar.

The sight of food was repellent to her, but she managed to force a few mouthfuls down, and the tea warmed and strengthened her. Only her heart was as cold as ice, and throbbed as though it were forcing its way through her breast, panting for freedom. Was that a step? Someone in the hall? The dainty Sevres cup crashed on the plate as she felt a hand seize her arm with a cruel grasp. She shook it off, and without daring to turn her face, crawled towards the corner of the room with averted eyes.

"Who is it? Who is it?" she asked herself in a fever of doubt. "Oh, if he would only speak—only speak!"

"Well?"

It was her husband! She felt a ringing in her ears, a sudden numbness seize her as if she were losing consciousness.

He laughed and walked towards her slowly.

"Look me in the face," savagely catching her sleeve and dragging her close to him. "Look at me, I tell you," raising her head towards his.

She could not help seeing that his features were contracted, and that where he had bitten his lips there was blood that had trickled down on his white shirt. He looked as if he were going mad. She could not turn away, he held her in such a grasp.

"Why are you not glad to see me?" he asked with a terrible smile. "I can see that you have spent the day in tears on my account, and now that I have returned safe and well, having settled everything satisfactorily, why do you not fly to embrace, to weep over me? Why? I ask you why?" with an awful laugh.

She reached out her arms towards him with a wretched attempt at fondness in her eyes, and the phantom of a smile on her lips.

"Ah!" he exclaimed with a gesture of disgust, pushing her from him. "Duped once, but never again!"

She made a feeble effort to rise to crawl towards him.

"No lies," he snarled. "The insult," with sneering emphasis, "has been avenged." He took a paper from his bosom, talking nervously the while. "You thought you were safe. You trusted in his skill with the pistol. I had faith, for I was armed with the right. Listen to me," shaking her savagely by the arm. "I will not detain you long. He agreed to the duel.

"We each made out a statement that we were tired of life and wanted to end it by suicide. This paper was to be found on the body of the one who fell in order to quiet suspicion. I shot him dead. What! are you going to faint? There, there, I shall be through in a minute. This letter I found in his bosom. It was addressed to you. The bullet had passed through it, stamping it with a crimson seal. Look at it; kiss it," thrusting the paper into her face with a ferocious gesture; "kiss it, woman! it is red with his blood. I have read it. It is a touching epistle. He asks you to come to him, for you are free!"

"Arthur!"

"Yes, free! I tell you so. Go to him; he has called for you from the dead. Go!"

And he went down the stairs with that terrible laugh on his lips.

Ernest Pierson.

Digitized by Google

One Good Turn.

At the age of twenty-two Celia Newman married Hamilton Ross for love.

She was at that time one of the prettiest girls in London. Not only that, but she belonged to very good family.

She was a flower that had retained its poetic delicacy in the fashionable life of a great city.

When she married Hamilton Ross, people were not surprised. She was not the girl to think of money. She loved him for himself, and that he was only an upright, simple, gentlemanly fellow, with a clerk's salary of £150 a year did not cause her any uneasiness or apprehension for the future.

That was seven years ago. In those seven years the hardships of life had settled down upon and almost crushed the Ross's. The £150 had only increased slightly, but the little Ross family had multiplied rapidly. When at night Celia dragged her tired feet upstairs to bed there were two little golden heads in the nursery cribs, and one in the cradle in her own room to bend over in silent good-night.

Though Hamilton Ross was the best fellow in the world, as good as gold and as honest as the sun, he did not seem to possess the inestimable quality of "being able to get on."

His wife's people hid what disappointment they felt and tried to make the best of things, for they were gentlefolk, with traditions behind them. Unfortunately, they were not wealthy enough to be of any material assistance to Celia.

Very comfortable themselves, in a completeness of luxury that their income just sufficed to produce, they looked on at their kinswoman's struggle with poverty, and saw her beauty, her gaiety her sweet serenity of soul, wearing gradually away.

These were small matters to Celia. Her love for her children, her concern for their welfare, engrossed her to the exclusion of all personal disappointments and chagrins. Poverty for herself and Hamilton would have been a thing to meet with a challenging smile; for her children, it was a misfortune to be averted at any cost. She thought of them growing up ill-educated and ill-clad, and she became frantic at her helplessness.

It was for their sake that she strove to keep in touch with the rich and fashionable society of her girlhood.

Here she was always welcome, for even poverty and an unfortunate marriage could not diminish the prestige of her family. The wealthy friends of her beaux jours were the means by which she hoped to raise her children into comfort.

Maternity had transformed the sensitive and dreamy young girl into a shrewd and calculating woman.

Her first step towards better circumstances was an unconscious one, the result of her kindly nature. She was at Mrs. Priestley's reception one afternoon, when she was surprised to see Mrs. Hilary there. The latter lady was of decidedly obscure origin, and in spite of her wealth and good bearing, she had never been able to obtain the entrance to society that she coveted. How she came to be one among that exclusive set, nobody knew; it was due to some great blunder, Mrs. Priestley afterwards explained to her outraged friends.

Everyone ignored her, and she was hesitating whether to retire or stay and face it out when Mrs. Ross forgot the traditions of her family and entered into conversation with her.

The ladies accepted this move on the part of Mrs. Ross with cool but refreshing incredulity, and one or two went home. Mrs. Hilary, in her upright, tightly-laced magnificence, breathing heavily under her green velvet carriage wrap, her card-case trembling in her large white-gloved hand, fronted the scene with a countenance of flushed but stolid immobility, and responded with admirable aplomb to Mrs. Ross's mild conversational attempts.

When she rose to go she had regained full possession of herself. She swept past the crowd of chattering ladies whose faces immediately became as stony as if Mrs. Hilary had been Medusa, with a bow fully as distant and haughty as theirs. But to Mrs. Ross she stretched out one of the white-gloved hands in a burst of irrepres sible gratitude and strained her little fingers in a tremulous, eloquent pressure.

Driving home in her splendid carriage, Mrs. Hilary's anger died down very quickly.

She was an eminently good-natured woman, and one can become used to anything. Mrs. Hilary had passed unscathed through many such ordeals, and she was full of energy to pass through many more, if by so doing she could reach the summit of her ambitions, her one unrealised ambition—a position in society.

It was a hard struggle against prejudice, but she would succeed eventually; it was only a question of time. Patience, and seize all opportunities!

But the happy day when Mrs. Hilary would walk unchallenged into the citadel seemed as far off as ever.

She was one of those women against whom the prejudice of society becomes deeply rooted. She was a trifle too aggressive in her imperious, impressive, style. The magnificence of her surroundings and belongings was theatrical. Moreover, she was known to be resolute and daring. Might not this commanding outsider, once inside the jealously-guarded gates, wrench the sceptre from the rightful ruler's hand?

And so this Peri knocked and knocked at the gate of Eden, with no response. In vain did she organise fêtes and bazaars, and patronise worthy charities. Her contributions were accepted but she was not.

Mr. Hilary, who was exceedingly fond and proud of her, and felt bitter at the isolation of her position, gave her free access to his fortune and full permission to spend it as she thought best. She entertained lavishly, but, unfortunately never could induce any but the employés of her husband. (Mr Hilary was the proprietor of the great Hilary Iron works), to attend her entertainments.

The treatment she had received that day at Mrs. Priestley's reception was sufficient to show her how far she still was from the fulfillment of her dreams. Being alone that evening—the children had gone to a party at a house to which their mother was never invited—she described the scene to her husband as they sat over the last course of their long and luxurious dinner.

Mr. Hilary received the recital in silence. He was mute with discouragement and anger, for he truly loved his wife, and her cheerful and courageous acceptance of the innumerable slights and covert insults directed toward her had strengthened his love for her. Mr. Hilary, in the wild scramble of his fight for money, had been rubbed so close against the seamy side of life that his respect for most things had been quite rubbed off. Personal bravery was the one human attribute to which he was ready to make a passing obeisance, and it struck him that his wife possessed more of it than any one else he knew.

To-night he more than ever admired her uncomplaining admission of the prejudice existing against her, which she did not feebly deplore, but was quietly determined to forcibly override. But when she came to the part of her story which dealt with Mrs. Ross a mist of tears quenched the fire in her dark, bold eyes.

Mrs. Hilary had been slighted so often that the slight had lost its sting, but, for the first time since the distant days of her childhood, she had met with a friendly glance, a mute expression of generous sympathy, from a good woman.

Mr. Hilary did not immediately respond. He, too, was moved more deeply than he liked to show, even to his admired consort. He felt that he would like to go out and buy Mrs. Ross a diamond necklace, and place a thousand pounds to Hamilton Ross's credit in the bank.

He said, however, tracting the buxom outlines of the shepherdess with the tip of his spoon:

"They're very badly off, I've heard. He's in a firm in the city, and he hasn't got enough brains to stop a keyhole with, they say. He's hardly able to get enough to get his wife and children food enough to eat, and clothes to wear."

Mrs. Hilary, who was one of those ladies who knows all about everybody, especially the people who won't know them, gave him a spirited account of the poor circumstances of the Ross's.

"That poor girl," she said in conclusion, "who used to be such a beauty, was in rags—literally in rags. She was like Cinderella among all those staring peacocks."

"It might be possible," mused the husband, "to do something for them. I wouldn't mind giving them a hand; the only trouble is, they possibly wouldn't take it. He's a decent sort of fellow, and after the way she acted to-day, I'd in some way or other like to help them along a little."

He leaned back with his head on one side. His wife's eyes were upon him in a steady stare which was more absent-minded than exploring.

"If you helped her," she said slowly, "she might help me."

"How?" Mr. Hilary forgot the shepherdess and looked at his wife.

"Why," said that astute lady, "if you put it in their way to better their circumstances, in return might not she put it in my way to better mine?"

"Yes, she might, but she wouldn't. Those Newmans are all the same. Poor or rich, they think they're above everybody. You wouldn't get her to recognise you—not if you gave her the earth."

"It would be hopeless if she was Miss Newman still. But she's Mrs. Hamilton Ross, with three children and hardly enough money to feed and clothe them properly. She's fond of her children, and she will do anything to help them on. It's children that make tigers of some women and angels of others, just according to the way they stand. If I hadn't had children I mightn't have been so anxious to get a position."

"You think that if I help Hamilton Ross to a good position his wife will help you into society?" asked her husband.

"She will if she understands that my entrance into society is the price of her husband being put into some good position in the Hilary Iron Works, where he will get a salary upon which he can live like a Christian."

"It would be possible," said Mr. Hilary, thoughtfully, "to find a berth for him in the works. Johnson could squeeze him in somewhere, give him a nominal position with a big name; and he's a hard-working, honest fellow. We haven't got too much of that sort of thing in the Works now. We might in time find him quite useful."

"You might find you'd entertained an angel unawares," said his wife with a little laugh; "honest men don't grow on every bush. On the other hand, if Mrs. Ross would take me up, or even allow me to take her up, there would not be any more trouble about my position. By the end of the season there would be hardly a house in town where I was not received. These fashionable women are not so very remarkable, after all. They follow each other like sheep. Hilary, will you do it?"

Digitized by Google

The query was only a polite formula which Mrs. Hilary's instinctively amiable nature prompted her to make. Her husband, in such a matter, was entirely at her command.

"Whenever you please," he said: "but as to its success, I'm not so sure."

"Oh, one must make ventures in this world," she said, lightly. "You've made them in your business, and generally won; I've made them in society, and generally lost; but this time I'm going to win. Make your plans for approaching Ross, and do it very slowly and carefully, and at the end just let him see—delicately—what the price is. Leave his wife to me. She will have prepared him long before you get that far."

The sudden irruption into the room by the children, jubilant from their party, put an end to further conversation.

In the course of the next ten days, a damsel sauntering up the street where Mrs. Hilary's residence was situated saw so astonishing a sight that she stopped short in her listless peregrination. Slowly ascending the sweep of steps that spread so grandly down from the great portico was Mrs. Ross, arrayed in her meagre best, a card-case in her hand.

The watcher loitered by with as serene an air of indifference as her curiosity would permit, and saw the visitor, after a second's parley with a butler, disappear between the wide portals.

Not two weeks after that some members of Mrs. Ross's own grand family were electrified to see drawn up in front of her humble door the handsome carriage of the newest build and style which the initiated knew to be the latest addition to Mrs. Hilary's well-appointed stables. The curiosity aroused by this spectacle overcame even that high-bred and chilly exclusiveness which had always distinguished the Newman character.

The ladies resolved to drop in upon their relative and surprise her, and entered her little drawing-room with an air of ingenuous, artless friendliness, but with the restlessly roaming glances of alert curiosity. There, among the worn down cushions, sat Mrs. Hilary, not in the least abashed; indeed, a keen eye might have detected something of suave triumph in her manner.

Undoubtedly she was very imposing; her self-possession was admirable, and as she rose to go—a regal figure in her glistening clothes of the latest and most gorgeous fashion—she seemed to fill the little faded room and almost crush the elegant occupants back against the wall.

What explanation Mrs. Ross offered to her amazed relations who shall say? That they went out and among themselves and their intimates expressed a surprise which struck the outside world as singularly temperate, is matter of history.

The damsel who had seen Mrs. Ross ascending the steps of the Hilary mansion hied her on her way and described that strange spectacle to all whom she knew.

Startling rumours began to circulate about Mrs. Ross's sudden acquaintance with Mrs. Hilary. People were denying this emphatically, when a paragraph in one of the papers ended all doubt.

The paragraph gave an account of a sumptuous dinner recently given by Mrs. Hilary, and there, first in the list of guests stood the names of Mr. and Mrs. Hamilton Ross and some of the Newmans.

Many intimate friends dropped in to see Mrs. Ross the next afternoon. They all wanted to know what convulsion of nature had taken place to so alter the Newman horizon. The lady parried every query with a cool unconcern which repulsed the most daringly curious. What the comments of these disturbed spirits were when two weeks later they learned through the efforts of a diligent press that the most seclusive member of the Newman family had entertained Mr. and Mrs. Hilary at "a choice dinner of the most recherché elegance" shall not be told in mere print. Moreover, the great and last move in the mysterious game was about to be played.

One morning the local world—fashionable, commercial and professional—had its eye arrested as it travelled slowly down the columns of its morning paper by a small paragraph. It was short and not sensational, yet the reading eye stopped at it even more quickly than at the murder above or the marriage beneath.

It merely stated without circumlocution that Hamilton Ross, formerly of the Universal Insurance Agency, had left his old employers to take the position of assistant general manager in the Hilary Iron Works.

Mrs. Hilary's prophecy came true; the fashionable world began to think that it had been wrong, and that there was really nothing against Mrs. Hilary after all. Later, when the Ross family moved to more spacious quarters, and Mrs. Ross gave a reception—at which she verbally announced Mrs. Hilary would be present—her invitations were freely accepted.

And before the end of the season the Peri had gained full admission to her coveted Eden.

TRISSY MARTIN.

Digitized by Google

The Sons of Père Beaujeon.

A STORY FOUNDED UPON FACT.

THE fatal day had come at last. A day long feared and dreaded by poor old Beaujeon and his wife. Their two sons, the prop and comfort of their old age, had been summoned by the inexorable military law, which spares neither rich nor poor, neither strong nor weak—that cruel military law which robs the widow of her only child, drags the labourer from his plough, disdains not even the ailing and diseased, and is at once the scourge and the curse of fair France, groaning under a burden which eats into the very vitals of her being.

Pierre, the great muscular Pierre, and Jules, the delicate dreamy boy, were to be taken, to serve perchance under the torrid skies of an African desert, or in the pestilential swamps of Tonquin. At that very moment they were drawing lots. The tirage was in full swing, and the picturesque Normandy village of Arques was all agog with excitement. But in the trim little cottage covered with jessamine and westeria, an aged couple were filled with gloomy thoughts.

"Père" Beaujeon (as he was affectionately termed by the village) did indeed make a courageous effort to revive those feeling of youthful ardour and enthusiasm, which stood him in such good stead in earlier days when fighting the Kabyles at Sidi-bel-Abès. He strove to conjure the fierce passion of that bloody afternoon when the chasseurs, surrounded by crowds of Arab horsemen, hewed their way through the living mass, and after all was over, when Captain Le Chatellier, himself bespattered with blood, had singled him out with the ringing words: "Tu es un brave!" Père Beaujeon looked down at the cross which never left his breast, and tried to live his battles over again; but it was a sorry failure. Every now and then he would glance across at his wife's tear-stained face, and heave an involuntary sigh.

Presently he threw his pipe aside with an impatient gesture, laid his hard and knotted hand upon her knees, and said:

"It is the will of God, my dear. It is hard, eh! oui, it is hard, but it is the will of God."

"The will of God," she repeated slowly, with sorrowful emphasis, "yes, always—the will of God!"

Père Beaujeon was greatly moved, and, rising with difficulty, for the rheumatics had been troublesome of late, he shuffled off towards the window.

The shouts of the newly-enrolled conscripts echoed down the village street. The tirage was over, and scattered groups of young men passed by, singing the "Marseillaise," and appearing, or striving to appear, highly pleased with themselves and with the regime under which they lived. There were sullen looks among the crowd for all that, and many a sorrowful woman's face.

Old Beaujeon had eyes but for two forms. He had not long to wait. Two young men separated themselves from the noisy throng and made for the cottage. When his sons entered, the old man turned slowly round and faced them; he said nothing, but gripped the window-ledge tightly. His wife had risen, and fixed a strained, anxious glance upon the newcomers.

"Eh bien! père, mère, good news! good news!" they cried together. "We are both in the 27th Line, stationed at Lyons. Both in the same regiment! Think of it! Just think of it!"

This was, indeed, grand news—far, far better than anyone of them had expected, and under its happy influence Père Beaujeon and his wife visibly brightened. The old father revived sufficiently to even chaff his sons upon the humdrum life they would be compelled to lead.

"Ha, ha," he exclaimed jokingly, "mes gosses, you will have a miserable tame time of it. If you had been ordered to Algeria now—there would have been some fun, if ——"

Old Beaujeon paused. He had caught his wife's eye; in it was a mild reproach, and he collapsed, feeling rather ashamed of himself.

Pierre and Jules were to start the next morning, and the evening was spent in various preparations, the old folk ransacking every hole and corner which might bring to light something of use to their beloved sons. That evening, before going to rest, the family knelt for a few moments in silent and solemn prayer.

Why harp upon the bitterness of the parting! A last long strain to a heaving breast, a last quivering imprint of loving lips, and for old Beaujeon and his wife, all the glory had departed from the sunshine, all the brightness from their lonely hearth.

* * * * * *

No two young men could have been more dissimilar, both in character and physique, than Pierre and Jules Beaujeon.

Pierre was dark and handsome, of medium height, and more than usual chest development—a strong, sturdy, active youth, on whose bronzed and manly features determination was writ large.

Jules, who stood somewhat taller than his elder brother, was of exceeding slightness. His face and form were refined, almost to effeminacy. A dreamy, delicate boy, with a singular sweetness of disposition, he seemed to possess an inner life of his own, a spiritual life which no one could understand, not even his brother, to whom he was passionately devoted. A love passing the love of woman existed between these two. At home it had been the wonder and admiration of the whole village. Among the soldiery it was regarded with respect and a rough but kindly sympathy.

This love had always existed between them, and as they grew into manhood it increased tenfold. It was a touching sight to see the chivalry of Pierre for his weaker brother, and the intense pride which Jules took in Pierre's feats of strength and resolute will.

Jules was utterly unfitted for a soldier's life. This became painfully apparent after a few weeks in the barracks at Lynn. The arduous drill and wearisome marches along dusty roads in a hot sun exhausted him, and at the end of a day's work he was utterly worn out, and often barely able to stand. But he would not give in; if his body was weak, his spirit, at any rate, was high, and he held out manfully. To Pierre's entreaties that he would apply for leave to enter the sick ward, he invariably replied:

Digitized by Google

"What would they think of me at home, giving in at the end of six weeks! No, no, I shall get into it very soon. Besides, I am not ill, I am only tired."

But the weeks grew into months, and Jules did not "get into it." Indeed, he became much worse. His health was now visibly impaired. He had no longer any appetite for the coarse mess of repulsive stew, which is the daily food of the French soldier. Twice recently, in the course of long, trying marches, under a glaring sun, he had reeled faint and dizzy from the ranks. Pierre was seriously alarmed.

Every sou he received from the two old people he expended in delicacies for his brother, which he forced the latter to accept, much against his will. More he could not do. But what made matters worse and almost drove Pierre frantic, was the systematic cruelty manifested towards his brother on every possible occasion by a certain sous-officier, by name Bostiche. Corporal Bostiche was a brutal, coarse, and ignorant bully. To these estimable qualities he added an overweening vanity which his personal appearance was far from justifying. Stumpy and stout, with bloated complexion and awkward gait, Bostiche resembled a wine-bibbing carter rather than a soldier.

He had taken an intense dislike to Jules from the very first. No one knew exactly why. Perhaps it was the delicacy and refinement of a nature which jarred upon his own bestial conceptions of existence; perhaps it was the physical debility which he despised in the young recruit. Whatever the reason, Corporal Bostiche, by repeated acts of petty tyranny, admirably succeeded in making Jules' daily life a perfect hell upon earth.

The system unhappily prevalent in the French army gives undue latitude to creatures of the Bostiche type, and many a young soldier has been goaded to desperate breaches of discipline—so fearfully and swiftly punished—by men of that class, who are, alas! very numerous.

In the caserne (barracks) and out of it, on parade, at drill, and on the march, Bostiche took every possible opportunity of displaying his remarkable powers of persecution. Gratuitous insult mingled with torrents of foul abuse were Jules' habitual experiences. He bore it all with a patient resignation, a dignified silence, which was nothing short of marvellous; but he pined and drooped and grew frailer as the months rolled on.

One day, after a particularly wearisome march, when the men were lounging on the wooden benches in the mess room, Corporal Bostiche suddenly made his appearance.

"Jules Beaujeon," he called out.

Jules advanced and saluted. "Me voilà, mon Caporal."

Corporal Bostiche surveyed the young soldier standing before him, with the tired and hopeless look in the grey eyes and white drawn face. His gaze travelled up and down the weary emaciated form until it finally concentrated itself on Jules' boots, one of which had split during the march and showed a glimpse of white sock from the aperture.

The Corporal curled his lips into an ugly sneer. "Ah fainéant," he exclaimed, "is that the way you attend to your dress? Pig, lout that you are. You disgrace the army, you half-bred worm, you miserable cur, you ——" And so the foul insults came hurling through the air until Bostiche was out of breath. At last he shook his fist in Jules' face, and screaming out, "Three hours in the yard at once, au complet," left the room spluttering and cursing as he went. The attack and the reprimand were equally unjustifiable; nevertheless, Jules had to tramp round the barrack yard fully accoutred and shouldering his heavy musket for three mortal hours. When relieved, he was done up and fell fainting upon his knees.

Pierre was on sentry duty at the time and did not see his brother fall, but a kind comrade helped Jules upstairs to the sick ward, where he remained for two days.

When he came out, the animosity of Corporal Bostiche was more virulent than ever, and this combined with the natural hardships of a French soldier's life was killing Jules by inches.

Pierre saw it, and writhed in misery and impotent rage. Finally, tortured by anxiety, he took a step which he afterwards bitterly regretted. He sought out the regimental surgeon, told him everything, and asked him to see Jules, and report the matter to the captain. But the surgeon was a weak and foolish man brimming over with the exaggerated red-tapeism and love of punctilio, which is one of the characteristic ingredients of the French military school.

Pierre's impassioned appeal jarred upon the caste prejudices in which he had been reared, and which insist that rightly or wrongly the superior officer must never be held to blame. He contented himself by a cursory examination of Jules, refused against the secret dictates of his own conscience to admit the gravity of the case, and when next he happened to meet the captain, remarked scoffingly that nowadays piou-pious seemed made of poor stuff. This remark elicited a query from the captain, and resulted in the surgeon repeating Pierre's complaints against Bostiche. The Captain, though not hard-hearted, naturally was a bit of a martinet, and always set his face against complaints of that kind on principle. He was as tough as a piece of whipcord himself and held weaklings in profound contempt.

The Surgeon's story, flippantly told, went in at one of the gallant captain's ears and went out at the other. Somehow Bostiche got to hear of Pierre's action, and became convulsed with rage. He would willingly have laid open Pierre's cheek—as he had been known to do to a conscript before—with the cane he was wont to flourish on the drill ground. But there was that in Pierre's eyes which suggested prudence. To put it plainly, Bostiche, who, like all bullies, was a coward, held Pierre in some awe, so he let the elder brother alone, and turned the concentrated essence of his vindictiveness upon the unfortunate Jules.

His brutalities to Jules now were such that on several occasions loud murmurs had arisen from the ranks, which only infuriated Bostiche the more. Jules life had become unbearable. A hollow cough racked his wasted frame, a hectic flush burned in each hollow cheek. Jules was dying and he knew it, and went on his way uncomplaining, lest he should sadden his brother.

Pierre knew it too, and the knowledge filled him with an agony of rage and horror. It filled him with something else, an overmastering desire to kill his corporal. Struggle as he would, he could not rid himself of the idea which haunted him by day and by night.

Ah! if only the six months were over, the six months which remained before the expiration of their term of service. If only Jules could hold out until then, with the love and attention he would get at home, he might yet recover. But could he? And meantime, meantime . . . . Pierre groaned aloud. He was so helpless—so helpless, cruelly helpless—and he had to disguise the real facts of the case from the old people at home. Jules wished it, and, even if they had known, they could have done nothing.

Digitized by Google

Alas! old Beaujeon and his wife were never destined to see their sons again in this world.

One day the crisis came.

A section of men were doing bayonet exercise on the fortifications behind the barracks. It was a close, oppressive morning; the air seemed charged with electricity; and Pierre, who happened to be next his brother in the ranks, observing him anxiously, saw that he looked ghastly in the extreme.

"What is it?" whispered Pierre. "What ails you?"

Jules did not reply. He appeared dazed, and went through the exercises in a mechanical way.

"Portez armes!" shouted Bostiche, preparatory to dismissing the men.

Jules took no notice, and continued to feebly thrust and parry, looking straight before him with dull and meaningless eyes. Bostiche grew purple with anger.

"Sacripant!" he yelled, but got no further, for at that moment a strange gurgling sound came from Jules' throat, a bloody froth rose to his lips, and he fell forward upon his face. Pierre darted from the ranks, and hardly knowing what he was about, stooped and half raised his brother from the ground. Jules' arms lolled helplessly apart, his eyes stared into vacancy. . . . His martyrdom was over.

"Eh; get up then, espèce d'animal," cried Bostiche with a horrible oath as he hurried forward cane in hand intent upon some fresh deed of tyranny.

They were the last words the corporal ever spoke. Pierre laid his brother's body reverently down, then sprang to his feet, and uttering a loud cry, before anyone could move a finger to stay him, lifted his rifle with its fixed bayonet high above his head, and with one mighty sickening thrust sent the bright blade crashing through the body of his brother's tormentor.

Bostiche flung up his arms and fell dead without a groan.

* * * * *

Two hours afterwards, a rattle of musketry might have been heard behind the barracks. The military laws of France are inflexible, and short shift is given to offenders. Pierre had paid the penalty of his action. Who will dare call it a crime?

* * * * * *

Père Beaujeon hummed softly to himself as he made his way towards the house of the Garde Champêtre, which lay just outside Arques village, beyond the railway cutting. Only a short time remained now before Pierre and Jules would be back once more. What joy! The strings of his stout old heart fairly vibrated at the thought of it, and a tear rolled slowly down the ridge of his nose, just stopping at the tip, where it hung for an instant, sparkling in the sun like a dewdrop. His bons gosses. How their mother would rejoice.

Full of these pleasurable anticipations, old Beaujeon reached the house of the Garde Champêtre, where he found several other leading lights of the village, all bent upon discussing the same question, viz., the depredation of the wild boars in the potato fields, and the best way of protecting the crop from their ravages. It was an important topic for the inhabitants of Arques, and long and animated was the talk. At length the meeting broke up, and all wended their way to their respective homes and breakfasts.

The Garde Champêtre, a worthy and kind-hearted soul, accompanied old Beaujeon part of the way home. General Boulanger's exploits were then the universal theme of conversation, and the papers were eagerly bought up. Presently the postman, who had just finished delivering his mails in the village, hove in sight, and, touching his hat respectfully to old Beaujeon, informed him that his paper had been handed to la bonne mère.

"Well, well, au revoir donc," exclaimed old Beaujeon to his companion; "I leave you to your papers, and I go to mine. Perhaps there will be news of my boy's doings. Qui sait?"

The two men parted with a cordial grip. The Garde Champêtre had an immense admiration for old Beaujeon. When he got home, he untied his bundle of papers and leisurely scanned their contents. His eyes became riveted upon a heading in large black type, which stood out from the sheet and looked portentious of evil. He read a few lines, uttered an exclamation of utter dismay, and fell into a chair.

Meanwhile, Père Beaujeon walked slowly up the street to his own dwelling, pushed up the latch, and entered.

His wife was seated in an armchair in front of the fireplace, her head bowed upon her breast, an open paper upon her knees.

"Eh, eh, you old politician!" chuckled Père Beaujeon, in high good humour. "What has the brav' général been up to now?"

His wife did not answer.

Startled by her silence and immobility, the old man shuffled rapidly across the room. "What is it, ma Mie?" he asked anxiously. There was no answer. "Asleep," he murmured; "is it possible?"

Fearful of waking her he bent low, peering into her face partially concealed in the shadow of a linen cap. A curious sound between a gasp and a groan escaped him. He placed his trembling fingers beneath her chin and lifted her face to the light. It was set in the rigidity of death.

Old Beaujeon staggered back. Every vestige of colour had left his face, and his body swayed slowly from side to side.

Presently the newspaper caught his eye. He took it up. In the middle of the sheet, printed in huge characters, he read this:

TERRIBLE TRAGEDY AT LYON BARRACKS
A SOLDIER KILLS HIS CORPORAL EXECUTION OF THE ASSASSIN.

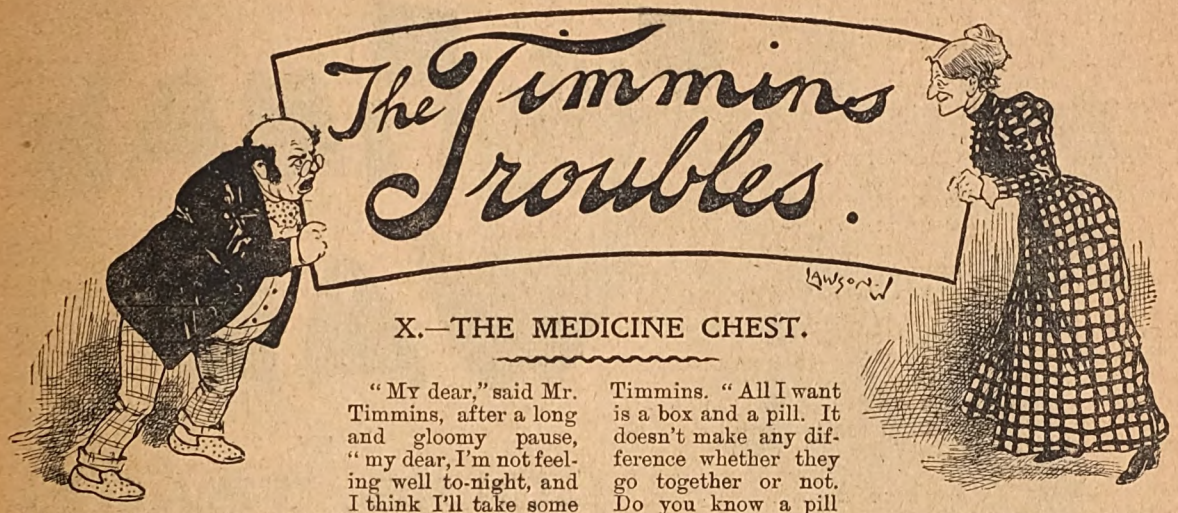
Slowly his eyes travelled down the column, and up again to the next, until the end was reached. He did not miss a single word.

When he had finished he laid the paper quietly down, looked out at the bright sun streaming in through the window, and then at his dead wife in her chair. His face had gone strangely rigid, and there was a curious blue look about his lips.

Suddenly, he burst into a shout of discordant laughter, a long, loud, hideous peal, and, as the door opened admitting the Garde Champêtre with the acutest sorrow written upon his countenance, Père Beaujeon with the laugh still upon his lips, came crashing to the ground, like some noble oak, felled by the axe of the woodman.

Edmund D. Morel.

Digitized by Google



X.—THE MEDICINE CHEST.

"My dear," said Mr. Timmins, after a long and gloomy pause, "my dear, I'm not feeling well to-night, and I think I'll take some of those anti-bilious pills. That idea of yours of having a little medicine chest, with everything handy, is an excellent one, and if you can find those pills I'll take a dose."

"They are just what you need?" said Mrs. Timmins, sympathetically; "your tongue is coated and your complexion looks very yellow lately."

"I don't remember calling on you for any remarks about my complexion, Mrs. Timmins, and as for my tongue being coated, we will assume that it has also got on vest, trousers, and boots. What I asked for was pills, pills, Mrs. Timmins, not oratory."

Mrs. Timmins bustled to the cupboard, and after considerable search, found a ribbon box with one end knocked out. In it were half a dozen blue papers that belonged to the large end of a seidlitz powder, a dose and a half of cough mixture, a paper of salts, an empty arnica bottle, two lumps of sugar, four biscuits, half a lemon, a lump of camphor, a mustard leaf, and seven pill boxes without covers.

"I don't think these are the pills you want," said Mrs. Timmins, scratching in the bottom of the medicine chest. "Do you remember whether they were white, brown, or black?"

"I'm not particular about the colour," responded Mr. Timmins sardonically. "What I want is anti-bilious pills. I brought home a box and told you to put 'em away carefully. If you've lost them in that box, it isn't my fault. What I want is pills—anti-bilious pills!"

"This looks like them," said Mrs. Timmins, squashing one between her thumb aud finger, and smelling it cautiously. "Do you remember whether they were sugar-coated?"

"I do not," rejoined Mr. Timmins, "nor do I remember whether they wore stand-up collars or a top-hat. If you think I'm going to sit here like a book on heraldry, and furnish you with the antecedents of those pills, you've lost sight of our relations, Mrs. Timmins. I want to know whether you can find them or not."

"Is this one of them?" asked Mrs. Timmins, chasing a refractory pellet into a corner, and fishing it out with some misgivings. "It looks like it, and I can't think what else it's for. Suppose you take it."

"Does it say so on the cover? Does the cover say it's anti-bilious?"

"I can't find the cover," responded Mrs. Timmins helplessly. "Here's a box, will that do?"

"Oh, certainly, anything'll do for me!" shrieked Mr. Timmins. "All I want is a box and a pill. It doesn't make any difference whether they go together or not. Do you know a pill from a post-office? Can you tell the difference between a pill-box and a policeman? D'you suppose I'm going to eat one of those things without knowing whether it's a railway ticket or a corn plaster? What did ye mix 'em up for? D'you think I'm going to speculate in those pills till one hits my liver, or to take 'em in courses like a City banquet? Have I got to get out a search warrant to find those pills?"

"Suppose you put on this mustard leaf," suggested Mrs. Timmins, holding it up before him. "Mustard is the best thing in the world to excite action of the liver."

"Oh, yes, certainly, certainly," sneered Mr. Timmins. "What a head you've got for physic! If I could get you to hold a red light in your mouth and tie a pestle and mortar round your neck I'd start you for a chemist's shop. How are you going to tie a mustard plaster round my liver? Don't you know the difference between a mustard leaf and a box of pills? What did you spill 'em for? D'you think I'm going to eat mixed pills like sweets? Been trying to make a pill salad haven't you?"

"Let me think," said Mrs. Timmins, musingly. "These white ones are quinine; these brown ones are the opium; now I remember, and the black ones are the ones you want. How many make a dose?"

"None!" yelled Mr. Timmins. "D'you suppose I'm going to take those things on their colour? Think I'm going to run the chances of filling myself up with opium, just to test your eye for tints? or shut my eyes and draw a pill, as if I was playing a game of forfeits? I don't want any pills. Throw 'em out! Pitch that medicine chest out of the window! Next time I want pills, I'll——"

Mrs. Timmins went to the cupboard, put the chest away, and as she did so noticed a little box that had fallen out on the shelf.

"Here they are, dear," she said smiling, and pointing out the label to her liege.

"Oh, yes, of course!" growled Mr. Timmins, "you found 'em, didn't you? Couldn't give 'em to me at first, could you? Another time Mrs. Timmins, I want you to let things alone. Don't ever put anything more of mine in that chest; you hear me? I don't want those things to-night, because I'm not sure whether I'm billious, but when I am I want these pills where I can find 'em; you understand?"

Digitized by Google

THE FINAL WAR

BY

LOUIS TRACY.

Author of "The Shadow Hand," "An American Emperor," "The Lost Provinces," etc.

CHAPTER LIII. (continued).

"STILL, it's a very old church and not a very convenient one," continued the other. "As some compensation Lord Roberts has decided to apportion the Champs Elysées into building lots, of which the rents will go entire to the French treasury."

M. Trochu looked up, and there was a wild madness in his eyes.

"I am very sorry to distress you, sir," said the Englishman gently. "I will say no more. Pray pardon me."

"No, no—the trut, the whole fatal trut—conceal nothing. Oh, mon Dieu, let me know ze worst!"

"I really don't think there's anything else, unless—no, stay, it is said that the Vendôme Column will be set up on the Thames Embankment, and that the British government have not quite decided whether they will erect the Arc de Triomphe in Hyde Park or in Waterloo Place."

It was too much, and the poor Frenchman, overcome, heedless of comment, and consumed with the overwhelming sense of his country's shame, broke down, great tears coursing one another down his cheeks.

Seeing this, the other Englishman interposed.

"Pardon my friend," he said, "he cannot resist a jest. All this is pure invention. Paris, the beautiful, the mother of cities, is safe, be assured, from English spoilation. And permit me, sir, to drink to the gallantry and chivalry of the great nation whom it is England's fortune to have beaten."

A marvellous change came over the Frenchman's face. He raised his glass unsteadily, drank to his tormentors and hastily left the place.

Next morning there appeared in one of the daily papers a poem from the pen of the Poet Laureate, who on this occasion at last succeeded in proving that he could leave the turgid and the commonplace, and adopt a note of sincerity and feeling. Part of it ran thus:

O England, tender mother of the fallen.
O England, scourge of tyranny and wrong,
Thy head is raised imperious 'midst the nations,
Thy step is measured to the victor's song!

For, England, though art consecrate to Freedom,
With all the passion of a zealot's vow.
The flower of Fity blossometh in thy bosom,
The star of Victory is on thy brow!

Thou whisperest thy secrets to the forests,
They bear them swiftly o'er the conquered sea,
And far-off people slumbering in their thraldom,
Awake to find themselves secure and free.

Upon the bleak and sterile lands thou treadest,
And straight the verdure springeth round thy feet.
Thy touch is magical upon the waters,
Thy hand enchanteth whatsoe'er it meet.

Beloved England, never shall the madness
Of patricidal nations fall on thee,
For, O my country, even are thy watchwords
Love, happiness, peace, justice, liberty!

And over all England there was rejoicing. Who shall say whether the commercial splendour of the great cities, with all its prodigality and display, was any more sincere than the bucolic thanksgiving of the rustic, who, bearing in his hands the simple product of the soil he cultured, laid it reverently upon the altar of his village church?

For he, beyond others, had suffered, if not in privations which in his low state could not be endured, at least in the lives of those beloved of him. Many a gallant son, the hope and pride of some poor country farm, lay cold and dead, or mouldered quite away in some far-off land. As of old, the soil of England had yielded up its treasure, and lay smitten beneath the cruel scourge of war.

Yet there was no repining, for these brave men had died not alone to save their country, but by their blood to secure peace for generations yet to come. There was at last finality to man's inhumanity to man. The NEWCASTLE CHRONICLE, in a leading article, observed:

"One thrilling thought remains. The cannon has spoken its last word. In all the savage incoherence of its cruel, inarticulate speech it has roared its ghastly message from century to century, writing its meaning in the writhing bodies of its victims, or tracing it along the blackened ruins of fair cities. For man deceived himself when he laughed at the childish legends of the past. He has always had his fabled monster, the insatiate, gluttonous devourer of his kind, and, with much more readiness than did ever those afflicted people of Crete, yielded up his annual tribute to its maw. But gun and cannon and bayonet and shell are silenced at last. In future ages, when new generations see in their museums these horrid implements, they will indeed wonder that the nineteenth century should have been so self-deluded as to deem itself civilised."

Solemn indeed was the meeting of Parliament when the news that all was over was formally announced in broken utterance by the Leader of the House. There was not one whose heart was not too full for words; but, by due observance, thanks were devoutly offered to Divine Providence, and a brief resolution of congratulation to Her Majesty, as representing in her person the kingdom of Great Britain, was moved and carried in silence.

An early day was set aside for National thanksgiving.

An early day was set aside for national thanksgiving. A chain of bonfires throughout the whole country was so contrived that, upon a signal raised high above the trees on Windsor Hill, all Britain was set aglow with triumphant blaze. Not a village but had its feast, and rich and poor alike joined in the joyous celebration.

But most imposing of all was the service held in St. Paul's Cathedral. Crowded beyond conception were the streets of London to see pass by the illustrious procession. The Queen, with all her family, both Houses of Parliament, the municipal bodies of London, and as many of the scaffoldings that were built upon every available space in the great building, joined in common adoration.

And to this enormous and unique gathering the eloquent Bishop of Ripon preached a touching and powerful sermon.

Dr. Boyd Carpenter is the silver-tongued orator of the Church of England. His is the gift of speech that goes to men's hearts, that appeals alike to intellect and sentiment, that convinces, not only by reason of its fervent sincerity, but its scholarly, well-ordered fluent thoughtfulness.

For this unparalleled occasion he had, with more than ordinary care, prepared an ornate discourse. It was clear and cogent in his mind, and although he felt the gravity of his task he never was more conscious of his powers and, primed with his subject than when he entered the pulpit of St. Paul's on this momentous day.

But as he gazed round upon the assembled multitude an overwhelming sense of awe held him as in a trance. He realised now that which he could not realise in the solitude of his study. It was his duty to give utterance to the first canticle of a new era, to note a fresh departure in the work of human deliverance inaugurated those long centuries ago by the shores of the Sea of Galilee, to proclaim aloud to the people that on the threshold of the twentieth century had been accomplished the destruction of the chief foe of civilisation.

The undertaking appalled him, so he knelt and solemnly asked for guidance and help.

And as he prayed, the whole of his set sermon fled from his memory. But there came to him with thrilling significance the words of Isaiah: "And I looked, and there was none to help; and I wondered that there was none to uphold; therefore mine own arm brought salvation unto me, and my fury it upheld me. For He said: 'Surely they are my people.'"

Then the Bishop rose to his feet, and taking his text from these ringing verses of the prophet, he delivered an extempore sermon that created a profound sensation among his thousands of hearers, and won world-wide renown when it was read in the newspapers subsequently.

He justified and glorified the action of England and the United States, and he denounced any other course than that which they had taken as forfeiting the birthright which Providence had seen fit to bestow upon them.

Their mission was one of emancipation, and freedom could neither be won nor bestowed until the demon of militarism had been slain in his own den. In such a struggle individual interests must be ignored, and the collective good alone sought.

"Whilst the air yet throbs with the lamentations of the widow and the orphan," said the Bishop, "I hear a grand canticle of thanksgiving, swelling ever louder and more joyous, thundering towards us from the hidden paths of the future. It is the song of praise of generations yet unborn, and in that marvellous diapason the cries of present grief are wholly overborne."

Unfortunately it is impossible to afford more than the merest outline of Dr. Boyd Carpenter's unexampled panegyric of the war and its results. One passage alone may be cited as a specimen of the rest.

"This campaign has often been termed a war of patriotism," he said. "The phrase is well meant, but it does not go far enough. It was, in the widest sense, a war of belief. Once before, within the lives of the elder amongst us, have we seen such a war. Brothers fought with brothers and fathers with sons to determine, by the last dread arbitrament left to man, whether or not slavery should find a place where the English tongue was spoken and the Bible ruled the conduct of men's lives. Heaven has willed it that the victory gained then should be now welded into an eternal principle. Freedom, spoke God through his earthly ministers, shall prevail, and war, the chief agent of the oppressor, shall cease to exist. And this superb achievement was vouchsafed to the English-speaking race, for He said, 'Surely they are my people.'"

Little wonder that a sermon pulsating with tumultuous words like these, which poured on with torrential force for over forty minutes, should have electrified all who heard and all who read.

England surged and swayed with such abounding excitement during the early days after the close of the war, that there was some fear lest the national character should suffer more from the resultant hysteria than from the accumulated strain and burthen of the campaign. The public mind required an anti-climax to bring it back to the calm content of the workaday world, and relief came from a totally unexpected quarter.

Mr. W. S. Penley, the well-known comedian, thinking that people needed some relaxation after the stress of conflict, wrote to the papers to call attention to the fact that "Charley's Aunt was still running."

And then everybody laughed, which was a wholesome sign of returning sanity.

CHAPTER LIV.

A Message of Everlasting Peace.

During the early days after the close of the war the attention of the authorities both in England and on the Continent was devoted exclusively towards making complete arrangements for the care of the wounded and providing relief for those who had been rendered homeless and foodless by reason of the campaign.

Mr. W. S. Penley calls attention to his play.

So widespread had been the area covered by hostilities that these tasks were in themselves colossal, and might at any other period of the world's history not so utterly dominated by a succession of gigantic undertakings, have evoked the astonished plaudits of civilisation.

The fleets of the belligerents, which had so lately carried devastation and ruin to peaceful ports, were now utilised for the more kindly purpose of ferrying ample supplies of food and clothing from the vast stores accumulated in the United Kingdom to those points on the Continent where distress was most severe. The work of the Government in coping with this final legacy of hunger and misery left by the war was rendered easier by the fact that during the concluding stages of the campaign the ocean had in reality been a British highway.

Digitized by Google

British and American merchantmen were consequently free to come and go as they chose, and there was not the disruption in the commercial marine which must have eventuated from any other solution of the struggle save that secured by the complete and overwhelming strength of the British navy, admirably amplified as it was by the ships of the United States.

But no sooner had departmental activity been fully concentrated upon this work of succour, than the keen attention of Ministers in England and the United States was given to solving the political and social problem which now confronted all who were responsible for the future safeguarding of the world. The cabinets of St. James' and Washington sat almost continuously, and the cables between England and the United States were wholly monopolised by the long messages which were constantly passing between the chiefs of the two countries.

The very magnitude of the reforms they contemplated brought about an element of ease and clearness in outline. Local and personal considerations, which in a scheme of lesser detail would have proved troublesome in settlement were now necessarily swept completely aside with ruthless vigour. When the future of the world was at stake petty consideration affecting a minor state or an insignificant section of the community could not be entertained.

British and American merchantmen were free to come and go.

As a preliminary measure Lord Salisbury and the American President decided that a Manifesto should be drawn up and signed by the two titular heads of the English-speaking race in order that the principles vindicated and established by the war should be set forth plainly, fearlessly, and unmistakably. Such a document required much care in preparation, and it was felt that if any error were committed in text or significance the lapse should certainly be on the side of simplicity. At last it was approved by both governments and signed by Her Majesty the Queen, and by the President of the United States. It was distributed, in every language, throughout the world, and never before was document so eagerly scanned, so widely discussed or so universally approved. The full text of this remarkable Manifesto was as follows:

"An International Proclamation.

"It has been decreed by Divine Providence that in the War which was recently brought to such a speedy and satisfactory close victory should rest with the arms of England and the United States.

"The victory thus achieved was so signal and complete, and so far-reaching in its consequences, that we cannot refuse to recognise the intent of a greater power than has ever been vouchsafed to any section of the human race.

"This clear expression of the Divine Will can only be interpreted in one way. War, with the countless miseries that come in its train, must forthwith cease, and it is by the medium of the most widespread conflict ever witnessed in the history of the world, that Providence has seen fit in its inscrutable wisdom to make manifest its commands.

"Great Britain and the United States are but the instruments chosen to accomplish the task. To their hands was committed the cause of suffering humanity, and as they did not shrink from their duty in the hour of difficulty and danger, so now they will not draw back from the undertaking until the peace of the world is placed upon a firm and lasting basis. We therefore, acting on behalf of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland and the United States of America, hereby state our unalterable resolves:

"1st. That disputes between civilised nations shall henceforth be determined by a tribunal of International Arbitration, the constitution and powers of which shall be hereafter decided.

"2nd. That no civilised nation shall be permitted to organise or maintain any naval or military armed force save in such limited degree as may be required for the preservation of law and order within the bounderies of the State. As a necessary consequence, all existing fortifications and accumulated munitions of war shall in due course be dismantled and destroyed.

"3rd. That England and the United States shall equip and maintain a sufficient armed force both by sea and land for the purpose of giving effect to the principles herein enunciated, such armed force being kept in readiness for as long a period as the rulers of those countries shall deem fit and necessary to achieve this object.

"4th. That in the event of any uncivilised state threatening the peace of the world the representatives of Europe and America shall collectively determine and provide the means whereby such danger may be averted or satisfactorily met.

"5th. That an International Congress shall in due course assemble in London, at which the nations of Europe and the great powers of the East shall be represented, to determine the best manner whereby the requirements of this decree shall be brought into operation, the Governments of England and the United States reserving to themselves the right to control and direct the deliberations of such Congress.

"6th. The first duty which shall call for the attention of this International Congress will be the most effective method of securing general disarmament, compatible with considerations of expediency, as vast numbers of armed men must not be thrown too quickly into civil life. The disruption which would ensue to all industrial operations from too great precipitancy in such a step will thus be avoided.

"7th. The Congress shall next devote itself to the consideration of permanent boundaries between States and the adjustment of Colonial areas, with due respect to existing possessions, and the development of unsettled localities adjoining thereto.

"8th. Notwithstanding the unprovoked nature of the attack made upon the United Kingdom, and despite the enormous sacrifices cheerfully borne by the peoples of Great Britain and the United States, it has been resolved that no indemnity shall be claimed from the assailants. We feel that the French, German, and Russian nations, with whom we have no quarrel, were led into this disastrous war by the short-sighted ambition of their rulers, and in refusing to inflict grievous financial burdens upon them in order to pay the entire costs of the struggle we are giving the best possible guarantee of the motive which dominates our action, namely, to secure lasting peace and happiness for the inhabitants of the world.

"9th. There will be no interference with the internal affairs of States, or the methods of government adopted, so long as constitutional means alone are followed for their settlement. But the use of force will not be permitted under any circumstances whatever, save as before stated, for the preservation of law and order at the hands of the properly constituted authorities.

"We humbly pray the blessing of Providence upon our designs, and we trust that the united peoples of Europe will co-operate with us in the effort to bring them to a successful and irrevocable consummation."

The effect produced on the Continent by this proclamation was stupendous.

Not only did the magnificent scope of the proposals made by the two governments appeal to the imagination of every man who cared for the progress of the human race, and the triumph of collectivism, but the magnanimity of England and America in refusing to fine the other belligerents, evoked the keenest gratitude from the already too heavily taxed agricultural and commercial classes in central Europe.

There was joy that night in the cafes.

Naturally enough, in some quarters there was a disposition to resent the masterful tone adopted by the victors.

But behind the dignified and convincing language of the proclamation there stood the terrific power of those who spoke. It was computed that when Paris fell, no less than twelve millions of Anglo-Saxons were armed for the struggle and cynically prepared to prosecute it to the bitter end.

To those nations of Europe who had not participated in the war the proclamation came first as a thunderbolt. But Austria, and Italy, and Spain, not to mention the less powerful kingdoms of the north, quickly saw that the project afforded relief to them as well as to the stricken peoples of France, Germany, and Russia.

In the Far East China hailed the glad tidings which placed the restless Japanese under the control of a mightier power than hers, and if the rulers of Turkey saw a definite end to a government of rapine and disorder, the oppressed nations of the Levant rejoiced in the certainty that the period of deliverance was at hand.

The German Emperor threw himself with heart and soul into the work of regeneration. He had learnt, by sad experience, that the greatness of Germany depended not upon her militarism but upon the commercial and industrial adaptability of her song and he now devoted his superabundant energies to the mastering of the technical and mechanical details of manufacturing enterprises with as much keenness as he had formerly displayed in qualifying himself to lead armies and fleets into action.

By a stroke of genius M. Bourgeois pacified Paris.

When the proclamation was read in the French Chamber the assembled deputies were dumb with amazement at its extraordinary conclusions.

The Premier was quick to note the excitable feelings under which the House laboured, and he ventured upon an anti-climax which proved to be a greater coup than he could have anticipated in his most sanguine moments.

"You have heard the decisions arrived at by England and the United States," he said, speaking with calm deliberation. "To me they seem both reasonable and temperate. But they cannot now be discussed in their entirety. At this moment I would beg to draw the attention of honourable deputies to the fact that if the Paris Exhibition of 1900 is to be as successful as we would desire, not another instant must be lost in pushing forward the too long suspended preparations."

The Premier's suggestion buzzed quickly through the Chamber and thence into the city and the provinces.

Its philosophy was undoubted and acceptable. France had had enough of war. Let her revert to her vastly more pleasing rôle as supplying the playground of the world. There was joy that night in the cafés, and hope in the Magasin du Louvre.

In bestowing honours and rewards upon the officers and men of the army and navy who had served the cause of England so well Her Majesty the Queen was called upon to face a task as formidable in extent as it was gratifying in nature.

In the first instance a special message was forwarded through the American President to the Senate and House of Representatives for permission to be accorded to her Majesty to suitably decorate the principal officers of the American army and navy. The required sanction was as cordially given as it was graciously demanded, and in the result Admiral Mahan and General Smithson received the Grand Cross of the Order of the Bath, whilst among other recipients of the Royal Victorian Order figured the name of Colonel W. J. Ritchie.

It was not until the legitimate claims of all the principal American officers had been satisfied that her Majesty preferred to the Government of the United States the most important request of all. This was no less than a most warmly-worded expression of her wish that legislative sanction might be given to the acceptance of the Knighthood of the Garter by the President, the Vice-President, and the Secretary of State for War. Such an unexampled departure from precedent deeply impressed the public mind both in England and across the Atlantic, for even democratic America felt that the prompt acceptance by the House of Representatives of the honour proposed to be conferred upon the chief citizens of the United States was in itself a testimony of the high regard in which the time-honoured and most distinguished institution of the English Court was held by every member of the Anglo-Saxon race.

Nor were Canada, Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, and other colonies forgotten in the least degree. Not only were their political leaders singled out for marks of royal appreciation, but the British Prime Minister intimated that in due course government grants would be made towards recouping all ports which had suffered loss or damage by reason of unforeseen attacks by the allied fleets.

In dealing with the British army and navy, Her Majesty's advisers were compelled, for obvious reasons, to restrict the range of definite reward. Where every officer and man had so nobly done his duty it was impossible, save in very isolated cases, to select individuals for distinction. Of course, in the case of generals who commanded in the field this restrictive rule was necessarily departed from.

Lord Wolseley's services as Commander-in-Chief of the entire army was recognised by a dukedom, whilst Lord Roberts, Sir George White, and Sir Evelyn Wood each became an earl. A similar honour was bestowed upon Sir Nowell Salmon, Sir Beauchamp Seymour and Sir Edward Freemantle, whilst Lord Charles Beresford became a marquis in his own right.

Springing to his feet he cried: "—

Baronetcies and knighthoods were distributed with a free hand to divisional and fleet commanders, and a bonus of six months' pay was given to every officer and man who had served in the field. A similar donation was bestowed upon the relatives of all who were killed in action or died from disease whilst under arms.

But it was generally felt that the action of the Government in the latter respect, although generous enough in view of the tremendous financial responsibilities entailed by the war, did not march with full measure of public sentiment. In England no less than in the United States there was a deep conviction that private generosity should supplement the relief given by the State to soldiers who had been disabled for life by their wounds and to the widows and orphans who had lost their breadwinners owing to the vicissitudes of the campaign.

Digitized by Google

For some time people were at a loss to know how to reconcile their wishes with reasonable performance, but the question was solved in a curious and eminently satisfactory manner.

The Baroness Burdett-Coutts had given a small and extremely select supper party at her residence, No. 153, Piccadilly. This gathering was destined to become famous in history.

The majority of the guests were millionaires, and, curiously enough, the somewhat limited section of humanity which comprises this fortunate class was represented to an unusually large extent. There were present not only the chief financial magnets of London and South Africa, but it happened that among the guests were four of the richest citizens of the United States.

The conversation during one portion of the proceedings turned upon the need there was for adequate provision being made for the humble sufferers from the war, and the opinion was unanimously expressed that the decision of the Government although reasonable from the point of view of Ministers responsible for taxation, yet in no way met the urgent demands of maimed men and helpless women and children. The noble and generous minded lady who presided at the table was very emphatic in expressing the view that at such a time the rich should carefully consider the real scope of the obligations imposed upon them by their wealth.

"We ought to realise," she said, "that were it not for the splendid heroism and absolute self-abandonment displayed by even the poorest members of the community, we should not now be in possession of our property under the peaceful security of a strong and impartial Government. We owe all that we have in the world to the men who have given their lives in defence of England, and I, for one, am prepared to mark my sense of what they have done by a donation towards some fund to alleviate the wants of those who are in need, and such donation will, by reason of its amount, be some testimony of the sincerity of my conviction. I may tell you," she continued, looking round at the assembled company, "that I have already given orders for the realisation of securities worth a million sterling, which sum I propose to hand over to such public committee as may be entrusted with the distribution of relief upon the most popular basis."

A hum of admiring appreciation passed round the table, and the excitement grew when Messrs. Barnato Bros. and J. B. Robinson announced their intention of following the precedent established by the philanthropic Baroness.

The Americans present looked at each other with growing eagerness in their faces, and at last Mr. John D. Rockefeller drily remarked to his compatriots: "I think it's about time we raised them a few."

Springing to his feet he cried: "I like your idea, and it ought to go well in the States. Just to give it a shove off I put up two millions."

"Dollars or pounds?" shouted a voice from the end of the table.

"Pounds of course," he replied. "We are not talking silver here to-night."

Thus the friendly rivalry sped, until in that room alone England had contributed eleven millions sterling and America nine millions to the Patriotic Fund which was shortly opened for the benefit of the necessitous.

The Times and the other chief newspapers of the United Kingdom warmly took up the idea, and the country contributed to an unprecedented extent. So fast and furious was the enthusiasm that Parliament itself felt constrained to direct and control the movement. A strong committee of both houses was nominated to join the representatives of the army and navy for the purpose of efficiently administering the fund, and by its effectual distribution a vast amount of misery and privation was averted.

This great work of succour and alleviation progressed steadily and contemporaneously side by side with the orderly progress now being made by the nations of Europe towards political and social regeneration.

By this time the Congress of London met for the purpose of entering upon a solemn, anxious, and protracted consideration of the many important questions raised by the joint proclamation of the Queen and the American President, the evil passions engendered by the war were already becoming quietly extinguished, and truly seemed that the world was at last about to enter upon a period of rest and peace and mutual helpfulness.

(To be concluded next week.)

Maud: "Do you believe that all the world loves a lover?"
Jack: "No; not since I met your father."

Watts: "Seems to have been some trouble over at Wickwire's house."

Potts: "Well, yes. His wife told him to advertise for a parlour maid and he goes and puts in the ad., 'blonde preferred.'"

"We are selling these goods," said the counter-jumper, "at a positive loss. Practically, we are giving them away."

"Then," said the lady with the haughty demeanour, "I, must decline to purchase. I cannot accept gifts from a shopkeeper."

A man who had saved the life of a daughter of a millionaire received 8s. 6d. from the grateful parent. He was so overcome with the magnificent bounty that he paid out every penny of it to seventeen organ grinders to simultaneously serenade his benefactor.

They attach a good deal of importance in American society to titles. On one occasion there was a young English nobleman figuring at Washington. He had not much brains, but a vast number of titles, which, in the eyes of the envious ladies, covered a multitude of sins. Several of them were in debate, going over the list. "He is Lord Viscount so-and-so, Baron of such a country," etc.

"My fair friends," exclaimed the gallant Lieutenant N., "one of his titles you appear to have forgotten."

"Ah," exclaimed they, "what is that?"

"He is Barren of Intellect," was the reply.

The following is a case to which the word "disillusion" might well be applied. Not long ago a servant living in Goole gave notice of her intention to leave, informing her mistress that she was about to be married. As the time drew near she addressed her mistress thus:

"Please, mum, have you got a girl yet?"

"No, Mary, why do you ask?"

"Because if you haven't I should like to stay."

"What? I thought you were going to marry the chimney sweep?"

"Oh, yes, ma'am," replied Mary, hesitating, and blushing a little, "but when I saw him with his face washed I felt I couldn't love him."

Digitized by Google

KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR.

WHY INDUCE HEART DISEASE TO CURE YOUR HEAD

When you can get a real safe remedy like KAPUTINE?

Dr. Thurston, Licentiate, of the Royal College of Physicians, writes November 16th: "Knowing the formulæ from which KAPUTINE is compounded, I unhesitatingly recommend its use in preference to crude Antifibrin and other synthetic drugs which, unfortunately for sufferers, are so commonly used for Headache, and which have undoubtedly injurious effects on the Heart, Brain, and Vescicle tissues generally."

NOTHING LIKE KAPUTINE. NOTHING SIMILAR. NOTHING AS GOOD.

All leading Chemists sell it. Packets of 18 doses 1s. Sample 1d.

After 13 Years' Suffering, Cured for 1s.

The Rev. T. TAYLOR, Vicar of St. Bredward, Cornwall, writes: "Owing to a severe accident while riding, my wife has for the past thirteen years been subject to violent attacks of neuralgia. The relief she has experienced from KAPUTINE has been speedy and effectual. KAPUTINE, while it is efficacious in its use, is attended with none of the disagreeable after effects which she has experienced in the case of other drugs."

After 10 Weeks' Suffering, Cured for 1d.

From Rev. J. H. BURN. DEER RECTORY, MINTLAW, ABERDEEN, NOVEMBER 8TH, 1897.

"My own cure with one dose of KAPUTINE was marvellous after ten weeks incessant neuralgia.

Used also by Her Grace the Countess of Cavan, Lady Dashwood, The Countess of Munster, Surgeon Lieut.-Col. Baker, etc., etc.

Nothing Similar. Nothing as Good. KAPUTINE CURES HEADACHE IN 10 MINUTES.

If you enclose stamped envelope to A. M. Kaputine Ltd., Huddersfield, you will get free samples by return.

KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR.

Don't Cough - use

They at once check the Cough and remove the cause.

The Unrivalled

One Lozenge alone relieves. Sold everywhere, Tins 13½d. each.

Keatings Lozenges

NOSE MACHINES as worn by Nobility. Shape altered permanently by few weeks' wear, from 9/9 each. Red Nose Cure, Medically Approved, 3/9. Pamphlet, "Cause and Prevention," 1/-; particulars for stamp. Mention Paper.
LEES RAY, Specialist, South Castle St., Liverpool.

£20 Hairdressers fitted up. Estimates free.

Tobacconists Commencing. Sec. Illd. Guide (259 pages) 8d. How to open a cigar store, £20 to £2,000. Tobacconists Outfitting Co., 186, Euston Road, London. The largest and original house (50 years reputation. Mgr., H. Myers

TOOTH-ACHE
CURED INSTANTLY BY
BUNTER'S NERVINE
Prevents Decay, Saves Extraction, Sleepless Nights Prevented.
Neuralgic Headaches and all Nerve Pains removed by BUNTER'S NERVINE. All Chemists, 1s. 1½d.

ROYAL AJAX CYCLES

ON MONTHLY PAYMENTS. Immense stock Ladies' and Gents'. New and Secondhand. Wonderful bargains. Carriage paid. Easy payments from 10s. monthly, or large cash discount. 1 year's guarantee. Illustrated Price Lists post free on application. Old bicycles exchanged.—The SILVER QUEEN CYCLE CO. Ltd., 221 Tottenham Court Road, London.

ATLAS LOCKSTITCH MACHINE.

Works by hand or treadle. Guaranteed 4 years. Equal in quality and size to any machine To ensure satisfaction, we will send machine on receipt of 5/- P.O. for ONE MONTH'S TRIAL. Balance can be paid 5/- Monthly. Call or write for designs and Samples of work. 39/-

THE ATLAS SEWING MACHINE CO.,
188B High St., Camden Town, London, N.W.; 63 Seven Sisters Rd., N.; 14 High Rd., Kilburn.

ZOX
CURES
NEURALGIA
Toothache, Headache, Sciatica, and all Nerve Pains.
PURE, HARMLESS, AND NON-APERIENT.
Do not be persuaded to take a substitute, there is nothing as good as ZOX.
Of all Chemists, 1s. and 2s. 6d. per Box.
ZOX Co., 11 HATTON GARDEN, E.C.

PREMATURE OLD AGE!
And all ORGANIC DERANGEMENTS yield more readily to the healing influences of mild Electricity, as generated by wearing THE ELECTROPATHIC BELT
For NERVES, STOMACH, LIVER, & KIDNEY COMPLAINTS.
New Pamphlet and Advice FREE.
Medical Battery Co., Ltd.,
489, OXFORD ST., LONDON, W.

PIANOS. UPRIGHT IRON GRAND.
Complete Iron frame, Brass Pin Plate, Nickel-bolted Wrest Plank, Check Action, Full Trichord, Full Compass. Rivetted Hammers, Handsome Walnut Case, Inlaid Marqueterie Panel, Sconces, Trusses, etc. Tone and touch perfect. Guaranteed 25 years. 28 guineas, at 10/6 per month. Delivered free on payment of 10/6. Approval. Catalogues Free.

ORGANS. GENUINE AMERICAN.
Imported Direct. Solid Walnut Case, Mirror Top, Music Case, 2 Knee Swells, Mouse and Dust Proof, 8 Stops, 3 Sets of Reeds, 14 Guineas, at 6/- per month. 10 Stops 3 Sets of Reeds, 2 Octave Couplers. 15 guineas, at 7/- per month. Illustrated Lists Free. Kindly mention this paper.

THE LONDON AND LIVERPOOL PIANOFORTE CO.,
Granby St. & Selborne St., LIVERPOOL.
Agents wanted where not represented.

Digitized by Google

AIDS TO ACCURACY.

J. D.—An instance of the defacement of coins to insult a monarch occurred in Saxony when that country was conquered by Frederick the Great. He imposed the Prussian coinage upon the vanquished in order to stamp out the last vestige of independence. The Saxons altered the wording on some of the pieces from Ein Reichs-thalen, a Royal dollar, to Ein Reich-sthal, the stealing of a kingdom. They had to pay dearly for their gibe in the end.

L. E. L.—The first railway in Sweden was opened in 1855.

G.—Frog-hunting is now prohibited by law in Belgium. The Belgian hunters, however, continue their amphibious occupation in Holland, and from the Sas-van-Gent have recently sent in one half-day as many as 20,000 frogs' legs on ice to Paris. These delicacies fetch between from twopence to fourpence apiece, and some of the hunters find the calling very remunerative.

H. M.—The sword of honour recently presented by the Corporation of London to Lord Kitchener, is the forty-third bestowed by that body on naval and military commanders. The first was given to Lord St. Vincent just over a hundred years ago. He had been accorded the freedom of the City, and the Corporation did not know how to do him further honour; someone suggested a sword, and this has become a kind of custom. Lord Alcester (Sir Beauchamp Seymour) was the last to receive a sword of honour.

L. S. D.—There are 40,000 miners at work in the Siberian gold mines. The grains of Siberian gold are, on the average, larger than those found in any other part of the world.

F. B.—It is highly probable that dancing is the oldest form of amusement. Leaping and jumping about is the most natural way of disposing of superfluous energy and of expressing our feelings, as may be observed in children, and the earliest records show that dancing was a common form of amusement. No doubt the early form of it was mere capering about, but this does not affect the question. Many dancers of the present day do nothing more than caper about the ballroom.

H. G.—The greatest amount of booty ever obtained by an army as the result of a single battle was that captured by Nadir Shah at the sack of Delhi, in 1733. Authorities differ as to the exact value of the treasure, which included the famous Koh-i-noor diamond, but the most modest computation is fifteen millions sterling.

A. R. N.—Astronomical instruments of glass were used by the Chinese four thousand years ago. One theory advanced in explanation of the erection of the Great Pyramid of Egypt is that it was intended to be used as an astronomical observatory as well as a tomb.

M. A. B.—Three-tenths of the earnings of a Belgian convict are given to him on the expiration of his term of imprisonment. Some of them thus save more money in jail than they have ever saved before.

L. G. asks if there are any plants or vegetable growths that emit light. ——It is difficult to determine with accuracy. Certain fungi shine with a brilliant phosphorescence, and some authorities on botany assert that various bright-coloured flowers like the marigold emit light towards evening. There is a difference of opinion about the latter point. One Swedish botanist says the light of the marigold is electrical; other botanists declare that it is an optical illusion.

Z.—The Sultan of Morocco keeps a large number of live lions about his premises, and in the evening these animals are let loose in the courtyards of the palace to act as guards to the royal harem.

G. N.—Nearly £300,000 worth of articles are pawned in London weekly.

P.—There are two violet farms in the United States, both managed entirely by women.

DRESS.—The universal custom among women of dressing in expensive clothes, regardless of comfort, is due partly to the love of display, no doubt, but it is looked upon by men of science as a survival of olden times, when the woman was the property of the man, and her dress was used as a means of displaying his wealth. In the present day, they say, the Society dame clothes herself in accordance with the social standing of her husband; she must "maintain her position," and comfort, which is the real function of dress, takes a back seat. This is certainly very much like the usage of patriarchal times.

P.—In most of the countries of Europe there are more restrictions on the sale of "patent medicines" than in the United Kingdom, where, in fact, there is very little restraint. In Armenia no medicines prepared by an occult art can be legally sold.

EAT.—Larvae or catapillars eat more in one day in proportion to their size than any other creatures. Many caterpillars consume twice their own weight of food in twenty-four hours. The larva of the flesh-fly increases its weight two hundred times during the first twenty-hours of its existence.

BELL.—The bell bird is so called because its note is as loud and as clear as a bell. It is found in South America and Africa. An eminent naturalist has stated that it can be heard at a distance of three miles.

SHELL.—Some authorities declare that explosive shells were first introduced as a factor in naval warfare in 1853, although their utility was recognised fifty years previously. This is in direct conflict with the record of the battle of Liman in 1788, when several Turkish battleships were destroyed by the shells fired from "big guns"—thirty-six and forty-eight pounders.

M.—When a criminal is arrested in Morocco he has to pay the cost of arresting him, if he possesses anything that can be realised. If not, he usually has a little added to his punishment.

G.—A neat brush is attached to the tail of the glow-worm for the purpose of keeping clean that part of the worm from which the light proceeds, and thus preserving the brightness of the light.

WAR.—A Polish statesman has estimated that the daily cost of a war in which the five Great Powers of Europe—Great Britain, France, Germany, Austria and Russia—were engaged, would be rather more than four millions sterling.

A. L.—The custom about which you ask prevails on the death of a prince of the royal family of Austria. His horse, covered with a black cloth, follows the funeral, limping painfully. The lameness is caused by driving a nail through one shoe, and is intended to typify the animal's sorrow.

SHORT STORIES' ADVERTISEMENT RATES.

Single column, per inch, per insertion	£0 10 0
Double ,, ,, ,,	1 0 0
Full page inside, facing page of matter, either white paper or 2nd or 3rd page of cover, or back page, per insertion	10 0 0
Half-page ,, ,, ,, ...	5 0 0
Quarter-page ,, ,, ...	2 10 0
Eighth-page ,, ,, ...	1 5 0
Front page, whole ,, ,, ...	12 10 0
,, half	6 5 0

All spaces above one-eighth of a page are charged at per page rate.

Series discount: 5 per cent. for 13, 10 per cent. for 26, 15 per cent. for 52 insertions.

Black blocks are charged 25 per cent. extra. All advertisements are subject to approval. All copy must be sent in by Noon on Tuesday, Feb. 21st, if intended for the Issue on sale March 7th, and dated March 11th. The Proprietors reserve the right to hold over or suspend the insertion of any advertisement without prejudice to other insertions on order. All communications should be addressed to the Advertisement Manager, "Pearson's Weekly" Offices, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Printed and Published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON LTD., at Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

ALL FAT PEOPLE

Can be CURED by taking

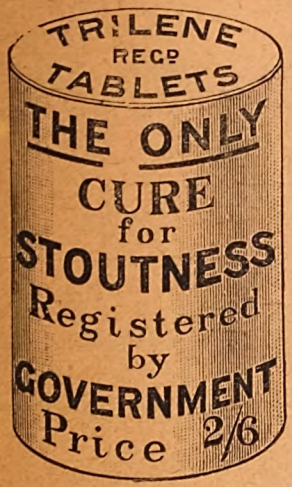
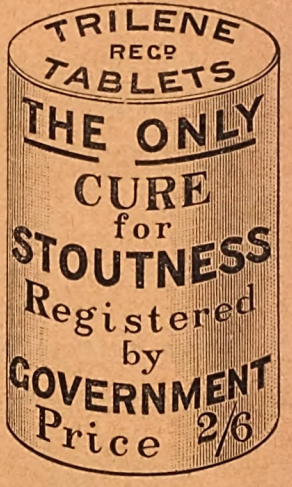
TRILENE TABLETS Regd



For a few weeks. They will safely REDUCE WEIGHT and CURE CORPULENCY PERMANENTLY, whether Abdominal or General. They are small, agreeable, harmless, sent privately, and never fail to Improve both HEALTH and FIGURE without change of Diet.

An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."

Send 2s. 6d. to THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION, 66, Finsbury Pavement, London, E.C.



SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

"87 Alexandra Road, Norwich, October 19th, 1896.

"Gentlemen,—In reference to Trilene Tablets, I may say that my wife found the greatest possible benefit from the use of them; their action was rapid, and exceeded our utmost expectations, as they were also most beneficial to the respiratory organs. My wife was many years growing so stout, but although the disease was, I consider chronic, the Tablets soon reduced the same completely. You have our united thanks, and if I can do anything to promote your interests I will freely use my utmost endeavours to do so.

"Yours faithfully, J. R. CANHAM."

MRS. DARNLEY SMITH, Landscove Vicarage, Ashburton, writes: "Trilene Tablets have reduced my weight very much. I am so much lighter in every way, and better in health."

COUNTESS SECKENDORFF, of Berlin, writes: "The Tablets greatly benefited me personally, and I am recommending them to friends."

MISS CHATTERTON, 7 Salisbury Villas, Banstead, Surrey, says: "I weighed 12st. 8lb., but am now 11st. and getting much better."

Nurse CROUCHER, at Mrs. Bennett's, 14 Buckleigh Road, Streatham, says: "I lost 9lb. from the box I took."

"77 Hindhill Street, Heywood, February 5th, 1898.

"Gentlemen,—I have not quite finished the box of Tablets and am 21lb. lighter. The change is great, and several friends are beginning the treatment, which not only reduces fat but strengthens rheumatic joints—such has been the case with me. "Yours sincerely, M. A. HEYWOOD."

MRS. D. BURTON, of Silverleigh, Tunbridge, writes: "I am very pleased with difference in size, my friends all telling me how much thinner I am getting."

MISS NORTHLEDGE, The Laurels, Riseholme Road, Lincoln, says: "The Tablets reduced me 1st., so that I am cured."

West Cornforth, Ferryhill.

MR. WM. USHER says: "A sister of mine, who was 17st., was greatly reduced by your Tablets to 15st."

Extract from The Lady, September 3rd, 1896: "Many stout persons have suffered untold agonies in unavailing efforts to reduce their bulk, either by means of severe dieting, or by taking more or less deleterious drugs; but all these pains would have been saved if they had only invested in a box of the wonderful Trilene Tablets which are quite harmless, containing neither mercury, arsenic, nor any other mineral poison, and which are an unfailing cure for obesity."

FATHER T. M. BYRNE, of Holy Cross Abbey, Sligo, writes: "When I began our Tablets I was 12st. 5lb.; I now scale at 10st. 11lb.—my case, too, is hereditary."

MRS. T. BOSTON, Cambridge Villas, Clifford Street, South Wigston, says: "I congratulate you on your wonderful Tablets. My weight at first starting them was 11st. 7lb., and I now weigh 9st. 11lb."

MR. MCLEOD, 44, Calside, Paisley, writes: "I have been cured. If you want to know my weight now, it is 10st.; reduced 1st. 8lb., and I am quite content."

A. M. PRATT, of Ongar House, Ongar, says: "My weight is so much reduced it is unnecessary to take more. The reduction of weight was from 12st. 6lb. to 10st. 4lb."

MRS. WHITEHOUSE, of Poplar Avenue, Edgbaston, writes: "My husband is in splendid health, and has lost 15lb. in weight since taking the Tablets; I am sure I thank you on his account."

MRS. H. COX, 28 Watnall Road, Hucknall Torkard, writes: "The box of Tablets has reduced my weight 1½ stones."

MR. WALKER, 236 London Road, Hazelgrove, Stockport, says: "I have used one box and am 14lb. lighter. Send another soon as possible."

Col.-Sergt. WHITTLE, of East Lancashire Regt., Burnley, Lancs, says: "A man in our regiment in 1891 lost several stone from taking your Tablets."

Mr. BUTLER, Surgeon, M.R.C.V.S., of Hampton Manor, Evesham, says: "My patient has lost 1st. in weight whilst taking your Tablets."

MRS E. ALEXANDER, 102 Dixon Street, New Swindon, says: "They have reduced me quite 2 stone, and I am now quite cured."

Mrs. W. A. RADFORD, of High Street, New Brinsley, Eastwood, writes: "Before taking Tablets I was 46 inches round waist, now I am 32 inches. I hope soon to be 23. I could hardly move or get up, now I get about easily. Please use this as you wish."

Countess G. FURSTENBERG, of Stammheim, Germany, writes: "They act speedily and well."

The Princess LIECHTENSTEIN writes from Landsberg, Austria: "Pray send me your excellent Tablets."

Mrs. WEAVER, of Greenpits Villa, Ross, Hereford, writes: "I am reduced from 12st. 8lb. to 11st. You may use this if you like."

MRS. CROSSLEY, of Rose Hill, Torver, nr. Coniston, says: "There is a very decided diminution of fat. I am delighted, and cannot speak too highly in praise of Tablets. My heart is better, and I can breathe so much easier. You may refer to me as often as you like."

Lady C. CONRAD writes from Wiesbaden: "I am very pleased with your Tablets."

Mrs. TAYLOR-ROBINSON, of Tweed Green House, Whalley Range, Manchester, says: "I feel so much lighter and better since taking your Tablets, and am so much thinner that I hardly recognise myself."

Miss A. LONG, of 9 South Parade, Waterford, writes: "Your Tablets have reduced me 14lb."

Miss A. DAWSON, 62 Orchard Street, Weston-super-Mare, says: "Glad to say the Tablets have sufficiently reduced me. I shall always recommend them."

THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION, 66 FINSBURY PAVEMENT, LONDON.

Digitized by Google

The No. 4 YOST Typewriter.

Learnt more quickly,
Prints better,
Writes faster,
Lasts longer,
Needs less repairs than any other Typewriter on the market.
Light carriage,
Infallible pointer.
Three line Spacings,
Beautiful characters,
Perfect adjustment,
Any width of margin,

AND

AN INK SUPPLY . .
GUARANTEED TO .
LAST SIX MONTHS.

CATALOGUE POST FREE.

The YOST Typewriter Company
Limited,
50A HOLBORN VIADUCT, E.C.

THE "MULTIFLEX"
DUNLOP TYRES

for 1899 are pronounced by the entire Press to be the Summum Bonum of Cycling luxury. Every cyclist should read our handsomely illustrated Booklet,—"All About Dunlop Tyres for 1899," which is sent gratis and post free on application.

THE DUNLOP PNEUMATIC TYRE COMPANY LTD.,
Alma Street, Coventry.

BRANCHES: London, Birmingham, Wolverhampton, Nottingham, Manchester, Glasgow, Dublin, &c.

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY G. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

NO. 530. FOR WEEK ENDING FEBRUARY 25TH, 1899. [ONE PENNY.

THE MONARCH RECORD REDUCTION SALE.

The "Queen's Royal" Household Carpets and Hearthrugs are extolled by all the nations of the earth.

Gigantic Sale of the "QUEEN'S ROYAL" HOUSEHOLD

Sale Price 2/- HEARTHRUGS Regd.

In REVERSIBLE RICH TURKEY PATTERNS, measuring 6ft. long and 3ft. wide. These HEARTHRUGS have gained a world-wide reputation for MAGNIFICENCE, CHEAPNESS, and UTILITY, having no equal. Registered New Designs, and considered Works of Art. Thousands of Repeat Orders and Testimonials received, giving the highest satisfaction.

SPECIAL OFFER.—Three for 5/9; Six for 11/3; Twelve for 22/-

The "Queen's Royal" Household Carpets and Hearthrugs are patronised by Royalty, Nobility, and Clergy from all parts of the Empire.

Gigantic Sale of the "Queen's Royal" Household Reversible Rich Turkey Pattern

CARPETS Regd. Trade Mark on all Goods. Beware of Imitations.

ADMITTEDLY THE CHEAPEST CARPET IN THE WORLD.

Woven without seam. Altogether superior quality, with handsome border to correspond. A marvel for excellence and beauty. Thousands of Repeat Orders and Testimonials received, giving the highest satisfaction. When ordering, please mention if for Bed, Dining, Drawing, or Sitting Room, and any particular colour preferred.

Size.	Each.		Size.	Each.
6ft. by 6ft.	4s. 11d.	REDUCED	9ft. by 13½ft.	16s. 6d.
6ft. by 7½ft.	6s. 0d.	SALE	10½ft. by 12ft.	18s. 0d.
6ft. by 9 t.	7s. 6d.	PRICE.	12ft. by 12ft.	21s. 0d.
8ft. by 9ft.	9s. 0d.		9ft. by 15ft.	19s. 6d.
6ft. by 12ft.	1 s. 6d.		12ft. by 13½ft.	22s. 0d.
9ft. by 9ft.	11s. 0d.		12ft. by 15ft.	25s. 6d.
6ft. by 10½ft.	13s. 6d.		12ft. by 18ft.	30s. 0d.
9ft. by 12ft.	15s. 0d.		12ft. by 21ft.	35s 6d.

Ramsden, Charlbury, 4/3/98.

Lady HICKS BEACH writes: "Will Messrs. F. Hodgson & Son send her one of their 'Queen's Royal' Carpets, 9ft. by 9ft., 11s.? Cheque enclosed. The other parcel received safely, and I am pleased with it."

To readers of "Short Stories," on receipt of Postal Order or stamps, value 4s. 6d. (Regd.), we will send you the Largest Genuine Reversible Carpet in Brussels Pattern, with Rug, ever sold at the price, direct from the Looms to any address, on receipt of amount. Suitable for Drawing Room, Dining Room, Bedroom, etc., bordered and woven in Brussels patterns, as an advertisement for our goods, thus saving any middle profit. Remember, these are woven, and are made of a material almost equal to wool. Thousands of these Carpets have been already sold at double these prices. Cut this out.

SPECIAL OFFER.—2 Carpets and 2 Rugs, 8s.

Illustrated Bargain Catalogue of Carpets, Hearthrugs, Table Linen, Curtains, etc., Post Free, if mentioning SHORT STORIES (25/2/99) when writing.

PRODIGIOUS SALE OF THE "PRUDENTIAL"

TURKEY DESIGN CARPETS.

(Regd.) Reversible, woven throughout, bordered, richly blended in several colours to suit any furniture. These goods cannot be distinguished from Real Brussels when laid down, and cannot be excelled in durability.

Size.	Each.		Size.	Each.
6ft. by 6ft.	2s. 11d.	REDUCED	9ft. by 15ft.	12s. 6d.
6ft. by 7½ft.	3s. 11d.	SALE	10½ft. by 12ft.	11s. 6d.
6ft. by 9ft.	4s. 6d.	PRICE.	12ft. by 12ft.	12s. 9d.
7½ft. by 9ft.	5s. 11d.		12ft. by 13½ft.	14s. 6d.
9ft. by 9ft.	7s. 6d		12ft. by 15ft.	15s. 9d.
9ft. by 10½ft.	8s. 6d.		12ft. by 18ft.	19s. 6d.
9ft. by 12ft.	9s. 6d.		12ft. by 21ft.	22s. 6d.

When ordering, please mention if for Bed, Dining, Drawing, or Sitting Room, and any particular colour preferred. A "Reversible" Prudential Hearthrug (Regd.), to match above Carpets, sent for 1s. 6d. extra, size 2yd. long and 1yd. wide.

SPECIAL OFFER.—3 Hearthrugs for 4s. 3d., or 6 for 8s., or 12 for 15s. 6d., sterling value.

N.B.—Foreign Orders executed and packed free, and shipped at Lowest Rates. Illustrated Lists Post Free. Telegraphic Address—"ECLIPSE, LEEDS." Cheques and P.O's payable to

F. HODGSON & SON,

Manufacturers, Importers, and Merchants,

WOODSLEY ROAD, LEEDS.

DON'T CUT OFF YOUR NOSE

to spite your face. You may want it—the nose we mean. To act spitefully at any time, either to yourself or others, is mean and contemptible. We heard of a girl the other day who quarrelled with her lover, and married a man she did not like, to spite him (her lover). Years have passed. She has regretted it every day since, and will do to the end of the chapter. But the game is not worth the candle. To act rashly is a losing game. Think calmly, without prejudice, and act promptly. When you read Page Woodcock's advertisements recommended for the cure of Indigestion, Wind on the Stomach, Biliousness, Liver Complaints, &c., don't say "Bosh," but try them, then talk, and then you'll tell a tale worth hearing.

Mr. W. H. Parsons, of 4 Crescent Road, Clapham, S.W., June, 1898, writes: "I have been a great sufferer from INDIGESTION, &c. Have tried a great many remedies, but found none to equal your WIND PILLS, which have worked magic upon me. Trusting that many others may find the boon of them. You may make what use you like of this. It is a fact!"

All sufferers from Indigestion, Liver Complaints, Wind on the Stomach, Costiveness, Sick Headache, Nervous Debility, Palpitation of the Heart, Biliousness, &c., should avail themselves of this most excellent Medicine.

Page Woodcock's Wind Pills, being purely Vegetable, Tasteless, and Mild and Tonic in their action, may be taken with perfect safety by the most delicate of either sex.

All Medicine Vendors at 1/1½ and 2/9. Post free for price by Page Woodcock, Lincoln.

Be particular that you ask for "Page Woodcock's Wind Pills," and see that you get no other.

Digitized by Google

COFFEE WITHOUT DREGS

GOOD! ITS MASON'S

An agreeable, stimulating and sustaining beverage. Instantly prepared and most economical. Equal to the very finest coffee. Highly recommended by the Medical Profession.

Of all Grocers and Stores, or a Sample Bottle post free for 9 stamps.

ALSO TRY

MASON'S WINE ESSENCES

AND

MASON'S EXTRACT OF HERBS.

Sample Bottle of either sent free for 9d.; two assorted 1/3; three assorted 1/8.

Agents Wanted.

Manufacturers—

NEWBALL & MASON, NOTTINGHAM.

"WORTH A GUINEA A BOX."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

FOR ALL

BILIOUS & NERVOUS DISORDERS,

SUCH AS

Sick Headache, Constipation, Weak Stomach, Impaired Digestion, Disordered Liver & Female Ailments.

SALE NOW OVER SIX MILLIONS YEARLY.

In Boxes, 1s. 1½d., and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.

Prepared only by the Proprietor,

THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.

Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere.

GOOD FELT HAT, Black, Navy, Brown or Grey 2/6. Carriage 4d.

THE John Noble

HALF-GUINEA COSTUMES

promptly sent by Parcel Post, safely packed, direct from the Largest Firm of Costumiers in the World, and made to look smart and yield faithful service.

TRIMMED HAT, as sketch, 5/11. Carriage 4d.

Model 984.

Exceedingly well-made and carefully finished Chesterfield Coat, and full-wide Tailor Skirt. Price complete Costume, 10/6; carriage 6d. Skirt alone, 5/6; carriage 5d. Good value. 10/6

Stylish blouse bodice and neat skirt. Bodice lined through, and made with prettily gathered front and shaped belt, as sketch. Lengths and Prices: 6/11

35 38 42 46 in. } Carriage
6/11 7/11 8/11 9/11 ea. } 5d. extra.

Lengths are from top of neck-band to bottom of skirt in front.

PRETTY MAID'S COSTUME Model 1016.

These Costumes are supplied in the following two good durable Cloths:
I. John Noble Cheviot Serge, weighty and weather-resisting.
II. John Noble Costume Coating, smooth-surfaced and of medium weight

PATTERNS SENT POST FREE,

together with the Illustrated Annual Sale List. Please mention Short Stories when writing.

A FULL DRESS LENGTH of either cloth (6yd. 52in. wide) for 7/6. Carriage 8d. 7/6

COLOURS of all Costumes are Black, Navy, Electric, Brown, Ruby, Myrtle, Fawn, Grey, Moss, Sage Green, and Purple.

THE THREE SIZES IN STOCK are 34, 36, and 38 in. round bust (under arms). Waists 24, 26, 28 in.; Skirts being 38, 40, and 42 in. long in front.

Any other size can be specially made to measure 1/6 extra.

BANKERS: "London City Midland Bank Ltd." Please name "Short Stories" when writing to

JOHN NOBLE LTD., Brook St. Mills, MANCHESTER.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK

Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London.

INVESTED FUNDS £10,000,000.

The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free.

FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager

COMFORT, CLEANLINESS AND CURE

FOLLOW THE USE OF

Dr. PAUL'S WHITE PILE OINTMENT.

Gives ease at once and effectually removes Piles, Cracks, Fissures and Ulcerations. In boxes 1/- & 2/6 each. Post free 1/2 & 2/9

PANN & CO., 89, BLACKFRIARS ROAD, LONDON, S.E.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

SHORT STORIES

No. 530. For the Week ending February 25th, 1899. One Penny.

The Death Model.

He was the handsomest man among the men who thronged the Artists' Quarter. But who he was, or where he came from, no one knew.

He painted exquisite pictures, which sold without the least difficulty.

We soon grew to like the fair-haired giant. He was so kindly courteous, so truly a gentleman. He seldom smiled, and his eyes, of deepest violet, always had a woeful expression in their depths.

That there was something strange about him, we realised from the first. At times he was the life of the party, and anon plunged into a gloom from which nothing could arouse him. At such times he would lock himself in his studio, and no word or entreaty from any of us could call him forth till the fit passed.

After these long seclusions he would come among us pale and enfeebled, and with an indefinable something about him which impressed us all, but to which none gave expression save the irrepressible Martin.

"Ugh!" he said one day with a shiver, "you look as if you had been communing with the dead."

The handsome face of Valette underwent a strange change as he replied, in his low, sweet voice:

"Would communing with the dead leave its imprint upon a man's face?"

"Unquestionably!"

Valette sighed deeply and turned away.

In the course of the next six months there were to be three distinct art exhibitions, and nearly every occupant of the Quarter was engaged upon a picture which he fondly hoped would secure the prize, or at least be hung. Such a rushing about for models, such grumbling and fault-finding you never heard of.

Valette, however, maintained his usual quietness, and when questioned as to his success in model hunting, assured us he had secured one in every way satisfactory. Yet my studio was right opposite his, and, watch as closely as I might, I never caught a glimpse of any model coming or going.

My own picture was a scene where a young and lovely wife was pleading for the life of her husband, who had been sentenced to death. Everything was completed save the face of the pleader, and I was unable to find any model capable of assuming the expression I was desirous of securing.

One day while lounging in Valette's room I incidentally mentioned my difficulty. Lifting the lid of a great desk he handed me a square of canvas.

"Will that be of any use?" was all he said.

I uttered an involuntary cry of delight.

The picture was painted with masterly skill, and represented a woman kneeling, with clasped hands and upturned face, at the foot of a wreathed-crowned cross.

But the woman's face made one give small heed to the details of the picture. Such agonised entreaty, such almost hopeless despair in the dark eyes; my own involuntarily filled with tears as I gazed.

I saw Valette was regarding me closely, as I raised my eyes from the picture and caught the same look of hopeless sadness in his own beautiful eyes ere he turned them away.

"You are welcome to make use of the face," and he began painting as if nothing had happened.

After that we grew to be close friends. Time sped on. One after another the men of our set finished their pictures and sent them in to the committees. Some were raised to the seventh heaven by a speedy acceptance, while others were plunged into deepest despair by a rejection.

I was one of the fortunate, and Valette informed me that all three of his were hung. He had not allowed even me to see them, and I was curiously anxious for the time to come when I could do so.

I was early upon opening day, but as I examined picture after picture, I found nothing to especially interest me until I heard little Martin's voice exclaim:

"Heavens! what a subject!"

I quickly made my way to his side, and as I saw what he was gazing upon, I mentally echoed his words.

It was a large picture of superb and gorgeous colouring. The background was a luxuriant growth of tropical verdure. To the right the shining waves rolled in upon the beach of shimmering white sand. But the figure occupying the foreground subordinated all these.

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

It was the form of a superbly beautiful woman struggling in the folds of an immense serpent.

One instantly comprehended the futility of the effort she was making, but every sinew in one's body tightened in sympathy. Both white hands clutched at the monster's throat, and the loathing horror upon her face told how fully she realised what must be her doom. Two folds of the gleaming body encircled her waist and limbs, and the terrible head, with distended jaws and diamond bright eyes, gradually nearing her face.

"Ugh! Whatever possesses Valette to paint such a picture? It is so horribly realistic," grumbled Martin. "See, Webster, the woman's face and form have already the hue of the dead."

It was so, and I shivered as I had done on gazing upon a corpse a few days before.

I did not ask my friend how he knew this was Valette's picture, for there was no mark on it. As I gazed, the conviction grew upon me that it was, and as I at length tore myself away I re-echoed Martin's words; "Whatever possessed Valette to paint such horrible things?"

I returned every day to gaze upon it, and it indeed seemed as if decay had fastened upon the rounded limbs and beautiful face, so perfectly was the hue of death depicted.

I said nothing to Valette upon the subject, however, but waited with impatience for the opening of the next month's exhibit.

This time it did not need Martin to point out Valette's work, though as before there was no mark by which to identify it.

A wide stretch of angry, tossing sea, extending on all sides to a dull sodden sky, no living object visible, but in the foreground the floating form of a woman, her dead face with half-closed eyes, gleaming ghastly white through the semi-gloom. Her delicate, rounded limbs were half visible through the enshrouding waters, and they wore the same terrible hue of death we had shuddered over in the former picture.

The colouring of every feature of the scene was so natural, the outlines so perfect, that one could almost hear the swish of the waves, and catch the undulating motion of the dead.

I went away more dissatisfied than ever. Who was Valette's model? And how had he caught the hue of death which others found so impossible to master?

At last the grand exhibition opened, and I only paused to give a self-congratulatory nod as I saw what an advantageous light had been given my own picture, in hurrying on to find Valette's masterpiece.

Worse and worse! Ugh! I shudder at the remembrance even at this late date, but among all that immense collection of pictures, there was none before which the crowd so persistently lingered.

It was a second sea scene. Under a glaring tropical sky, where the sun gleamed like a ball of fire, floated a raft, upon a sea whose waves were copper-hued and scorching. Upon the raft were three human forms. One, a woman so grandly proportioned, so wondrously beautiful, that you instinctively envied death her possession.

She clasped a babe lovingly to her bared breast, as is the mother love had sought even in death to prolong the feeble life. The other form was that of a man, as superbly formed and proportioned as that of the woman. Death had claimed them all, as was proved by their glassy eyes and upturned faces, helpless under the burning sun. Here again was the greyish pallor, horribly suggestive of decay.

As I gazed fascinated by the very horror of the scene, a messenger put a note in my hand. It was from Valette, urging me to come to him at once, as he was ill. I instantly left the building, nor paused until I stood by his bedside.

A Sister of Charity and an old greybeard of a doctor were in attendance. It was Roman fever, and would probably prove fatal, was the verdict.

Valette bore the sentence bravely, and then requested to be left alone with me.

"I shall be delirious in a moment," he said, grasping my hand eagerly, "so must talk fast.

"Behind yon curtain you will find a large box of which this is the key," pushing one into my hand; "take one look at its contents, and then see it laid in consecrated ground. When I am dead lay me beside it. Keep my secret—promise—promise!"

The last words came gaspingly, and ere I could reply he sank into unconsciousness.

I hastily recalled the attendants, then, with a pitying glance at the doomed man, lifted the curtain behind which I had never seen, notwithstanding my intimacy with Valette.

There was nothing remarkable in the sight, save the box of which he had spoken. It was large, and stood upright against the wall, where the afternoon light streamed full upon it.

Inserting the key in the lock, I quickly swung open the door. A cry of horror and fear escaped me as its contents were thus revealed.

Its sides were padded, and lined with white satin and costly lace. In the centre, in a kneeling posture, was the half clothed form of a dead woman. The original of all his horrible pictures, I saw at once; for here was the superb limbs and wondrous beauty. Here was the model, about whom we had made so many conjectures.

The embalmer's work had been skilfully done, but an unmistakeable charnel house odour came to my nostrils, and I hastened to close and lock the door, destined never to be re-opened.

I lost no time in seeing the fearful thing underground, although it was not accomplished without some risk and a generous use of gold.

I then devoted myself to Valette's care, and had the satisfaction of seeing him recover. Slowly, it is true, and with many relapses, but one day, six months later, we left Rome together on a long journey round the world, during which he recovered health and spirits. The love he gave me fully repaid me for all the sacrifices I had made in order to be with him.

It was many months ere the subject of his model was mentioned between us, but one day, in the wilds of a Brazilian forest, he told me a strange story of wrong-doing and sorrow.

He had loved the beautiful woman whose form I had laid away, but she became the wife of another.

In life he could not possess her, but when death laid his icy hand on her, he had stolen her body away, and lived in its presence for months, half mad, and wholly heart-broken.

He shuddered at the remembrance of those fearful months, wondering now, in his sanity, how he could ever have been possessed of such morbid madness, and he has never since looked upon those terrible pictures.

Cyril Newland.

Digitized by Google

A Man of the Past.

There is no doubt that Miles Otway was contradictory by nature. His best friends said he was unmanageable unless you began at the wrong end with him. Then perhaps, he would argue you—and himself—round to the right. Right was his purpose, but he must fight his way to it; he must first discover and demolish the wrong.

At parish meetings, and in all affairs of general interest, he was sure to be in the opposition, so they called him, "Old Per Contra."

He had been engaged during his youth to a girl, who had said to him more than once, "Miles you are the most opposite-sided person I ever met." A time came at last, when, in answer to some utter unreasonableness, it had been, "I don't think, Miles, we had better risk it, after all."

Then he remonstrated with all the joined power of his habitual combativeness and his truest feeling; but to no purpose. Marion West had come, reluctantly, to mean it. The engagement came to an end. Miles was then twenty-seven; Marion nineteen. Four years later she married Doctor Fletcher, and went with him to his home. Miles never married. In Marion's rare visits home he was careful not to meet her.

Thrown back on himself, Miles grew bitter against the world. He denounced much, tolerated little, excused nothing. Just to a fault, by that fault he failed of justice, even to himself.

One person only came near him; that one hardly knew how near. Their life so managed itself that neither of them guessed or betrayed the undemonstrated depth of mutual regard. And yet it was plain to any third person that old Miles and young Sam had no life apart from each other. Nobody dare hint of "Old Per Contra" in Sam Otway's hearing; nobody dare speak slight of Sam to his Uncle Miles.

Since the young man was sixteen they had lived together in the old Otway's house on the side of Thornton East Hill. All else of the immediate family, in both generations, had passed onward, leaving place and memory to these nearest kin. Miles Otway held in possession the greater part of the ancestral inheritance, which was large. Sam had what remained of his father's share after considerable spending and losing, and this residue was not large. Everybody thought, of course, that he would ultimately have the whole. This, which would seem a strong bond of interest, was really between the two a separating wedge.

The old man was out of touch with the present.

"Whatever you do, Sam, don't marry a girl of the period," he said one day.

"A girl of which period shall I marry?" Sam asked. "I seem to have been born into this one myself."

"Do the best you can in it, then. There may be an exception to be found."

"Not in a little old-fashioned bonnet, and innocent of Browning, or Paderewski, or the higher mathematics, or associated charities, Uncle Miles. That girl is gone. May not these that have come be just as nice and sweet, in spite of their dress and doing? They only take things where they find them, as the others did before."

"Can't be as nice," grumbled his uncle. "It's all demoralising. The fittest hasn't survived. Folly has run to seed; there was always plenty of it; now the crop's pretty much weeds."

"You hold aloof, Uncle; you don't know."

"Don't mean to know. I don't belong to the end of the century."

The man who had lost his past and rejected his present, threw down the newspaper with which he daily aggravated himself, got up and walked away.

The unforeseen occurred. Marion Fletcher returned to Thornton a widow. Her father and mother had died; the house in Thornton belonged to her. Her income was modest; it would do more, and in better accordance with her wishes, here.

With her came her daughter Rose, and a little grandson just out of babyhood, the child of a daughter who had died.

In a straight line, had the hill been tunnelled, her house and Miles' would have been scarcely a furlong apart; but there are few straight lines in the world—it was up hill and down hill between them. Miles, in his daily constitutionals, never walked that road now. The younger man soon found the way,

Rose Fletcher was eighteen and pretty; Sam was in the flush of twenty-five, and soon very much in love. He knew nothing about the old story, a part of which was repeating itself.

Mrs. Fletcher's deep, shaded verandah, the one grand adjunct of her unpretentious house, was delightful on a summer evening. It came to pass that many a time when Uncle Miles, smoking his solitary pipe, paced up and down his long garden walk, Sam was behind the honeysuckle trellis of the Fletcher's house, enjoying the companionship, and falling under the special charm which had never come to him before.

Mrs. Fletcher began to see what was impending with a dread, and yet a secret hope. It might bring trouble; it might result in beautiful replacement. A new, young love might redeem the bitterness in which the old had ended, and draw near in a late peace of friendship the lives so long estranged.

Marion Fletcher had loved her husband; and she cherished his memory.

In the years since Gilbert Fletcher died, it had never entered her thoughts that any change could be imagined for her from her single absolute loyalty. It did not invade her conciousness now. She was free of herself; she could frankly wish to be forgiven and better understood by Miles Otway; to change his scorn into kindly confidence; to draw forth his true nature once more; to compensate his pain with calm content.

It was different with Miles. Though he would have disdained the self-suspicion, he was half afraid of any reconciliation because of what that reconciliation now could never be. He was loyal to his first love in what he thought his hate. But hate is never dead indifference. It is the other side of love, and love is life.

So far he had kept successfully from Marion's path. He had not even passed her so nearly on the street as to have met her glance. He would by no means have held out his hand to her; he thought his contempt would have hindered him.

One evening Sam took Mrs. Fletcher—perhaps himself—by surprise.

Digitized by Google

She had walked with him down the winding path, narrowed and dark with shrubbery, to the gate in her white front fence.

He took her hand to say good-night; suddenly he could not let it go.

"I must say it!" he broke forth. "You know already don't you?"

Yet as if she did not know, he told her; the old story, with the old demand, that mothers have to listen to and answer with struggle of love and joy and pain, or other passions, according to their differing natures. Her Rose was the rose of the world to him; might he tell her so?

Dismay was Marion's first feeling. She drew back her hand. It had come too soon. "Oh wait!" she entreated. "There hasn't been time!"

"My dear Mrs. Fletcher, for what? Does time count? All there ever was, or will be is present tense. The thing is——"

"Oh, I know. That is the trouble. With everything else time doesn't count. It will count with your uncle. It isn't present tense with him."

"No. He has to be persuaded down from his past," said Sam, not guessing how truly he spoke. "But if you and Rose——"

"Not yet," she interrupted. "There ought to be some opportunity for him to know Rose—to understand me—a little—better. If he would only come here, as you have come—a neighbour—and see for himself and believe! Mr. Otway," she went on after a pause, "I used to know him long ago, but I do not know him now. He is, they say, a peculiar, prejudiced man. It will all be strange to him. He will not like it. He will think, perhaps, that I have—managed."

Sam hardly understood her anxious incoherency. "My uncle does not visit," he said. "The only way is to tell him what has happened—if it may happen. He is peculiar, but he is a just man. I must be fair with him."

Yet with the words his mind misgave him. What would his uncle say? Would he give himself a chance, or would he commit himself by instant, stern refusal?

"Promise me to wait a little while," said Mrs. Fletcher.

"I will not press nor hurry you," the young man said, his tone unconsciously a shade uneasy. "But do not let it be too long. I do not like to keep things back. I would rather be quite open with my uncle from the beginning. Indeed, it is the wiser way."

Marion held out her hand again to say good-night, Sam pressed it warmly.

"I owe it to my Uncle Miles, you see," he said with gentle apology. "Yet, all the same, my own mind is made up, as a man's should be." With that he left her.

In her room afterward Mrs. Fletcher said to herself:

"I will see Miles Otway. I will make friends with him. Or else—for Rose's sake—I will leave it all to Sam. He is right. A man's mind should be made up."

A pleasant lane, with small houses on each side, ran up at the back of the high street from the village square, where were the shops and post-office. Miles often took this quiet, roundabout way in going home.

One morning he walked along it leisurely, pausing presently before a cottage. Two women lived there, mother and daughter, seamstresses. They sometimes did work for Mr. Otway. He now and then sent them fruits, vegetables, and flowers, from his own garden. He stood there, his cane tucked under one arm, while he cut some bits of the young-leaved, thorny twigs of the sweet brier.

The door opened; a lady came out. She wore a simple black dress, a bonnet of folded black silk, within whose edge a single, soft white line defined a fair, sweet face. No cataract of crèpe; no evasive ornament. A quiet acceptance of a fixed estate. Miles did not look up. He was busy with his cuttings. He stepped aside that she might pass, but she did not.

"Mr. Otway." The voice was calmly gentle.

Then he had to make some sign, for he was a gentleman. The hand that still held the knife went up to his hat and raised it slightly. If he ha known which way she meant to go he would have gone the other; but she did not move, and he stood still, trimming his sprigs.

"Why cannot we be friends?" the sweet voice said.

She half held out her hand, but he was busy, and he would not see.

"We are growing old, Miles."

"I am old. I do not make new friends."

"Nor forgive old ones?"

Miles looked straight at her then, as cold as stone.

"I don't know whether outgrowing is forgiving. I've outgrown a good deal in my life," he said.

Even yet she would not be repulsed; there was nothing in her meaning that could be ashamed.

"We are neighbours now," she said with kindly dignity. "I should like it to be in neighbourly content."

He had finished his work deliberately, and put his knife in his pocket. He took his stick from under his arm.

"I am content. But I don't make neighbours, either. It's too late for beginnings. I've lived my life."

He stepped off the path and lifted his hand to his hat.

"Not all of it," answered Marion, as she moved to go. "There is the Land of the Leal."

The Leal! Miles' lips flashed into a bitter curve.

"An uncertain place and population," he remarked frigidly. "I don't see how it can be largely re-enforced from this planet."

The man had the last word. Men occasionally do. He finished his intended salutation with a remote, stately courtesy, and passed on.

Mrs. Fletcher raised her interdict. Nothing else remained for her to do. Sam thereupon joined his uncle in the garden path one evening and made avowal.

"Uncle Miles," he said briefly, "I have found my girl of the period. Your exception, too, I think. The period has neither made nor spoilt her. She would have been the same at any period."

"You put a good many periods in your remarks without coming to the point. Please state your fact."

"I thought I was stating it. Not much remains. The girl I mean—the girl I hope to marry—is Rose Fletcher."

"That woman's daughter. That accounts."

"Her mother's daughter; yes, it does account," said Sam quickly, perceiving and resenting a prejudice, without at all comprehending it.

"For every perfection? Very likely you think so. I'm not surprised. She's that sort of woman. One way or another she'll flirt and cajole till she dies. She would make eyes—for an object—at an organ-grinder's monkey."

He said it, calmly scornful, between slow whiffs of his pipe. The cumulative bitterness of his words drew itself from a new, severe wound—the sudden suspicious understanding of her beautiful overture of peace.

The absurdity was beyond resenting; Sam nearly laughed. But he answered curtly, "She would be sweet to anybody or anything, if that's what you mean."

"Yes, that's what I mean. And she would mean nothing but her own ends."

"Uncle, you are unjust; unworthy of yourself. You do not know Mrs. Fletcher."

"I knew her before you were born."

A faint apprehension flashed through Sam's mind.

"I cannot help it. You may have been mistaken then; you certainly are mistaken now. I hope you will think better of it," he was adding with entreaty, "for——"

"I don't think of it at all," interrupted the old man.

"But I ask you to think of it! Don't be hard, Uncle; this means everything in my life. There is absolutely no other way for me."

"Then our ways separate. I cannot help it either."

The two walked on without words. It was hard to break from each other so, hard to separate their ways.

"Understand," said Miles Otway, stopping when they reached the house again, and shaking the dead ashes from his pipe, "I have no spite in this matter. It will make no difference in what I shall ultimately do for you, though it may in a way of my doing it. Family property is a trust. You're safe in that respect. I've no threats to make. You can go your own way. But you cannot bring that young woman here; and"—slowly—"I will never enter your door. We will not speak of it any further."

It was the cruelest dismissal that could have been given. It was a torture that only one generous spirit, under warp and wound, could inflict upon another.

The marriage took place in February. On the night before his wedding the young man found upon his dressing-table an envelope; it held a cheque for two hundred and fifty pounds. In the morning he met his uncle as he came downstairs. Before the old man knew, Sam had his hand; the grasp was strong. "I know you don't want words," he said. "But I feel as you would in my place." Then they went in to breakfast together.

Sam bought "The Hollyhocks," an old house and small, long ago a beautiful mansion, but vandalised, in vulgar hands, by the improvements of forty years before, and now neither ancient nor modern. But there he and his wife were very happy.

* * * * *

When February came round again a beautiful happening at "The Hollyhocks" made the home complete. Miles Otway found a note on his breakfast-table.

"I have a little son," it said. "I shall give him the old family name. I hope you won't take it amiss."

The old man was crotchety that day. The new pull chafed hard the soreness of his harsh resolve.

The time went by. These last months had been the bitterest of all to Miles since the "separate ways" began. There was something in the world he had a right to, but that by his own action he could not take. Against this condition of things he rebelled. It was not comfortable.

One day he got a bit the best of it for the time being. "I owe the youngster that much anyhow," he said. Being a just man he went upstairs, took something out of an old chest and sent it to London. It came back in a neat silversmith's box. It lay a week in his drawer. He could not quite decide how to act.

Sam came in several times. He had never stayed away. It would have been easy enough to hand the parcel to him, but Uncle Miles said to himself with a vague obstinacy, "No hurry, I'll do it as I please."

Easter Monday arrived, and he had not found out what he pleased. Early after tea he took his stick, and walked over the hill. There was a bright young moon. The weather was clear and still.

Miles purpose was not even yet defined when he was in sight of the house. He might ring, do his errand, and go as he had come. Suppose Sam should open the door? What matter? He need not cross the threshold. He need not break that—confounded—word of his. Secretly, the wish was in him that something might happen to give a turn to things.

The door was open. Half unconsciously he stepped into the hall.

The handle of a door into an adjoining room turned softly. A small figure came out and stopped; a child's face stared up at him. Two little hands put themselves sturdily behind the back, however, and the look did not flinch.

"Does you want my mamma?" the boy asked.

For a moment the man was as much surprised as his small detective. Then it came to him.

"Oh, you're the other one," he said.

"No, I ain't ze uzzer one. Ze uzzer one's upstairs in a basket. He's ze new boy. I's ze one zat always was. He can't sit up to dinner. I's four years old."

"Oh!"

"Oo is you?"

"Miles Otway," was the grim, grave answer.

"Well," said the boy, "I ain't af'aid. An' I sink I's better go and tell ze ozzers."

"Show me the way. I'll go, too."

The boy turned, opened the door behind him and ran on shouting:

"I's got him! Here's sombody! I's caught him, my ownself!"

Miles Otway followed, composed and dignified.

* * * * *

Half an hour later dinner was served, Miles was at Rose's right hand, between her and Sam. Opposite were Marion and the boy.

Everybody had taken everything as of natural course. There had been no question or explanation. Uncle Miles had effected the grand gainsaying, he had contradicted himself.

In the middle of the table, close under the épergne of ferns, stood a beautiful old-fashioned cup. On it were three inscriptions:

Miles Otway, Jan. 4, 1798.
Miles Otway, Aug. 6, 1830.
Miles Otway, Feb. 2, 1892.

This last little Miles was brought down at dessert to be shown his inheritance.

Before little Gay was taken to bed he came and climbed upon the rung of Uncle Miles' chair.

"I know which you is now," he whispered in his ear, "You's the fairy godmovver!"

William Grace.

Digitized by Google

AN UNWILLING PASSENGER.

A COLD east wind was sweeping over the unsheltered country where lay the little station of Lidby Junction—so cold that no one who could stay at home would have chosen to face it. Nevertheless three or four passengers had just alighted from the local train and were preparing to wait till the next "up" train was due. Whether they were willing travellers that bleak night may be left to conjecture.

All but one immediately sought the shelter and warmth of the waiting-room. The one—a gentleman—remained on the platform.

"How long to wait, porter?" he asked.

"Forty-five minutes, sir," was the answer.

The passenger pulled up the collar of his fur coat and thrust his hands into his pockets.

"Not there!" he called out, as the porter, carrying his valise, made for the waiting-room. "Three women and a man there already and no chance of seeing the fire."

"You can't wait out here, sir," said the man, surprised.

"Don't intend to. I'll go and have a smoke at your fire, and you can help me to pass away the time. What's a porter for if not to make passengers comfortable? Now don't keep us standing here!"

The porter led the way without another word to the little den at the end of the platform of which he appeared to have the sole monopoly. It was neither clean nor inviting, but the fur-coated passenger pulled a chair up to the hearth, gave the fire a poke and quietly produced a silver cigarette case.

"Sit down," said he to the porter. "It's not your fault that there's no system in the working of country railways, and that passengers are shot out like bales of goods to wait for the next conveyance. If it was I should have enough to say to you for the next three-quarters of an hour. But it will be your fault if you don't fill your pipe out of that pouch."

"Thank 'e, sir," said the porter. "I'll not be in fault this time."

"I can't ask you to have a drink," said the other, as he applied the match to the end of his cigarette, "or I would. I want some one to pitch into about that too. But there are too many grievances to get over without plenty of time. The only solution I can see is not to travel at all. I daresay now, you've never been a twenty mile journey in your life?"

The porter was pressing the tobacco into the bowl of his pipe with a satisfied expression, and at the same time wondering what sort of a gent this was who carried things with so high a hand.

"Well, sir," he answered, "I can't exactly say that, for it's a deal more than twenty miles to the place where I was porter first. That was on the South-Western line. It was only last year I got sent on here."

"And how did you come to be carted off to this dead-alive hole?"

"I was laid up in hospital down at Exeter for six weeks, and my place was filled up. And talking of journeys, sir, it was all along of a journey that that happened."

"Yes?"

"Yes, sir, that it was. And it was the rummiest journey that as ever a man took."

The traveller glanced at the burly young man. "Well, how was that?" he asked.

"Well, sir," said the porter, not at all unwilling to tell his story, "it is just a year since then—much the same sort of a night as this, with not a star showin'. It was a little station like this, not many passengers as a rule, but a good many trains passin' through in the day. The lamps were all alight and the line signalled clear for the 'up' train. It was bitter cold, and I says to my mate, 'Not many for Exeter to-night,' for there were but two or three when the train came in. It stopped only a minute or two. Just as I was shutting the last door, I sees a man make a rush for it. He seemed to come out of the dark and not through the station door at all. He made for the carriage and got in, and before I knew any more I was gripped under the arms, pulled in too, and thrown down on the floor. The surprise sort o' stunned me for a minute, but when I looked up the train was moving and a tall man in grey was standing over me.

"'What's up?' says I, not knowing.

"He put his great foot on my chest. My eye! he was a big man—with eyes that seemed to screw you up like a gimlet.

"'Now look here,' says he, speaking quiet. 'If you do what I tell you no harm shall happen to you. If not, by——I'll kill you!' And I knew he meant it. 'I could choke you now,' says he; 'but if you will get up and change clothes with me you shall go scot free.'

"'Mad,' thinks I, 'no good refusing.' So I says 'yes,' and he lets me get up. I did it quick for I won't say as I wasn't in a bit of a fright. But you might have knocked me down with a feather, sir, when I saw his clothes—for they were a convict's, light drab colour with the broad arrow marked clear. No help for it. He got mine and had them on as quick as lightning.

"'Now,' says he, 'no noise,' and he gave me a blow that took the wind out of me and gagged me with my own pocket-handkerchief.

"Before I had got the better of that knock he had tied my hands together with the strap he wrenched off the window and I lay helpless. I was no match for such mighty strength.

"'Now,' says he, 'so long as you lie quiet under the seat you are safe,' and with that he gave me a push, and then I lay like a log.

"The train stopped just after that. I couldn't move, and no one came in, and the convict's great boots were so close to my head that I didn't like the idea of a knock with them. So I lay quiet. Then we stopped at Okehampton. Someone got in. I couldn't see, but I knew presently it was a woman. She sat on the seat I was lying under. 'A cold night ma'am,' says the convict, but his voice was so altered that I shouldn't have known it.

"'Yes it is cold,' says the other, and I knew she was a lady. Then he began to talk for all the world just as though he was really a porter. Very soon he had made her believe that he belonged to Exeter station and promised to find her a cab when the train arrived there. I lay wonder ng how all this was going to end. At Crediton the carriage door opened again, and this time a man came in. My heart began to beat at the thought of help. If only I could get my hands undone I thought I could finish this little play. But I was tied fast—with the convict's boots close to my head, and I began to think of the figure I'd cut in that convict rig-out even if I did appear.

Digitized by Google

"Presently the villain began to talk to the man who had just come in. He was a farmer—a slow-speaking chap—elderly, I soon found out, and a bit asthmatical.

"'Bad weather for you,' says the convict.

"'Middlin' bad,' answers the other.

"'Got far to go, sir?' asks my man.

"'Exeter,' answers the farmer. 'My son there's took mortal bad.' And then he began wheezing and coughing, and I saw I shouldn't get much help from him.

"There was no more talking for some time, and I kept turning over in my mind what would happen when we got to Exeter. That would be my chance, I thought, and no good moving before and running the chance of being kicked to death. I tell you, sir, I never went through such a time as that—never in all my life.

"At last we got near Exeter.

"'Tickets please,' was the next thing. My man was as cool as a cucumber.

"'Haven't got my pass,' says he.

"He knew his porter's dress 'et him travel free.

"'Got to see the station master at Exeter.'

"'Where from?' asks the ticket collector.

"'Lydford; name—Joe Snell; all right. Goin' back to-night.'

"The door was shut. He had got my name too, as pat as if he'd had it at baptism. I remembered a letter there was in the pocket of my coat from my girl, and I felt like shaking the breath out of him.

"Just as we were slowing into Exeter, says he to the young lady:

"'Now miss, let me take your bags and rugs and follow me. I'll see you all right.'

"'Now I'll be rid of you,' thinks I, 'and if I'm half a man you'll not get off!'

"But just as I was thinking that, he leaned over and whispered something to the farmer. I couldn't hear the words nor see their faces but the farmer made a sound as if he was startled

"'Good Lord!' cries he, and there was another whisper. Just then the train stopped. Quick as thought out jumps the convict and helps the lady. The farmer follows as if he couldn't get out quick enough, and the door was shut and in another moment locked, as I could hear by the click of the key.

"What was this for? I tr ed to wriggle out from under the seat, though I could not get my hands free or stand up, for that wretch had bound me so fast. Then I heard voices outside the door, and the farmer's wheeze as he told his tale. Five minutes passed, perhaps. I could see faces watching me through the window, but when I tried to lift up my head it was all swimming and confused like. The next thing I knew was that I was being dragged out and carried along the platform by two strong men. They took me inside the station-master's office and made me sit down. Then they took the handkerchief from my mouth. I was half choked and kept gasping before I could speak.

"Then I begged to have my hands undone, for the strap was cutting my flesh.

"'All right, my man,' said one, and I saw that he was a policeman. 'You won't do much mischief now.'

"'It was a good piece of work to nobble you,' says another. 'Where's the porter—what's his name?'

"'Joe Snell,' answers the wheezy farmer. 'He's gone with a lady, and he'll be back in a minute. He asked me to keep guard.'

"'I'm Joe Snell!' cried I. 'He is the convict who went with the lady. He's the rascal!' There was a laugh.

"'Yes, we know all about it,' said the sergeant.

"'Of course you're not an escaped convict from Dartmoor—Oh no!'

"Then I got desperate. My head got queer again and I didn't know what happened.

"But when I came to I was lying on the floor with something under my head. The farmer was talking.

"'That's exactly how it all happened,' he was saying, 'and a pretty sort of game to be travelling with a mad convict. But you've got 'im, and now you've got to keep 'im, and I must go.'

"So I was left with the policeman and station-master and some others.

"'Well, where's that there porter?' said one.

"'Takin' his time with the lady, considerin' the company as is waitin',' said another.

"'Look here,' says I, feelin' a bit better, 'I ain't no convict. Look at my hair—is it close-cropped? Look at my clothes under this darned fit-out and see if they don't belong to Joe Snell.'

"Then says one to the other, 'Never thought of his hair—but it's got no prison cut.' Then they fell to examining my clothes, and they soon saw that what I said was true. Then there was a bit of a shine, I promise you, sir, for all this time—and it wasn't far short of twenty minutes—the sham porter had been making off with the young lady's bag, and no doubt money in it, and my clothes to keep him from being found out.

"They telegraphed to Lydford and the station-master came on by the next train and identified me. By ten o'clock that night I was in bed comfortable at the station-master's house at Exeter, with them convict clothes taken away by the police.

"I was taken to hospital next day, for that bangin' about of my head had made me bad, and they said I was ravin' about the convict for days and nights. And that's how it was I never went back to Lydford."

"And, the convict?" inquired the passenger, looking at his watch, and pulling up his fur collar.

"Never heard of again so far as I know," said the porter. "He managed well and no mistake. It was a dark night and he got off with the lady's bag and rugs. And, whatever he did with himself, my clothes was seen no more. Here's your train, sir."

"Clever fellow that," said the passenger, as he walked across the platform to his carriage. "I should like to know what became of him."

Something in his voice made the porter look up quickly as he held out his hand for what the passenger offered him. The next moment the train had moved away and the sneering face was lost to view.

"Could it have been his brother?" the startled porter was asking himself, "or——?" But there was no answer to his question.

E. Dawson.

Digitized by Google

My Sleeve-Link.

I HAD strolled into the park to pass the time that hung heavy on my hands. On the morrow I was to take part in what was, at least to me and one other, an important affair; and nothing is more trying than waiting for a crisis.

On a grass plot not far from where I lounged, a couple of French bonnes were gossiping, while the children they watched chased each other over the green sward. I could occasionally catch words as the little ones shouted to each other, and I knew they were English—at least they spoke the English tongue. One of them, a little girl of perhaps six or seven years, had dashed by me several times, with flying ringlets. In her sash was that which plainly showed she had disregarded the instructions posted everywhere in this German park: "Es ist nicht erlaubt Blumen abzupflücken." "It is not permitted to pluck the flowers." In one of her flights I stopped her.

"Don't you see," I said, pointing with my stick to one of these notices, "they won't let anyone pick the flowers?"

She looked from me to the notice, then at her flowers; then fixed her eyes straight on mine. But her mind was not easily made up to such an informal introduction, and she soon dropped her eyes again to the flowers.

"Suppose a policeman should come along," I went on, "and find these flowers in your sash?"

Her brow knit in a frown, but still she did not deign to answer.

"Never mind; I'll try to get him to let you off, if he comes."

"But if you can't?" said a little voice. It was so little and so timid that I scarcely heard it.

"I can try. Won't you give me one of the flowers?"

In a twinkling she forgot her fears. A new question came up to drive the first right out of her little brain. She began to pick over the flowers, hunting for one worthy of a gift.

On the road at the foot of the slope one of the guardians of the park was loitering in the sun, his hands clasped behind him, his sabre swinging like the pendulum of a clock as he walked with his head thrown back, that he might see from under his helmet. Presently, instead of stopping when he came to the end of his beat, he kept on, round a curve in the road, disappearing for a few moments behind a clump of trees.

"The policeman!" I exclaimed to the child. "He's coming."

"Where?"

Her cheek whitened.

"Down there, behind the trees."

She looked anxiously in the direction I pointed.

"Give me the flowers," I said. "He'll think I took them."

"No."

"Yes, quick."

"No, no," she cried, impatiently stamping her diminutive foot.

"Why not?"

"You didn't take them."

"Well, come and sit by me, I won't let him hurt you."

She came and climbed upon the seat beside me. The policeman came on, professedly looking at the flowerbeds or the trees, or up at the sky, but really at the maids. As he came near where we were sitting, I could hear my protégée's little heart beating like a toy-drumstick. When he came opposite us, what was my astonishment to see her take the flowers from her girdle and hold them toward him, and call out:

"I took your flowers, Mr. P'liceman. Are you going to take me to prison?"

Fortunately she spoke in English, and not till a moment after he had passed. He kept on without noticing us, round the road which bent in an ellipse about the sward.

Then my little girl buried her face against my shoulder and burst into tears.

"Never mind, little one; he shouldn't have troubled you; I'd have spitted him on his own steel first," I said comfortingly.

In another moment there was a transition. Undried tears stood on her cheek, but every other vestige of distress had disappeared. She stepped down off the seat.

"Are you going to leave me?" I asked.

"Yes."

"So soon?"

"I may come back again if—"

"If the policeman comes, you little coward—no, you little heroine. Won't you give me a kiss before you go?"

She looked down on the walk, neither assenting to nor dissenting from my proposition. I drew her towards me, and taking her head between my two hands, looked into her face.

I had quarrelled with my chum, an Englishman, like myself. The quarrel arose from nothing, but it led to an assignment for a duel, after the German fashion. I was enraged, yet I had an uncomfortable feeling that I was in fault.

Presently she asked; "Have you got a girl?"

"No, I haven't a girl,—or boy, or mother, or anyone?"

"I don't like that."

Her big blue eyes were full of sympathy.

"Deedie!" called one of the maids.

"I must go now. Emilie is calling me."

"Go and ask Emilie if you may come back and stay with me a little longer."

Digitized by Google

"Will you wait here till I come?"

"Certainly."

I leaned back on the wooden seat and watched an animated conversation between the bonne and the child, speaking, from what I could hear, in French. Presently she came running back with the information that she might stay a little longer.

I sat for some time trying to keep her with me, for at the sight of a butterfly or a humming-bird she would be off like the wind. When she came back from one of these flights I drew her to me to caress her. I asked her about a bead necklace she wore, and who gave it to her; and took hold of it to examine it, that my hand might touch her warm neck. And all the time she prattled, and asked me questions, and told me about people whose identity she didn't trouble herself to explain, as though I had always known them.

I was forgetting everything in this innocence, this diminutive combination of strength and weakness. She insisted on decorating me wi h the flowers she had appropriated, and soon made me look like a figure in a flower-bed. Then she stood off and looked at me, and clapped her hands in great glee and laughed, and I laughed myself.

"Deedie!"

"Your nurse is calling you again; you must go."

"Are you coming here to-morrow?" she asked.

The question startled me. It brought me back to my quarrel. Where might I be to-morrow?

"Do you wish me to come?" I asked.

"Yes."

"Very much?"

"Ever so much."

An expression of pain must have passed over my face, for she asked:

"Why do you look sorry?"

"Go. But stay a moment. What can I give you for a keepsake?" I felt in my vest-pocket for some trinket, but could find nothing. "Here." I pulled a cameo sleeve-button from my cuff and handed it to her.

She drew back. "Mamma won't let me take things from people."

"Take it, and if your mamma won't let you keep it, you can bring it back to me another day."

"To-morrow?"

"Go! go! good-bye."

I wound my arms about her and kissed her. When I opened them it was like letting a bird out of a cage. She flew like a swallow near the ground across the grass, to rejoin the nurses and the other children. Then they all arose and walked away.

* * * * *

Four weeks elapsed before I went into the park again. Then my complexion was many shades whiter, and two stout canes lay beside me on the seat on which I sat, the same on which I rested when I made the acquaintance of Deedie. I was convalescent. I had taken part in what I feel that I speak assuredly when I say was my last affaire d'honneur. I had been severely wounded.

It was now midsummer, and I was glad to be protected from the sun by an elm which spread its branches near me. I had come to the park with a vain hope of meeting my friend—my little girl who had so charmed me by her innocent prattle and, more than all, by her childish exhibition of moral courage.

While I sat I meditated on my parting with her a month before—the disappointment she must have experienced when she came to the park the next day, and did not find me.

The next day! What had it brought for me?

Just before dawn of that eventful morning I lay dreaming—dreaming that I walked in the park with Deedie—yet not Deedie the child. She had grown to be a woman. The park, too, had changed. The trees had grown wonderfully; saplings which the day before had only reached to my head were now twice as high. And Deedie—she was not the little romp of yesterday, but wore a countenance of deep seriousness—she walked beside me calmly and with a certain awe-inspiring stateliness. Her features retained all the delicacy of a child, but added the sympathy of a woman. And she reproached, asking me if I would kill a man whom I had insulted.

Then I felt a vice-like grip on my arm, and found myself awakened. A strapping youngster about my own age, with a box under his arm, was visible in the glimmer of early dawn.

"Never mind the girl," he said; "get up."

"What girl?"

"The one you've been calling in your sleep."

The laugh that accompanied his words jarred upon me, scarcely awakened from my vivid dream.

"What is it?" I asked, bewildered.

"Here;" and he tapped with his finger on the box.

"Yes, yes, I see."

I threw off the covering and sprang up.

* * * * *

There is the policeman walking on the same beat, his sabre swinging, his head thrown back. But where is the child? I scan the different groups near me. No. She isn't here. I should know her among a thousand children.

But to return to that eventful morning. I was an excellent shot; he was a bungler. I had tried to make him a better, but he was too clumsy. He could handle neither a foil nor a pistol, and hadn't the delicacy of sight or touch to learn.

I cast a glance at my adversary's face. He was calm and resolute. I saw as plainly as words could have told me the condition of his mind. Besides, I knew him well. His nature was eminently practical. He was the most stolid, matter-of fact man I ever knew, yet honest and steadfast at heart. He had determined that he must kill me, or I would kill him; and he had decided to kill me if he could.

We were not on the field ten minutes. The distance was paced. I was handed my pistol and sent to my station. The word was given.

But other words sounded in my ears with the signal to fire—the words spoken to me by Deedie in my dream.

Both shots rang out as one, sharp and spiteful on the quiet morning air. I purposely fired aside from the living mark before me. My adversary stood unhurt; I had a bullet in my side.

I saw a figure striding towards me. It looked strange and tall and indistinct, but I knew it was my adversary.

"Are you satisfied?" I asked.

"Satisfied! Good heaven! are you badly hurt?"

"It was all my fault," I extended my hand. He attempted to take it, but the seconds interfered. "We haven't time for palaver; we must get away from here at once."

A carriage in which the medical student had come to the ground stood in the road near by. I was hurried into it, or rather carried, for I was fainting. The doctor and my second got in with me, and we drove to my rooms. The others hurried off in a different direction.

Digitized by Google

All that morning I lay on my bed, experiencing a mental, if not a physical, convalescence. I had been badly wounded, but this was nothing. My hot head had been turned into gentler veins of thought. I had been saved from a bitter memory, a fiend that would have pursued me through life. I was in an ecstacy when I realized that I had not killed my friend—that my hands were bloodless. I was thinking of the diminutive shield which had been thrust between me and crime—the little maid I had met in the park.

She is perhaps seven, I mused; I am twenty. Seven from twenty leaves thirteen. When she is twenty I shall be thirty-three. That's not a great difference. Then I made a vow—a reckless, absurd boyish vow. Ah! the hot impulse of youth; into what follies does it lead us!

One of my first acts on getting out was to take my remaining sleeve-button to a jeweller and have a pin attached, that I might wear it in my scarf. Perhaps she will do the same, I argued; and I have an abiding faith that by this means we shall one day recognise each other. There was another link by which I might know her: Deedie, I learned, was the diminutive for Delia; so Delia must be her Christian name.

I sat in the park till sunset. I saw again in fancy the group of a month before walking away, and Deedie dancing backward and holding up her token and throwing me kisses. Then the figure melted from my fancy as it had faded from my eyes before. I arose and walked away. For the first time in my life I experienced a sensation of loneliness.

After that, on bright days I often visited the park, but not to find my little love. Doubtless she had returned to England. At last I completed my studies and left the university.

* * * * *

Twelve years passed, during which, if my child friend did not pass entirely out of my mind, she at least became a very indistinct image on my memory. I had become a quiet, matter of fact man, with no fancy whatever for the sight of blood, and without the slightest predilection for making vows. The one I had made so long before I was not disposed to regard as strictly binding; and should any reason occur for breaking it, I did not look upon it as a serious obstacle.

I was sitting one summer afternoon on the porch of a hotel facing the beach, chatting with a friend—a lady. It was the hour when the young lady sojourners, dressed in tasteful costumes, promenaded to and fro; quite enough of them, I thought, to form a battalion of beauty.

Suddenly in one of the groups that went by, appeared one who, as she passed, nodded pleasantly to the lady with whom I was sitting. The salutation was unstudied, yet not familiar—a happy combination of cordiality and dignity. The smile that accompanied it sent a thrill through me in a twinkling.

"Who is that?" I inquired, quickly.

"Miss Ward."

"Her Christian name?"

"Edith."

"No, no, her other name?"

"She has no other."

"Isn't it Delia?"

"Simply Edith. Would you like to know her?"

I rested back in the chair from which I had started.

"Thank you; I'll not trouble you. I shall not be here long."

The next afternoon I was standing at the door with my friend, taking my leave. A bevy of young girls approached, and one of them, wishing to speak with my friend, stopped for the purpose. In a moment I was introduced to the whole party. One of the young ladies was Miss Ward.

There was about this girl a certain high-born reserve which alternated with an engaging frankness and sprightliness. There were two sides to her disposition, the one merry, the other serious. A low melodious laugh expressed keen enjoyment to perfection; but if anything occurred to divert her from merriment to seriousness, there came without warning that which inspired me with a kind of awe.

Instead of departing at once, as I intended, I did not leave the hotel for four weeks. I prolonged my stay, notwithstanding a number of resolutions to the contrary, until I began to censure myself for being weak. At last, perceiving that my stay was noticed by my friends, I resolved to leave immediately.

On the evening on which I made this new—and I determined it should prove an irrevocable—resolution, I chanced to be sitting with—Miss Ward. The moon was at the full. It seems singular to me now that I should have presumed to speak so confidingly to one I had known so short a time. Besides, my companion had not encouraged any special confidence on my part. Indeed, I regretted that she had ceased to treat me with the unconventionality of the others, and seemed at times a trifle constrained.

What it was that led me to confide in her on the evening mentioned I can scarcely conceive, unless it was that exquisite hour—the most delightful to me of all hours of the day—when the newly-risen full moon stands on the horizon as if pausing to survey the landscape, and then begins to rise, a great illuminated ball, in the heavens.

Whatever was the cause, I touched upon several episodes in my life, among them the story of my meeting little Delia in the park in Germany, twelve years before. I gave a minute account of what occurred. "Here," I said, putting my finger on my scarf-pin, "is the mate to a keepsake I gave her."

"What a beautiful cameo!" she looked at it closely. "I think I have noticed it in your scarf before."

I took it from its place and handed it to her. She bent over it to examine the carving in the mingling twilight and moonlight.

"You haven't told me," she said, without looking up, "what it was that engaged your attention on the day after you parted with the little girl."

I hesitated.

"That would scarcely interest a woman."

"But I wish to know."

I told her of my quarrel with my friend; my dream before going out to the field; my firing aside, and receiving my adversary's bullet. As I gave the short story she bent closer to the object she was examining, until her face was entirely hidden from me. When I had finished we sat some time in silence.

"This pin," she remarked at last, "must have been cut at Rome."

"It was."

"And the child—" she went on, "she really prevented your becoming—murderer?"

"Would you have so regarded me?" I looked at her anxiously.

Digitized by Google

"Yes, and more"; she raised her eyes and fixed them full upon mine; "a coward."

Great heavens! how like the look of the face of Delia, in my dream of years before!

"And you have given up all expectation of ever seeing the child again?" she asked, turning her eyes from me to the cameo.

"I scarcely know if I should wish to meet her."

"Why?"

"Under an impulse of gratitude for the unknowing part she had taken in preventing my being a—murderer ——"

"And a coward," she interrupted.

"And a coward," I admitted, "I made a silly, sentimental vow."

"What vow?" she frowned.

"That no other person should be my wife; that I would seek her, and when found, if ever, I would win her——"

"Supposing that she would be willing," she added, not giving me time to finish.

It was plain that I had antagonised her.

"Of course."

"Well?"

"Since then"—I looked out at the peaceful moon, at the deepening shadows, "since then I have met one who has driven the child-image from my mind—I fear from my heart."

We sat without speaking, each waiting for the other to break the silence.

"You have spoiled a pretty story," she said, somewhat sadly. "You should have been true to the little girl. How do you know but what she is treasuring the mate to your pin?"

"She was too young."

"How old did you say?"

"Seven, perhaps."

"Seven! That's not too young. I was impressed myself at that age."

"May I ask, are you true to that impression?"

She hesitated.

"I have treasured an ideal. But I must go in," she added, in another moment; and rising, she moved towards a window opening on the balcony.

"Good-night."

She stepped in at the window. As she crossed the sill and entered the room she turned. A smile, a frank, happy smile broke over her face. It bespoke the merry side of her disposition. In another moment she was gone.

That night I dreamed. I was again in the park in Germany. It was night. The image of a former dream walked beside me. The features of that image had long ago faded from my memory. Now they were the features of Miss Ward.

"Would you kill him because you insulted him? because you struck him?" The words came strangely, as out of a dead past.

"No, no; I will kill no one. I am no longer a boy. I thank Heaven I escaped this dreadful result of that boyish folly. It was you who taught me what is true courage; teach me now what is love?"

The next evening I met Miss Ward again. I expected it would be my last evening at the sea-side that summer. We sat in the nook where we had sat together so often before. Whether it was the prospect of my departure, or a suddenly imparted knowledge of the condition of my feelings, I do not know to this day, but the spell that had been gathering about me for weeks appeared suddenly intensified. Led on, it seemed, by a sort of fatality, I suddenly burst into a torrent of words which I had never dreamt of speaking when I joined her. I poured out my feelings in a number of short, glowing sentences.

I well remember her first words after I had ceased to speak. They conveyed to me the first knowledge of how deeply I was stung.

"But your vow?" she said. Startled, I had forgotten it. "Do you think it would be right for you to break it?"

I was silent.

"You must keep it."

Something told me that, however I might regard its keeping or its breaking, there was no compromise to be hoped for from the only woman who would be a temptation for me to break it.

She had been toying with my cameo, which she had desired to examine again. As she spoke the last words she arose and handed it back to me. I interpreted the act to mean a parting.

"I cannot. I will not," I cried, passionately.

"You can and you will," she replied. There was a sparkle in her eye. The other features of her face only indicated sympathy, kindliness.

"Good-bye," I faltered.

"Rather say adieu," she said, softly. She took my hand and pressed it kindly. "I shall have a word to say to you before you go," she added. "May I see you here to-morrow evening, when the moon rises?"

"Better go at once," I replied, bitterly.

"Shall I see you?" she repeated.

I bowed a silent assent.

The interval between this parting and the next evening seemed interminable. I believed her decision to be irrevocable; but what lover will not hope so long as there is a desire? Still, I wished it all over.

She came. She was clad in the light drapery of midsummer. The moonlight fell on her figure, softening the gauzy folds of her dress and blending them with the environing shadow. She was to me a human apparition; substantial yet unsubstantial, spiritual loveliness in human beauty. Why was she not less beautiful or less conscientious?

As she approached, my eye was caught by a flash of something, evidently metallic, where a lace handkerchief crossed her bosom. I was led by some unaccountable attraction to fasten my gaze on this object, which I knew I had not seen before, and which, as she drew nearer, shaped itself more distinctly. In another moment it flashed upon me what it was.

And what was it? To this day the answer brings a thrill of pleasure. It was the mate to my cameo.

I sprang across the short distance that separated us.

"And you are Delia?"

"No, Edith."

"How did you come by that cameo?"

"You gave it to me."

"And the name Delia?—explain."

"That was my father's doing. It was first Edie. Papa corrupted it to Deedie."

A single letter had misled me for twelve years

"And you have kept my souvenir?"

"I was forbidden to do so. I went to the park the day after I met you to return it. You were not there."

"No, I was not there. And you remember me?"

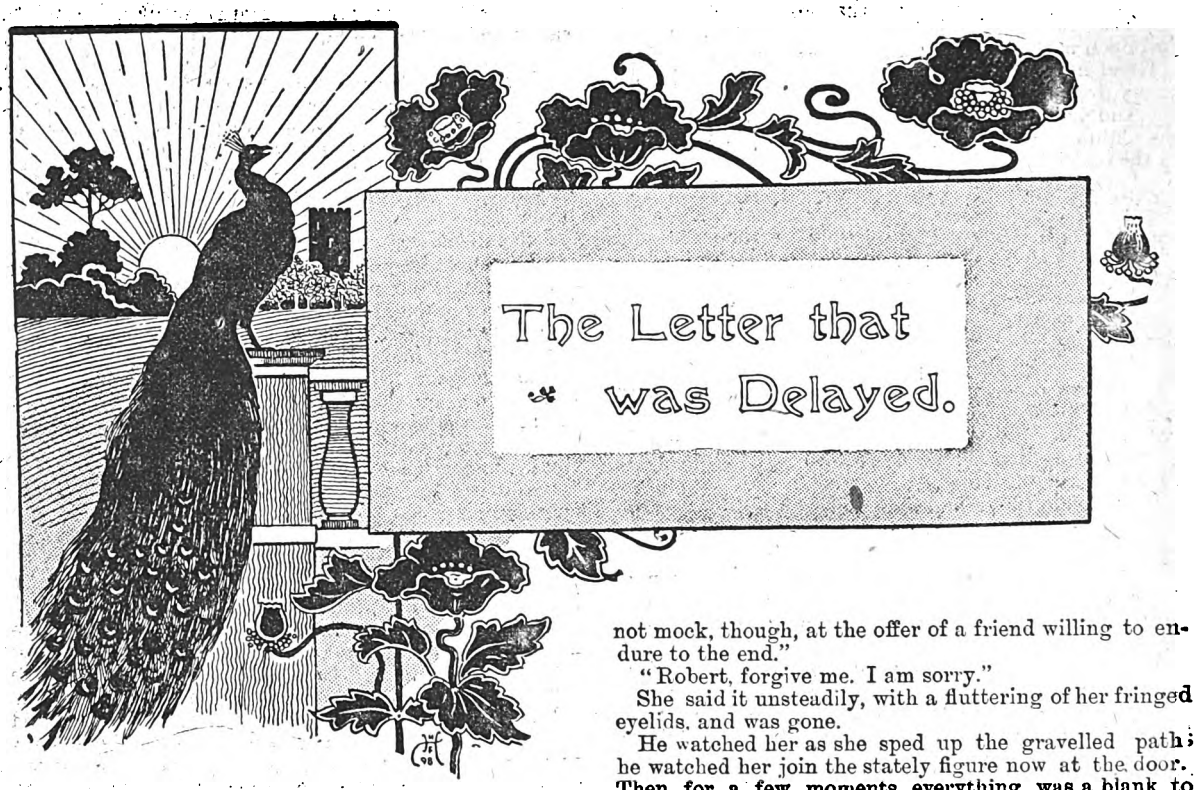
"I have not entirely forgotten," she said, dropping her eyes, "though I was rather young to——"

She did not finish.

"Love?" I asked, trembling.

Anthony Wilde.

Digitized by Google



THEY stood at the little gate together for the last time.

"Impossible!" she had said, in her disdainful way, with a flash of those wonderful eyes, whose false glamour Robert Strong had come to love only too well.

"Impossible?" He repeated it over and over, hardly knowing what he said. He took the pretty fair face in his two hands, and held it tightly.

"Nelly, come out of the damp," called a thin, affected voice.

Robert only bent closer to the face beneath him.

"She will have more to answer for than you," he said, thickly, "and I am glad of that; it softens the bitterness. Yet, even now, when I am feeling so keenly how cruelly you have lured me on, I cannot hate you, Nelly."

She shivered and made a motion to free herself.

"Stand still," he said, almost roughly, and then he loosed her at once, and moved back.

And the thin voice came to them again, this time a little sharper still.

As the girl turned, her eyes swept into Robert's a swift, sudden appeal.

It was strange how the moonlight brought out in that one fleeting look a weird, indefinable foreshadowing of future suffering.

"Heaven be praised," cried Robert, catching at her dress, "that I love you still, for by the strength of that love I will yet save you. Will you let me? Will you send for me?"

"Mr. Strong, you are sentimental. My aunt is waiting for me. Good-night." She spoke coldly and proudly.

"Oh, Nelly!" he cried in pain, "you believe that sorrow can never touch you. I hope it never may! Do not mock, though, at the offer of a friend willing to endure to the end."

"Robert, forgive me. I am sorry."

She said it unsteadily, with a fluttering of her fringed eyelids, and was gone.

He watched her as she sped up the gravelled path; he watched her join the stately figure now at the door. Then for a few moments everything was a blank to him. He realised at last how his life's love had been thrown away.

Robert Strong buried himself deeper than ever among his models and machinery after the de arture of Nelly and her aunt, and strove to forget the wild dream of his love.

With the strength of a giant he rode over his broad acres, directing, over-looking. With a surplus of zeal he carried on his work till his new-fangled notions and machines made the worthy country people wonder if he had gone mad, and clothed his name with fame and repute in the world outside.

"Yes, yes, yes," Robert's mother would say when the neighbours came in and talked over what a great man Robert was becoming, "my boy knows what he's about. I'm old-fashioned myself, and don't understand all his new-fangled names and ideas, but I've got faith in him, and I hope to live long enough to see the end."

But it was willed otherwise, and one morning the old lady was found dead in her bed, with a pleasant smile on her wrinkled face.

Desolate was the great house without the dear mother. Papers and models and dusty scientific books lost their relish, and, drive it away as he would, the image of Nelly rose before him.

In every leisure moment, at night, in his dreams, he saw her, and always with those last wavering words on her lips: "Robert, forgive me. I am sorry."

"She shall see how I can forgive her," said he. "She is in trouble. I will go to her at once."

And shrewd, clear-headed Robert Strong, who was so swiftly and surely making his name in the world by his deep insight into scientific and mathematical knowledge, packed his bag with all the nervous fidgetiness of a raw school boy, and hurried away haunted with a morbid dread lest the pretty, fair face that had played him false had come to sorrow.

Digitized by Google

But the pretty face, fairer than ever, beamed out on him from under a pink-lined parasol and a chip hat wreathed with the twining convolvulus.

Alas! for the wild chimeras that had taken possession of his brain! He drew back into the embrasure of the window, with his face clouding.

Another presence invaded Robert's lookout. A gentleman in appearance, as could be seen at a glance, evidently unaware that the window was already tenanted.

He seemed to be searching for some one in the crowd outside. At length his gaze fastened upon Nelly.

"Ah, there you are!" he hissed, with an evil look. "Coquette, is it? None knows that better than I! Ah, my beauty, smile on in your insolence while you may, for my evil wishes will follow you."

Robert Strong laid his hand heavily on the stranger's shoulder.

"I am that lady's friend," he said, with a motion towards her. "You are answerable to me for the language you have just used. Here is my card."

Robert towered up in his wrath grandly. Here was a champion not to be trifled with.

Let us give Henry Daland, for that was the stranger's name, credit as a rare tactician. In that one surprised moment he knew his man and took his cue.

"Robert Strong!" he read the name from the card. "Your name is familiar to me, and I would stand well with you. For the ungentlemanly words you so accidentally heard me utter, I indeed owe an apology, and to you as her friend I most humbly tender it. Perhaps if you knew the circumstances, you might pity as well as blame."

He threw an indescribable pathos and grace into his speech, and his voice trembled in irrepressible sadness at the end.

Robert thought of his own suffering, and held out his hand.

"Let us be friends," said he, "since we are brothers in affliction."

"It seems as though I should go mad," said Henry Daland. "I was so sure of winning her, and she encouraged me above all others till the peer came. That is he, riding in the carriage with her."

"Poor lad," said Robert, clasping him tighter.

In the evening the two stood arm in arm at the end of the long hall, and looked at Nelly standing in the centre.

There were other cheeks as fair, other faces as lovely, but by the supreme witchery of her power she was queen of them all.

Once she swept so close that her silken skirt brushed against them, and a rose fell from the dusky brown of her hair at their feet. Henry Daland was about to crush it with his foot, but Robert picked it up.

In the morning Robert started for home, leaving no word or sign for Nelly, and his new friend went with him.

The old farmhouse had a visitor for two or three weeks. A pleasant spoken, agreeable gentleman everybody agreed, and one whom Robert liked right heartily, and when at last he bid him good-bye, he did it with honest regret.

Sometimes those first words of Henry Daland's would come back to him strangely and unpleasantly, and then, ashamed of even one traitorous thought towards the one he called friend, he would take himself to task, saying:

"To think the poor fellow meant anything, when he was so cut up and dazed."

* * * * *

"Please, sir," said the postmaster's small boy, twisting his battered hat awkwardly in one hand, and holding a diminutive letter gingerly in the other, "father says as how this 'ere got lost somehow or nuther in atween the hind leg of the shelf and the iron safe, and he hopes as how it won't matter so much, seeing it's a small one."

Robert snatched the letter. He felt instinctively what was to come. It needed not the signature of "Nelly" to tell him whom it was from.

"Come, come," she said. "Oh, Robert, you are my only hope! Save me, or I am lost."

His shaggy eyebrows almost met as his eye caught the date. He groaned aloud when he thought of the months that her incoherent prayer had lain neglected amongst the dust and litter of the country post-office.

While his neighbours were wondering at his departure, Robert Strong, possessed with a fierce unrest, paced backwards and forwards on the deck of an ocean steamer, outward bound.

With tide, steam, and wind all in his favour, it seemed but a snail's pace he travelled at. He shuddered when he thought of Nelly's letter, and the time lost.

And when at last he reached Capetown, and found the house in ruins, and no trace of her, he was almost ready, in the first weakness of disappointment, to lie down and accept the fate that so persistently followed him.

But Robert Strong was not one to give up easily, and soon he set himself to work again with all his accustomed determination. Baffled and foiled, he woke to the knowledge that some secret enemy dogged his footsteps and turned back his sure success.

He sat one evening in a café, thinking this over, when a man at one of the tables behind him fell down in a fit.

Robert had no recognition of the features as they lay convulsed before him, but as they smoothed themselves out he saw Henry Daland, gentlemanly and aristocratic in appearance still, but fearfully haggard and emaciated.

Nobody knew him, and there was nothing about him to prove his identity. Insensible, he was conveyed to Robert Strong's rooms and left to his care.

And tenderly did Robert nurse him all through the terrible illness that the physicians declared must prove fatal.

"Nelly, Nelly!" the sick man would cry in his delirium, and then, defiantly, "I will see her! Stand back!" wrestling with his arms as if fighting a crowd; then, as if he had seen something frightful, he would cower and hide under the bed-clothes. "Is she alive? Did I murder her?" in a whisper, and with a loud laugh. "No, no; go away. That is not she. She is deceiving me again. Where is she?"

And it grew upon Robert slowly as he watched, that from Henry Daland's lips the mystery would stand revealed.

Anxiously did he wait the return of reason. After weeks of suspense it came.

Calming down from a furious paroxysm, he lay as if exhausted for several hours, and then opening his eyes fully upon Robert, he asked, rationally:

"How long have I been here?"

He was propped up with pillows, and motioned for Robert to come nearer.

Digitized by Google

"If you do not already know," said he, "I have something to tell you."

"About Nelly?"

Henry Daland nodded.

"And you are the one who threw me off the track; you betrayed me; you brought peril to her."

Another gesture of assent.

"Traitor!" cried Robert.

"Stay! I have not long to live. Listen and I will tell you all. A year ago I made a friend of you for an object; otherwise you would have run me to the ground. In consequence of the honest faith you credited me with, I was enabled to follow her unmolested. I followed her to here, and saw a millionaire succeed the English lord."

Henry Daland's eyes grew brilliant with excitement; his hollow cheeks flushed."

"I kept a magnificent house. I spent my money like water. This gave me the entrée to the superb madam and her beautiful neice, Nelly Harland.

"Fate favoured me. By the overturning of a carriage Nelly's uncle was suddenly killed. His wife was brought home in hysterics, and died in a week. Nelly, herself, was prostrated by the blow, and her friends fell away like autumn leaves, for it was found that her uncle had died bankrupt.

"Here then was my time. I concocted a scheme, which I may truly say was fiendish."

The colour had faded by this time from the speaker's cheek, and he lay a moment gasping for breath.

Robert Strong forgot he was a dying man and leaned forward.

"Do not dare to fail me now," he said passionately, "or——"

"Hush!" said Henry Daland, with difficulty. "What are earthly threats to me! Have patience and you shall hear all. I hired the house; I bribed the servants; all this unknown to her. By and by she grew better; she came downstairs; she asked questions.

"At length she was told all by the housekeeper, and coming in upon her she fell in a dead faint at my feet. Sending the housekeeper away, I held her in my arms till she revived.

"In her first weakness she was obliged to submit, but soon she freed herself and stood indignant before me.

"'Do you not know that you are hateful to me?' she said. 'Do you think I could ever consent to marry you?'

"'I am no more particular about that than you,' said I, twiddling my watch-chain.

"'How dare you stay in my house?'

"'Softly,' I lisped, 'it's my house, and you know it, and I don't risk as much as you.'

"Her eyes blazed.

"'I will leave.'

"I mocked her with a reverence.

"'Simply impossible, for I am your gaoler.'

"For a month she made every effort to escape, but I thwarted her at every turn. At last she got desperate."

"It was then she wrote to me," groaned Robert, with the big veins bulging out in his forehead. He shook the dying man, who was fast growing unconscious.

"Tell me what happened," he said.

"She jumped from her window in the third storey."

"On the pavement?" cried Robert, in horror.

Henry Daland took no notice of the question; his eyes were glazing.

"By all your hopes of eternal forgiveness," said Robert in agony, "say if she lives."

With a desperate effort the stiff lips articulated something, then the jaw fell—he was gone.

Down the street, with quick, unconscious tread strode Robert Strong.

He at once made his way to the nearest hospital. The grey-haired porter stood at the open gate, and he passed in without seeing him.

He walked through the sunshiny court-yard and through the cool corridors. They were all untenanted; he wished to meet someone now of whom he could make enquiries.

There was a rumbling down one of the long passages, and just as Robert turned the corner, a little wicker carriage appeared in sight, propelled by the occupant, a woman.

It stood still as he advanced and asked—

"Where can I find Miss Harland?"

"Here," said the woman, meekly and gravely, her hands folded on her breast.

"Yes, I know she is here somewhere, but where can I see her?" said Robert, gently, wondering (strange he should have troubled himself then) if this woman's face (it was hidden by her bonnet) was as calm and dead as her voice.

"Here," she answered again, as meekly as before.

"But you do not understand. I am a friend, a very old friend of Miss Harland. She sent for me a long time ago, and I have just been able to come. I have been looking for her a great while, and I have only now found where she is. Tell me just where to look for her in this asylum."

The pale, thin hands unloosened the white strings about her throat and the stiff, starched bonnet was taken slowly from the head, and for the third time the sober voice spoke.

"Robert Strong, Ellen Harland is here."

It brought the great man weeping like a child at her feet.

He had been prepared for anything.

"Only not this, not this," he moaned, covering his face.

He wept at sight of the beautiful face so scarred and wan and wasted; the beautiful eyes so dulled and dimmed with pain; the beautiful voice so cold and passionless.

She tried to comfort him.

"Though the joys of this life are passed from me," she said, "I am content, thought I shall never walk out again in the world, I am at peace; and never henceforth, in this body, to be freed from pain, yet am I happy."

And Robert strong was comforted, for her voice had lost its deadness.

And he could go away and leave her; he could bear even to put an ocean between her and him; for he knew, though she had lost this puny world, she had gained an entrance to life everlasting.

George Wolfé.

Who is Your Double?

The Editor of Pearson's Weekly is offering £10, to be awarded to the five pairs of people who most closely resemble one another. Photographs must be sent in envelopes marked "Likeness" to reach the office of P.W. by Monday, March 20th.

It should be a very interesting thing to you to find out whether there is any person who exists with a physiognomy practically the same as your own.

All photographs should be accompanied by a stamped addressed envelope sufficiently large to carry them. For details of this competition you should look in the current number of P.W.

Digitized by Google

THE WIZARD OF RED GULCH.

ARTHUR ARMSTRONG, of Montreal, was collector for the Golden Gate Iron Works builders of stamp-mills and other heavy machinery. He was on his first trip into one of the interior counties of California, a mountainous, mining district, where the coaches of the Beaverville, Red Gulch and Gold Run Stage Company are still the only medium of public conveyance. On this occasion Armstrong was the only passenger, for Joe Carter, the noted bandit, locally known as, "The Holy Terror," had robbed the stage the day before, and the incident had caused a temporary decline in the traffic of the line. Even Wells, Fargo and Company, had no treasure to forward that day, and therefore there was no shot-gun messenger aboard.

But the driver on the morning run, from the railway station into Beaverville, was a genial fellow, and, stimulated by a few draughts from Armstong's capacious flask and by some of his choice cigars, gave a most entertaining sketch of the robbery of the day before. Stopping at the spot where it had taken place, he described its minutest details. He pointed out the tree under which the passengers had been "lined up," while Carter had picked their pockets. Carter's style, although peremptory, was very quiet, and he had treated the passengers with great consideration, apologising for the annoying necessity of appropriating their valuables.

The driver alone had made resistance and had not been treated quite so gently. In fact, he had been "all shot up," and was now lying at Beaverville in a critical condition. His friends were in hot pursuit of Carter, intent upon lynching him if caught.

The road to Beaverville soon leaves the broad valleys that are traversed by the railroad, and winds for a distance through the foothills. Thence it penetrates the Sierras, leading deeper and deeper into a rugged country with small and scattered settlements most of which are mining-camps. It goes up and down long declivities, some abrupt, some gently sloping. A part of the way is shaded by magnificent forests of pine and fir. The robbery had occurred not far from Beaverville, a rude wayside station at which Armstrong and the driver arrived an hour or so after noon. Emerging from the dining-room after dinner, Armstrong found his friend, the driver, smoking on the little verandah.

"I leave you here," the driver remarked.

"Sorry," said Armstrong. "I appreciated your company this morning. Who takes the reins?"

"Jim Willing, one of the best drivers on the road, and a jolly good fellow. You'll enjoy the afternoon."

When the team, six wiry broncos, was brought from the stable, Armstrong took the former seat on the box. "Good-bye," he called to his late companion, reaching down a handful of cigars. "Have another?"

"Thanks. Good-bye."

As the horses were attached, Armstrong heard one of the men say that there wasn't a fresh horse left, not even a saddle horse. Everything had been pressed into service in the pursuit of Carter, who had headed for Nevada. "All ready!" called the foreman of the corral force. "Where's Willing?"

Just then a man whom Armstrong had not noticed climbed quickly into the driver's seat. Without waiting to gather up the reins, which were fastened to the brake, he yelled: "Go!" in a voice like the crack of a pistol, and the horses started at a gallop, throwing aside the two men holding them. With a quick motion the driver loosened the brake and grasped the reins. As Armstrong turned to wave a farewell, he caught a fleeting glimpse of a man excitably running after them and shouting: "Whoa! Stop!" But the driver urged the horses all the faster.

"Not much," he said. "I don't stop fer nobody. Let the duffer be on time if he wants to ride with me." A turn in the road and a clump of pines quickly shut their pursuers out of sight, but Armstrong fancied that he still heard them shouting.

Greatly amused at the independence of the man who dared thus defy the manager of the line, by leaving a passenger behind, Armstrong took a good look at the new driver. He was tall, wiry, and muscular; dark, with a stubby black beard, apparently of only a few days' growth. His face had a peculiar pallor, and his eyes were luminous, like a cat's in the dark. His head wobbled queerly from side to side, and the edges of a livid wound, or a deep scar, near the right temple, protruded below the slouched hat that was pulled low over the forehead. Altogether, his appearance was forbidding, even sinister and Armstrong decided that his friend of the morning must have been joking when he predicted a pleasant afternoon. The new driver seemed anything but sociable. To the proffer of the flask, refilled at the station, he answered:—

Digitized by Google

"No, thank you; not to-day."

"Have a cigar, then?"

"Thanks, but I don't care to smoke."

Armstrong lit a cigar and puffed in silence, the driver gave his whole attention to his horses, guiding them with wonderful skill. The road was now taking them through a deep cañon, with a stream rushing down the centre. There were many quick decents and sudden turns, but the driver made them all with the greatest ease, the pace slackening. Armstrong noticed, with a curious thrill of mingled apprehension and pleasurable excitement, that he took every possible chance of an accident yet always escaped. At the curves, he drew his horses in as closely as possible to the overhanging rocks, and sometimes the coach swung for a moment on two wheels, but it always righted itself, and the horses seemed to understand the slightest motion of the guiding hand.

Passing out of the cañon, they came to a stretch of more level country, and Armstrong improved the relatively slower gait by another attempt at conversation.

"How far," he asked, "to the next station?"

"'Bout twenty mile."

"Be there in two hours?"

"Certain; less than that if we hev any luck. Them hosses is good fer fourteen mile an hour, an' the road's down hill most of the way now."

"I suppose you have heard all about the hold-up yesterday?"

"Certain. I wuz there."

"What?"

"I wuz there. Saw the hull shootin' match."

Armstrong thought that the fellow was lying, but he didn't like to say so. He lit another cigar and continued.

"Were you one of the passengers yesterday?"

"No."

"You surely weren't the driver? He got shot."

"No. I wuzn't the driver."

"Nor the express messenger?"

"No."

"Well, then, if you were not the driver, nor the express messenger, nor a passenger, what were you doing there?"

"Jest loafin' round as a spectator."

More puzzled than ever, Armstrong inquired:

"How did you happen to be there?"

"Never you mind, stranger. Don't be too inquirin' 'bout other people's bizness. When I tell you that I wuz there, thet orter settle it."

Armstrong was hurt, not so much at his companions gruffness as at the fact that the genial driver of the morning had so grossly deceived him. Either this was true or else he was singularly unsuccessful in finding the right side of the rough nature with which he was trying to establish an acquaintance. He made one further effort.

"Now see here, Willing," he commenced.

"You're mistaken," the driver interrupted. "My uame ain't Willing."

"The deuce you say? Who are you then?"

"They call me the Wizard of Red Gulch, but my real name is William Murphy," said the driver quietly.

Armstrong sulked back into his seat, and in gloomy silence awaited further developments. These were soon forthcoming. They commenced to wind about the brow of a mountain preparatory to a descent on the other side of a "divide." There was forest on both sides of the road, and now and then they skirted the edges of ravines.

"I'll tell you how I got my name," said the driver still in a quiet monotonous tone. "I kin do things with hosses an' coaches sech ez no other feller ever done. I'll soon show you my greatest act. Jest over the hill here we go down all the way for 'bout a mile. Pretty steep, too. They call it Long Cañon. 'Bout the middle there's a stretch of a quarter of a mile where the bluff on this side is straight down five hundred to a thousand feet. Narrow road. Jest 'bout the middle of this there's a big boulder right on the ragged edge. I turns them hosses loose an' makes it at a gallop. Ev'ry trace on this side an' both wheels hez to graze thet rock 'thout hittin' hard enough to throw us over. See?"

No, Armstrong didn't see, and didn't want to see. He was convinced now that he was travelling with a maniac. But it was too late to interfere. They had entered upon the narrow road indicated, with a sheer wall of granite at their left, and a plunge into unknown depths at their right. Armstrong caught glimpses of the tops of trees far below them, and fancied that he heard the roaring of a torrent at the bottom. He shut his eyes in despair; then opened them again, impelled by a horrible fascination. Yes, there was the boulder just ahead. The brake was jammed down hard but the horses were plunging merrily along, their heads in the air their hoofs flying, quivering with excitement. The coach swayed and lurched, and the man held the reins, his eyes fixed intently on the leaders, leaning away forward in his seat, was calling with explosive emphasis, which seemed to lift the broncos into the air: "Go! Vamos! Vamos! Git out o' here!"

They swept past the boulder. Armstrong saw the traces touch and bound away and heard the hubs of the wheels grate against it. A few moments later the danger was past. The horses had swung around a turn in the road and were trotting quietly upon a space that was nearly level. Armstrong wiped the sweat from his face. A little later they emerged from the cañon and the view widened on either hand. Armstrong breathed more freely.

"I knowed I could do it agin," said the driver quietly "I done it every day fer three year—except once."

"What happened that time?" Armstrong stammered, with a desperate effort at unconcern.

The driver ignored the question.

"Would you mind holdin' the ribbons a minit?" he inquired. "I git off here."

Mechanically Armstrong took the reins. Without an instant's hesitation, the Wizard of Red Gulch stepped lightly from the swiftly-moving coach and waved a farewell to Armstrong, who looked back at him, bewildered. He had expected to see Murphy roll head over heels and stop with a broken neck. But nothing of the kind occurred.

Murphy stood for a moment with his tall figure sharply outlined in the glare of the dusty road-bed, a melancholy smile played upon his cadaverous features. Then he vanished, all in an instant, and Armstrong thought that he must have plunged into the chaparrel by the side of the road. He was uncertain whether he ought to stop. He had never driven a six team in his life, and he hesitated a moment between desire to be rid of the maniac and reluctance to assume responsibility. A second later the horses settled the question, for they broke into a gallop again, and Armstrong found himself occupied keeping them in the road. For the first time he fully appreciated the wonderful skill of his recent travelling companion.

Digitized by Google

Having gained a certain control, Armstrong kept the horses moving along and left the Wizard to his fate. He soon entered a better country, where there were ranches of some pretentions and evidences of prosperity, and was congratulating himself that he must be nearing Red Gulch, when he noticed a dozen horsemen coming swiftly towards him. At sight of the coach they separated and arranged themselves on either side of the road.

When Armstrong came up they pointed rifles at his head and ordered him to halt. He brought the six horses to a stop as quickly as he could. "Throw up your hands;" was the next command. Armstrong lost no time in complying. His captors were roughly clad, uncouth, but ready men of the mountains—not at all the sort to be trifled with. They surrounded the coach, swearing, laughing, cracking frontier jokes.

"Git up thar, Jim, an' hang to them broncos," said a burly fellow, evidently the leader. "Jim," slipped from his horse, handed the bridle to the man next in the line, mounted the box and picked up the reins which Armstrong had dropped.

"Now then, Sandy an' Tom, git up thar, too, an' search him fer weapons."

Two climbed upon the stage. After a hasty examination of Armstrong's clothing, they reported that there were no "shooting irons" upon him.

"The hell you say!" remarked the leader in a puzzled tone.

"Gentlemen," said Armstrong," may I inquire the reason for this outrage?"

"Now don't try to run no bluff on us, young man," was the reply. "We're out after ye, and we've got ye. Were a goin' to take yer inter Red Gulch, where ye'll have a fair trial. Fall in, boys. Go ahead Jim."

Escorted by the riders and closely watched by the men with him on the stage, Armstrong made his entry into Red Gulch an hour after his sudden deposition from the proud position of driver. On the way he gathered little information, every question being met with ridicule or with indifference. He inferred, however, from the little that was said, that he was accused of stealing the horses and the stage, and was supposed to be connected, in some mysterious way, with Joe Carter.

Red Gulch is a straggling mining village. The office of the stage company is flanked on one side by the post office and the general store, and on the other by the Blue Blood saloon. As the stage and its cavalry escort came swinging down the single narrow street of the place thirty or forty men and half grown boys rushed forward and surrounded them. Several were armed with revolvers ostentatiously protruding from pockets and belts. Their air of eager expectancy impressed Armstrong forcibly rather than pleasantly. At a word from Jim, when the stage stopped, he stepped to the ground. The crowd laughed and drew closer. A tall, old man, with a long, gray beard, a hooked nose, and an eye like a hawk's, waved them aside.

"Jedge," said the leader of the capturing party, "here's your man. We told ye thet we'd bring him in, dead or alive. He's a queer cuss. Didn't show a bit of fight. Cons'quently he's here to speak for himself. We'v searched him. We didn't find nothin' in the way of tools—no rifle, no revolver, not even a knife. He don't look like one of Carter's gang. But we'll turn him over to you fellers, an' you can try him. We've done our part. Now you do yourn. In my opinion, though, he ain't worth the price of a rope to hang him with."

With a look of infinite disgust and a wave of the hand which signified that he was done with the business, Armstrong's captor delivered him into the custody of the law, as represented by Judge Billings, of Red Gulch. Something in Armstrong's appearance seemed to strike the judge as irresistibly comical, and he joined in the laughter of the crowd as he laid a sinewy hand, at the end of a long, lean arm, lightly upon Armstrong's shoulder.

"So you're the bold, bad man," he said, "thet runs off with a stage an' six hosses, be you?"

"I don't understand you, sir. There must be some mistake," Armstrong replied with dignity, and shaking off the detaining arm.

"Wa'al, they telephoned from Beaverville to look out fer a light haired, doodish duffer who hed run off with the coach, an' here you be, answerin' the description all right."

"Did they also telephone from Beaverville that they had sent the stage out with a lunatic for a driver?" Armstrong demanded angrily.

"No—o. They didn't say that. But mebbe thet's right. Boys, what d'ye say?"

"Looks like thet wuz 'bout right," said one.

"Let's try him for hoss stealin', anyway," said another.

"Ask him where his friend, Carter is," suggested a third.

"Gentlemen," said Armstrong, "you are evidently labouring under a misapprehension. If you will devote a moment's reflection to this subject, you will at once see that I could have no possible use for a coach and six horses. I have not been guilty of larceny, as you appear to surmise. I simply took the reins from the hands of a crazy driver, who deserted me several miles back, and I have brought the property of the Beaverville, Red Gulch and Gold Run Stage Company to the place where it belongs. It is I who have suffered, not you or the company. I have been frightened out of my wits this afternoon, and if you will give me your attention for a few minutes, I will prove to you that your suspicions in regard to me are entirely unfounded."

Thereupon, Armstrong related the story of his ride. When he described the Wizard and his reckless driving, the crowd laughed uproariously. They tossed their hats in the air and yelled like madmen. Armstrong became convinced that most of them were drunk. No one could tell what freak would seize them next. He was frightened. His voice faltered; his knees shook; but he managed to carry his narrative to the end, realising, as he told how the Wizard had dropped off from the stage and vanished—he did not know whither—that his auditors had a reasonable foundation for their mirthful incredulity.

"You're a good one," Judge Billings remarked, when Armstrong had finished. "Well, boys," he continued, "come along an' let's talk it over. We'll settle this thing right now."

The crowd drew a little apart, and, left alone, Armstrong took a seat on the steps of the shanty that served for a stage office. He caught snatches of the comments passed upon him during the animated discussion which followed. They were such as these:

"Slickest liar ever been in these parts."

Digitized by Google

While this proceeding was in progress, six fresh horses had been attached to the stage, and the new driver, a ruddy, cheerful individual, was drawing the reins over them for another start. Armstrong did not stir. The driver called "All aboard!"

Judge Billing came back to Armstrong.

"The boys," he said, "hez found ye guilty ez charged, but with extenooatin' circumstances. I hopes you'll excuse th' informality of the proceedin's. I'm a jestice of the peace, but in these parts the wheels of jestice is mostly greased by public opinion. Some of our influential citizens air out after Carter. Mebbe that's jest eez well fer you. If the boys thet's here don't object I kin let ye go. Some of them thinks you're in partners with Carter, but they ain't proved it. We've decided to turn you loose if you'll stan' treat all round."

Without stopping to discuss the equity of this decision Armstrong willingly acquiesced. Everybody filed into the Blue Blood saloon, and Armstrong paid for drinks for all. Then he climbed slowly to a seat beside the new driver, nd they started amid cheers and rattling farewell of revolver shots.

Armstrong and the new driver rode for ten minutes in silence. Then the driver said: "Thet wuz a dead cold bluff of yourn pardner. But it worked all right jest the same. You see the Wizard hez been dead this two weeks—two weeks ago to-day he wuz killed. He use to hev the trick you tell of—skinned past thet boulder every day for ten years. Skeered more'n a hundred wimmin passingers inter fits. Comp'ny discharged him half-a-dozen times, but took him on ag'in, fer he wuz all right 'cept fer thet one thing. But two weeks ago to-day he wuz a leetle full, I reckon. He druv too close to the boulder an' plunked right inter it. Threw him off'n the the seat an' inter the Gulch. Killed him dead."

"Nevertheless," said Armstrong quietly, "I rode with him to-day."

"The boys wuz hot 'bout your stealin' this here outfit afore you come up. Thought it mebbe you wuz mixed up with Carter in some way. Consid'ble talk of lynchin' ye. But you see, you didn't do no harm. Hosses blowed a leetle, but thet don't count. I reckon they decided that you wuz crazy. Mountain air makes people crazy sometimes. No. You can't come it over me. I see Murphy arter he was picked up. His head wuz smashed an' his neck wuz broke. He wuz dead ez Cap'n Kidd. We planted him in Beaverville.

"Thanks; I don't c re if I do. Here's to your good health. Thet's good stuff, too. Will I hev a cigar? Cert. You ain't a-ridin' with no fool this trip, mister. Ain't thet lovely sunset, though? See how it flames along the mountains?"

In course of time Armstrong completed his tour and returned to Montreal, but for weeks afterwards, in his dreams he took wild drives down Long Cañon, in company with the phantom Wizard of Red Gulch.

Arthur Pigott.

"MADE-UP PARAGRAPH" COMPETITION.

We Have £1 Waiting for You, and £1 each for Five Friends.

Do you want to earn a sovereign for yourself and one each for five friends? All you have to do is to pick out a line from any column of SHORT STORIES—any line will do—and fill up the first space of the table printed below.

Then get five of your friends to do the same thing, each selecting a line to suit the preceding selections, so that the whole series of six lines will make up a good paragraph from various parts of the paper. No two lines to be taken from the same page.

When the table is complete post it to us, and the six people who make up the best paragraph, in the opinion of the Editor, will be awarded £1 each. Only two members of the same family may insert their names.

All attempts should be addressed, "Made-Up Editor," SHORT STORIES, Henrietta Street, London, W.C., and reach this office not later than Monday, February 27th, 1899.

Name and Address.	Lines.	Page & column.

Digitized by Google

BOOK III.—CONCERNING THE RULE OF KING OLERON.

CHAPTER VII.

How the Ledge was turned into a fort: how it was defended: how three of the besieged got out: and how they came across the chief sorcerer to the island of Erma.

THOUGH the invaders were doubtless anxious enough to meet the whole Erman force massed together, the invaded steadfastly refused to risk annihilation in another pitched battle. They retreated before every strong advance, and only hazarded fighting that was little more than skirmish.

The island was large, and furrowed with valleys running out of the bare rocks of the central peak. If the army of Daji straggled much, many members of it would certainly be cut off by those who knew the ground, and could plant good ambushes; and besides, even by straggling, it could not have covered so large an area.

Of course the Ermans had been obliged to desert houses and other possessions of that kind. But come to think of it, the sacrifice was not a very large one. The Dajians might burn huts and furniture certainly. But new huts could be run up in a day or so, as good or better than the old; and when one's household goods consist of one net hammock per head, and a few calabashes, and one's wealth of a dozen or so yards of tappa cloth, the materials for producing which all grow close at hand, well, a man is not in reality much the poorer for the loss of such at all. For no one could destroy the forests, and no one could catch all the birds in the air, or dredge all the fish from the sea.

So the Dajians ate, drank, and used what they wanted, destroyed what they could of the balance, and had perforce to leave the remainder—the larger part—untouched. And between whiles they amused themselves with hunting Ermans, without much success or excitement, except sometimes when they found the tables reversed, and got hunted in their turn.

This desultory warfare lasted for well nigh a month without any signs of its coming to a conclusion. The natives became habituated to their life in the woods after a couple of day's experience—indeed the change was a trifling one to them—and preferred to remain as they were, to making any desperate attempt to regain possession of the island again.

But King Oleron felt deeply the disgrace of having a foreign foe quartered in his land, and was continually inciting his subjects to harass the invader by every means in their power.

In one of their sorties, if one may so call them, from a snug erie amongst the mountains, our three Europeans had a very near shave of being taken prisoners. They had marched down Maantee's valley one night with a company of natives, intending to attack a body of Dajians, who had encamped on the coast. But as these inconsiderate savages had shifted their quarters, without giving due notice of the fact, the surprise came from the wrong side. The sortie party found themselves in a tight place, for the Dajians were on them both front and rear; and at first it looked as if the Ermans and their white allies were going to be massacred to a man. But principally by the herculean efforts of this latter trio, they cut their way through, and the survivors of them made for the Ledge with as much dignity as they could muster. I'm afraid it was more of a run than a retreat; but the enemy was at least four to one, which forms some excuse. However, once on the Ledge, the top of the path leading thereto was easy to defend, as Sneyd and O'Neill taught conclusively to the vanguard of the pursuers; and so the survivors of these fell back and told their comrades, who contented themselves with posting a strong guard at the foot of the ascent.

"The Ledge makes a very decent fort, as Sandy said it would," Sneyd remarked. "It's easy enough to defend it against escalade. The only question is how far we are provisioned against a siege."

"There's just twenty-two mouths of us, all told," said O'Neill, "an' Mytto reports that three of 'em are in a bad way av Dochter Sandy's any judge. The crops is all stole or spoiled, for these ugly haythens trampled down what they couldn't ate or carry off; but we shall find some taro left by huntin' for it, an' there's bananas they couldn't reach, an' the spring, which of course they couldn't stop. I don't think there's much fear on the score of grub. It'll last us a week wid care, an' we should conthrive some manes of givin' 'em leg bail before that time's out."

House and all fixtures and improvements were burnt or otherwise destroyed, but this was a minor detail. They could be replaced when the time came, very easily, and in the meanwhile they were but little missed. The proprietors of the Ledge paid but small heed to the havoc around them. They were too busily engaged in making themselves obnoxious to the new neighbours who had taken up quarters down below. O'Neill sighed for artillery. With half a dozen 18-pounders he could surprise the beseigers not a little. Such engines of warfare were of course unattainable; but Sneyd, casting back his memory over old reading recalled the form of one or two missile-throwing implements in use before the invention of gunpowder. Having plenty of strength and material at hand, he constructed three pretty powerful ballistas on the edge of the platform. The besiegers saw the erections being set up, and thought, so Mytto said, that they were gods, and consequently stared at them fixedly. Each was trained as accurately as inexperience would allow of, and loaded with a great lump of rock. The levers were drawn down by their windlasses, and released. The three projectiles sung through the air, and one of them fell amongst a knot of the spectators, knocking several over, and killing four outright.

Digitized by Google

They started practice with these infernal machines.

O'Neill, to whose lucky marksmanship this successful shot had been due, rubbed his hands delightedly. "Begob," he cried, "we'll pick 'em off pace-male." But the Dajians were not such fools as to allow this. They had never seen a ballista before, or heard of one, but the weapon's power was obvious, and they withdrew hurriedly. A second discharge, trained to a higher elevation, sent them to a still more respectful distance. But, at a quarter of a mile away, they were out of range, despite the lofty position the shot was hurled from.

So to prevent time falling heavily on their hands, the besieged added to their artillery four great cross-bows. The bows were stout trees, the strings thick rope. They were drawn by rude winches made for the purpose, and fired a bolt—or to be more explicit, a bamboo stake—four feet long, fire-hardened at the pointed end, and feathered at the other extremity with flat wooden vanes. They started practice with these infernal machines after dark, and, by aiming at the watch-fires, contrived to split some half-dozen unfortunates before the others understood where this new pest arrived from, and took themselves even farther away still. In fact, when morning lighted the scene, the besiegers were seen to have deserted even the hill opposite the Ledge, and were encamped in two bodies, one up and one down the valley, and each at least half a mile in crow line from the obnoxious fort.

A larger and stronger cross-bow was made, but it wouldn't throw the distance. The Dajians could evidently be annoyed with missiles no longer. O'Neill took this as very mean on their part. But Sneyd said, "Small blame to them for refusing to stand up and be shied at if they can't hit back."

"But," grumbled the Irishman, "the dirty bastes are just goin' to thry and starve us out."

"Of course they're going to try it," replied Sneyd.

"And they'll do that same av we don't interfere to help ourselves. There's ownly two things to prevent it that I can see. Either it must rain grub, or else his honour, the King, must collect his troops, an' raise the siege."

"Either of which," Sneyd added, "is equally likely."

"It's no use asking for terms," said O'Neill. "We must just hould out till our bellies are empty, an' then make a bolt for it under cover of the darkness. Some of us may slip through av they hit on a soft place in the line of pickets, an' the rest must just die as hard as they can —fightin'."

"It's no use waiting till we're weak from want of food," said Sneyd. "I move that if to-night is decently dark, we make a dash for it without further loss of time."

There was silence for a minute or so, which Sandy broke by saying:

"Why shouldn't we try and get up the cliff at the back?"

There was no verbal answer to his suggestion, but, reading from their faces what each thought, he went on:

"I don't think it's impossible. One could scale this flat, vertical rock with a long bamboo ladder, and then, as far as one can judge from below, there are crannies and fissures to give foothold right away to the very top. We might draw off the whole force that way, evacuate the fort this very night, and none of the Dajians be a bit the wiser till morning. But what do you say, Mytto?"

Mytto shook his head most decisively. "Can't be done," he said. "'Out of sunshine into oven,' as King Oleron would say. Devil lives up there, and he's worse than all the Dajians."

Sneyd, who thought the plan distinctly feasible, asked angrily, "What nonsense is this?" But Mytto, beyond reiterating that the cliff was a favourite and much-used residence of the original fiend himself, and stating his unalterable determination not to scale it, vouchsafed no further explanation. And his fellow-countrymen were equally unsatisfactory.

At first the three Europeans thought they were in honour bound to stay and share the other defenders' inevitable fate. Deserting one's comrades to save one's own skin always seems cowardly, even though the said comrades have refused, through sheer funk, to avail themselves of a simple avenue of escape. But then it dawned upon them that if they could get out, they might have sufficient influence to gather a force that could raise the siege, and at any rate they could reprovision the garrison from above under cover of darkness. For either of these purposes it was necessary for the whole three of them to go. But their absence would make no difference to the defence. The point where the path from below debouched on to the little plateau had been strengthened artificially during the siege, and in its then state two men could hold it easily against an army. An attack could only be made in single file, and as each man appeared he would most certainly be brained. And beside the fact that their muscles were superfluous, their appetites were distinctly a burden.

Digitized by Google

So they set about making the wherewithal to scale the vertical cliff at the back of the Ledge.

A regular ladder of the requisite length proved impracticable, principally because there was not enough stuff to make it easily procurable. So they lashed single poles together, for which purpose there was a sufficiency of long stout bamboos, and notched them at intervals. Nearly two hundred feet were required, and to raise this in one piece was quite out of the question. However, by dint of great care and contrivance, one-third was reared up on end, and rested against the cliff.

O'Neill climbed cautiously to the top, hauled up another section after him, hoisted it into position, and lashed it there. Then instead of letting down his rope for the next piece, he came to the ground in person.

"Get me some short sharpened lengths," said he. "There's heaps of crannies to stick 'em in, an' av the long po'e gets a side lashing every here and there, it's less likely to let one go by the run than it is at pre-ent."

The work went on slowly, now one, now another of the trio taking his turn, but at last the top section reached a narrow ledge, whence the final ascent seemed practicable, if not easy.

The task had taken many hours, for in the darkness, which was very intense, one had to exercise great caution; and by the time the three Europeans had got on to the solid footing above, they judged that dawn could not be far off. So they started off on the upward climb without a minute's delay. The rocks were steep, bare, and greasy with dew. In many cases one had to be hoisted up by the other two, who in turn were dragged on to the higher level. Once they were obliged to build a little cairn of stones, collected with great trouble, before even this means of scaling one of the higher steps was possible. They had each several narrow escapes of slipping, and a fall would only finish in the valley below. And several times when foiled in one direction, they had to turn back, and try another way. But thanks to having hard tireless muscles, heads that no dizzy height would turn, and seamen's knack of climbing, they had got over the worst by the time dawn began to cast its grey shadow over the eastern waters, and had scrambled into cover behind some craggy rocks before the sun had sprung up to commence his daily round.

"It's meself that's been up some quare places," said the Irishman, wiping the perspiration from his face with the back of a hard freckled hand, "but for all-round bastleness, this about whips the lot of 'em. An' how we're goin' to get down again's more than I can tell. It's about lucky Mytto an' the other chaps didn't thry to come wid us, or it's broken necks they'd had be the toime they got to the top. Begob, I wish they could ha' come though. How powerful sorry for themselves them Daji bhoys would ha' been to find thay were kaping guard over a nest that had neither egg, chick, nor old bird in it."

"There's one thing we're overlooked," said Sandy. "That bamboo pole can't very well avoid being seen."

"That's awkward," remarked Sneyd. "If we come back here to-night with supplies, we may find a party of these beggers ready to cut us off."

"Then," said Sandy, "the sooner we find our own people, and persuade a gang of them to make a night attack on the besiegers, the better. We shall only have half to deal with, as they are in two bodies, and if Mytto is sharp—which, to give him is due, he generally is—he will rush out and join us with his men at the first attack."

"Sandy," said the ex-cornet, "you are a great general. Come, let's be moving without further loss of time. We've had quite long enough rest to get our winds back again."

They crossed the ridge and sharp arrête of bare stone, and began cautiously descending the other side. The climbing was very hard. All their wits were required to find the safest path. Once down the rocky steep, they would reach a gently sloping plateau of turf, and then might examine the prospect below at their leisure. O'Neill was the first in the line of descent. The others were coming cautiously along a few yards behind him. The Irishman reached the easy ground, halted, and held up his hand for silence. Sneyd and Sandy Carmichael stopped dead. O'Neill listened for a minute or so, and then beckoned for them to join him. They did so, carefully, being mindful to make no noise.

"There was somebody talking just round that rock," he whispered.

The three unslung their clubs and listened. For fully ten minutes not a sound broke the silence. Then a hard grating voice made a remark, and another, a feebler one, replied.

"That's Ebry who spoke first," said the Irishman. "I'd know it in any crowd. I'd know it if I heard it in Sackville

O'Neill climbed cautiously to the top.

Digitized by Google

Street, Dhublin." With which sagacious remark he pressed forward, followed by his companions, and the three of them found themselves in the presence of the chief sorcerer of the island of Erma.

CHAPTER VIII.

How the three Europeans refreshed themselves: how the chief sorcerer turned traitor: and how Sneyd and O Neill got a respite from the oven just in the nick of time.

To say that the chief sorcerer showed surprise at the meeting, is to put the case mildly. He jumped up from the bed of leaves on which he had been sitting, ran backwards till his shoulders banged against the rock, and crouched there with both hands up before his face as though to ward off an expected blow. He might have mistaken his unexpected visitors for Dajians; but that does not disguise the fact that he made a most pitiable exhibition of cowardice.

"All right, Ebry," laughed Sneyd, "sorry for scaring you, but we've not come with murderous intent. Your time hasn't arrived yet. Who is that you were talking to? Oh, I see, the plump little assistant. Hurt, too, poor beggar. Hullo! why, there's a regular cave behind here. Keep house in this outlandish spot, do you? Well, that explains what Mytto said about the mountain being the abode of the devil. But, I say, my good Ebry, you might be a little more hospitable. We're simply famishing. Just escaped from the Philistines over the other side. Spin you the yarn afterwards. But give us some grub first, or we shall break through our usual rule, and follow the custom of the neighbourhood, by turning cannibals and eating you."

The chief sorcerer, with his uncomely visage screwed into a vinegary and obviously forced smile, set before the hungry fugitives a large calabash full of well-seasoned poce, and then when that had vanished before their desperate inroads, he produced three great pines, and a palm basket full of custard apples, with which vegetarian meal they perforce had to satisfy themselves, as there was no meat forthcoming.

During the meal, Ebry related incidents of his own prowess, showed an incised wound at the back of his scalp, and said that but for him the Ermans would have been swept into the sea long ago. Which statement, as the chief sorcerer had not been in evidence in any of the engagements they had fought in, the Europeans had to receive on trust; though taking into account that the scalp wound was evidently dealt from behind, and remembering what a timid front he had shown on the enemy's arrival, they swallowed these deeds of derring do with many grains of salt.

There was no doubt, however, that the plump assistant sorcerer was badly hurt, and after dressing the head of his superior officer, Sandy pulled off the rude bandage from the little fellow's ribs, and showed a ghastly wound about the middle of the right side. He examined it carefully, but no one could tell the diagnosis from his face. His features were absolutely expressionless. Then he washed the gash, put on fresh compressers, and binding them firmly in place, went across to the other side of the cave, and joined his companions.

"Well?" said Sneyd in English. "How is he?"

"Desperately bad. He says the spear 'bit deep,' and it must have done."

"Will he pull through?"

"I can't say. But we must hope for the best."

"A regular doctor's reply. That means, I suppose, that your patient is going to die"

Producing a coil of grass rope his captors lashed him to a pole of bamboo.

"He'll have a small chance if he's left to Ebry's tender mercies. That blear-eyed ruffian has nearly killed him as it is."

"I wonder if we couldn't get some of the women down to nurse him?" mused O'Neill. "This place is snug enough. There'd be small chance o' them Dajians beatin' 'em up here."

"Let's ask the landlord," suggested Sneyd. "I say, Ebry, your friend here won't have much of a chance unless he's better looked after. Can't you find some woman or other to come and take care of him? I'm sure there must be scores sleeping out every night under the stars who would be glad of quarters here."

The chief sorcerer's face showed plain distaste for the proposal. But he did not refuse to entertain it. He temporised, and said he would consider the matter, and then he asked what were the white men's plans for the immediate future.

Digitized by Google

"Well," said Sneyd, "notwithstanding the demands of your pressing hospitality, we do not propose inflicting ourselves upon you for long. You see, Mytto and the other men, who are holding the Ledge, demand our first attention. Either we must collect a band of men strong enough to make the Dajians raise the siege for a sufficiently long time to allow the defenders to get out, or we must contrive to smuggle in provisions."

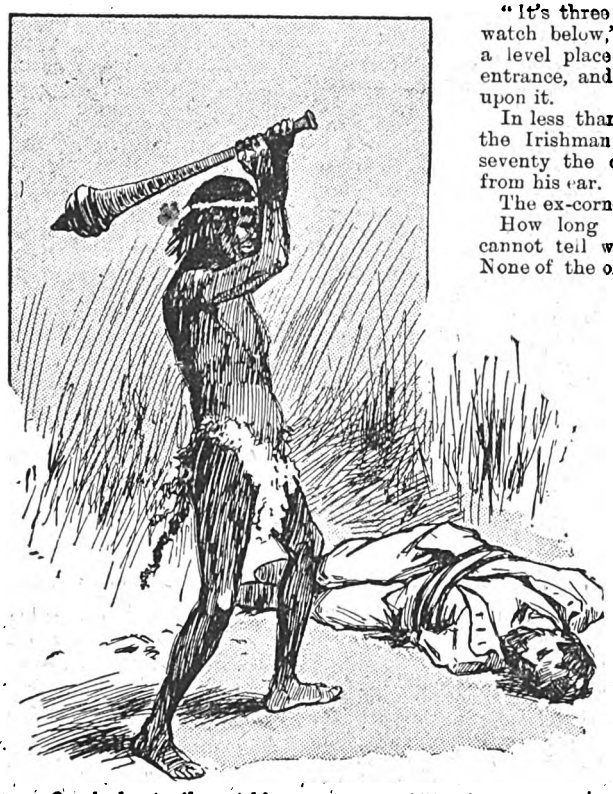
"Could they hold out if they had food?" inquired Ebry.

"Well victualled, they would defend the place till they died of old age."

"Then," exclaimed the chief sorcerer, "this is what must be done. I will go now and command that a force be raised. None dare refuse Ebry's command. In four hours I shall be back here. As soon as darkness falls, you shall return with what food you can carry, and I will come with you, bearing more. On the second night from now, a force of Ermans will surprise the men of Daji who hold the valley. We shall be on the look-out, and when the shouts of war reach us, we will sally forth and join the conflict."

"Bravo, Ebry!" exclaimed O'Neill, hitting the chief sorcerer encouragingly on the back. "You've more pluck in yez than a dead mouse has."

The sorcerer grinned constrainedly at the compliment, and said he would set out on his errand without further delay. Sneyd proposed accompanying him, but the man begged to go alone. There were Dajians about everywhere, he said, and Sneyd would most certainly be seen by them. He, himself, would not be noticed. He was accustomed to slipping through undergrowth like a snake.



One had actually got his weapon over O'Neill's head.

This last remark was very true, and the three Europeans resolved to stay where they were, take a few hours much needed sleep so as to be thoroughly recruited for their arduous climb after dark.

"I shall be back long before it is time for us to start over the hill," said Ebry, as he took himself off, "and I will show you then where we can gather the supplies. The place is close at hand." And with that he took himself off.

"Before you lie down," said Sandy, who was kneeling beside the wounded man, moistening his bandage, "I wish you'd give me a lift with this poor fellow. He's very feverish, and I think he'd be more comfortable further in the cave, where it's cooler."

The others readily complied, and raising the assistant conjuror as carefully and gently as they were able, they carried him round a couple of angles, and deposited him on a couch of leaves in a cool, gloomy recess.

"Hullo," exclaimed Sneyd, looking round him, "we are in that old scamp's laboratory, or whatever he chooses to call it. Look, here's all his conjuring tackle littered about. I say, Sandy, as you've starting dabbling in magic, you'd better overhaul this stuff when you've a little time, and try and find out how that clever snake trick was done. You might be able to step into Ebry's shoes some day when he retires on a competency, and subsides into private life."

"Perhaps I will, if the opportunity occurs," replied Sandy, with one of his rarely indulged-in smiles. "But not now. I'm far too sleepy at present. In fact, I should think none of us will be sorry to turn in for an hour or so."

"It's three weeks since I had a regular watch below," yawned O'Neill, looking for a level place on the cave floor near the entrance, and then settling himself down upon it.

In less than thirty seconds Sneyd heard the Irishman snoring, and in less than seventy the discordant noise had faded from his ear.

The ex-cornet was fast asleep himself.

How long they slept, I am afraid I cannot tell with any degree of accuracy. None of the old records mention the time; and, as they ignore it, I suppose they themselves are ignorant on the point also. Sneyd said that he had just closed his eyes, when O'Neill's yell awoke him; but then that evidence is eminently untrustworthy. A good many of us are ready to declare that we haven't been in bed a minute, when some heartless person says it's 8.30 a.m., and quite time to get up. However, this does not particularly matter, as the method of their awakening is clearly told. The ex-cornet was roused by the sound of a terrific yell, opened his eyes, and attempted to rise at the same time. Instantly twenty hands seized him, and bore him back again. He tried to struggle, but found he couldn't move a limb; and ten savage faces above him glowed with satisfaction. He had spoken somewhat scoffingly of the Philistines overnight. The Philistines were upon him with a vengeance now.

Producing a coil of grass rope, his captors lashed him to a pole of bamboo, and then two of them, raising the ends on their shoulders, he was carried into the open. He turned his head, and saw O'Neill in similar plight beside him.

"Where's Sandy?" he asked.

"Haven't seen him," replied the Irishman, "or heard him."

"How did these fellows come?"

"That cursed informer Ebry brought 'em. He's just behind yez now. They grabbed me when I was asleep. I shouted to wake you, an' hit out. But it was no use. I did damage the ugliness of a few of 'em, but there was too many to give a bhoy a dacent chance."

"Are you hurt?"

"No, me skin's sound enough, praise be, though that's not much, when one's trussed up like this. It will be small mercy we've got to expect; but begob, av they'd allow me five minutes conversation wid that thraitor Ebry, an' one fist cast adrift, it's meself that 'd go along wid 'em, like a lamb to the meat-shop."

Sneyd added a sentence or two, in which his opinion of the chief sorcerer was put in strongish phrase, and then asked his companion in misfortune what could have become of Sandy.

Digitized by Google

"It's meself that's been wondering," replied the Irishman. "I expected to find him being jumped upon beside me. But he wasn't there. The Dajians were surprised too at not grabbing him, and so was Ebry, for he went away back into the cave and evidently examined every cranny carefully. It can't be that he got wind of their coming, and made a bolt for it, for, of course, he'd have warned us too. So where has he got to, I can't for the life of me imagine. However, the odds are he's got clear away somewhere, and if he has, you may lay your teeth on it he'll bear a hand to get us out of this mess, av that same's possible. There's no leveller head than Sandy Carmichael's on Erma this minute."

The Dajians bore their prisoners along with but scant ceremony. Every time bearers were changed—and this happened pretty frequently—bump! went the helpless bodies on to the ground; so that by the time they were finally shot down in the middle of their captors' encampment, both were tolerably bruised. But such minor details as bumps and abrasures, are little thought of by men who expect within the hour to be killed and grilling in an oven. Their minds were working at full strain to find a means of escape; but as a preliminary to every plan, they must first have use of arms and legs; and wriggle and strain how they would, nothing would come adrift. The lashings had been passed by no 'prentice hand, and every now and then a savage would catch sight of their strivings, and grin with cheerful derision, and recommend them to take matters stoically. And so after making the fetters cut deeply into their flesh, in at least a dozen places, they desisted from the useless effort.

Still it was rather maddening work to lie still, and see those human demons dig a couple of neat holes in the earth with bamboo spades; to watch them line the sides of the cavities with stones; to note bearers bringing in armfuls of wood; to see the fuel placed carefully into position and lighted; and to be fully aware all the time, to what end these deliberate proceedings tended. I say it would be hard for any one to be cool and phlegmatic under such trying circumstances; and I fully own that both Sneyd and O'Neill would have gone pale if their skins had not been too sunburnt to admit of such a change, and that they actually were so upset, that the cold perspiration of pure funk literally gushed from them in streams.

But at the very last moment when the blazing wood was being taken out of the earth ovens, when the stones within were dully red; when the feasters were beginning to stroll up;—at the last moment, I say, Providence intervened. Another ten seconds and the intervention would have been too late. Two brawny savages had come up, club in hand, to prepare the roast for the oven—to consummate the sacrifice. One had actually got his weapon raised over O'Neill's fiery head, when a shout from the outskirts of the camp made him stay his hand.

A messenger was running up as fast as legs would carry him. "We go back," he panted, "to Daji. There has been a battle, and our men ran. They are running even now. The Ermans have killed many, and are chasing the others into the sea. Fly whilst there is still time."

The two butchers hesitated for a moment.

"Take the prisoners," said the messenger. "They will be a comfort for us when we reach Daji."

(To be continued.)

The Best Hundred.

"Go North, or South, or East, or West, You can't improve the Hundred Best."

And the reason is that when once you have compiled your list from the hundred and twenty-five titles given, it will be as perfect as anyone who has not yet a big library could wish. If you already have a number of books in your book-case, of which some appear on the list, then you may select fifty (according to the conditions) of those you find you would like, to make your library as complete as possible.

THE COURSE TO PURSUE TO GET YOUR BOOKS.

1. Take a post-card. 2. Write on the post-card: "Hundred Best Books Department, Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C." 3. Write on the back, "Please send a list of your books to (write here your name and address)." 4. Wait for the list. 5. When it comes, select your books. Don't do it hurriedly. Choose them carefully. 6. Fill up the necessary coupon. 7. Inclose it in an envelope with a postal order for ten shillings (unless you wish to pay for them cash down). 8. Post your envelope and watch for the carrier.

That is the Whole Process!

You may obtain the Books free of charge by sending us ten order forms duly filled up for ten sets of a hundred books, or ten sets of fifty books. The Books will be bound in cloth or half-morocco, whichever binding predominates.

But send a post-card for the list! Send a post-card for the list! A post-card for the list! Post-card for the list! Card for the list! For the list! The list! List!

	100	50
CLOTH BINDING	Cash down, £7 0s. / Instalments, £7 10s.	Cash down, £3 15s. / Instalments, £4 0s.
HALF MOROCCO	Cash down, £10 0s. / Instalments, £10 10s.	Cash down, £5 0s. / Instalments, £5 5s.

All communications to be made to "Best Books Department," C. Arthur Pearson Ltd., Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

PAINTING COMPETITION FOR CHILDREN.

The Editress of Home Notes has produced a work so that children can easily learn the way to paint. There is an outline of each flower, and a coloured plate in addition, showing the correct tints. Fifty handsome prizes are offered for children over twelve and under sixteen, and children under twelve, who best paint the pictures in the book.

To win one of these you have only to send three stamps to the Book Department, 17 and 18 Henrietta Street, W.C., asking for No. 1 of "Attractive Work." When you get it, paint the pictures and send it to the Picture Book Editor, Home Notes, Henrietta Street, W.C., not later than the first post on April 3rd.

There are full particulars in Home Notes.

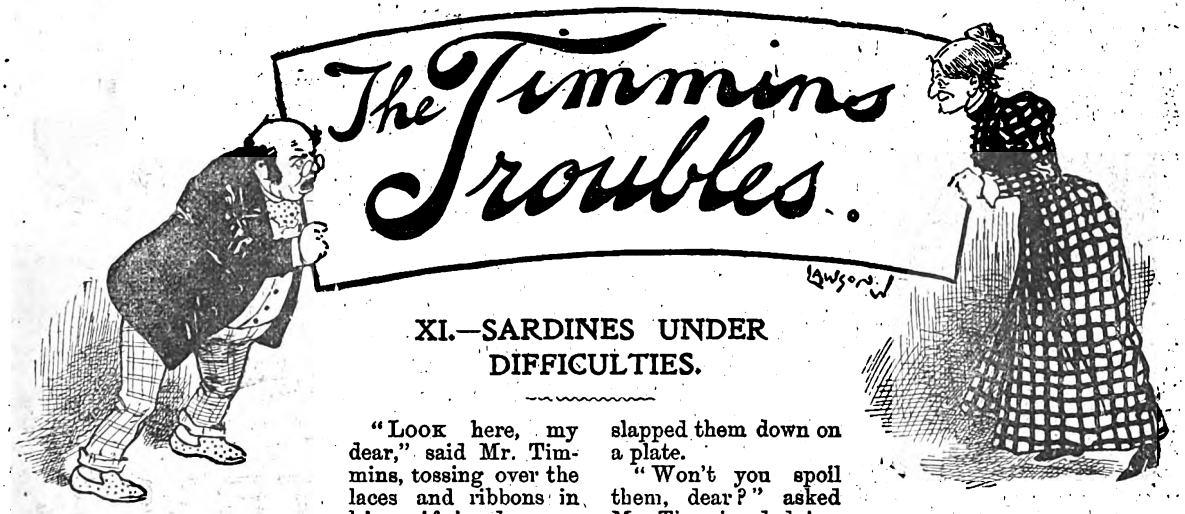
Digitized by Google



XI.—SARDINES UNDER DIFFICULTIES.

"Look here, my dear," said Mr. Timmins, tossing over the laces and ribbons in his wife's drawer, "what's become of the can-opener? I don't see it anywhere."

"What do you want it for?" asked Mrs. Timmins, fluttering up to protect her trinkets, and trying to gain a little time.

"I want to open some sardines with it," retorted Mr. Timmins, abandoning the drawer and hunting through the work-basket. "D'yer think I want to comb my hair or write a letter with it? Well, I don't. I want some sardines. What have you done with it?"

"You might take your big knife," recommended Mrs. Timmins. "The large blade is just the thing for that."

Mr. Timmins seized the knife and bored away at one corner of the box, while his wife looked on with considerable distress.

"Hadn't you better put a paper under the box? You'll get the oil all over the tablecloth," suggested Mrs. Timmins.

"No, I won't either," said Mr. Timmins, as the knife plunged through and the oil spattered. "Serve you right if it did," he continued, ploughing away at the tin, while the oil flew in all directions. "It would teach you to put the can opener where you could find it. What kind of housekeeping do you call this, anyhow?" he yelled, as the blade slipped out and closed upon his fingers.

"Did you hurt yourself, dear?" asked Mrs. Timmins anxiously.

"No, I didn't hurt myself," shrieked Mr. Timmins; "the knife only struck the bone. Give me some ether!" he howled. "Fetch me some chloroform! D'you s'pose I'm going to saw at this box any more without an anæsthetic? Have you got an idea I'm going to chip off a couple of dozen fingers without something to deaden the pain? Where's the laughing gas? Give me some laughing gas while I extract these fish."

And Mr. Timmins pranced round the room, and then jabbed the knife into the box again, and ripped away as though he was run by steam.

"No use to hide away from me!" he yelled, hacking at the box with all his might. "I know you're in there, and there can't be any sardine that ever was built able to get away from me. Come out, I tell ye!" And he seized a fish by the tail and slung it across the room. "You're transacting business with Timmins now!" And he clawed out a handful of mashed sardines and slapped them down on a plate.

"Won't you spoil them, dear?" asked Mrs. Timmins, dodging the flying heads and tails. "They won't be very good if you open them that way."

"Oh, won't they?" howled Mr. Timmins. "P'raps you've got an idea I ought to climb under them and lift 'em out. Maybe you want me to get into that box with a boat and take 'em out with a casting net. Well, I won't. Give me the tongs. I want that fish at the bottom. Where's the tongs? Gone to get married to the tin opener, haven't they?" and Mr. Timmins grabbed another fish and flung it into the grate.

"Be patient, my dear," said Mrs. Timmins soothingly; "make the opening a little wider, and they'll come out."

"Patient!" shouted Mr. Timmins. "P'raps you want me to sing Dr. Watt's hymns to 'em. Come out of that!" and with a wrench Mr. Timmins hauled off the top and disclosed the mangled remains of his enemies. "Now give me a lemon; quick now."

"Upon my word, my dear, I don't believe there's a lemon in the house," stammered Mrs. Timmins. "I had one——"

"Oh, you had one," exclaimed Mr. Timmins, "only you're just out. You only need an awning and a family on the top floor to be a grocery shop! D'ye suppose I'm going to eat these sardines raw? Think I'm going to swallow these fish alive? Gimme something to put with 'em will ye?"

"What would you like, my dear?" queries Mrs. Timmins.

"Ink! Fetch me some ink! Can't ye find some laudanum somewhere?" and Mr. Timmins projected himself into the closet and pranced out with a bottle of arnica. "There," he growled, as he dashed the contents over the sardines, "there's your fish all ready for you," and Mr. Timmins flopped into his easy chair and picked up the paper.

"Don't you want some sardines?" asked Mrs. Timmins after a long pause.

"No, I don't," growled Mr. Timmins.

"But this is a fresh box," said Mrs. Timmins, displaying the sardines in neat layers.

"How'd you get it open?" demanded Mr. Timmins.

"With the tin-opener," replied his wife. "I found it in your tool-box, where you put it to sharpen it."

Digitized by Google

THE FINAL WAR

BY

LOUIS TRACY.

Author of "The Shadow Hand," "An American Emperor," "The Lost Provinces," etc.

CHAPTER LV.

MOSTLY MATRIMONIAL.

"IRENE!"

"Yes, dear."

"What does it mean when a spider runs across the window?"

"Oh, where is he? Are you sure he is running straight across? For goodness' sake don't blow at him."

Irene Vyne came quickly from the comfortable chair in which she had been enjoying "a good read"—the first novel from Mudie's for over six months—and stood by Ethel's side to see the tiny insect, so unusual a visitor in a West-end drawing-room, rapidly scudding across the broad window-pane. He deviated neither to right nor left but travelled off towards the frame as though a nice juicy fly were well within sight and safely caught in his web.

Irene heaved a sigh of deep satisfaction.

Irene Vyne came quickly from the chair.

"Really," she cried, "a somewhat close acquaintanceship with Tommy Atkins has made me superstitious, and I am so glad that this has happened."

"Well?" said Ethel. "Don't be silly, but tell me at once. I saw him first."

"It portends," said Irene, with mock seriousness, "a long journey for a dear friend, a very long journey in your case, and a shorter one in mine, and that nothing on earth will stop either from coming straight here."

Ethel looked sadly and wistfully at her friend as she heard the explanation of the spider's transit over the glass. "It may be true enough for you, dear," she said, with a slight catch in her voice, "as Teddy is within ten hours of London, but Frank is on the staff in Russia, and the "TIMES" says we will be compelled to keep an army of occupation there quite a long time, until the political settlement of the country is completed. Poor little spider! He meant well, I am sure."

They smiled at the conceit, but they both started when they heard the doors of a hansom slammed open in front of the house, followed by a vigorous pull at the bell.

"Now, who on earth can be calling at this time of the day?" cried Irene, for it was past six o'clock.

Ethel did not answer. She had suddenly become greatly agitated, for no assignable reason. Unable to control her emotion she walked to the door of the drawing-room in order to escape from the commonplaces of some casual acquaintance who might be putting in an appearance. When she opened the door she was confronted by a footman and an officer in the undress uniform of the Royal Navy.

In an instant the latter personage sprang forward and caught her in his arms, whilst the footman discreetly closed the door, and thus explained the case to Buttons in the hall: "'E said as 'is nyme was Commander Rodney, but 'e didn't give me chawnce to say a word. They seemed to know 'im all right hupstairs, all the syme."

Rodney did not at first perceive that Irene was in the room. Her eyes had filled with tears at the knowledge that her friend's happiness was now complete, for this was the first meeting of the lovers since that memorable night at the Paris Embassy when Frank had been compelled to forego his waltz, and could not even wait to say "Good-bye."

She discreetly gazed at the window, trying to find that thrice blessed spider again, and she only turned in response to Rodney's cordial greeting.

"I have been sent home overland with dispatches," he explained. "I was obliged to go straight to the Admiralty and War Office, and came on here at the earliest moment without even waiting to change my clothes. But surely you knew I was coming?" he continued, turning to Ethel.

"Not until I opened the door, and you—how could you be so ridiculous before the footman?" and she blushed so prettily that Frank nearly became ridiculous again.

"But I wired to you from Vienna, thirty hours ago."

"I never got it."

They were speculating upon the probable cause of the mysterious loss of the telegram when a knock at the door elicited a "Come in" from Irene.

The door opened gently, there was a discreet cough, and the footman entered, his action causing the three occupants of the room to laugh heartily. He was far too well trained a servant to even smile. He solemnly approached Irene and said:

"There's a telegram, milady, which nobody knows 'oo it's for, and will you please to open it, milady."

The buff envelope was addressed to "Ethel, Grosvenor Square, London," and the same address appeared in type-written characters within. It was undoubtedly Rodney's message, for which the Post-office officials could find no lucid explanation until an unusually smart postman remembered that there was a Miss Ethel Harington staying at Lord Vyne's residence in the square.

Frank vowed that he wrote the full name and number of the house, but no one believed him, and, if anything, his sweetheart thought more of the error than of its possible explanation. His thoughts must surely have been very full of her if he believed that the Austrian telegraph operator at Vienna would be sufficiently enlightened by this vague description.

When the precious telegram had been safely stowed away in Ethel's purse, Frank said: "By-the-way, where is your brother?"

"He's in Paris, and Irene hasn't had a letter from him for two days."

"Well, this is the second day," grudgingly admitted Irene, "and I won't find him guilty until after to-night's post."

They were so busily engaged in talking that none of them heard the advent of another new arrival, nor, in the growing dusk did they notice the door open.

This time the footman was prepared for eventualities.

The moment he turned the handle he exclaimed quite pompously, "Major Harington." Irene's chair fell over, so quickly did she spring from it, and the footman was able to impart delicious confidences to Buttons for a second time: "They're 'avin' a fair beano hupstairs, I can tell you," he concluded with grinning emphasis.

Lady Vyne, good soul, had been indulging in a quiet nap before dinner, and her astonishment was great when she reached the drawing-room, whilst his lordship soon returned to dinner from his club and heartily welcomed the wanderers, especially Rodney, whose long absence rendered his unexpected return all the more delightful.

Harington had been offered a short leave by Lord Roberts, and, of course, eagerly availed himself of the favour. But in a little while, he explained, all the British troops now quartered in France would be quietly sent home. Indeed he hoped to be permanently back in town within a month.

Why he and Irene should look at each other when he said this, and why everybody else should laugh when they both blushed at being caught, no one troubled to explain.

He asked Ethel to marry him.

But the incident set Rodney thinking, and the result of his cogitations became apparent a little later when, in a quiet corner of the drawing-room he asked Ethel to marry him in November.

'I can't possibly be ready," she protested.

"Not even if there's an opportunity for a double wedding?" he said.

"I am quite sure Irene won't be married until early next year," she whispered, "but—but—if she agrees for November I will agree too."

Now, as both girls had debated the question many times from every possible point of view, and had already determined that a double wedding in November was absolutely within the bounds of even the dressmaker's limited imagination, it will be seen that there was not much need for the many and convincingly ingenious arguments used by their suitors before the date was finally fixed.

But such are the ways of women, and they are pleasant ways withal.

So it came to pass that after a brilliant ceremony at St. George's, Hanover Square, which was attended among many other representatives of rank and fashion, by the Duke of Sussex, and the Earl of Tramore—few will recognise Lord Wolseley and Lord Roberts by these titles—Major and

They drove back to Grosvenor Square.

Lady Irene Harington and Commander and Mrs. Rodney drove back to the well-remembered house in Grosvenor Square to attend a very lively, not to say uproarious, wedding-breakfast.

By a little kindly arrangement made by the authorities it was not until the meal was well advanced that letters were handed to the two ladies announcing that her Majesty had been pleased to bestow upon them the insignia of the order of the Royal Red Cross for their services with the field hospital in France, and at the same time the War Office and Admiralty announced to Harington and Rodney that they were respectively gazetted Colonel and Post Captain.

They set forth on their wedding tours almost at the same moment; Irene and her husband to pass a quiet honeymoon in Yorkshire, whilst Ethel and Frank started for Paris and Egypt, as Mrs. Rodney would not be content until she had seen with her own eyes the exact locality where her sailor lover had blown up the Suez Canal.

By a singular coincidence they joined the Peninsular at Brindisi, and it was from the deck of that fine steamer whilst passing through the canal that Rodney pointed out to his wife the spot where he had succeeded in inflicting upon the allied nations the most damaging blow struck at them during the opening period of the war.

* * * * *

In the bar parlour of the "Cat and Anchor" at Catford a goodly company of cyclists assemble nightly to discuss old stories and new tyres. The conversation ranges from reminiscences of the great fights in the Seine Valley to the latest record established by the club. But never a race along the Ripley Road can compare in interest with that spin taken by the Catford Cyclist Corps from Vernon to Beuil.

The perpetual president of the club is Major William Briggs, who retired from the Army with Her Majesty's permission to retain his rank and uniform. He plays his magnificent part with unassuming dignity. The one story he never tells, but which is often told of him for the edification of admiring juniors, is the record of his adventure with the Zouaves, and how he preferred to look into the Valley of the Shadow rather than save his life by treachery.

Digitized by Google

A goodly company of cyclists assembled.

The gallant Major is vastly improved in manner and appearance. He bears upon him the stamp of a man who has deserved well of his country by responsible and noble deeds, and it is rumoured that his business as a cycle manufacturer has become extremely profitable since his return home.

* * * *

At Worthing, Colonel Perkins was unanimously chosen as Mayor for the succeeding year. Now that the alarms of war were over his good wife resolved that the new-born greatness of her husband would not permit of his personal attendance to the small details of a drapery establishment. It was obvious that the British Leonidas, the man who struck the first and most determined blow at the enemies of England, could not be expected to measure yards of calico or receive mysterious confidences as to the material for linings. So the shop, which throve amazingly, was handed over to an experienced manager, and Colonel and Mrs. Perkins with the children removed to a larger house in the fashionable West.

* * * * *

It was difficult to know how to recompense adequately the services which Mr. Thompson had rendered to the nation by the invention of his marvellous electric rifle.

There could not be the slightest doubt that by its aid alone Paris had been captured, and the capture of Paris meant the immediate cessation of the war, which must otherwise have dragged on its weary length for weeks, if not for months. What this meant, from the mere financial aspect, will be realised when it is remembered that the joint expenditure of Great Britain and the United States upon the maintenance of troops and ships in active service was estimated at £2,500,000 sterling daily.

When approached on the subject, Mr. Thompson himself emphatically repudiated any idea of receiving more than a modest reward for his work and he named an amount which whilst ridiculously small, would in his opinion suffice for the needs of himself and his family.

The matter however came before Parliament and a proposal was made that as it was understood to be her Majesty's intention to confer a baronetcy upon the famous inventor, the nation must give him the means of maintaining his new position with dignity and ease. It was consequently resolved that as the expense of manufacturing the apparatus and preparing the rifles had already been born departmentally, Sir Henry Thompson should receive a bonus of £2 for each weapon supplied to the troops engaged in the attack upon the French capital.

In other words he received £200,000, which was exactly twenty times as much as he had asked for.

* * * * *

Peyton and de Vismes, the heroes of the ride through the pass, both received promotion and the Victoria Cross. For his subsequent services in organising the successful attack upon the Central Asian Railway, Colonel W. J. Peyton was gazetted a K.C.S.I. The native comrades of the two British Officers were also rewarded by the Government of India with a generosity that evoked the liveliest approval in every cavalry bazaar from Peshawar to Tuticorin.

* * * *

When Colonel Ritchie and his charming wife arrived in New York, en route from London to San Francisco, they were met by two tug-boats full of interviewers, and were compelled to hold a series of brilliant receptions in the Waldorf Hotel to afford their numerous friends and innumerable admirers an opportunity of congratulating the famous leader of cavalry upon the many splendid achievements which his audacious originality had rendered possible to the troops of the United States.

The chief railway companies running to the west competed for the honour of supplying a special train to convey Colonel and Mrs. Ritchie and their friends to the Golden Gate, but in each case the invitation contained a polite hint that the journey would not be performed within sixty hours. Those fourteen ruined engines still loomed large in the memory of American railway men.

In San Francisco, of course, the party came in for a State ovation, and the last news to hand of the gallant Colonel is that he has been cordially commanded to fill an honoured place on board the Hohenzollern when that distinguished yacht next bears her Imperial master to Cowes.

* * * * *

And thus the curtain drops upon the chief actors of this drama of to-morrow, whilst the stage is cleared for the superb spectacle of a world free from bloodshed and rapine and famine.

CHAPTER LVI.

The Destiny of the Race.

So Peace ruled: not that sullen silence which harbours in its breast poisonous passions, but a peace such as the world had never known, deep, eternal and serene.

In this last mad eruption the evil genius of war had exhausted itself and humanity had cast it forth as a noisesome thing to be tolerated no more. The Saxon race for a moment held the world in fee. But it was only to give to the nations abiding rest, to sooth ambition, to repair injustice, to mete out to all freedom before the law of justice.

Such a vision of a new world and of a new age had Tennyson. Was this the consummation of the poet's dream? Had mankind progressed—

> Till the war-drum throbb'd no longer, and the battle flags were furl'd
> In the Parliament of Man, the Federation of the World?

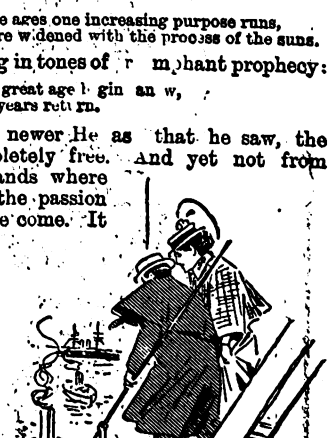
There was no room for scepticism in that noble mind. For in the same breath he wrote:

> Yet I doubt not through the ages one increasing purpose runs,
> And the thoughts of men are widened with the process of the suns.

Did not Shelley also sing in tones of triumphant prophecy:

> The world's great age begin anew,
> The golden years return.

This surely was the "newer Hellas" that he saw, the Hellas of a world completely free. And yet not from countries of romance, lands where warm blood keeps fresh the passion of poetry, did the miracle come. It was from the race dedicated to commerce; the sturdy, unimaginative, practical people whose home, first set in the little Island of Great Britain, spread forth to a new continent in the West, and then broadened out till it covered the earth and sea.



Colonel Ritchie and his wife arrive at New York.

Such is the destiny of race. Three empires has the world known. Transient tyrannies have swept across it, and in the dark background of time there loom gigantic shadows of strange dynasties covering the earth with their power. Of them history has no word to say. But since man's life became clear and intelligible there have been but three preponderating races, each representing a cosmic force and taking its place in the due development of the destiny of humanity.

Digitized by Google

First came the Greek, the strong, sensuous being who gave order to chaos, who wrested from its bondage the perfect life of man. His was the rule of Art, that great force which gives each thing its place and finds for each a use, which cuts off the civilised from the barbarous, which carves the rich doorway to the Temple of the Ideal. Greece gave to mankind its implements—its faith, its yearnings, its strength; and in doing so exhausted herself.

There was the Roman, the man of action, not the dreamer of Hellas, not wrapped in the sensuous charms of art, but the strenuous builder of empire. It was the destiny of Rome to found the great doctrines of jurisdiction, to give law to the nations. Hers was a civil, not an æsthetic strength. As her great poet has in noble verses propounded;

Others, I know it well,
The breathing bronze will chase,
And from the death-white marble
Upcall the living face,
Will plead with eloquence not thine,
Will mete and map the skies,
And with the voice of science tell
When stars will set and rise.
'Tis thine, O Rome, to rule:
This mission ne'er forego,—
To spare in war the vanquished
And bring the haughty low.

She ruled by virtue of impartial Law, by the just principle which brought all peoples willingly to her feet. And yet even Law was not enough to bring a lasting empire. Others arose who also knew her Law, and from her nerveless grasp snatched the sceptre of her dominion. And in a day the Empire of Rome melted away before the vigorous Northmen.

Now has taken up the tale the third overwhelming dynasty that the world has known. The new empire is that of the Saxon race. Art and Law had had their day; there followed the dominance of science.

The nations had learnt the lessons of beauty, and knew how to disfigure them; had caught the message of Law, and knew how to abuse it. But nature has her revenges, and as the earth opened out before the pioneer, and discovery narrowed the great continent of Europe, and brought its peoples into active rivalry, it became clear that the new empire was not one of orb and sceptre—not the annexation of countries, and the absorption of alien races. It was to be an empire of another, a subtler, a more enduring, a more resistless kind.

For the message which science gave the world was that that race alone would conquer in the struggle for existence which showed greatest adaptability, which could easiest accommodate itself to the countless variations of earth's wayward moods. It was the cruel law of the survival of the fittest. There was need of some versatile people who feared no change of climate or contradiction of condition, for whom heat and cold, desert and fertile land, sea and plain, peace and war, luxury and indigence, struggle and ease were alike—whose temperament had infinite degrees passing from sanguine heat to phlegmatic torpor. For such a race the earth lay open, offering its dominion.

Here lay the tragedy of less fortunate peoples—more blessed, perhaps, in rich qualities of heart—more developed, it might be, in gentle graces and warm emotions—but forced, after all, to pay the penalty of their very virtues.

Life is eternal action and re-action, and from the being who rejoices in a nervous temperament which leads him to the pleasant paths of art, she sucks the virile vigour which should nourish and sustain. It is the fate of the Celt. He exhausts himself in the passion of life and scatters his years from him in each gust of self-abandonment. He is the invalid amongst men, the sick person, incapable of

A Solace and a Stay.

Ladies shopping or visiting; business men whose affairs compel the postponement of meals; all, in fact, whose avocations or recreations necessitate a protracted fast, or an undue amount of mental or physical fatigue, find a solace and a stay in a cup of Bovril, which can be prepared in a moment, and can be had almost anywhere. Taken at night before retiring, Bovril proves a "night-cap" par excellence, soothing the jaded brain and nerves and promoting refreshing sleep.

BOVRIL

Digitized by Google

A brilliant ceremony at St. George's, Hanover Square.

continued effort, needing all that luxury can give and yielding himself to dreams and visions and things impalpable.

Nor is the more vigorous people of romance, that northern people, fitted for the struggle. For romance plays too great a part in its life. Its character is weakened by sensuousness, and its vision dulled by speculation. It may be led to victory, it cannot take itself to the goal. For in this new empire it needs that each and every man shall himself be leader. It must be a nation of pioneers.

This, then, is the mission of the Saxon race—slowly but surely to pour itself over the earth, to absorb the nations, to bring to pass that wonderful dream of a world united in a single family and speaking a common speech.

How rich the blood, how noble the inheritance of Britain! She has the stern indomitable defiance of the Saxon, the strenuousness of the Celt, the romantic genius of the Teuton. She is both actor and dreamer. Her poets have dwelt beside the founders of her empire. Reckless of danger, amorous of what is new, versatile in action, ready in resource, fertile beyond the ingenuity of chance, adaptable to all changes of climate and modes of life, at home in ice-bound regions and beneath the equatorial sun, carrying with her the capacity of empire, the power to rule, and obstinate in the attainment of her desire, she is bound by no limit of race, no dimension of geography.

And thus she early found her power. She has led the world in all its noblest struggles. Whilst other nations groaned in kingly servitude, she was already free. Her battle of liberty was fought before the hope of freedom dawned in Europe. Her conscience refused that allegiance to sacerdotalism, which drenched the Continent with blood, and her reformation long premeditated, came, if not without the agony of struggle, still gently and without excess. Her Parliament at almost the dawn of her history gave equal laws, disputed with kings, and drove out tyrants. Her press was free, her speech unrestrained. And as she batled ever for freedom, so she gave herself to the passionate pursuit of knowledge, to the mysteries of philosophy, to the sublime teaching of science. Thus, armed with all that discovery could yield her and owing allegiance only to herself, she poured her sons over the earth and upon the seas, and in remote regions founded another empire. America arose — that second England — new home of the Saxon race, and heir to her aspirations and her destiny—America which developed a new type of being, more versatile still, and still more strenuous.

Commerce bent itself to Britain and all peoples entrusted to her their possessions. The Saxon tongue has become the speech of the world, the Saxon ensign—whether British or American—is the flag of the seas.

Thus, as life becomes more complex and harder grows the struggle, there is no escape for peoples not fitted to bear its strain, and the Saxon race will absorb all and embrace all, reanimating old civilisations and giving new vigour to exhausted nations. England and America—their destiny is to order and rule the world, to give it peace and freedom, to bestow upon it prosperity and happiness, to fulfil the responsibilities of an all-devouring people.

This vision—far-off may-be—already dawns: and in the glory of its celestial light is the peace of nations.

The End.

Digitized by

Messrs. NICOLE FRÈRES'

REGINA AND POLYPHON

MUSICAL BOXES

PLAY YOUR OWN SELECTION OF MUSIC.

They render on steel combs the most exquisite music, with the compass and volume of tone equal to that of a piano. As a social entertainer they are unrivalled, Playing over a Thousand Different Tunes, including all the latest popular music, as well as classical and operatic selections. With one winding will run about 20 minutes. The tune sheets being made of metal are practically indestructible, while the mechanism of the instrument is very solid, yet of the simplest construction possible, with no delicate parts to get out of order, as in the old-time imported music boxes.

MAKE DELIGHTFUL PRESENTS.

MAKE DELIGHTFUL PRESENTS.

From 16s. 6d. to 100 Guineas.

All Dealers, or Complete Illustrated No. 3 Catalogue, Post Free, to readers of Short Stories. Repairs at moderate prices.

NICOLE FRÈRES LTD. (Dept. 3),
21 ELY PLACE, HOLBORN CIRCUS, LONDON, E.C. Estd. 1815.

VARICOCELE.

Every man suffering from Varicocele and the allied troubles, or Varicose Veins, should send for treatise, describing their Causes, Symptoms, Results, and Successful and Painless Treatment without surgical operation or the use of cumbersome trusses and electrical appliances. Will be sent sealed, post free.

S. S. MURRAY,
7, Southampton Row, London, W.C.

£20

Hairdressers fitted up

Estimates Free.

Tobacconists Commencing. See Illustrated Guide (259 pages), 3d. How to open a cigar store, £20 to £2,000. Tobacconists Outfitting Company, 186 Euston Road, London.

The largest and original house (50 years' reputation). MGR., H. Myers.

6D. THE BAROMETRICAL LADY. 6D.

A real Barometer for 6d.! This little lady changes the colour of her dress according to the weather, and is a prophet of whether the day will be fine, wet or changeable; a pretty, charming and useful novelty. Price 6d. post free. Our Large Illustrated Catalogue of Novelties, 1d.

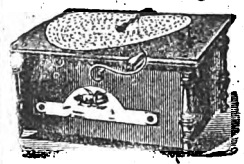
Variety Co., Dept. G, Dalston, London.

SULPHOLINE LOTION,

For clearing the skin from Spots, Blemishes, Redness, Roughness, giving a Beautiful Complexion and pleasing appearance.

SHILLING BOTTLES.

HAND ORGANS from 20s.



Made in 3 sizes, in Ebony and Gold Case. Full organ tone. Can play Songs, Hymns, or Dance Music. Sent on receipt of P.O. 5s., balance 5s. monthly. Send for List of Tunes and Catalogue.

ATLAS CO., 184 High Street, Camden Town; 63 Seven Sisters Road; 14 High Road, Kilburn.

GIVEN AWAY

HUNDREDS OF POUNDS IN PRIZES - EVERY COMPETITOR GETS ONE OR A £5 OR £3 00 HOUSE

LIBERAL PAYMENT FOR WRAPPERS. PARTICULARS WITH EACH 2½D AND 3D BAR.

CHANCELLOR SOAPS

Send a sample for Sample to 13 Clerkenwell Road, E.C.

PYN-KA

THE WONDERFUL METAL POLISHER

The Lustre Lasts!

Pyn-Ka Leaves no Scratches!

Cleans and burnishes gold, silver, plate, copper, brass, nickel, tin, glass, etc., better, quicker, and at less cost of labour and money than any other polish known.

Paste or tablets, 1d. to 6d. All dealers.

TRILENE REGD. TABLETS

THE ONLY CURE for STOUTNESS Registered by GOVERNMENT Price 2/6

ALL FAT PEOPLE

Readily Reduce Weight and Cure Corpulency Permanently by taking TRILENE TABLETS (Regd.) for a few weeks. They are very agreeable, harmless, and never fail to PRESERVE both HEALTH and FIGURE without change of diet. Reduction begins immediately.

An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

MISS HEYWOOD, 77 Hpdmill Street, Heywood, Lancs., says: "I am 21lb. lighter, and my rheumatism also seems cured."

MRS. WEAVER, of Greenpits Villa, Station Road Ross, Hereford, says: "Am reduced from 17st. 8lb. to 11st."

MR. CANHAM 87 Alexandra Road, Norwich. "Tablets cured my wife of extreme stoutness; it has never returned."

LADY CONSTANCE CONRAD writes from Wiesbaden: "I am very pleased with the Tablets."

PRINCESS LIECHTENSTEIN writes from Laudsberg, Austria: "Pray send your excellent Tablets directly."

COUNTESS G. FURSTENBERG, Stammheim, Germany, writes: "They act speedily and well."

MR. BUTLER, Surgeon, Hampton Manor, Evesham, says: "My patient lost more than a stone."

Send 2/6 to THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION, 66 Finsbury Pavement, London, E.C.

PIANOS. UPRIGHT IRON GRAND.

Complete Iron frame, Brass Pin Plate, Nickel-bolted Wrest Plank, Check Action, Full Trichord, Full Compass, Rivetted Hammers, Handsome Walnut Case, Inlaid Marqueterie Panel, Sconces, Trusses, etc. Tone and touch perfect. Guaranteed 25 years. 2s guineas, at 10/6 per month. Delivered free on payment of 10/6. Approval. Catalogues Free.

ORGANS. GENUINE AMER.CAN.

Imported Direct. Solid Walnut Case, Mirror Top, Music Case, 2 Knee Swells, Mouse and Dust Proof, 8 Stops, 3 Sets of Reeds, 14 Guineas, at 6/- per month. 10 Stops, 3 Sets of Reeds, 2 Octave Couplers, 15 guineas, at 7/- per month. Illustrated Lists Free. Kindly mention this paper.

THE LONDON AND LIVERPOOL PIANOFORTE CO., Granby St. & Selborne St., LIVERPOOL.

Agents wanted where not represented.

PAMPHLET AND ADVICE FREE

Every man and woman in search of HEALTH should write without delay for which will be sent POST FREE to any address on application. The treatise contains full particulars of the treatment of the various ills that flesh is heir to. It also contains a selection from the thousands of testimonials received in favour of the ELECTROPATHIC BELT and other curative appliances. Advice Free of charge (personally or by letter) on all matters relating to health. Note address, and write to-day or call.

A NEW MEDICAL WORK,

THE MEDICAL BATTERY CO. LTD., 489 OXFORD ST., LONDON, W.

KEATING'S LOZENGES

THERE IS NO BETTER REMEDY IN THE WHOLE WORLD FOR ALL COUGH AND THROAT TROUBLES THAN KEATING'S LOZENGES. ONE GIVES RELIEF. THEY WILL CURE, AND THEY WILL NOT INJURE YOUR HEALTH. THEY CONTAIN ONLY THE PUREST DRUGS.

Sold everywhere in 1/1½ Tins.

ZOX

CURES

NEURALGIA

Toothache, Headache, Sciatica, and all Nerve Pains.

PURE, HARMLESS, AND NON-APERIENT.

Do not be persuaded to take a substitute, there is nothing as good as ZOX.

Of all Chemists, 1s. and 2s. 6d. per Box.

ZOX Co., 11 HATTON GARDEN, E.C.

Digitized by Google

MANY HAPPY RETURNS OF THIS PAGE.

S. T.—Yes; the Thames and the Severn are connected by a canal thirty-seven miles long, but its existence is known to very few people for the reason that as railways extended, the canal was allowed to fall into disuse and become unnavigable. It leaves the Thames at Lechlade, and at one part it has a tunnel three miles long under a hill. It has recently been rendered fit for navigation at a cost of £20,000.

C. G.—The Chinese, properly trained and fed, make formidable opponents in athletics and war. Some of the Chinese at our new possession, Wei-hai-wei, have been practising foot-ball under British guidance, and they have succeeded so well that a team is to visit this country for next season. What can be done with the Chinese as soldiers may be seen from Gordon's exploits in the Flowery Land.

J. M.—You will need to be very healthy and have a strong constitution, for life in the Niger Coast Protectorate. According to the report for last year, the European population was 200, each of whom was treated by the doctors, on the average, six times in the twelve months. Fifteen died and fifty-eight were invalided. High wages are enticing, but they are not everything.

Martel.—It has recently been discovered by a British scientist that fresh water falling through air electrifies it negatively, while salt water under similar conditions electrifies it positively.

S. T. R.—The South American Republics are all afraid that the United States will swallow them up; they accuse the U.S. of bad faith in connection with Mexico, and say that the Great Republic will hesitate at nothing to find a pretext for annexing their territory. Your idea that these countries would be strong enough to prevent annexation if they combined is doubtful; but they would not combine. They do not like each other, and there is a preponderance of Indian and mixed races among their populations that bodes ill for combination. In Ecuador, for instance, there are 100,000 whites out of a population of 1,270,000. The army numbers 3,300, and the navy consists of a torpedo-launch and a transport.

C.—Cremation does not seem to prosper in Scotland. Since the crematorium was opened in Glasgow four years ago, only forty bodies have been burned. This may be due to the charges, but there is always great difficulty in getting people to depart from established custom.

D. R.—The greatest depth to which a diver has descended into the sea is 204ft. At that depth the pressure is 83lb. to the square inch.

T. R. E.—The monkey temple of Benares is one of the grandest and most costly buildings in the city. The followers of Brahma hold this animal in great awe; it is sacred, and they fear and worship it as devoutly as any of the images of wood and stone. The temple is elaborately fitted up for the accommodation of numerous monkeys who are confined in it.

B.—The power of gelatine when contracting is shown by what happens in collotype plates. If one of these be over-dried, the gelatine in contracting tears away the surface of the glass. The glass being "ground" gives the gelatine a hold. The glass tears in fern-like patterns generally, but different kinds of gelatine produce different patterns.

V. I.—There is a real "Strad." violin in the Hungarian National Museum that was presented to that institution on one condition—that it should always be lent, for special purposes, to the best native player. It was made for Leopold II., Duke of Tuscany.

G. L.—There are many species of flies that never indulge in sleep.

H. O.—Hospitals are numerous in all the Australian Colonies, especially in New South Wales. Although the Colony has long since been settled its resources are still largely undeveloped and numbers of men are at work in districts far removed from home; hospitals are therefore a necessity, and are to be found in all large provincial towns. There are one hundred and eight in New South Wales, all of which, except three, are subsidised by the Government.

F. D., having read that the King of Sweden is the descendant of Bernadotte, one of Napoleon's soldiers, asks if that Royal house can claim to have a humbler origin than any other in Europe?——————No, the King of Servia holds the record in this respect. He is the great-grandson of Yephrem, the brother of the heroic Milosh Obrenovitch, the leader in the struggle for Servian independence. Milosh was a herdsman and Yephrem was a keeper of pigs.

K. G.—The oldest commercial company now in existence is the New River Company, founded under a charter in 1619; its shares now fetch enormous prices. The oldest company concerned with commerce in its strict sense is the Hudson Bay Company, founded under a charter granted in 1670 by Charles II. to Prince Rupert and others. The original scope of the company was much modified in 1868, when it surrendered most of its right to the Crown for a money indemnity.

Y. wishes to know why the House of Lords is sometimes called the "House of Landlords."——————Because almost all of them are large landowners. Fully one-third of the land in Great Britain is in the possession of members of the gilded chamber.

J. H.—Nearly a million quail are sent from Egypt to France every year.

L. A.—The laughing plant grows in Arabia. It has bright flowers and soft, velvety seed pods. Each pod contains two or three seeds, resembling black beans, which the natives dry and crush. On taking a dose of this powder the soberest person begins to dance, laugh, and shout, and continues till he is exhausted; he then falls asleep, and on waking up, he has no recollection of what has taken place since he took the powder.

C. N.—British Guiana is the colony that contains the greater number of nationalities. Among the labourers may be seen—in addition to the aboriginal Indians—negroes from Africa, creoles from the West Indian Islands, Arabs from Algeria, Spaniards, French, Dutch, Portuguese, Afghans, Chinese, Danish, and natives of all parts of India, with occasionally a gang of British seamen. The planters for the most part are British, but there are representatives of many European countries also.

D. E.—Among the Romans and Athenians it was a very serious offence to get into debt. So strict was their law in this respect that a debtor was often sold into slavery in order to raise money to pay his creditors.

SHORT STORIES' ADVERTISEMENT RATES.

Single column, per inch, per insertion	£0 10 0
Double ,, ,, ...	1 0 0
Full page inside, facing page of matter, either white paper or 2nd or 3rd page of cover, or back page, per insertion	10 0 0
Half-page ,, ,, ...	5 0 0
Quarter-page ,, ,, ...	2 10 0
Eighth-page ,, ,, ...	1 5 0
Front page, whole ,, ,, ...	12 10 0
,, half	6 5 0

All spaces above one-eighth of a page are charged at per page rate.

Series discount: 5 per cent. for 13, 10 per cent. for 26, 15 per cent. for 52 insertions.

Black blocks are charged 25 per cent. extra. All advertisements are subject to approval. All copy must be sent in by Noon on Tuesday, Feb. 28th, if intended for the Issue on sale March 14th, and dated March 18th. The Proprietors reserve the right to hold over or suspend the insertion of any advertisement without prejudice to other insertions on order. All communications should be addressed to the Advertisement Manager, "Pearson's Weekly" Offices, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Printed and Published by C. Arthur Pearson Ltd., at Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

FROM THE OLDEST CYCLIST IN THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.—"During my 18 years' experience I have never been astride a more free and easy wheel than the A.B. It is the best hill-climber I have ever ridden; nothing has ever gone wrong. It is an excellent machine, swift, light, and reliable."—JAMES O'CONNOR, M.P.

FROM WINDSOR CASTLE.—"I am delighted with it in every way."—(AUTOGRAPH TESTIMONIAL), June 22nd, 1898.

FROM A BRITISH ADMIRAL.—"My son is very proud of his machine."

OVER 200 EXCELLENT PRESS NOTICES DURING THE LAST FEW MONTHS.

100 BICYCLE PRIZES.

"We have examined the A.B. Cycles, and find them well-made, high-class machines. The firm are thoroughly straightforward in their dealings."—Cycling, August 6th, 1898.

"We can honestly recommend the firm."—Athletic Record, September 3rd, 1898.

WHAT TO DO.

Make up the best sentence you can out of eight words, commencing with A, B, C, D, E, F, G, H, in proper order. Thus: "A Beautiful Cycle Does Excellently For Good Holiday." The letters A B will be counted as words used if to denote our cycles. Enclose loose stamp for result.

ABSOLUTELY FREE.

We ask you to buy nothing, to subscribe nothing, before allowing you to participate in the Prizes. You pay nothing to enter, and even if you receive one of our regret notices—and we make no secret of the fact that hundreds are unsuccessful—you are only out of pocket for the cost of two penny stamps, which the Post Office gets the benefit of.

First Prize, £23 A.B. Safety, fitted with A.B. tyres.

A FEW FREE CYCLE WINNERS, each of whom has signed a Solemn Declaration that he or she is in no way connected, either directly or indirectly, with this Firm: Mr. Geo. A. Haynes, 9 Windsor Street, Barrow-in-Furness; Miss Mary Page-Henderson, 8 Lexham Gardens, Kensington, W.; Mr. A. Merrilees, Harvay, Orkney; Mr. Arthur J. Woolnough, 29 Thomson Street, Govan, Glasgow; Mrs. Maria Fraser, Haglefort, Shinrone, Ireland; Mr. Robert Hughes, Llanidan, Anglesey, North Wales; Mr. L. Horne, 101 London Road, Oldham; Mrs. Flora H. Bungay, 170 Railton Road, Herne Hill, S.E.; Mr. R. B. Reed, Crawfordsburn Inn, Crawfordsburn, near Belfast, Ireland; Mr. H. Janes, Booking Clerk (L. C. & D. Ely.), Whitstable-on-Sea, Kent; Mrs. R. M. Blazey, "The Ferns," Wymondham, Norfolk; Miss Florence Hunnybun, Holton Rectory, Colchester; Mr. Joseph Leith, 20 Taylor Street, Ayr, N.B.; and dozens of others.

Second Class (9 prizes) £23 Cycle for £9
Third Class (12 prizes) £23 Cycle for £10
Fourth Class (15 prizes) £23 Cycle for £11
Fifth Class (18 prizes) £23 Cycle for £12
Sixth Class (20 prizes) £23 Cycle for £13
Consolation (25 prizes) £23 Cycle for £14

TAKE PARTICULAR NOTICE.—COMPETITION IS NOW OPEN, and closes March 3rd, 1899. Results will be declared as soon as possible, although it may be a fortnight afterwards before all replies are posted.

Winners of prizes must clear them within a week or ten days, otherwise machines unclaimed will be passed on to the next in rotation. Enclose loose stamp for postage of Result of Competition. As so few are able to call and inspect the machines, we guarantee to refund the full amount paid for a Second, Third, Fourth, Fifth, Sixth, or for one of our Consolation Prizes if the owner is not perfectly satisfied with it on arrival. We cannot give any money or other prizes in lieu of cycles, and consequently cannot enter into any discussion relating thereto. One solution only allowed to each competitor. Disregard of this regulation renders any Prize liable to forfeiture.

£100 We offer this Reward to any lady or gentleman able to prove that we have ever in the whole course of our existence sold our cheapest machines under £15 cash either to any ordinary customer, agent, dealer or shipper. We are continually refusing £14 and £14 10s., both by cheque, through post, and cash in our showrooms, for the self-same cycles. We absolutely could not afford to sell to anyone below £15.

Mark letters "SHORT STORIES" on top corner of envelope, and address to the Managing Director,

A.B. CYCLE CO. LTD., 59 & 60 CHANCERY LANE, HOLBORN, W.C.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Hopkins Street, London, W.

THE 'DOLLY' SPECIALITIES

"DOLLY" BLUE.

CAUTION.

Notice.—"DOLLY" Blue is neatly tied in a white bag to a small handle to hold by whilst using. Sold only in Plain White Calico Bags. No blue (whether in bags or not), except that of Messrs. Wm. Edge & Sons Ltd., can be Sold as "Dolly" Blue. "Dolly" Blue is sold by all Grocers and Oilmen at 1d. per bag.

"DOLLY" CREAM AND TINTS.

"DOLLY" Cream Colour, for tinting Curtains, Muslins, Laces, Silks, Blouses, etc., a rich Cream Shade.

"DOLLY" Tints manufactured in six Shades—Pink, Terra-Cotta, Old Gold, Heliotrope, Sea Green, and Canary Yellow—for tinting Faded Ribbons, Lace, etc. Sold everywhere, 1d. per bag. Will wash out when required.

"DOLLY" FAST DYES.

The "DOLLY" Dyes are fast on Wool and Cotton alike, and will not wash out or fade. "Dolly" Dyes are not Tints, but are Solid Colours, viz., Black, Brown, Blue, Green, Red, and Marone, Price 3d. each Dye. "Dolly" Dyes for Home Dyeing are sold by all Grocers and Oilmen.

IMPORTANT.

The Public are cautioned against attempts which may be made to supply other Blue, Tints and Dyes than those of Messrs. Wm. Edge and Sons Ltd., when "Dolly" Blue, "Dolly" Tints, and "Dolly" Dyes are ordered.

The "DOLLY" SPECIALITIES are Manufactured only by WM. EDGE & SONS Ltd., Bolton, Lancs.

NUTRITIOUS, EASILY DIGESTED, OF DELICIOUS FLAVOUR & AROMA.

PURE SOLUBLE

COCOA

GUARANTEED TO BE THE PRODUCT OF THE FINEST COCOA BEANS.

LYLE'S GOLDEN SYRUP.

LONGEST ESTABLISHED PUREST & BEST.

"MATCHLESS" METAL POLISH.

"WARNING TO LADIES."
Beware of Polishes that set up injurious acids. They impregnate your cloths with verdigris and spoil your hands.
"SIMPLE TE T."
Dab a small quantity on a penny and leave it overnight. If it sets up acid the surface will become green with verdigris.
"MATCHLESS" METAL POLISH will not turn any metal green, and is therefore free from acid.

FREE FROM ACID - POISON OR GRIT

LARGEST SALE IN THE WORLD

PATON, CALVERT & Co MANUFACTURERS, LIVERPOOL.

RED WHITE AND BLUE FRENCH COFFEE

SOLD EVERYWHERE

DELICIOUS FOR BREAKFAST OR AFTER DINNER.

IT IS NOT

Reckitt's PARIS BLUE

UNLESS RECKITT'S NAME IS ON THE WRAPPER.

EIGHTH YEAR OF THE FRESH AIR FUND.

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

No. 531. FOR WEEK ENDING MARCH 4TH, 1899. [ONE PENNY.

A Public Boon:

It is to the critical and discerning ability of the public that Guy's Tonic owes its present proud position. The remedy has been weighed in the balance and found to possess exceptional merit, and to give exceptional value. That is why the number of fluid ounces of Guy's Tonic sold in the shops to-day is five times as great as it was ten months ago. Nothing but strong public approval could account for this marked access of trade.

As a Remedy for Digestive Disturbance, depressing pains and oppression after eating, and for preventing food becoming like a weight at the pit of the Stomach, Guy's Tonic is invaluable. People who take it after meals digest their food thoroughly and completely, so that the Body is far better nourished in every way, and there is an entire absence of those unpleasant Symptoms which make food and eating a bugbear to so many.

Congratulations:

E. P. LUBBOCK, Esq., of 8 Carlisle Terrace, Gravesend, writes:

"I am pleased to learn "of the reduction in the "price of Guy's Tonic. I "hold a very high opinion "of your medicine."

Mrs. M. A. JACKSON writes from 3 Castle Villas, Lenton Boulevard, Nottingham:

"I am pleased to see the "price of Guy's Tonic is "reduced. I have found "great benefit from it for "Liver trouble and In- "digestion."

A new size (Six Ounce) Bottle of Guy's Tonic, price 1s. 1½d., is now on Sale at all Chemists and Stores.

"ALFOSCO" R.&Co.

Allen Foster & Co

SOLE MAKERS OF

THE 'ALFOSCO' COSTUMES

"ALFOSCO" R.&Co.

Buy Direct by Parcels Post from the Leading Firm of London Manufacturers.

Design No. 105. 10/6

A Special Line in Ladies' Serge Costume Skirts, Black and Navy, lined throughout, cut full. Price only 3/11 each; postage, 5d.

Design No. 110. 10/6

Design No. 105. 10/6.

Made in the world-renowned Spécialité Serge, or in the excellent Venetian Cloth, all colours: Black, Navy, Brown, Fawn, Grey, Blue-Grey, Electric, Myrtle, Reseda, Purple, &c. The bodice is shaped to the figure and very prettily designed. It has a pleated front, and trimmed with a frill of cloth carried over the shoulders, and large fancy buttons. The bodice and sleeves are lined. The Skirt is cut full and fashionably. Costume complete, 10/6. Carriage paid, 6d. extra. Skirt alone, 5/6. Carriage paid 5d. extra.

Patterns & Sketches Post Free.

Design No. 110, 10/6,

Is Allen Foster and Co.'s famous Reefer Costume. Thousands of Testimonials speak in most flattering terms of this Coat and Skirt Costume. The Coat is cut in the latest approved style. It has a velvet collar and small fancy buttons. The skirt is cut full and fashionably. Made in the smooth-faced Venetian Cloth or Spécialité Serge. Price 10/6 complete, in either cloth. Carriage, 6d. extra. Colours: Black, Navy, Grey, Fawn, Brown, Myrtle, Bronze-Green, Purple, Electric, &c.

Patterns & Sketches Post Free.

Regular Stock Sizes are 34, 36, and 38 in. round bust (under arms), the Skirts being 38, 40, and 42 in. in front. Larger or Special Sizes made to measure, 1/6 extra.

Patterns and New Illustrated Sketch Book of Fashions for the Spring Season POST FREE on application.

ALLEN FOSTER & CO.,

The London Manufacturers,

17 ROSCOE STREET, GOLDEN LANE, LONDON, E.C.

COFFEE WITHOUT DREGS.

GOOD! ITS MASON'S

MASON'S ESSENCE OF COFFEE AND CHICORY

EXPELS THE OLD METHOD

An agreeable, stimulating and sustaining beverage. Instantly prepared and most economical. Equal to the very finest coffee. Highly recommended by the Medical Profession.

Of all Grocers and Stores, or a Sample Bottle post free for 9 stamps.

ALSO TRY

MASON'S WINE ESSENCES AND MASON'S EXTRACT OF HERBS.

Sample Bottle of either sent free for 9d.; two assorted 1/3; three assorted 1/8.

Agents Wanted.

Manufacturers—

NEWBALL & MASON, NOTTINGHAM.

ROYAL MAGAZINE

Now On Sale,

3d.

PASTIMES

A Weekly Magazine of Sport and Adventure.

PUBLISHED EVERY WEDNESDAY

ONE PENNY.

ZOX

CURES

NEURALGIA

Toothache, Headache, Sciatica, and all Nerve Pains.

PURE, HARMLESS, AND NON-APERIENT.

Do not be persuaded to take a substitute, there is nothing as good as ZOX.

Of all Chemists, 1s. and 2s. 6d. per Box.

ZOX Co., 11 Hatton Garden, E.C.

£4 15/- Few Lady's and Gents' shop soiled, last Season's Pneumatics from best English makers. With 12 months' guarantee.

Easy payments arranged. Lists free.

F. G. Potter, Wholesale Cycle Factor, Norwich.

FOREIGN STAMP COLLECTORS' CHANCE

A WONDERFUL OFFER.

Gratis and Post Free upon receipt of Fourpence to cover cost of packing, postage, etc., the following to every applicant:

100 Assorted Foreign Stamps. 25 British Colonials. 1 Album. Packet of Unused Stamps. Packet of Mounts. Packet American Stamps. Packet South African Stamps. Packet Japanese Stamps.

Price List Free. Approval Sheets. Good Discount.

Universal Stationery Company, TENBY Pembrokeshire.

TRILENE Regd TABLETS

THE ONLY CURE for STOUTNESS Registered by GOVERNMENT Price 2/6

ALL FAT PEOPLE

Readily Reduce Weight and Cure Corpulency Permanently by taking TRILENE TABLETS (Regd.) for a few weeks. They are very agreeable, harmless, and never fail to PRESERVE both HEALTH and FIGURE without change of diet. Reduction begins immediately.

An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

Miss Heywood, 77 Hindhill Street, Heywood, Lancs., says: "I am 21lb. lighter, and my rheumatism also seems cured."

Mrs. Weaver, of Greenpits Villa, Station Road, Ross, Hereford, says: "Am reduced from 13st. 8lb. to 11st."

Mr. Canham, 87 Alexandra Road, Norwich: "Tablets cured my wife of extreme stoutness; it has never returned."

Lady Constance Conrad writes from Wiesbaden: "I am very pleased with the Tablets."

Princess Liechtenstein writes from Laudsberg, Austria: "Pray send your excellent Tablets directly."

Countess G. Furstenberg, Stammheim, Germany, writes: "They act speedily and well."

Mr. Butler, Surgeon, Hampton Manor, Evesham, says: "My patient lost more than a stone."

Send 2/6 to THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION, 66 Finsbury Pavement, London, E.C.

£20

Hairdressers fitted up. Estimates free.

Tobacconists Commencing. See Illd. Guide (259 pages) 3d. How to open a cigar store, £20 to £2,000 Tobacconists Outfitting Co., 186, Euston Road, London. The largest and original house (50 years reputation. Mgr., H. Myers

PALATABLE SUBSTITUTE FOR COD LIVER OIL.

DEVONSHIRE CREAM.

(Really Genuine.) In Patent Air-tight Tins, ½lb., 10d.; 1lb., 1/4; 1lb., 2/4; including Tin and Postage.

MRS. CONYERS, MORCHARD BISHOP, DEVON.

VARICOCELE.

Every man suffering from Varicocele and the allied troubles, or Varicose Veins, should send for treatise, describing their Causes, Symptoms, Results, and Successful and Painless Treatment without surgical operation or the use of cumbersome trusses and electrical appliances. Will be sent sealed, post free.

S. S. MURRAY,
7 Southampton Row, London, W.C.

FOR LADIES AND GENTLEMEN.

JUNO CYCLES

LISTS POST FREE

ARE THE VERY BEST AND MOST UP-TO-DATE.

Carriage Paid. Cash Discount.

Write for New Season's List.

JUNO Cycles and Accessories sent Post Free.

Road Racer, £10; 16s. 8d. Monthly.

Monthly		Monthly		Monthly
£10 ... 16/8	£12 ... 20/-	£14 14s. ... 24/6
£10 10s. ... 17/6	£12 12s. ... 21/-	£15 15s. ... 26/3

METROPOLITAN MACHINISTS' CO. Ltd.,

Juno Cycle School, 75, 76, Bishopsgate Street Without, E.C., and Piccadilly Circus, London, W.

Typewriters, £9 9s. 15s. 9d. Monthly.

You will be pleased with CHANCELLOR SOAPS.

That's why we want YOU to try them. As First Prize we offer a £300 HOUSE, and hundreds of other prizes. By using Chancellor Soaps and saving your wrappers till June you get the best and cheapest Soaps extant, you may get the House or a 50 guinea Piano, you will probably get a splendid Lady's Silver Watch, or if not you must get a money Prize.

Every Competitor gets one.

GET A BAR TO-DAY!

Won't You?

Send 4d. for Sample Bar

GIVEN AWAY

HUNDREDS OF POUNDS IN PRIZES - EVERY COMPETITOR GETS ONE OR A £300 HOUSE

LIBERAL PAYMENT FOR WRAPPERS. PARTICULARS WITH EACH 2½d AND 3d BAR.

CHANCELLOR SOAPS

to 13 Clerkenwell Road, London.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK

Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London.

INVESTED FUNDS £10,000,000.

The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free.

FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

12,000 Stitches a Minute.

A LADY writes of the NEW AUTOMATIC KNITTER:

"I earn my living entirely by the machine."

A FATHER writes: "My little girl, nine years of age, earns as much as Five Shillings some days."

Knits Socks (a pair in 35 minutes) and Stockings, Underclothing, Fancy Goods, &c. Easily learned. Lessons free. Cash, Hire, and Work Terms from Sorres. Dept., 67 Southwark Street, London, S.E., or 58 Union Street, Glasgow.

Digitized by Google

Short Stories

LOVE WAR ADVENTURE ROMANCE PATHOS HUMOUR

No. 531.] [One Penny.

For the Week ending March 4th, 1899.

A CARLIST MISSION.

"It is useless to attempt to persuade me further, dear Mercedes. Not even for your sweet sake can I consent to give up this mission, dangerous as I know it must be. The very danger is an inducement; the greater the danger, the more proud shall I be that I have been entrusted with the mission. I long now to do something for him who is the rightful King of Spain."

"You have served Alfonso in Cuba; why should you now fight against him in Spain?"

"I served Spain in Cuba, not this King Alfonso. Don Carlos is the rightful King of Spain, and although his fortunes are low, and his case now almost hopeless, I will not hesitate to do what I can or him. As soon as I could leave Cuba after the proclamation of Alfonso, I did so. Then this wretched fever overtook me. Now that I am well again I must act."

Pedro Alzola drew himself up and looked proudly at the girl in front of him. He had raised his voice as he had spoken the last words, and Mercedes stepped forward and laid her hand warningly upon his arm.

"Speak not so loudly, Pedro," she said hastily. "You know that in this house all are adherents of Alfonso. When do you start on your mission? Oh, that I could dissuade you from your purpose!"

Her eyes were fixed appealingly upon his, and for just a second the young man's resolution seemed to waver; but the weakness was quickly over, and he spoke again.

"Let us not talk further on my errand. I start this afternoon. Was it only for this that you urged me to come here this morning?"

"I wished to save you if I could, Pedro," replied Mercedes, clasping her hands. There was a pause for a few seconds and then she continued:

"You start this afternoon; will you tell me your destination, and how you intend to reach it, so that I may know where you are as the hours go by, and pray for your safety?"

"That is a secret which I ought to tell no one, least of all to one who is so connected with friends of Alfonso," he returned with a slight smile. "Nay, Mercedes," he added as he saw a slight flush pass over her beautiful face, "that was but a jest. I know right well that my secret will be safe in your keeping. I am going to Saragossa and I shall travel part of the way by train and walk or ride, according to circumstances, to the village of Vejos, where I shall put up for the night at the 'Black Bull' Inn. I shall be disguised as a peasant," he continued, growing enthusiastic again, "and after I leave the inn to-morrow morning—if I cannot get one before that—I have the name of a trusty man who will give me a mule to enable me to finish my journey. But it all depends upon what happens," he concluded hastily, as though sorry that he had said so much.

"Heaven grant that you may escape all dangers!" exclaimed Mercedes, "but this, I fear will be our last meeting. My father will never consent to my marriage with one who has espoused the cause of the Pretender; so that, even though you come safely through the conflict, which, alas! may not be, we shall be parted for ever. But, tell me, have you the letter upon you now?"

She spoke in a low tone, and bent forward somewhat eagerly.

"Yes," he answered after a moment's hesitation. "I have it here. It was entrusted to me only this morning, and I shall not let it pass from my keeping until I deliver it to the person for whom it is intended."

"I should like to look at it," said Mercedes, with a pleading glance. "To me, it is like a dread document that means unhappiness for us both—I had almost said, our death warrant, Pedro."

"Dear Mercedes, do not regard it in so gloomy a light," said Pedro, tenderly. "I am a soldier and a son of a soldier, and you also are of a soldier's family. I am doing nothing more than a soldier would do. I thought you were more brave; something has unnerved you."

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

"Yes, Pedro. But I will not distress you further with my gloomy thoughts. Still, I would like to look at the cover of that packet—to just hold the message that means so much for you and me. I cannot tell you why this is; a woman's whim or curiosity, call it what you like, but it has a strange fascination for me and I ask you to grant this last request."

Pedro was moved by the tenderness in her voice, mingled as it was with something that seemed to express hopelessness and loss. Glancing cautiously about him, Pedro unbuttoned his coat and from an inner pocket slowly drew forth a square packet wrapped in silk. For a moment he held it and then handed it to her.

"And this is the missive that carries so much with it!" said Mercedes pensively, gazing at the thin packet which she held.

She looked at it thoughtfully for several moments, until Pedro began to fear that her gloomy thoughts would overcome her and cause her to weep. He stretched out his hand as if to take it from her when she started back with an exclamation of fright.

"Hark!" she exclaimed. "Here comes my father. He must not see this or you are lost!" And she hastily hid the important packet in the bosom of her dress.

Alzola stepped forward as if to take it, but Mercedes had already darted to the door in her anxiety to prevent the entrance of the newcomer. She opened the door and stepped into the corridor. Pedro listened for voices, and from where he stood at the other end of the long room he heard confused tones. The next minute Mercedes returned with a light step to her lover.

"It was only a servant, after all," she said in answer to his inquiring look. "Oh, Pedro, take this dreadful document,"—drawing it forth and handing it to him—"and hide it away quickly. I began to fear that my curiosity would bring about your ruin. Hide it away quickly, I cannot bear to look at it again!"

She thrust it hurriedly into his hand, and half helped him to place it in his pocket. She was trembling so violently that when he had once more safely hidden the object of his mission he took her in his arms and tried by loving words and caresses to still her agitation.

"But I must now be going, Mercedes," said Pedro, when the girl's agitation had ceased, "I have stayed too long. I have still some preparation to make for my journey."

Mercedes did not attempt to detain him, and after a tender leave-taking, with many injunctions to be cautious on the part of Mercedes, the lovers separated.

It was about half-an-hour after the departure of Pedro that Mercedes Chabran rang the bell and told her maid that she wished to see Carlos.

This man was a young Irishman who had been brought to Spain when a mere boy, and had at this period been in the service of the Chabrans for ten years. In speech and appearance he was quite Spanish, although occasionally there was a twinkle in his eyes which is far more commonly seen in a native of Ireland than in a Spaniard. His real name was Charles Regan, which the Spaniards had turned into Carlos Regano.

"Carlos," said the young woman when the servant entered, "I understand that my father has given you leave of absence."

"Yes, Miss," returned Carlos.

"I want you, Carlos, to devote some part of that time to undertaking an errand for me. Can you do that?"

The Irishman looked somewhat puzzled.

"Will you tell what you want, miss?" he returned, avoiding a direct answer to her question.

"You know my relative, Pedro Alzola? I think you have seen him. I want you to carry a note to him. He is travelling to——"

She stopped abruptly, and looked fixedly at Carlos; then she continued in fairly good English, but with a decided accent:

"Charles, you have been a faithful servant, and I am sure I can trust you."

"You can that same, Miss," replied the Irishman emphatically dropping into a way of speaking which he had never shaken off, despite his many years residence in a foreign country. "It is a pleasure to do anything for ye, Miss Mercedes."

"Señor Alzola has been here this morning to say good-bye to me and I fear that I have depressed him with gloomy forbodings. I have written a letter to him which I wish you to convey, as it may serve to comfort him on his journey. I know that he will stay this night at the 'Black Bull' Inn, at Vejos. He will be disguised as a peasant. I wish you to give him this letter of consolation some time to-morrow morning after he has left the inn. You are discreet, and know how to hold your tongue. Can you do this for me?"

"I can, and I will!" returned the Irishman, in a tone that left no doubt that he would accomplish the task. "And I am pleased to have the chance of repaying you for the kindness you have shown me. An Irishman may be hot tempered, but his heart is in the right place, and he doesn't forget those who've been good to him. Give me the letter miss, and Mr. Pedro shall have it to-morrow morning if I am alive."

"Or he is," breathed Mercedes. "Charles, if you meet him before he reaches the inn to-night and—and—he is in trouble, will you help him?"

"Trust me for that, miss!" answered the Irishman in a decided tone. "Have you anything more to say?"

"No; I think you understand me," returned Mercedes with a meaning glance. The young Irishman returned the glance, bowed and withdrew.

When he reached the corridor he stood still for a moment and passed his hand through his hair, while a puzzled and yet amused expression passed over his countenance.

"This beats me," he muttered. "She couldn't know the reason why the old gentleman has given me a holiday. She has given me the very information I wanted, to help me to do what the old gentleman wants, and yet I know she expects me to help Mr. Alzola to do what her father doesn't want him to do. It's rather mixed up, but that's what it amounts to. So to please one I've got to take something away from Alzola and kill him if necessary, and to please the other I have got to watch over him and hand him a letter to comfort him when he is in the thick of his trouble.

"I can't see through it properly, but women are strange creatures. I don't know that I am particularly fond of Mr. Alzola; he wasn't very nice to me before he went to Cuba and I haven't forgotten it aither. The old gentleman has promised me a big sum if I do it, and the young lady hasn't promised me—. Get out wid ye! Ye ought to be ashamed of yoursilf, Charles! She's pretty, and an Irishman should be ready to go through fire and water for a pretty face!" And he went off to his own room.

It was getting dusk that evening when a peasant, mounted on a mule, and ambling along the road towards Vejos, suddenly pulled up. The cause of the sudden stop was a sound of hoofs rapidly approaching from the direction whence the peasant himself had come.

Digitized by Google

"He seems to be in haste," muttered the peasant, "and I prefer that he should pass me."

He got off the mule and pretended to be busy examining the mule's fore legs. A minute later he was joined by a man on horseback.

"Can you tell me if I am far from the 'Black Bull'?" inquired the new arrival, who was fairly well dressed and apparently of the well-to-do middle class; "why can't people leave off fighting, so that a man can travel by train instead of jolting over these rough roads? I expect that my horse will be lame by the time I reach the inn."

"You have about a mile farther to go," replied Alzola, imitating the rough talk of the peasants. "You have lost your way, or you would not be on this out-of-the-way path."

"One might lose anything here," returned the stranger, "as well as one's way. Are you going towards the inn? Yes? Then we'll go together, for I don't like these parts. It will do my horse good to take it easy, so your mount will be able to keep up with mine."

Alzola was rather disconcerted, but after a moment's reflection he decided to agree. It might be safer for him, after all. He therefore nodded assent, mounted his mule, and the two men continued the journey side by side.

There was very little conversation between them until they reached the inn. Alzola thought it prudent not to say much lest he betrayed his superior social standing; moreover, as his companion was above his own assumed rank, it was not becoming in him to carry on a conversation. The man on horseback, who said that his name was Lopez, addressed him occasionally and made various remarks on different subjects, but on the whole very little was said.

Arriving at the inn, Lopez insisted that the peasant should come into the best room with him. There was not much accomodation at the little place and the best room was but a poor affair. Alzola tried to decline the honour, but the other took him by the arm and drew him into the room.

"Hark," she exclaimed. "Here comes my father."

"The landlord will see that our animals are attended to," he said, "so just sit down there and make yourself comfortable. We'll have some wine and some supper, for I think you said you were going to stay the night?"

Alzola had said nothing of the kind, but he judged it prudent not to contradict. He was naturally suspicious of everybody, but there seemed no reason to fear that his new companion had any sinister designs against him. If he were suspected by the Royalists they would simply surround him and take his document from him by force; they would not trouble to set a man to ferret out his secret, or to get the document away from him by cunning. Still, he must be cautious.

The wine and some fruit were brought, and both men did justice to it. Alzola relaxed a little under the influence of the wine, while Lopez paid no heed to the apparent difference in the social scale. Before they had been seated half-an-hour Alzola had ceased his imitation of his peasant speech and the two men were chatting amicably together.

"That's a good ruse of yours," said Lopez, "to disguise yourself as a peasant. I wish I had done the same. A man's life isn't safe about here, I should say, if the people think that he's got a little money about him."

Alzola started, but Lopez only laughed.

"Oh, don't be afraid," he returned in answer to the quick glance which Pedro shot at him. "I'm in disguise too, for that matter. I think it is lucky that we have met, for I imagine that we are on much about the same errand. Well! well!" he added as the other pushed back his chair, "I don't wish to know your business, but there is no reason why we shouldn't spend the evening agreeably together. We need not be afraid of each other."

He filled the glasses again, disregarding the fact that Alzola had half risen from his seat.

"Here's good luck to both of us!" he said raising his glass.

Alzola, his suspicion allayed by the easy manner of Lopez, and anxious to repair so far as possible the blunder he had committed in betraying himself, sat down again, drew his chair closer to the table and knocked his glass against the other's.

"As you say, here's luck to both of us!" he said with

Digitized by Google

Pedro Alzola . . . stooped and picked them up.

assumed heartiness. "If I choose to travel as a peasant why not?"

"Exactly!" replied Lopez. "And now, if you have finished, let us pass the time by throwing the dice. We need not play for money, but just for amusement. To show money here might be dangerous."

There was a box of dice on the shelf and the two began to play. After they had been thus engaged for about five minutes, Lopez, in making his throw, ejected the dice too roughly and the little cubes rolled over the table and fell to the floor by Alzola's side.

Lopez uttered an apology and rose for the purpose of finding the dice, but with true politeness Alzola bade him sit still and, shifting his chair, stooped and picked them up.

"Come, you're not drinking!" exclaimed Lopez after the next throw.

"I never drink much," returned Alzola as he rattled the dice in the box.

"Nonsense!" was the rejoinder. "This wine would not hurt a baby. It's fairly good for the place. Come, drink up your glass, man!"

Pedro sipped at the wine and made his throw.

"Two fives," said Lopez, yawning. "This is rather a slow game, and I am getting sleepy." He lay back in his chair and yawned again.

"I, too, feel tired," said Pedro, drowsily leaning back. "I think we had better retire."

"Stay a little longer, and smoke another cigarette," said Lopez. "These are good, try one,"—pushing the box of cigarettes across the table.

Alzola made no movement. He saw the box, but his eyes were heavy. He gazed sleepily at the box of cigarettes, then his eyes closed, and his head dropped on his breast.

When he awoke with a start his first action was to raise his hand to his breast, and a feeling of relief passed over him when his hand touched the place where the packet had been deposited. His companion was still sitting opposite him smoking his cigarette.

"I thought you wouldn't sleep long," remarked Lopez "so I stayed here to keep you company."

"Have I been asleep long?" asked Pedro, vaguely.

"Not really asleep, only dozing," replied Lopez. "The least thing would have aroused you, as that gust of wind did just now when it shook the window. We had better get to bed."

The landlord appeared in response to his call, and said that the two beds were ready. They were both in one room, as he had no other room to spare. This was perplexing to Alzola and he was about to protest that he was not fit company for Lopez—he intended to make other excuses when the landlord was gone—when all three were surprised by the door being flung back violently to admit an officer and half-a-dozen soldiers.

"Seize the peasant!" shouted the officer, and the six men made a rush at Alzola.

All was confusion. The landlord ran back, scared almost out of his wits, and Pedro, guessing that any attempt at concealment would be useless, endeavoured to gain the wall in order to prevent an attack from behind while he defended himself to the last. But, before he could carry out his purpose and grasp the revolver hidden under his coat, the soldiers were upon him, and, struggle as he might, he was unable to free himself. In the greatest of mental agony he had to submit to his clothes being torn open and the precious packet, with its silken covering dragged from its place of concealment and handed to the officer.

The officer tore off the covering and opened the packet. He stared at it for a brief space, then looked wonderingly from the document to Pedro.

"What is the meaning of this?" he asked. "There's nothing in it, the paper is blank!"

If he expected Pedro to tell him all about it he was doubly mistaken. The young fellow was just as much surprised as the officer, but his surprise was not manifested, because his face was distorted with rage. On hearing the officer's words he just had sense enough left to keep silence and await developments.

Digitized by Google

"We have seized the wrong man, after all!" exclaimed the officer in a tone of vexation. "Where's the other fellow? Seize him!"

But the "other fellow" was nowhere to be seen; he had apparently taken advantage of the confusion to effect his escape. The officer satisfied himself that Pedro had no incriminating document upon him, took away his revolver and told him that he might go where he liked—only that was not exactly what he said. They then all hurried out after the missing Lopez.

Nearly out of his mind with rage, mortification and perplexity, Pedro staggered about the room blindly in his attempts to find the door; but, stumbling over a chair that had been thrown down in the scuffle he fell to the ground, striking his head heavily against the hard floor. There he lay unconscious for more than an hour, when someone carried him off to a rude bed on the floor above.

The next morning Pedro awoke with a splitting headache and to the memory of the failure of his mission, and the mystery of the document entrusted to him. He was not long in arriving at the conclusion that Lopez had made an exchange while he had been asleep in his chair, but the reason was not clear.

What was to be done? It was useless to go forward, and equally so, he had no doubt, to set out in search of his companion of the previous evening. And how could he go back to Barcelona and confess that he had failed! He descended the rickety stairs and found his way to the stable; the mule was there, but the horse ridden by Lopez was gone.

The landlord met him and pressed him to have breakfast, but the young fellow declined and pulled out his purse to pay for his lodgings. The landlord, however, refused to accept anything, saying that his companion, who had left much earlier, had paid for all.

When Pedro found himself once more on the road it was with no proper idea as to where he was going. But the incidents of his journey were not yet over. He had not proceeded far from the inn, when he was hailed by a young man whom he saw striding across a field.

Pedro went on without heeding; he had had enough of casual acquaintances. But the man sprang lightly into the road and stopped the mule.

"I have something for you, Señor Alzola," he cried. "something that you will be pleased to receive." And with these words he handed to Pedro a somewhat bulky letter.

"How did you know my name?" asked Pedro, mechanically taking the letter.

"You do not recognise me," was the reply, "I am Carlos Regano and am in the service of Señor Chabran, and that letter was given to me for you by the señorita."

Alzola was almost beyond the capability of feeling surprise. He urged his mule forward a few paces and then tore open the letter. On a sheet of paper was written these words:

"Forgive me! I did this to save you. This will be delivered to you when all danger is, I hope, past. You now can fulfil your mission."

Pedro, scarcely able to believe his eyes, looked from the letter to the other enclosure, in which he recognised the missing packet. His brain was in a whirl; he could only return to Carlos and in broken tones ask him to convey his thanks to the señorita.

Then the two men separated, Carlos to return to Barcelona, and Pedro to continue his journey.

On the following day Carlos returned somewhat unexpectedly as the other servants thought. Señor Chabran was not in, so he reported first to Mercedes.

"And you delivered my letter of consolation to him quite safely?" she inquired anxiously. "And—was he in any trouble?"

"There was a little trouble at the inn, miss," replied the Irishman, "but he was really in no danger. I watched the scuffle from the door and would have helped him if necessary; but they only found on him some blank papers."

"What! that all?" asked Mercedes; and after thanking the Irishman and rewarding him in a way that made his eyes sparkle, she dismissed him.

"That's a good stroke of business," mused Carlos as he left the room. "And I expect the old gentleman will act just as handsomely when I hand him this packet."

But to judge from the Irishman's countenance as he sat in his room, after his interview with Señor Chabran, the result was not nearly so satisfactory. For nearly half-an-hour Carlos sat in deep thought; then a light of Struggle as he might he was unable to free himself.

Digitized by Google

Alzola tore open the letter.

intelligence took the place of the vacant stare in his eyes and he slapped his knee vigorously.

"I can see through it all!" he said softly, "and she's as clever as—well never mind who. I'll warrant this is how she did it!

"She heard that he was going away, and she heard from her father that the Royalists had got scent of the fact that a Carlist messenger was to leave Barcelona with important information. So she put two and two together. Of course, she wanted to save him, and help him, and she didn't want to betray her father's plans.

"So she asked him to come here that morning and she had a bogus packet ready. Somehow she managed to change 'em. I shouldn't be surprised if she did it under his very eyes without his knowing it. A man is blind when he is in love, and the woman can do anything, and he wouldn't know a word about it.

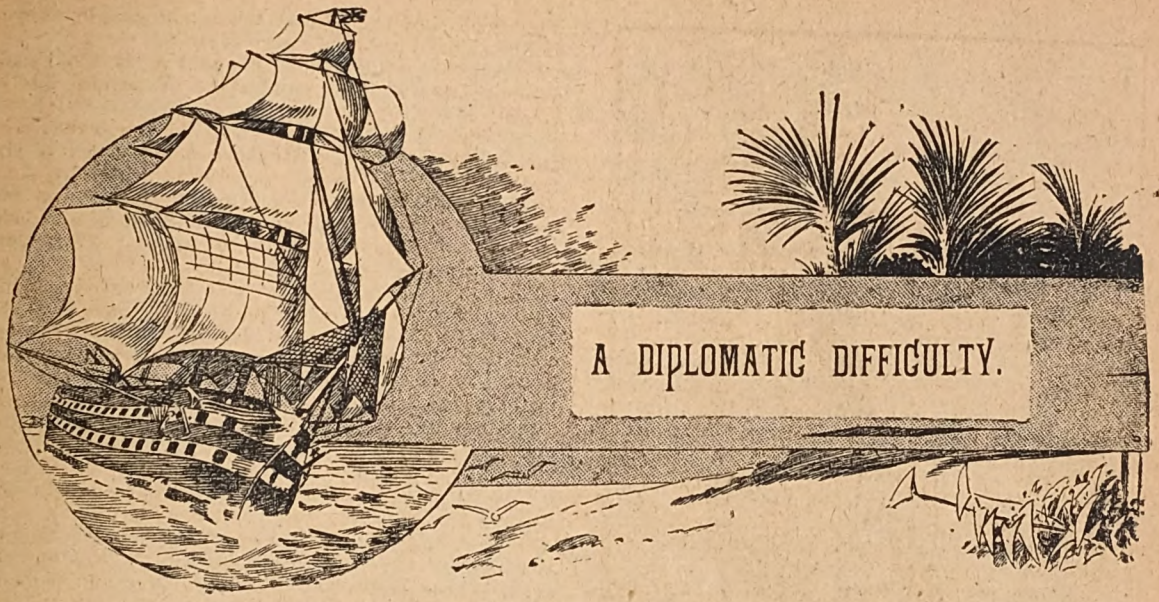
"Well, he went off and thought he had got the packet safe; then she sent for me and gave me that very same packet to hand over to him when she thought the trouble would be over. And sure enough I did it! And I went to all that trouble—I made friends with him, dropped something into his wine while he was hunting for the dice, exchanged the letters during the five minutes he was asleep, giving him another bogus one in return for what I thought was the true document; and then I handed to him the real thing which I had been carrying about with me, and came back to Barcelona as pleased as Punch because I'd done a service to two people with one stroke as I thought. And that girl outwitted the lot of us.

"Of course, the old gentleman won't want her to marry Alzola, but she will. When the Carlist business is settled she will coax her father to get a pardon for him and he will give them a father's blessing like a lamb. A girl that can play a trick like that can do anything."

It is sufficient here to say that the Irishman's explanation was correct except in one particular, and that his conclusions concerning what would happen in the future proved equally accurate. He was wrong simply concerning the exact way in which Mercedes had effected the exchange, but on this point the reader will require no enlightenment.

George Day.

Digitized by Google



A DIPLOMATIC DIFFICULTY.

Señor Antonio Smith, Spanish Consular Agent at Hookport, U.S.A., found himself in a singular diplomatic position. He had just been notified by his Consul General that, relations with the United States being terminated, he was to turn over the archives to the care of the local Consular Agent of France, close his office, and depart.

This may not appear difficult, in view of the fact that Hookport was but a small place of two or three thousand inhabitants, so much fallen away from its earlier brisk trade with the West Indies that neither the Spanish nor French agent receives a call for official services half a dozen times in a year. So that for the little town one man, and he Anthony Smith, sufficed for both of the foreign consulates. His fellow-townsmen had also obtained for him the position of postmaster. He was also, incidentally, town clerk of a notary public.

This composite responsibility was taken seriously by Señor Antonio, M. Antoine, or plain Anthony Smith. Having much imagination, and quiet and limited surroundings, he magnified his offices; like a chameleon, he took colour from the circumstances of the moment, however often and suddenly they might change.

Smith was really an Englishman, who had spent years in business in Cuba and Martinique, and had been drafted to Hookport, where he had settled down.

In a room adjoining the post office stood two roll-top desks, precisely alike, occupying the two front windows. Above one of these desks was draped the flag of Spain; the tricolor of France overhung the other. The archives were few, but arranged with an eye to effect, and tied with many yards of red tape; the consular seals also were in evidence. In the windows respectively appeared the printed signs:—

Consular Agency of Spain, Antonio Smith.
and
Consular Agency of France,
Antoine Smith.

And the same men who were hail-fellows-well-met with Tony Smith in the post office were gravely courteous with Señor Antonio, or politely festive to Monsieur Antoine at their Consulates.

At 10.45 on an April morning, the postmaster of Hookport, having opened the mail-bag, perceived among its contents a large official envelope bearing the seal of the Spanish Consul General and addressed to Señor Antonio Smith. Recent developments in regard to the political situation had prepared him for an international crisis.

He turned red, then pale; but he placed the packet in its appropriate box, and went on distributing the letters and handing out newspapers to the applicants outside the delivery window. When the rush was over, and only a few straggling individuals came in to inquire for letters, Mr. Smith called Foote, his assistant, and himself passed into the office of the consulates.

Thence, a moment later, he came out, and, presenting himself at a small window, asked cautiously:

"Señor Assistant Postmaster, is there anything for the consular agency of Spain?"

"Yes, señor," and Johnny Foote proffered the official document, which Señor Antonio took with a lofty expression of thanks.

Johnny Foote it may briefly be said, was a freckled towheaded youth, who adored his employer as the triple extract of all that there is of heroic and romantic, a bigger man than any to be found in history or in penny novels. It is true that the elaborate international parts which the official felt himself obliged to play seemed to Johnny a game. But it was a good game, indeed, Johnny judged; and in his awkward way the boy imitated and seconded his chief as best he could.

Señor Antonio carried away the document, retired to the desk of the Spanish consulate, opened the envelope, and read his instructions with an air of ever-increasing gloom. Then he shouted, "Ola Juan!"

The useful Johnny instantly appeared.

"Yes, señor."

"As clerk of the consulate agency of Spain you are now to learn that diplomatic relations between our government and that of the United States are terminated."

Digitized by Google

"The paper said so this morning," interrupted Johnny Foote.

"We have not known it officially until this moment," corrected Antonio, and Johnny stood rebuked.

"In accordance with instructions from my Consul General," continued Antonio, "I am about to confide the archives to my honourable colleague the Consular Agent of France, Juan. It is your duty to carry them to him, and to safeguard them, if need be, with your life."

With this, Señor Antonio piled up the packets of papers upon the willing arms of his assistant, crowning the heap with the metal stamp of the consulate. Johnny set out with a measured step towards the other side of the room.

It had been the intention of M. Antoine to be seated at his desk, ready to receive the messenger whose errand his diplomatic sense must have foreseen. But, unluckily Señor Antonio in throwing away some useless papers let fall into the Spanish waste basket a pair of scissors which, before relations with the United States had become strained, he had borrowed from the post-office. In search for the scissors two or three minutes were lost so that when M. Antoine entered the office of the French consulate the messenger was awaiting him.

"Good-morning, Señor Juan," said the official, with a fine unconciousness of any crisis in affairs.

The messenger, who did not know what he ought to say, answered simply:

"Good morning, monsieur," and deposited the archives upon the desk of the friendly power.

M. Antoine viewed the papers with an air of sudden concern.

"Does this mean, Señor Juan, that Spain has severed her relations with the United States?"

"I should say so, monsieur," responded Johnny Foote.

The French Consular Agent wrote a receipt for the archives, rose to his feet and, handing the paper to the Spanish messenger, spread his hands eloquently above the paper of his new trust. "I beg you, Señor Juan, to convey this receipt to Don Antonio, assuring him that Spanish honour is safe with France, whose humble representative I have the happiness to be, and also present to him my personal condolences, with the assurances of my highest esteem."

This time, on his way between the two consular agencies, Johnny Foote delayed to exchange signals with a friend under a back window who wanted him to come out later to join in some sports. So that when he reached the Spanish desk Señor Antonio was sitting there in an attitude of noble grief, with an effect of having remained immovable for several hours.

Johnny delivered the receipt, and stated that "M. Antoine is going to pitch into anybody that tries to lay a hand on the Spanish things; and he is awfully sorry for you, señor, and thinks just as much of you as though you were not down on your luck. And so do I, by Jingo!" added the boy loyally.

Don Antonio silently arose from his chair; then, mounting it, he took down the Spanish flag, which he carefully folded and laid upon the desk; then, having removed the sign from the window, he placed it with the flag. He closed and locked the desk. His career as a Spanish diplomat was at an end.

He crossed the room and set to work to find places for archives intrusted to the guardianship of France. Johnny Foote, emboldened by the more cheerful looks of his superior, came to the side of the desk and stood fidgeting from one leg to the other. M. Antoine smiled at him.

"My good Jean (for Johnny was now attached to the French consulate), what can I do for you?"

"If you don't want me, monsieur, I should like to go out a little while with the boys."

"Ah!" murmured M. Antoine. "Without doubt. Go, my brave boy!"

On the square-hewed timber near the edge of the wharf sat a row of ancient mariners, talking as they had talked for the last twenty years. They were thoroughly acquainted with one another's ideas, but certain subjects seemed to be made to be rolled over and over again in their mouths along with their tobacco. When other topics failed the peculiarities of Tony Smith were a continual resource, and just now the political crisis, instead of overshadowing his personality, seemed to bring it more strongly to light.

"I expect," observed one of the elders, "that there ain't nobody in this country as much interested in the war as Tony Smith is."

"Well, you know, there's three of him, to view it from all sides," said another.

"Queer acting ain't he? Wasn't no mental afflictions in his family, was there?" ventured a stranger, a skipper, in for repairs to his schooner. He was promptly disciplined.

"No, sir," responded the captain, who had spoken first. "Good blood on both sides of the house. Anthony Smith is a likely young man excellent in every respect. Anything you observe that looks sing'lar in him is due to his stay in the West Injys. Manners and customs is different there from ours, of course, and Tony stayed long enough to soak 'em into his natur'."

The other old men nodded their adhesion to this diagnosis.

At that moment somebody saw a vessel rounding the point. By well-known features of its rigging it was made out to be the Miranda, Captain Soper of Hookport, master and owner, on its return from Matanzas, where it had gone four months earlier with a load of timber and salted fish. Its Captain, when on shore, was one of the chorus of elders who sat on the wharf to prophesy, and he had been much missed. His wife had accompanied him on the voyage, and her return with an assorted cargo of news was eagerly awaited by the ladies of the place.

A topic of conversation was not easily let drop by the sages. "First man that Captain Soper will want to see is Tony Smith," remarked one.

Nobody doubted it. Then the chorus took to professional appreciations of the course of the schooner.

The old Captains stood in a line on the wharf to welcome their crony and his wife. But everybody was surprised to see a third person with the excellent couple, a walking bundle of wraps that still was recognisable as a young girl. From under a "pumpkin hood" and above a worsted muffler gleamed a pair of magnificent Southern eyes. A Cuban girl!

"Our young friend, Miss Manuelita Garcia of Matanzas," Mrs. Soper told the captains.

The stay-at-home mariners now enjoyed the glory of informing Captain Soper that while he was on the sea, war had been practically declared

"It's a mercy that we hadn't been overhauled for a prize, and I feel thankful," declared the good man. "Now, I must see the Spanish Consul at once," he continued, "for I've got a letter for him from an old friend in Matanzas."

Digitized by Google

By this time the boys had left off playing and come down to the wharf. Johnny Foote, as ex-clerk of the consular agency of Spain, spoke to Captain Soper:

"Spanish Consul's gone away, sir. But he has left his papers with the French Consul, and you can see him. He is there. And the postmaster, too, sir," Johnny added, as an afterthought.

"Eh?" said Captain Soper, for the moment puzzled.

"Tony Smith is there all right," explained one of the mariners.

"Oh yes, yes, of course. My dear, you see about getting the things on to some kind of a lighter and steer for your sister Byram's. I will run on ahead to see Tony, and you can overhaul me at the post-office."

The postmaster sat on the steps of the office alone and in deep thought; when he saw someone coming near, he threw a small object neatly behind some stones—perhaps forgetting who he was just then. Mr. Smith had been wooing peace of mind with one of the cigarettes of the departed Señor Antonio. He arose quickly.

"Glad to see you, Captain Soper. Welcome home again, sir!" he hailed, heartily.

But over the fine first careless rapture of the meeting was cast a shade of melancholy when the captain without ceremony, handed a letter to the postmaster, who at once saw the handwriting of a Cuban friend.

"From your old master, Don Serafino Garcia," said the Captain, cheerfully. "Good many years since he saw you, but he remembers you well, Tony. His wife has been dead for some time, and he was terrible put out to know what to do with his little girl. You remember Manuelita, I daresay. She must have been a mite of a little tot, at the time that you were there in Matanzas. She ain't but sixteen now. Well, m'wife just took to that sweet, pretty creature, and we've brought her home with us to stay for a time, at any rate till the troubles in Cuba are over.

"The way Señor Garcia talked about you! Tony, I thought he desired that you might take it into your head to marry her. Well, this letter will speak for him and I must go along now, for here are my women folks."

They made a picture as the ox cart came up the street, the two women seated among a heap of sea chests bundles, and a queer, fo eign-looking small black trunk. The boys had resolved themselves into a guard of honour. Johnny Foote bore the oxgoad, and gee'd in a friendly fashion at the big, lumbering animals.

"Heave to, there!" shouted Captain Soper, and the team was halted.

"Here's Tony Smith, my dear," said the Captain. "Miss Garcia, Mr. Smith."

One blue mitten, so spacious that it had an appearance of emptiness, was pulled off by some force concealed in its mate, and a slender, little, creamy hand was timidly extended towards Tony. As he took her slight fingers she lifted her black-fringed eyelids, and shot a soft, brilliant glance straight into his eyes, and down into the heart of Anthony Smith, of M. Antoine, even as far as the heart of Señor Antonio, late consular agent of Spain. That glance was a formidable projectile.

The ox team started again on its way, Captain Soper walking behind.

"You be sure and come up to see us this evening, Tony," Mrs. Soper called out to him.

"Thank you, ma'am; I will with pleasure if I can. But this is my busy day," he replied, vaguely.

He watched the group until it turned the corner towards the Byram house Then he thought of Don Serafino Garcia's letter, and went into the post-office to read it.

But it was addressed to Señor Antonio Smith, consular agent of Spain.

The postmaster sighed. "Not for me," he judged. Then he had the right idea. "That letter must be consigned to the French consular agent."

He looked round for a messenger, but Johnny by this time was probably helping to unhaul the ox team, so that Mr. Smith was obliged to carry the letter in person.

He laid it upon the desk of the French consulate; then seated himself and opened the envelope. Don Serafino Garcia wrote thus:

"My very dear and esteemed friend Smith."

"That's me—any one of me" noted M. Antoine with satisfaction. "I am committing no indiscretion. The letter is not of a personal nature."

But as he continued to read the loyal diplomat, he began to have his scruples. After some generalities concerning the state of the island and of business he saw these phrases, with increasing alarm:

"To you, most excellent friend, I wish to recommend my only daughter, Manuelita, the eye of my soul. To a father be it permitted that he speak plainly—if your heart, dear Don Antonio——"

Clap went the palm of M. Antoine over the ensuing words, that he might not behold them.

"This is too personal by half," he declared. "I have no right to learn the private affairs of my Spanish ex-colleague. That, indeed, would be indiscreet!" and he gave a very Gallic laugh and shrug.

But Postmaster Anthony Smith had heard what Captain Soper had said about Don Serafino Garcia's hopes, and M. Antoine had not been able to ignore the overtures to Señor Antonio.

There could be no doubt, the question must be settled then and there whether Mrs. Soper's invitation be accepted or not. Because it was certain that a few more glances from those glorious eyes of Manuelita would conquer the whole triple alliance of Smith. M. Antoine sat immersed in thought; finally he came to a diplomatic conclusion to this effect:

"Señor Antonio. Consulate Agent of Spain, has departed; officially he no longer exists; he is defunct. His affairs are, by instructions from his government, committed to the care of the French Consulate. Now in this time of crisis could a Spanish official wed a Cuban woman? That is the ultimatum in the case of Don Antonio. While I—M. Antoine, French Consulate Agent, am bound by international honour to remain strictly neutral, a state of mind quite incompatible with the lively affections which should be the basis of marriage.

"So I am out of it, too. But my opinion in this critical case would be that the postmaster, Mr. Anthony Smith, may, individually and officially, with great propriety, contract a matrimonial alliance with the daughter of Don Serafina Garcia of Matanzas, his old friend and employer."

Outside the consular window could be seen the boys returning from escort duty. Mr. Smith ran to the door of the post-office.

"Johnny!" he called to his factotum, "you run back and tell Mrs. Soper that I shall have the pleasure of calling on the ladies this evening."

Elizabeth Pullen.

Digitized by Google

OUR HARDY ANNUAL.

WHAT WE ARE GOING TO DO WITH 100,000 CHILDREN THIS SUMMER.

Tradition says that a drowning man sinks for the third time, and then finally disappears. The Fresh Air Fund has "gone under" seven years in succession, and now for the eighth time it makes its appearance as fresh as ever, and sets forth its usual appeal for assistance, not on behalf of itself, but for the benefit of the poorest children in London and our other large towns. Since the first appeal was made, no fewer than half a million children have been given a day's outing in the country through this agency.

There are, no doubt, a great many new readers of Short Stories since the objects of the Fund were last published. For their enlightenment let me say that each child gets a day in the country, with plenty of good food and drink, at a cost of ninepence, and this sum includes the amount spent on the railway fare.

The arrangements for the outings are made by the Secretary of the Ragged School Union, which society shares all the working expenses with the proprietors of Pearson's Weekly; that is to say, the Fund is not burdened in any way by having any expenses deducted from the amount subscribed. Every penny received is spent on the children, and I believe I am correct in stating this to be the only charitable institution in existence which is run on such lines.

Each year is worked separately from its predecessor or successor, the accounts being made up every September. Thus we get our "hardy annual."

It is hoped it will be possible this year to give a holiday to 100,000 children, and arrangements have been made for that number, provided, of course, sufficient money comes to hand. This means that £4,050 must come from somewhere. One half of the amount has been guaranteed to the gentlemen who have undertaken the work of carrying out the excursions in the different centres, and if the donations fall short of £2,025, the deficit must be made good by the proprietors of Pearson's Weekly. Such a calamity, however, is not anticipated. We start the season with nearly £300 which has come to hand during the winter.

But the desired end will not be reached without a lot of hard work, and appeals will be inserted from now until the end of September, asking for subscriptions. You, on your part, must worry your friends, and if you succeed in gaining their interest in the movement, go a step further and request them to mention the matter to their friends and acquaintances.

The list of towns and the number of children to whom it is hoped to give a treat in each is as follows:

Aberdeen, 2,000; Birmingham, 5,000; Belfast, 3,000; Blackburn, 2,000; Bristol, 2,000; Bradford, 2,000; Bolton, 2,000; Cardiff, 2,000; Dublin, 2,000; Edinburgh, 2,000; Glasgow, 5,000; Gateshead, 2,000; Hull, 2,000; Leeds, 2,500; Leicester, 2,000; Liverpool, 5,000; London, 40,000; Manchester, 5,000; Nottingham, 2,000; Newcastle, 2,000; Oldham, 2,000; Portsmouth, 2,000; Sheffield, 2,500; Sunderland, 2,000; total, 100,000.

Each place, of course, is worked according to local peculiarities. In some it has been found possible to carry out the excursions in co-operation with an existing organisation, while in others a special committee has been formed. The name and address of the correspondent or secretary in each case will be published next week. To print a full list of the committees would occupy too much space, and probably would not interest anyone outside the particular town for which they are responsible. If any person is so interested in the scheme as to wish to be in possession of all the names, no doubt the secretary will oblige him, on receiving a request to that effect.

The places to which the provincial children will be taken will be left to the local committees to decide. But so far as London children are concerned, they will go to Epping Forest, as in other years.

It has often occurred to me that people do not actually realise the position of the children of the very poor of our big cities. If they did, I firmly believe the whole of the £4,050 would reach these offices during the first week, instead of it being necessary to keep pegging away for subscriptions.

It seems scarcely credible that with all the existing organisations of one kind and another, there are still so many children who have never tasted the happiness of a day in the country.

Now supposing there are only one thousand children in London this summer who are in such a plight. A cheque for £40 10s. will make them all happy. Who will be the first to send that amount?

We do our best to pick out those who deserve a holiday—not those who have earned one by attending a Sunday or any other school, but children who, through no fault of their own, are too poor to get a little pleasure and fresh air. The question of religion does not enter into the matter. Let a child be poor and in want of a holiday, and the Fresh Air Fund steps in.

Having set the ball rolling once more, it is for our readers to assist us as best they can. Collecting sheets will be supplied to anyone sufficiently interested to ask for one. The offer of a gold-plated pencil-case, or one of Pearson's Weekly penknives to those who collect £1 or over, still holds good.

Amounts received will be acknowledged in Pearson's Weekly from week to week.

Digitized by Google

MICKEY'S PIG.

TOM CONNOR was the blacksmith over the hill. Mickey Finn was in the habit of running on errands for Tom, and so, when Providence sent a litter of pigs into Tom's sty, he picked out the smallest, most measly-looking pig in the litter, and gave it to Mickey.

Of course the boy was delighted, and he ran home with the squealing little porker under his arm.

Now, if there was anything of which Mrs. Finn was fond of it was fresh pork, especially when it was young and tender. But she had had considerable experience with animated pork in her day, and after looking at Mickey's acquisition with the eye of a connoisseur, she decided that the chances of the pig's ripening into plump hams and juicy chops were very slim.

"Now, Mickey, you take that rack o' bones wid no mate on it back to Tom Connor, an' tell him he might be up t' better business nor shovin' off his bones an' bristles on ye. Faix, he might as well be givin' ye a shtove grate. Luk at th' tail iv th' boneen! Musha, thare's no more twist to it than to a hoe handle!"

"But, mother, I don't want th' pig t' ate. I want to play wid him!"

"Play wid a pig, is it! Nixt ye'll want to be playin' wid Feeman's calf, so ye will. Oh, but you're a looney b'y; ye're out iv of yer sivin small sinses. Play wid a pig! Mebbe ye'd be puttin' pants on him an' feedin' him wid a spoon, agra. It's a quare lad ye are, me b'y, wid yer ould divil goats an' that black crow as has shiny beads in his head. Well, well, an' I wantin' t' make a ly'yer iv ye 'stead iv a dirty snake charmer or mautherin' vagabones as ye will be av ye don't shtop playin' wid animals! So, thare. Now, Mickey, take that pig back t' Tom Connor an' tell him t' give ye wan wid pork on his ribs an' fate worth picklin' on him. Now run, run awa'."

Mickey picked up the pig tenderly in his arms and went away over the hill. His heart was heavy; but Tom Connor cheered him up.

"Mickey," said he, "you an' I'll make a pen for the porker forenist th' forge, an' you can gather a little grass an' shtuff fer him. Mebbe he'll get fat. Thin ye mother'll be glad t' hav' him. We'll call the porker Darby."

The pen was built and Darby was duly installed therein. Under the fostering care of the blacksmith, and little Mike, the porker grew in size and plumpness, and endeared himself to Mickey by his many winning ways. The pig became broad of back and strong of limb. Darby's ears began to droop upon his neck, and he was very fond of being scratched between them with a piece of old iron. And so the days fled quickly by, filled with the joy of content.

But while the May days were slipping away into the eternities, Mrs. Finn had not been idle. Her boy's extravagant praises of Darby had awakened her cupidity anew.

Often while Mickey was at school, Mrs. Finn took sly trips over the meadows to the sty. On each of these occasions she always took with her some choice morsels which were calculated to increase Darby's girth.

Alas! however, Mrs. Finn entertained none of those fine sentiments of unselfish love for Darby which animated her son. She could see no poetry in the cork-screw curl of Darby's tail as he grunted with pleasure while gnawing last year's cabbage stump. Her finer sensibilities had been roughened by the sandpaper of misfortune. Each pound Darby gained meant no added grace and proport on to her, but rather suggested the salty pork barrel and the sizzling frying-pan.

During all this time Mickey's old grey-bearded billy-goat was suffering the torment of unrequited affection. Day by day the billy saw Mickey go by him on his way to the pig-pen. But once, in three weeks long, did little Mick stop and gambol with the goat as he had been wont to do in the sweet old days before the coming of the hated Darby. The goat seemed to be aware that the affections of his master were waning away from him, "like the twilight of an autumn day."

Only a litt'e sunlit hollow in Stumpy Field separated Darby and the goat. One morning, while yet the grass was bending beneath diamonds of dew, the goat came out of his barrel and stretched his legs. He looked off over the valley at the mists fleeing up the rugged sides of Snake Hill. He saw the faint flush in the east gradually deepen into a vivid blush of rose colour. Then he indulged in a little practice bucking.

While engaged in th s harmless amusement the billy became aware suddenly that he was a free goat, no longer bound by the galling clothes line. Billy, having satisfied himself that he was no longer a captive ambled over to Darby's pen. The pig was asleep. He, however, was soon awakened. There was a battering-ram at his gate.

Once, twice, thrice did that implacable catapult hurl itself against the frail pen. Then the hemlock groaned in pain; it cracked, it broke. Darby sprang to his feet and squealed in fright. The hoofed demon with blazing eyes and ragged bangs, full of hemlock splinters, was in the pen.

Then began an awful struggle. Urged by the billy, Darby was forced out into the field and bowled over and over down the hill. The billy attended strictly to business. No sooner did Darby get on his feet than he was called on in a most forcible manner to lie down. When Darby had once more got his trembling legs under him he made one supreme effort and ran up the hillside. His ascent was materially assisted by the goat. But Darby was going towards the lime quarry! In headlong, blundering flight Darby rushed madly on. The bushes fringing the brink of the precipice were parted by the maddening rush of thirty-five pounds of animated pork.

A faint squeal rent the air of the beautiful May morning there was a dull and sickening thud on the rocks below, and lifeless, but beautiful, Darby lay.

Before Mickey missed Darby his uncle drove up to the door and invited him to make a short visit to Greenage. After her son had gone and the breakfast dishes were cleared away, Mrs. Finn went to the sty to have a look at the pig. There the awful reality dawned upon her—the wrecked sty, the freed goat, and the missing pig. But when she found Darby in the quarry she made no moan. In fact, she smiled and bore the body home in her strong arms.

The next morning Darby was tried by the fire and was not found wanting, for his jacket assumed a rich brown colour and the savoury smell that rose from the oven was sufficiently appetising to make the tongue of a gourmet palpitate in his mouth. Then Darby was put on a big plate and placed in the oven. There were a number of guests at dinner that day, among whom were Mrs. Murphy, Mrs. Cronin, Mike Welsh's wife, Patsey Corrigan's lass Nancy, and the one-legged accordion player.

Just as the guests sat down at the table Mickey returned, but his mother gave him a plate in the kitchen for certain prudential reasons.

Darby was indeed a beautiful sight, ornamented with sprigs of celery and with a fat lemon in his mouth. If he was lovely in life he certainly presented a very toothsome appearance in death. Mickey drummed upon the kitchen table with his knife-handle, because being the younger, he had to wait until all the rest were served. But at last a big piece of tenderloin was placed before him. To his shame be it said, he actually neglected the potatoes on his plate and asked for a second piece of Darby before he touched the potatoes.

It is with deep regret that the occurrence is recorded but Mickey's plate was filled a third time, and in this instance it was a choice cut from the plump ham of his little protégé. After he had been filled to repletion, after the buttons of his vest had been relieved of dangerous pressure, he leaned back in his chair with grease on his face and a peace-with-all-the-world look in his eyes. Then his mother turned to him and said:

"Mickey, did ye like th' dinner?"

"Yis, mother."

"Won't ye hav' another little bit aff th' neck—jist a thrifle dear?"

"No, mother dear. I couldn't ate it; I'm full."

"Well, darlint, ye won't be freckened if I tell ye somethin'?"

"No, mother, I will not."

"Well, that piece o' rib, an' that bit aff th' ham, ye're afther 'atin' kem off your Darby!"

If a bombshell had fallen at Mickey's feet he would not have been more startled. He leaned forward and big tears ran down his cheeks and mingled with the gravy in his plate. Then he laid his head down upon the table, and wept as if his heart would break.

A. Mondey.

IT SPEAKS FOR ITSELF.

You have only to look through the pages of PEARSON'S MAGAZINE to discover that it is the best and brightest magazine in the world.

The March Number is now on sale, price 6d.

Among the principal contents will be found:

PHOTOGRAPHING IN THE DARK.
A novel paper, illustrated with photographs actually taken in utter darkness.

WEARERS OF THE STRAWBERRY LEAVES.
Some interesting personal notes about our British Duchesses, illustrated with portraits.

THE NEW ART OF SELF-DEFENCE.
Describes how you may render yourself impregnable to any form of attack—illustrated with photographs showing how to overcome an assailant in every emergency.

BORES.
Describes and illustrates the most remarkable of tidal phenomena.

THE DOGS OF WAR.
All about the trained dogs of the Prussian Army.

UNDER WATER IN A DIVING TORPEDO-BOAT.
A thrilling account of a voyage in the American submarine-torpedo boat, "Holland," illustrated with photos.

With seven complete stories, and innumerable illustrations, printed on the finest paper, and inclosed in a beautiful cover—PEARSON'S MAGAZINE stands alone in interest and value.

A Pleasant and Instructive Competition for the Little Ones.

A CHARMING book has been issued by Messrs. C. Arthur Pearson Limited, Henrietta Street, London, W.C., containing a number of outline sketches of flowers, specially drawn so that they can be painted. A coloured plate of each flower accompanies the sketch, so that the child can pick out the necessary tints. The price of the book is 3d., provided that this notice be cut out and forwarded with the three stamps to the Book Department, at the above address.

The Editress of Home Notes is offering fifty handsome prizes to the children who best paint the pictures in the book, and in order to give all children an equal chance, the competition will be divided into two sections—children over 12 and under 16, and children under 12.

TO WIN ONE OF THESE you have only to send three stamps to the Book Department, 17 and 18 Henrietta Street, W.C., asking for No. 1 of "Attractive Work." When you get it, paint the pictures and send it to the Picture Book Editor, Home Notes, Henrietta Street, W.C., not later than the first post on April 3rd. If a stamped envelope be sent for return, after judging the books will be sent back. If this is not desired they will be forwarded to the Ormond Street Children's Hospital.

CHARITY BEGINS AT HOME.

WITHOUT doubt there are many readers of P. W. who heartily sympathise with the FRESH AIR FUND, but are unable to subscribe to it. It is now possible for them to do so, for everybody must use soap. To help the Fund, Messrs. Jeyes' Sanitary Compounds Company Limited, have promised to hand over a farthing on every 2½d. bar of their "Fresh Air" soap sold in the United Kingdom during the current year. It can be had from the vendors of such commodities all over the country.

Digitized by Google

The Fate of the "Rosie."

"YES, I think the time has now come to speak plainly."

Two men sat facing each other across a table in the private room of the chief of the shipping-house of Brandon and Co. One was a man of nearly sixty years of age; the other was about thirty-two. It was the latter, James Burk, the chief clerk of the firm, who had uttered the above words, and the man to whom they were addressed was Richard Brandon.

The old man fidgeted nervously and raised his eyes in one swift glance at Burk's face. The look which he saw on that face was not reassuring, for he dropped his eyes, and his agitation increased."

"What do you mean?" asked Brandon, hesitatingly, with the air of one who already knows the answer to the question he has just put.

"Let me see," said Burk, musingly. Outwardly he was calm, almost indifferent, but to those who understood him it was a sign of mischief or some deeply-laid plan. "It was on January, the twenty-first, 1871, as near as possible eighteen months ago, that the Rosie went on her last voyage."

He was interrupted by a suppressed groan from Brandon, which brought the faintest shadow of a smile to his face.

"The Brandon vessels had, and still have the reputation for sea-worthiness, which is rare at the present time, when everybody is full of horror at the revelations concerning the going to sea of rotten vessels which have been called 'Coffin Ships.' The Rosie was not a seaworthy ship; her previous voyage had proved that she had reached the end of her career, but you sent her, heavily laden and heavily insured, to her doom, and the doom of the sailors on board was almost equally certain."

"Don't!" groaned Brandon.

"The ship was lost with all hands, and your purpose was effected. The firm was in the greatest straits owing to certain little transactions on the part of its principal, and the insurance money—which was largely in excess of the value of the ship—was quite a little windfall for you and enabled you to tide over the crisis. From that time things have gone far better and the firm is now prospering. I am the only man who knows what you did to save yourself."

He had leant forward to speak the last words, and as he saw Brandon's face grow still paler, the wicked smile again flitted over his lips and he sank back in the chair with an expression of triumph in his eyes.

For a moment the old man remained silent, then he rose from his chair with flushed face and sparkling eyes and burst forth fiercely:

"Burk, you are a villain! It was you who prompted me to do it when I was weak and ill, and overwhelmed with anxiety at the crisis which I had brought about by unwise speculations undertaken with the object of increasing the amount that I should leave to my daughter.

"In a weak moment, when I scarcely knew what I was doing, you whispered the tempting words to me—you took advantage of my weakness and made me do it—I did what others were doing, and are still doing. I saw no evil in it at that moment, but I swear to Heaven that I believed the crew would be saved. The ship had not gone one day when I awoke to the awfulness of my crime. Oh, Heaven! How bitterly I have repented it; how it has haunted me during all these months."

Exhausted by his outburst, Richard Brandon sank into his seat and covered his face with his hands.

"It is lucky that the door is padded to prevent confidential conversations being overhead," remarked Burk coolly. "Otherwise the clerks outside would have heard your little confession. I would advise you not to talk so loudly. In your righteous indignation,"—with a sneer—"you forgot to mention that you made use of the insurance money without scruple; you did not tell the insurance company that it was not just to accept it, and as to blaming me, that story will not hold water with the outside world when they learn all the facts; moreover, you are old enough to be responsible for your own actions."

"I won't say another word about it," returned Brandon, with just a show of firmness. "I had my scruples; but to have rejected the money would have meant ruin and disgrace. One crime necessitates another. What more do you wish to say?"

"As the manager of this concerned, I am entitled to more of the benefits than I now obtain. I am a bachelor and your daughter is twenty-one. I mean to marry her. That is brief and to the point, I think. In that way I shall inherit your fortune and business, and so reap the reward of my labours."

"Rosie will never consent to marry you!"

"I know that I am not the object of her affection," returned Burk, "but that is not a matter of importance. She is in love with Captain Manning, who does not find favour in your eyes. I mean to marry your daughter, and you must assist me, otherwise—— Well, the story of the Rosie, named after your dead wife and your daughter, would cause some sensation just now, would it not?"

Brandon groaned in anguish, but he felt that he was in the power of this man; it was either disgrace and ruin or the sacrifice of his daughter.

Digitized by Google

"Leave me now," said Brandon brokenly, "and I will give you your answer to-morrow." Burk arose, pushed back his chair and left the private room without a sign of the triumph with which his heart was filled.

Two hours later Richard Brandon was pacing up and down his small study, awaiting the entrance of his daughter. "I will tell her all and leave it to her to decide. Oh, my child!" These were the words he continually repeated as he walked about the room.

"Oh, here you are, dad! I have just come in and I understand that you wish to see me in a great hurry. It must be something very important."

The words were spoken in a merry tone and the remark was rounded off with a happy laugh, as Rosie Brandon ran to her father, put her hands on his shoulders and kissed him heartily.

"But what is the matter?" she continued, her voice changing to a tone of anxiety and her pretty face clouding. "You don't look well. Oh, dear, I hope that dreadful business is not going to make you ill again as it did nearly two years ago!"

"Sit down, my dear," said her father gently, leading her to a chair. "I have something very serious to tell you. Heaven knows if I can tell you!"

Wondering, and with a vague sense of fear, all her brightness gone, Rosie sat down, while her father stood before her trembling in every limb. It was a situation almost unendurable; he had to confess to his daughter, who looked upon him as the very model of honour, a crime similar to that for which other shipowners were being held up to public execration. For crime it was, although others might call it "business."

Slowly, with bent head and downcast eyes that never once sought his daughter's face, the old man related what had taken place in his private office that afternoon.

When he had finished, he waited for her to speak, but no sound came from her lips.

There was dead silence for a few seconds, then Brandon cast a swift glance at his daughter's face, as he had done previously at Burk's and the great change which had taken place in the countenance of his beloved daughter, nearly broke the old man's heart.

"Oh, Rosie, help me in this great trouble; I cannot hand you over to this man, yet I cannot bear to think of the disgrace that will fall upon you. For me, I am old and it will be easy to escape justice and the sneers of men!"

The dreadful underlying meaning of those last words aroused Rosie to the reality of the position. By a great effort she obtained control over her emotion and spoke quietly although with a slight quiver in her voice.

"The vessel went down in a storm, so I have heard; but I have not taken much interest in business and you tell me very little, because you say that I am not to be worried by office troubles."

"It foundered and all hands were lost."

"But did it founder?" persisted Rosie. "Vessels sometimes remain afloat for years, we often read of derelicts."

"The vessel had not behaved well on her previous voyage and I have no doubt that she went down. I know that derelict vessels float for months and even years over all the seas, but if by chance the Rosie had floated in a waterlogged condition, as others have done, it would not alter the fact that I sent her to sea when she was not seaworthy. It is a part of my punishment that my crime should be brought home to me by continually reading reports of the sighting of derelict ships, and the thought that one is the Rosie. I almost dread to read the newspapers lest I shall see such a paragraph. It seems to burn its way into my very soul; the letters float before my eyes like a grinning spectre, I can hardly bear it."

He staggered to a seat. His daughter came and knelt before him.

"Let us try to face the trouble fairly, and see which is the best way out," she said very tenderly. She felt that it devolved upon her to be brave, and to stimulate this utterly crushed and dejected man to action.

"Father, have you tried to follow any abandoned ship?" she asked.

"Yes, my child," replied her father, wearily. "But such ships are like phantoms; you meet them unexpectedly, but when you wish to meet them, you may hunt the oceans for years and not see them. One was caught, but it was not my ship, and I have told you"—more wearily—"that it would make no difference in my guilt."

"Then I must marry Burk, or disgrace and ruin will fall upon us?" she asked.

The old man bowed his head in assent.

"Then I will marry Burk," she continued firmly. "Have no fear, father; it is the duty of a child to sacrifice herself, if needs be"—she could not quite control her voice at this point—"in return for all the love and care bestowed upon her. Filial duty is as great as parential duty, and I will not be found wanting."

"It must not be, I cannot bear it," cried the shipowner, with a return of energy. "It is too dreadful. I would rather that disgrace fell upon me and—not upon you. Oh, unhappy wretch that I am!"

"Leave it to me, father," said Rosie gently, taking his hands in hers as she arose and kissed him. "Let Burk come here and receive his answer from me."

That evening a cablegram went to New York addressed to Captain Arthur Manning of the Merrie England. It was handed to him just before the vessel started on her homeward voyage and made him open his eyes in surprise.

On the following afternoon, when Mr. James Burk, as well-groomed as ever, called at the Brandon residence, he found Miss Brandon awaiting him. She was self-possessed, and made no pretence at ignorance of the object of his visit, but went straight to the point with a brevity which rather amazed even that collected individual.

"You wish me to marry you," she said coldly, "and you are using your knowledge to force me to this union. You are aware that I have no affection for you?"

"My affection and admiration for you," he replied suavely, "will in time cause you to return my love. I am convinced of that."

"This marriage will be hateful to me," she went on. "Is there no alternative?"

"None."

"Then I must consent," said Rosie, scornfully. "I do it to save my father, and I do it on condition that the marriage must not be announced for three months. You must agree to that, although you wish it to be made known at once."

"I do; but I agree."

"And I warn you," continued Miss Brandon, "that during those three months I shall use every endeavour to thwart your present plan. If I do not succeed in that time, I must resign myself to be your wife. I think there is nothing more to say now."

"Nothing," he said, taking his dismissal in his usual

Digitized by Google

cool manner, "except that I admire you all the more for your spirit. I will leave you now."

"That's a fact," he murmured as he walked briskly towards the railway-station. "I admire that girl; she's got plenty of go. We shall make a splendid pair. James, you're getting on!"

He continued to be of that opinion for the next few days; he was more affable to his subordinates than was his wont, which somewhat mystified them. Then there came a change which disturbed the smoothness of the water upon which he seemed to be sailing.

Brandon and Burk were seated in the private room, the former signing cheques for current accounts—for although Burk was now really managing the business he had not obtained authority for that purpose. They were interrupted by a clerk, who handed a telegram to Mr. Brandon. It was marked "private" on the outside and was from his daughter; it ran thus:

Telegram from Manning. Rosie picked up close to Azores. No doubt.

"Anything fresh?" queried Burk, as the shipowner folded the telegram and placed it in his pocket. Burk had an uneasy suspicion that the telegram concerned him.

"Merely a few words from my daughter," replied Brandon, evasively.

But Burk was not many hours before he guessed at the contents of the telegram. It could not be kept a secret from the shipping world that the Merry England had towed into "Queenstown" harbour an abandoned vessel supposed to be the long-lost Rosie. This was a check to his plan, but he did not give up hope of winning.

The fact that the vessel had floated and braved all weathers for so long a period in a water-logged state did not upset the idea of unseaworthiness; he still had a hold upon Brandon who although he believed that the ship was not in a fit condition to be sent on a voyage, had nevertheless allowed it to go.

After a few maledictions under his breath Burk recovered his equanimity for awhile, although at times a certain fear oppressed him. His equanimity was destined to be totally upset by what followed when Captain Manning arrived in London.

He received a note from Miss Brandon asking him to call with reference to their undertaking. He was not quite easy in his mind concerning the object of this visit, but he was never a man to draw back.

He went, leaving Brandon in the office. Whether the ship-owner knew or not that he was going to call upon his daughter, Burk could not quite determine.

He was ushered into the study where he found Captain Manning, whom he of course knew quite well, as he was in the employ of the firm, and Rosie Brandon, who looked prettier than ever. He was not left in doubt for more than a few seconds as to the reason why he had been summoned there.

"Mr. Burk," said Rosie, when he was seated, "some re-arrangement of our agreement will be necessary after you have heard what Captain Manning has to say concerning the derelict."

"I am all attention," returned Burk with a polite bow.

"It is soon told," said Manning, a man of about the same age as Burk himself and who had attained his present position purely owing to his ability. "I did not include it in my official report on the finding of the Rosie, because I thought it better to mention it to you privately.

"The Rosie did not founder, but her crew feared that she would not weather the storm and so took to the boats. Unluckily, as often happens, all the boats appear to have been capsized."

"That is not fresh intelligence; we all know it now," said Burk.

"If she did not founder," continued Manning, "it was not the fault of one member of the crew. It is recorded in the captain's handwriting that a seaman was discovered in the act of scuttling the ship, and on being caught he confessed that he had been paid to do it by——Warm, isn't it?" queried Manning sarcastically, as he noticed Burk's flushed countenance.

"It's a lie!" cried Burk, loosing his self-possession.

"The man signed a confession, which the captain wisely drew up while the man was still under the influence of fear as to the result of his misdeed. To that confession was attached a few words in hand writing familiar to some of us.

"I found these documents in the captain's chest on board the Rosie. Unfortunately, the man had so far done his evil work that the ship was looked upon as doomed and she was abandoned. This seems to have been an error of judgment on the part of the captain."

"The evidence is against you, Mr. Burk," said Miss Brandon, interrupting. "The exact nature of your scheme I am unable to fathom, but I have discovered enough to know that you were trying to obtain a hold on my father. The Rosie never was unseaworthy; it was you who told my father that she had behaved badly on her previous voyage, and you wished to complete your plan by causing the ship to sink and so confirm your statement."

"I think there was no other reason for scuttling the vessel," said Manning before Burk could speak. "The note I have mentioned contained a reference to a sum of money and specie to that amount was on board the ship."

"There is sin on both sides," said Rosie with a chastened air, "but yours is the greater. My father's was committed in illhealth and overwhelming anxiety; yours in strength and it was premeditated. It will be better to bury the past and go on our separate ways.

"I told you I would thwart you if I could. I had read that the abandoned ship had been seen in the Atlantic and in my desperation I cabled to Captain Manning with my father's consent, to keep a look-out and to spend a day in searching for her, which he could do as he had no passengers. It seemed a hopeless task, but providence intervened and rendered possible that which seemed impossible. Our agreement is at an end."

She walked slowly to the door and opened it.

All the bearings of the position passed rapidly through Burk's mind, but he felt that he would not further his own ends by revealing all, even if he escaped punishment himself, and his genuine admiration for the girl decided him to accept the situation.

Ignoring Manning, he bowed polite to Rosie and passed out.

They never saw him again.

Soon after Manning was managing the business of Brandon and Co., for Brandon never really recovered from the effects of that terrible strain which had been too great for his weak constitution, and he died shortly after Rosie's wedding.

G. Knight.

Digitized by Google

A Chilian Incident.

WE were lying in the stream with the top-sails hanging in the buntlines. Everything was stowed ready for getting under way. The night was very dark, and the sky was obscured by lumpy clouds. It was dead calm, and the water was smooth and streaky.

Gantline and I sat on the forecastle rail, watching the lights of the city and small craft anchored closer in shore.

It was quite late, and our last boat had come aboard some time since, bringing our skipper, Jack Green, his pretty daughter and two passengers. At daylight we would clear with the ebb tide and land breeze with the early morning, and then, with good luck, we would make an offing and stand away for home. We were sick of the war-ridden country, and even the town of Valparaiso itself offered no attractions for us.

While we sat on the rail we heard a slight rippling in the water ahead of the vessel. It sounded as if a large fish was making its way slowly across the bows. We listened in silence for some moments while the sounds came nearer. I looked aft and saw two figures in the light from the after companionway, and I recognised Miss Green, and the smaller of the two passengers standing close to the hatch.

The sounds in the water interested me no longer, and I gazed rather hard at the figures aft. The two passengers, who were missionaries on their way home, had been aboard ship several times during the last week, but they had always been so reserved in manner that I never once thought to see one of them talking to a young woman.

Suddenly, I heard a sound of someone breathing, followed by a smothered oath, coming from the direction of the rippling water which drew more and more beneath us.

"Ha! Vola! Hace bein tiempo, manana—lingo gets crossways of me gullet," came a deep voice from the black water.

"Och! stop ye blathering ijiot, an' kape ye sinses. If them's dagoes on watch 'twill be all up with us. Whist, then! Ye men on the fo'c'stle?"

"What's the matter?" asked Gantline and I in the same breath.

"Faith, an' if ye have a drop o' th' milk of human pity in yer hearts, ye'll give two poor fellers a lift out o' this haythen country. Say not a whurd, but let us come on deck, quiet like. If ye don't the blood av two innocent men will be upon yer sowls. Spake aisy."

"Now what kind of man is this?" asked Gantline, as a naked man climbed slowly up the martingale stays and crouched close to the starboard bow, out of sight of the man-of-war lying near us.

"By th' luck o' Lyndon! Is this old Tom Gantline who talks? Why, man, we've just escaped from th' prison on th' beach. Don't ye remember me? I'm Mike McManus, only cousin to Reddy O'Toole who used to be mate with ye."

"No, I don't remember you," answered Gantline, "but if you had said you were anyone else you would have gone overboard again fast enough. No one but a chip of O'Toole would have come out here in this tide-way, right under the guns of that man-o'-war. Who's with you?" and he peered over at the man who still clung to the bob stays as if uncertain whether to trust himself on board or again swim for it.

"That's a man called Collins. He got taken along with me, when we was smugglin' in the rifles, up to the north'ard. Whist! below there, come up and make yerself known amongst friends. We're safe."

"I ain't so certain about that," growled Gantline,

Digitized by Google

"what am I to do with you but put you ashore? I can't run the risk of having the vessel overhauled for such fellows as you."

"Ah, shipmate, ye haven't the heart to turn us over, when all we've done was to try and land a few rifles fer thim poor fellows. Oh, me boy, ye haven't seen the inside of wan of thim black iron holes on th' beach, to talk of puttin' us ashore again. Six whole months behind them steel walls an' niver see th' sun rise or set! Now, ye may be in sympathy with Chilly, bat ye have the look av a sailor man for all that."

As he spoke he climbed to the cat heads and drew himself gently to the top of the t'gallant forecastle. He was followed by the man, Collins.

They crouched shivering behind the capstan and I saw they were in a bad condition. They were wasted and gaunt, and their flesh had a soft, sickly look, as if they had spent a long time in close confinement.

Gantline stood irresolute a moment, looking at their shivering forms. Then he glanced sharply at the man on watch, who walked in the port gangway. It was too dark to see him distinctly, so trusting that he in turn had seen nothing of what had occurred forward, he started aft.

The two figures I had noticed a few minutes before had now disappeared.

"Keep quiet," I said to the naked men whose teeth chattered in the cool night air. "Lie flat on deck until he comes back and perhaps we can do something."

The man, Mike, was about to make some reply, but at that moment the fellow on watch came close to the edge of the forecastle.

I stepped quickly in front of the man, and in doing so trod on a projecting foot which cracked horribly, and, twisting, brought me down in a heap upon them. A deep groan told of the damage done, but I instantly regained myself and began to hum a song in a low bass voice.

The man on the main deck stopped a moment and looked hard at me, but it was so dark he could see but little, and my singing reassured him, so he turned again and went off.

In a short time Gantline returned with a bundle.

"Now, bear a hand there, you men, and put these clothes on in a quarter less no time," he whispered. "Come, hurry up."

And he passed a shirt and a pair of dungeon trousers to each.

"Och! he has broken me toe off," groaned Mike, slipping on the garments.

His companion dressed rapidly in silence.

"Now then, up you go, both of you, into the fore-top and lie out of sight 'till we get to sea, and if I see a hair of your heads inside the next twenty-four hours I'll turn you both over on the beach. Here, take a nip apiece before you go," and he passed a small bottle to the men.

Gantline's seamed and livid face wore an anxious look as he took his place beside me and acted as if nothing had happened to seriously interrupt our former conversation. We sat a few moments discussing our stowaways and then went aft to get a little sleep before clearing.

I turned in and lay awake thinking of the men in the fore-top, hoping nothing would occur to make it necessary for more than one man to go aloft there. The sails were all loosed, except the fore-royal, and this I would go aloft for myself.

It was past midnight before I lost consciousness, and it seemed almost instantly afterwards Gantline poked his head in my doorway and announced eight bells. I turned out and found it was still dark, but a faint light in the east told of the approaching day.

By the time the men finished their coffee, Captain Green came on deck, and then he gave the order to "Heave short." In a few minutes all was noise and bustle on the forecastle head.

Then we broke clear and swung off to starboard with the fore and main yards aback. Then we came round and stood out with the ebb tide, the light breeze sending us along with good steering way.

We had gone clear without mishap, but although we were making six knots an hour off the land, we knew the breeze would not hold after the sun rose. As we expected, it fell shortly after, and we lay becalmed a few miles off shore on a sea of oily smoothness.

The passengers came on deck to take a last look at the harbour and their voices sounded pleasant to the ear as they held forth on the beauties of a morning in the South Pacific.

These passengers had engaged berths more than a week before we sailed, and since then were almost inseparable. Their clothes were of some dark material, much alike in cut, but their faces and head-gear were in marked contrast.

"I was speaking to those poor fellows in the prison there, only yesterday," the younger one was saying as I came aft, "and I did my best to cheer them, but they were both much set against spiritual consolation, and the one McManus stole my pocket-knife with its saw blade which I used to carry to cut cocoanuts."

"How do you know it was he who took it; might you not have lost it?" asked the big man with a smile.

"Do you suppose I would bear false witness against any man?" replied the younger in a tone of reproach. "I noticed he came close to me while I was praying for him, and felt his hand touch me, but did not know my loss until after I left the prison. It will do him little good, however, as he and his companion in crime are to be shot this morning."

"Ah!" said the big man in a deep voice.

We drifted slowly all the morning, and about noon the sea-breeze set in from the southward and sent us along at a comfortable rate. Nothing occurred to make it necessary for a man to go aloft in the fore-top, and those who had gone up the main and mizzen in the early morning had noticed nothing unusual. The platform in the top was as large as that in a full-rigged ship, so the men who were hiding were not visible from the deck as long as they lay flat on their backs.

Gantline had decided to tell the skipper the whole affair of the night before, but the old man was in such a bad humour that the mate delayed telling him until the prospect of a serious burst of anger was less apparent.

The day wore on and the vessel held steadily on her way, making from eight to ten knots an hour.

After supper the skipper came on deck with his passengers and they were soon joined by Miss Green. They sat aft and chatted, the men smoking and very much at their ease.

There was something in the younger passenger that attracted Miss Green to him. There was a mysterious power about the man that was apparent to anyone after being an hour in his company. Something in his deep, vibrating voice, when he was talking, appeared to hold the attention, and I, more than once, looked at him as he sat next to the skipper's daughter, holding forth on matters of the church.

Digitized by Google

Captain Green was still in a bad humour, because of his low freight money, and it was evident that he would ease his pent-up feelings on someone.

He had listened to the talk of the missionaries with ill-concealed contempt, whenever they fell to discussing their ecclesiastical affairs, and now he asked the younger abruptly, when he was to return.

"Ah!" replied he, "I shall return as soon as possible, for my flock will get along poorly without me. I have converted many chiefs, who wrangle among themselves, as has also my friend here."

The skipper turned with a look of disdain at the big-bearded man, who appeared to understand the implied interrogation, and hastened to answer. "It is true, I have converted many," he said in a low voice, "but I shall not return to the Islands of the Pacific, for I think there is a better field nearer home. Not that I believe my labours wasted, for the converted natives never stole anything but ammunition and utensils, while the others stole everything from me they could lay hand to. Not that the effort was entirely in vain, I say, but that better work can be done among our own people, such as sailors, for instance."

"Eh! What's that?" growled Green as he listened to the last part of this sentence; "What do you mean by sailors?" and his eyes flashed ominously.

"Why, go among them, and see that they get the proper books in the libraries sent out on vessels for them to read, for instance."

"Now you are talking some sense. Instead of whining around among a lot of good-for-nothing niggers, like your friend here, you'll really do something if you follow that up. Yes, sir, if you'll only put something in these libraries besides 'Two Years before the Mast,' and the like, and get some police reports nicely bound, along with some yarns like 'Davy Crockett,' you'll be a blessing to sailors, and skippers, too, for that matter. No, sir, don't play with those islanders any further. They were all right before they ever saw the likes of you, and they've been all wrong ever since. You talk like a man of sense, after all, and I hope what I've said won't be lost on you." And as he finished his peroration, he stood up and looked astern.

"Hallo!"

Before the astonished missionaries could say a word the skipper started for his glasses and seizing them, he looked steadily at a faint trail of smoke which rose above the horizon directly in the vessel's wake.

"That's strange," he muttered. "There's no steamer bound out to-day, and yet that fellow seems to be standing right after us."

"Mr. Gantline!" he called, as he turned where the mate stood. "Go aloft with the glass and see if you can make out that fellow astern of us."

"Aye, aye, sir!" answered Gantline, and he took the skipper's glass and made his way leisurely up the main ratlines.

From the lower top he could see nothing but a black funnel, and masts without yards, so he went higher. On reaching the cross-trees he looked forward, and there, lying prone on their stomachs, were the two hiding men.

Their eyes were straining at the vessel astern, and even if Gantline had not already made out who she was one look of those faces would have told him. He came on deck and returned the skipper's glasses without a word, and then started forward, but Green stopped him.

"Could you make her out?" he asked.

"Well, there isn't much of her rising yet, but I suppose she's the Blanco Encalada," he answered.

"Seems to me it is hardly time for her to put to sea," growled the skipper, "and she's making almost the same course as we are." And the old man turned back to his passengers.

Before two bells in the first watch that evening, it was blowing half a gale to the southward out of a clear sky, and the old ship flew along on her course.

There was no sea running, so she heaved over and drove along at a rate that bade fair to keep the Blanco below the horizon for several hours. As it grew late the air became quite chilly, and the skipper went below with his passengers.

The moon rose and shone with great brilliancy, so that our towering main-skysail must have been visible a long distance. All night we drove along with nothing visible astern, and at daybreak the hull of the steamer was still below the horizon.

At seven bells Green came on deck.

"Now what's he after?" he growled, as he gazed astern. "It is the Blanco, after all, Gantline; but what makes him hold on like this? We are going to the westward of Juan Fernandez, and that is more than a hundred miles out of his course."

The mate made no answer but went on with his work.

"It's just like those dagoes to go running all over the southern ocean for no other purpose than to wear out their gear and burn coal," continued the skipper. "If this wind keeps slacking up, he ought to be abreast of us before noon, though I never knew this old trooper to go at the rate she's been doing all night. Breakfast did you say? Mr. Gantline, you may let her head a point more to the north'ard."

Saying this, the skipper took a last look at the approaching warship and then disappeared down the companion-way.

Although the vessel still raced along at a rate that sent the foam flying from her sharp clipper bows, she was no longer doing her utmost, and the Blanco rose rapidly in her wake with the black smoke pouring from her funnel.

Suddenly, while Gantline was watching her, she appeared to be enveloped in a white cloud of steam. Then there was a sharp, shrieking rush as something tore its way through the air close to the mainyard, and struck the smooth sea almost half a mile ahead, folllowed by the sullen boom of a heavy gun.

The rush of the shot brought Captain Green on deck, closely followed by his passengers.

"What's the matter," he bawled, as he rushed to the taffrail, while the younger passenger, who had followed close at his heels, smiled grimly.

The Blanco came driving along heavily a couple of miles astern. She was rapidly drawing up.

"Wants us to heave to, I suppose," growled Gantline, and he eyed the skipper suspiciously.

"Man alive?" roared Green. "Why don't you do it, then, before he cuts the spars out of us? Fore and main royals, there, quick! Let go by the run. Main clew garnetts.—All hands!" And the skipper bounded on to the poop, and cast off everything he could lay his hands on.

The ship was soon luffed and her main yards backed. Then the Blanco came abreast and all hands had a chance to look into the muzzles of her ten-inch guns which were trained toward us. A swarm of men crowded the deck of the ironclad, while a boat shot out from her side, and approached us rapidly, with a short, thick-set man in uniform sitting in the stern sheets.

Digitized by Google

Green stood at the break of the poop, scowling at him as he swung himself lightly into the mizzen channels, and leaped on the quarter deck, followed by six men. Hardly had he done so, when the younger of our two passengers drew a heavy revolver from somewhere behind his back, and fired point blank at this officer.

The Chilian was in the act of drawing his sword, and the hilt was across his breast at that instant. The bullet intended for him struck the hilt and flattened on the brass. The next instant there was a rapid fusilade, the six Chilians firing together, and the passenger with a six-shooting revolver in each hand, backing away behind a cloud of smoke.

It was all over in half a minute. Three of the bluejackets were dead and their officer badly hurt when the firing ceased. The passenger tossed his empty pistols over the side and staggered aft and not one of the survivors dared to follow him. He gained the after companion-way, and as he did so the figure of the Captain's daughter appeared on deck.

I could see her face pale as she caught the look in the passenger's eyes, but she said no word. He went to her and kissed her lightly and passed on to the starboard taffrail. The Chilians now recovered themselves and rushed for him. He climbed over with difficulty, but did not hesitate. Then he plunged headlong into the sea before anyone could seize him, and as we rushed to the side we could see his body sink slowly down into the green depths until it finally vanished.

The skipper, Gantline, and the big missionary stood looking on in amazement, and then the wounded officer turned toward th' m.

"That was Senor Jose Zacaticar—of course you did not know," and he nodded to the skipper. Then the dead were placed in a boat while a tourniquet was passed round the officer's leg to stop the flow of blood until he could reach his ship. In a few moments he and his men were on their way back to the Blanco.

Green stood staring after them without a word. The name of the dead desperado was too well known to him to protest against the manner he was treated while on an English ship, but he desired some explanation.

The Blanco dipped her colours and he came to his senses. "Hard up the wheel, there," he bawled. "Stand by the lee-brace," and the vessel paid off again on her course.

The ironclad headed away to the northward and in a few minutes was a couple of miles away.

"I met him only a week ago," explained the big missionary, in answer to the skipper's look, "and I thought, of course, he was what he claimed to be."

Green gave a grunt and went aft.

"Mr. Gantline," said he, as he met the mate, "are there any more missionaries aboard this ship, for if there are, we will put them ashore on Mas-a-fuera."

"There are two more," answered Gantline, looking the skipper in the eyes.

"Show them to me," said the skipper.

Gantline went forward and looked aloft.

"Come down from there!" he bawled, and two lean figures stood in the fore-top and then painfully descended the ratlines before the astonished gaze of the crew.

When they gained the deck they followed the mate aft to Green, who stared at them in amazement.

"We are off soundings and that fellow has no right to board me," he said, "but if you belong to that Jose gang, I'll signal for him to come back for you."

"Faith, an if we did, Captain Green, it isn't such a crowd av cutthroats as ye seem to belave," said McManus. "The fact is, we're just broke away from bein' shot for no more than the carryin' av a few Remingtons. I see ye remember me, so for th' sake av auld times ye better give us a passage home an' not make Crusoes av us on the Farnandez."

Green looked at Gantline.

"It's the truth," said the mate.

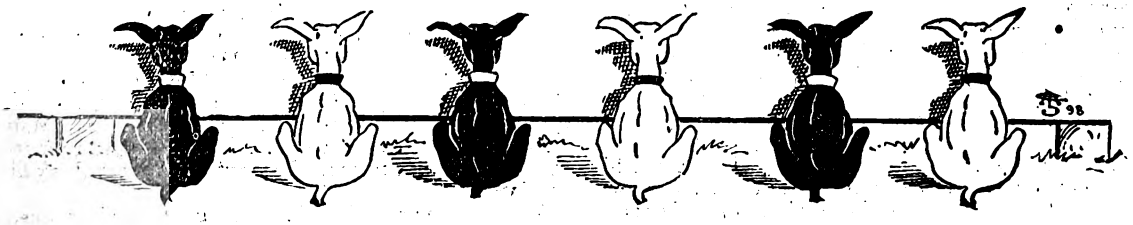
"Who says it's the truth? I'll——"

At that moment a slight figure appeared at the companion-way and the next instant Miss Green seized her father's arm. He turned roughly, but there was something in the poor girl's face that made him look at her. She led him below and the escaped men stood staring after her.

"You fellows can turn to with the men forward," said Gantline, and they went.

A little later Green came on deck again and stood looking silently over the bright Pacific. He stood there by the taffrail looking long at the eastern horizon. No one approached or spoke to him for all knew Green when his mind was full of unpleasant memories.

ARTHUR SELBORNE.



Digitized by Google

BOOK IV.—CONCERNING A SOJOURN - - - AMONGST THE DAJIANS.

CHAPTER I.

How Sneyd and O'Neill landed on Daji: how they were imprisoned in a prehistoric temple: how they tried to break gaol: how they met with an impediment: and how they had an unexpected lady visitor.

SAVE for the summit of its central peak, and the tops of some of the ridges which shoot out of it like the rays of a great stone star, Erma, as viewed from the sea, was one great collection of greens, varying to all shades It looked fertile, and it did not belie its looks. The place was a tropical garden.

It is impossible for soil that is capable of sustaining plant life to be barren in the tropics. But you could see, as you approached it, that a larger part of Daji was bare and barren. Steep sterile rocks rose in gaunt ridges from the vegetation in the lower ground, and stood out bleakly against the warm skies beyond. Nothing grew on them. They were utterly destitute of soil. Even the teeming orchids, which are independent of mould to grow in—even the orchids whose lovely uncouth forms swarmed everywhere else, left these stony wildernesses to their chilly barreness. Only the screaming seafowl tenanted the crags. They were not dependent upon soil. The seas around were their hunting ground. The bare wind-swept rock was the roosting-place and nesting-ground they preferred to all others. Besides, the crags were for the most part steep and precipitous; and man, the biped who ruled below, being wingless, could not annoy bird, the biped who reigned in the air above.

Thus the island of Dagi was divided, and I think that the feathered portion of the inhabitants had the easier life of it, for food was always to be had for the fishing, and sickness was unknown. But with the men and women it was different. Starvation was an item which had very often to be calculated in their economy of daily life. Their husbandry was crude perhaps, but the ground suitable for cultivation was small. There was a great deal of swamp on the lower part of the island, and mangrove bushes reticulated over this in hopeless luxuriance. The ubiquitous cocoanut palm was there of course, but not in large quantities, and the other fruit trees did not bear in any generous profusion. There was, in fact, just a little less than enough of everything; and life on Daji was consequently often very hard.

Neither Sneyd nor O'Neill saw the island as the fleet approached it. Still securely lashed to their respective poles, they were lying like logs in the bottom of a big canoe. The tepid bilge-water swished over them as the vessel at the laboured seas. The crew trod over them as though they had been sacks of ballast.

They were not starved. Twice since their capture food and water had been stuffed down their throats. But for all that, they were in a very miserable condition—stiff, cramped, sore.

The passage was not a pleasant one for anybody. Stores were few. An army in full retreat is not generally overloaded with luxuries. But every voyage has an end somewhere, either on a shore, or in mid-sea, and this was no exception to the rule. Save for one which broached-to and got swamped, all the canoes were safely beached on Daji, where they were unloaded of what they happened to have in them, and then run up high and dry.

All the population which had been left behind flocked down to the shore. In time of peace the postal arrangements between the islands consisted of one canoe-load of news per annum. During the war there had been no communication whatever. So a good many married women suddenly found themselves widows, and a number of old men learnt that they had no longer a stalwart son to support them in their failing years. It is the fortune of war that such things should happen; still these people were desperately angry none the less, and sought to vent their fury upon the only two representatives of the island of Erma within reach—to wit, Laurence Sneyd and Murtagh O'Neill. And indeed they would have proceeded to glut their passions by tearing these unfortunates to shreds, had not their captors interfered, and pushed the agressors on one side with scant ceremony. They had had all the trouble of bringing the two white men across, and they were not going to have them wasted merely to gratify petty spite. The two prisoners could not atone for all the Dajian youths who had been killed. Besides, the pair were destined for another fate. They would die surely enough, and that soon. But they were destined for the oven, and it was no use mauling them about first, and rendering them unfit to eat.

Actuated by these humane sentiments their captors carried the two Europeans up to the nearest village, placed them in a hut for the night, and posted a guard to see that no malicious person came near and damaged them; and having supplied them with food, they left them to their own devices.

Directly they found themselves alone, the restless pair as usual set about trying to get free. By dint of severe exertion, which in their then weak state told heavily, they contrived, by rolling over and over, to get alongside one another—heads and tails, and then each selected a part of the other's lashings, and began steadily gnawing it in one spot.

Digitized by Google

Well laid-up grass rope is tough stuff, and unsatisfactory feeding at the best of times, and just now they found it desperately dry and unpalatable; but as men will, who are in such a plight, they stuck grimly to their self-imposed task, and divided it fibre by fibre. Sneyd had got but half-way through his rope, when O'Neill's gave in two; but the gross result of each man's work was the same, for at that moment one of the guards showed his head in through the doorway, renewed the lashings, rolled the prisoners to opposite walls, and made each fast there by a heel rope that was quite unget-at-able.

"There," said the guard; "now do keep quiet, and give me no more trouble."

"We'll just have to do that same, ye spalpeen," growled O'Neill; "thanks to this last piece of delicate attention. Begob, av I could get loose an' die quietly fightin', it's little more I'd ask. But to lie tied up here, like a bullock waiting to be pithed, is a thrifle too much for me nerves. It makes me restless, an' inclined to feel dangerous an' murthersome."

"I'm not going to give up hope till I've got my throat cut," observed Sneyd. "I was pretty much down in the mouth just before that first shave. It was a near thing and no mistake. If the messenger had been ten seconds later, he'd have been too late for us. But when we got off then, my spirits went up with a bound. I felt sure we should escape somehow. I made certain, though, Sandy would contrive to help us."

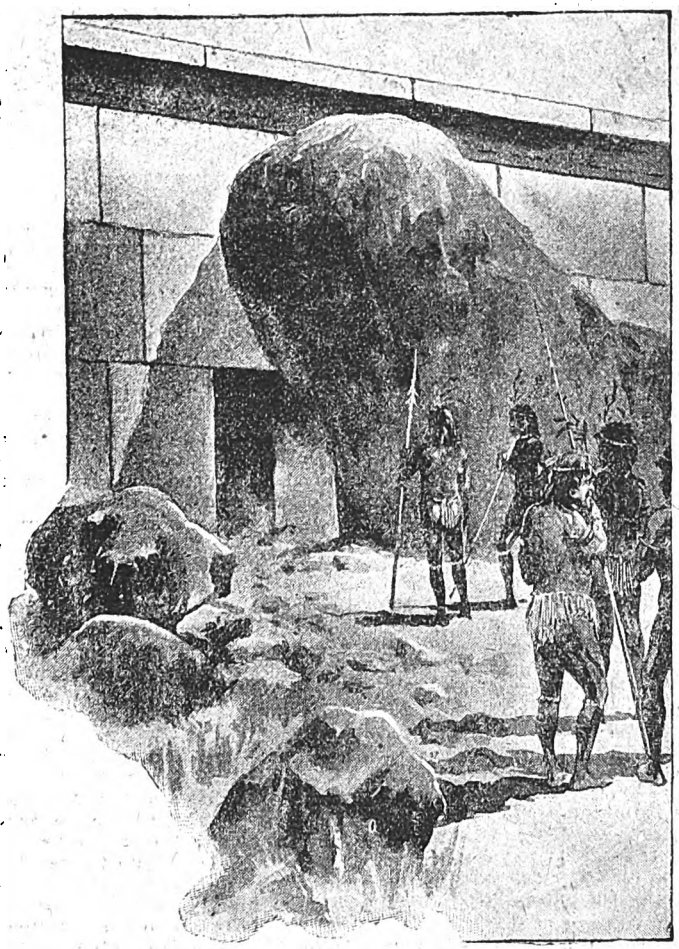
"And Sandy didn't. He's as dacent a bhoy as iver stepped, an' would have done anything that was widin his power to get us clear. But the fact remains that he didn't manage it, whether he thried or not; and the result is, we're here."

"He might contrive to come over and carry us off."

"He might," replied O'Neill drily. "But we can rest pretty sure that he won't. I don't think these Daji blay-guards got much of a licking. I believe they left Erma principally because they'd had a bellyful of fightin', an' wanted to get home widout further loss o' men in small give-an'-take skirmishes. But they've the sthronger force left still, an' it's a very small mouthful of the Ermans they'd make av they came over here, dhrum, fife, army, and baggage, wid Sandy Carmichael marching at their head. No, I don't think we can count much upon that."

"I wasn't altogether thinking of an invasion in force," said Sneyd. "But I was hoping that Sandy would scheme some idea for making a quick raid with a few men, and getting us away before more than a dozen people knew we'd gone. I've heard of such things being done in the continental wars at home."

"Ay, but who is it that makes those sort of dashes? A clever officer and a party of picked men. Sandy may be the one, if you like, but his following couldn't be the other, however they were chosen. You might pick amongst those naygurs in Erma as carefully as you liked, but none of them would be 'picked men.'"



The Europeans found themselves before a square building.

O'Neill's words were paradoxical, but the meaning of them was incontrovertable. There was no combination on Erma capable of making a successful foray in an enemy's camp. Assistance could not be expected from without. And as at present their bonds forbade them to help themselves, there was nothing for it but to await the course of events as stoically and philosophically as might be. And so, having arrived at this conclusion, and judging from the Irishman's snore that he had done the same, Sneyd shut his tired eyes, and fell into a deep dreamless sleep.

The sun was high above the mountain tops when they were awakened. If left to themselves, the intense weariness which their recent hardships had engendered would have doubtless kept them in Morpheus' arms still longer, despite the hardness of their cold earthen couch, and the merciless tightness of their bonds. But at that time a number of Dajians entered the hut, and rudely kicking them into wakefulness, proceeded to examine them much in the way that men in the farming interest at home here examine animals at a fair. The savages pinched their arms and legs, prodded them in the ribs, and were evidently much disgusted at their condition. Both were sinewy and lean; one might use the word emaciated, in fact; and Sneyd in particular, who was always a spare man, would now, so one of the connoisseurs affirmed, be as unsatisfactory feeding as the husk of a dropped cocoanut.

The committee of inspection shook their heads gloomily. These two white bearded prisoners they had taken so much trouble about, and expected to prove such delicacies on the table, turned out very unsatisfactory when subjected to a close inspection. They were simply not worth cooking as they were now. There was nothing for it but to keep them, and supply them with plenty of fattening food till they got into better condition. And so an order was given, and the two Europeans found themselves once more being borne like logs on men's shoulders.

Digitized by Google

Sneyd hurried to the brink, and looked down.

Though treated with more care now, the means of progression was far from being a pleasant one. The boughs of overhanging trees scratched their faces; the jolting of the bearers made the ligatures of grass rope cut more deeply into their arms and bodies. But the thought that another respite was before them, gilded these minor discomforts, and made them feel that the journey was not without its pleasant side.

The route lay up a valley, for the first part a long narrow pathways fairly tunnelled through masses of rank foliage. But as they climbed upwards, the vegetation thinned and grew scantier. It consisted mainly of stunted bushes and wind-distorted trees, with patches of scrubby grass interspersed with fallen boulders, and outcrops of mother rock. There was no vestige of track, and the place was evidently but very seldom visited.

After a while the cortége stopped, and the Europeans found themselves before a square building of time-worn plain stone blocks, and topped with a heavy cornice. In the middle of the side facing them was a great rock, bent, so to speak, to an angle, which had equal arms. One of these arms, or limbs, was lying on the ground when they came up; but a couple of the escort climbed up on to the summit of the other by means of steps evidently cut for that purpose and their weight made the stone slowly revolve till the other limb rose in the air and disclosed a doorway.

Through this the Europeans were carried. Their bonds were cut, a quantity of food was placed down near them, and the escort withdrew. The stone door was swung back into place, and they were alone.

But though unfettered, it was a long time before they regained the use of their limbs. Through being kept for so long in one fixed position, their muscles had got stiff, and their extremities were half dead from the tightness of the ligatures which had bound them up. But by degrees they got their cramped fingers to resume their natural functions and after a vigorous course of massage, they rubbed the circulation back into their other limbs, and were able once more to stand upright.

No one will doubt what they did first. Just then, they were men with but a single idea. Their whole minds were absorbed in the one question of escape. And so they set about examining their prison with a view to this end. It was a plain square, built of great blocks so accurately dressed that they fitted too closely one above the other for the blade of a penknife to be inserted between them. Needless to say, it was not the work of the present race of Dajians, or even of their racial forefathers. It was the outcome of that forgotten civilisation; the work of that old people which once inhabited the great continent which the Pacific has submerged, and a few of whose monuments are still to be seen on the peaks of Polynesia.

But for the history of their gaol, these two men cared not one rap. Only one thing led them to examine it. They wanted to find a way out.

They inspected the doorway first. Sixteen feet through the thickness of the wall, was the great block which slid across the portal. So accurately did it fit at the sides, that not a ray of light from the bright glare without shone through into the gloomy passage. So closely did it press on the threshold flag below, that no lever's point could have been pressed in to prize it up, even had they possessed a lever to try with.

"Evidently," as O'Neill remarked, "the porter was always stationed outside."

Next the walls of this strange old-timed temple—for temple it undoubtedly was—came in for their share of scrutiny.

"I've heard," said Sneyd, "of pivot blocks which will turn if they are pressed at the right point."

So they tried every stone in the lower course in turn, thrusting against both ends of each with all their combined weight, and not desisting till they had gone methodically the round.

"That cock won't fight," observed O'Neill as he sat down for a minute's rest, and wiped the streaming perspiration from face and forehead. "An' we ain't sthrong enough to heave the whole wall-side over bodily. What do yez say now to climbing up to the top?"

"It would be a very good idea, but not being flies, I don't exactly see how we are to carry it out. The stones are five feet thick at the very least, and they fit far too close together to let us drive pegs into the spaces between them, even if we had the pegs to drive. Remember they've taken our knives away."

"There's wood enough in this jungle of brush and scrub which fills the place to make pegs of av we wanted 'em, and at a pinch we could sharpen 'em wid our teeth. But the bhoys that built the place masoned it too nately to let any one play that sort of prank wid their work. I only suggested climbin' up to see if yez could knock out an idea."

"I'm afraid it's beyond me," said Sneyd, musingly. "But," he exclaimed, as if struck by a sudden happy thought, "but I don't see what is to prevent us from undermining them. Of course the foundations will be deep, but if we work hard enough, and are allowed sufficient time, we should be able to drive a passage under them into the open outside."

"Begob now, but that's a great notion."

"Of course," continued Sneyd, "we shall have to exercise caution. We mustn't go and delve a great chasm, and just chuck the stuff we take out all in one big heap at the side. When the fellows come to bring us food, they would see that in a moment, and lash us up again pretty sharp, or take some other measures to keep us safe. They are not altogether fools, you know. The thing will have to be done with caution. We must take out one big block of roots and soil all in a solid piece, and put that on one side. Then we must start digging beneath, pound the stuff we take out into small dust, and scatter it about beneath the bushes where it can't be noticed. Then when any one comes, we can clap the lid on our hole, and then none of them will be any the wiser about what has been going on."

"Here," exclaimed O'Neill, "are a brace o' sharp-edged flat stones—shovel an' pick combined—let's begin before the grass grows any longer under our feet."

Getting out the first surface slice in one unbroken wedge was a longer job than had been anticipated; for the ground was one mass of interlacing roots, and the tools were but ill adapted to cutting them through. However, by continual exertion and vigorous effort, the tangled mass gave way little by little; and at last, breaking adrift from its moorings altogether, was hoisted out and laid carefully on one side. It was quite intact, and as all sides sloped inwards from the top, it would always fit in its place without falling into the cavity beneath.

Then they started on the matter below. It was almost wholly made up of loam that had been formed by successive generations of plant, that had grown, died, rotted, and been replaced by others. The débris they scraped out was easily disposed of too; for it was easily disintegrated, and so could be readily sprinkled about, and got out of sight.

The excavation deepened apace, and the spirits of the miners rose accordingly.

"Av the blayguards don't get hungry, an' ate us before we're nicely fat, I don't see why with reasonable luck they should eat us at all."

"Not unless they turn up suddenly, and unexpectedly, and twig what's going on. And even if the lid did happen to be in place, we're as grimy as a pair of navvies—skin, rags, everything plastered with this black mould. If we'd only water enough to wash in, it would be all right, but as it is, I don't see how we are to get it off."

"Faith, then we'll let it stay where it is. An' av they ask any questions, we'll just say we were grubbing for roots—which is a fact—an' to prove it, we'll just tear up a big hole right in front of the enthrance there, so that they can see it for themselves."

So they made their decoy, and then went back and delved in the more important hole. This had gone down six feet now, sloping towards the wall; and for the last eighteen inches or so it had laid the stone bare. There was no signs of the foundation yet, and so they worked on without any feelings of disappointment. The labour was hard. To avoid bringing more débris to the surface than was absolutely necessary, they kept the diameter of the hole to the smallest possible minimum that was compatible with any moving about, and so their positions when down below were very cramped. But the loam yielded easily when they got past the region of living roots, and it could be scraped up by the digger as rapidly as the worker above could dispose of it by sprinkling under the bushes. A couple of rude baskets, woven from withes and leaves, aided this process, and whilst one was being emptied above, the other was replenished in the pit below.

He was evidently disappointed that they had not laid on more fat.

And so they went on till, when about eight feet below the surface O'Neill, who was digging, uttered a fierce exclamation. Sneyd hurried to the brink and looked down. The Irishman was scraping furiously away at the bottom of the pit, accompanying his strokes by a torrent of invective against all things in general, his own luck in particular.

"Eight blessed fut of cave dug, wid the sweat on our brows an' the bark off our knuckles; an' then to be brought up wid a round turn like this. Howly wars! it's enough to make a bhoy chuck up the whole business in disgust. An' what did the fools that built the place want to be so luxurious for? Betther men than them has lived an' died in a cabin wid a mud floor. Bad scran to them, what for did they want to go and lay down a tesselated pavement? Misdirected haythens; why couldn't they have stuck some beams across the wall-tops and shoved their flag-stones a-top o' them, by way of a roof? They've got their flure caulked as tight as the end of a whiskey-keg, sorra leak about it; oh, y'have come to look?"—This to Sneyd, who had asked what was the matter.—"Then see there. See that paving-stone. I've been grubbing around on all sides. The whole place is floored with 'em. Look at the way the edges of thim fit. Not room for a thumbnail between them. We've no chance of tearing them up. They are cemented together. Even if we had knives we couldn't shove a blade in the chinks. I guess this road's blocked for good."

"Not a bit of it," retorted Sneyd. "We can't prize those stones up, and we can't cut them through, because we've neither chisel nor pick; but if we stick to it long enough, we should be able to beat away at the corner of one of them with other stones, till we have splintered a piece off. Then, once a hole made, we can surely muster brute strength enough to wrench something away."

"For an idea suggested on the spur of the moment," said the Irishman, "that's the best I've heard for some time. But I don't know how it will act. The bastes that built this place were fond of heavy stuff, an' these flags may be a yard thick, for anything we know. And even av we do get through the stone, there's a hape more quarrying to be done before we're under the foundations, an' still more before we sniff outer air again. It's a wintry lookout."

"It might be better," Sneyd assented. "But I don't see that we have any other chance. Anyway, we may as well stick to it. Tumble up and let me take a turn."

The pavement did not prove so thick as O'Neill had feared; but fifteen inches of solid stone had to be pounded and splintered away, before the under surface was reached; and then, so firm was the cement in which it was set, the remainder of the flag had to be disintegrated before it would quit its bed. Beneath this, to their unutterable disgust, the unfortunate men came upon a layer of concrete, so hard as almost to defy their fiercest attacks. The stones they pounded it with ground away piecemeal, without producing any appreciable effect on th adamantine surface. But by almost imperceptible degrees it was worn down, and if they had been allowed time, they doubtless would have penetrated it in t me. But a Deus ex machinâ, in the form of a Dajian, put a stop to their efforts.

Digitized by Google

As the reader is quite aware, these interesting cannibals had placed their prisoners into the old temple to fatten, and not to contrive an escape. Food was brought in every two days; and the bearers, after satisfying themselves that the captives were safe, withdrew without further inspection. Every week the chief who owned them came and looked at his stalled white men in person, and examined them, to see how much flesh they were putting on, with callous familiarity.

This went on for a month, and then the old rascal considered that the feeding process had gone on for long enough. He was evidently disappointed that his captives had not laid on more fat, and fingered their hard stringey muscles with a comical expression of disgust. He could not understand how men, who, as he thought, did nothing except eat and sleep, could remain so lean and sinewy; but giving up the problem in despair, or solving it by supposing that thinness was in the white man's breed, he stalked out of the enclosure, giving some instructions to his followers as he went.

"Did you hear what that old reptile said?" exclaimed Sneyd, as the stone swung across the portal, and they were once more alone.

"No; what was it?"

"He was telling his men that he would have us cooked on the second day from this. He said it was a waste of time and good victuals to keep us talled here any longer."

The Irishman's jaw dropped. "The game's up," he said. "It's no use going on wid the tunnel. Av we were through that infernal concrete, which I don't think we are nearly, two days isn't sufficient to get under the wall an' up again t'other side."

"I don't think the game is altogether up," replied Sneyd doggedly. "We've managed to scrape clear so far, and I truly believe luck will see us through. At any rate, I've got my hands free now, and when those brutes come to take us away, they'll find me rather hot and heavy to hold."

"That, of course," replied the Irishman. "I'm not going to have my throat slit like a pig now. Not if I know it. I'm going to go down, warm and comfortable, in a dacent scrimmage. Begob, av we got over on either side of the enthrance yonder, we could make it awkward for anyone who tried to come in. I can rig up a sweet weapon out of a hard stone, an' three or four of these thin springy shoots, by way of a handle. The clubmanship we learned in Erma'll come in handy for fingerin' that."

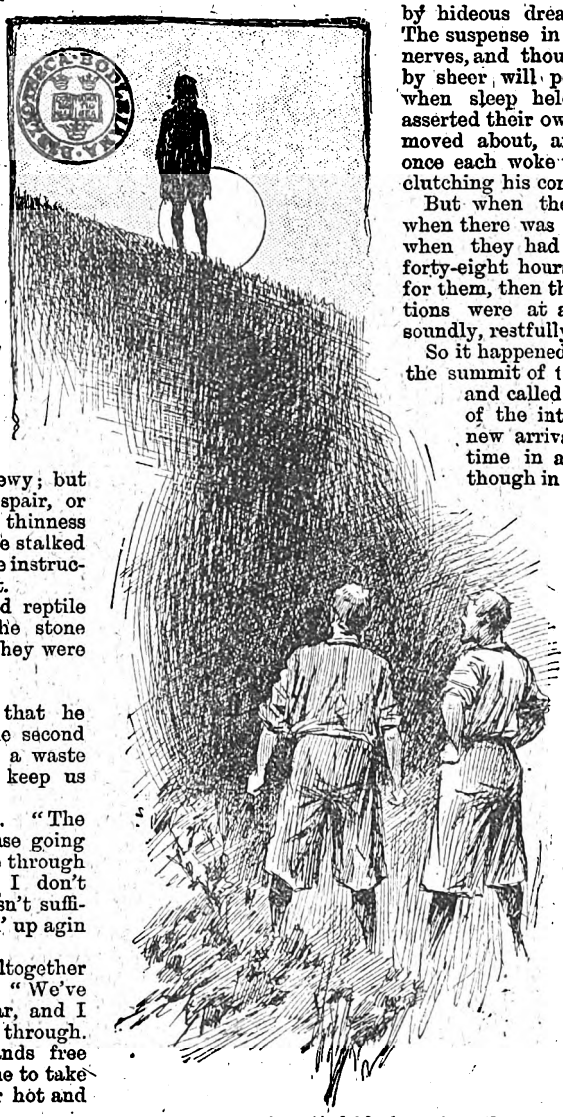
"Well, you see," said Sneyd, "there's a chance. We can brain all those who have pluck enough to venture in, and then go out, kill the cowards who have stayed outside, and afterwards make for the hills. Very likely there won't be a dozen altogether. There certainly won't be twenty."

So, having come to this vigorous resolve, they set about making the weapons, with which they hoped to carry it out.

During the whole period of their imprisonment up to now, the slumbers of these two men had been disturbed by hideous dreams, and torturing nightmares. The suspense in which they lived acted on their nerves, and though they quelled the excitement by sheer will power during the waking hours, when sleep held sway, the mental disorders asserted their own. They talked excitedly; they moved about, and gesticulated violently; and once each woke up, half-strangled, to find he was clutching his companion by the throat.

But when they knew a day had been fixed, when there was no more agonising uncertainty, when they had been definitely warned that in forty-eight hours' time the butchers would come for them, then their suspense and their speculations were at an end, and they slept calmly, soundly, restfully.

So it happened that, when a figure appeared on the summit of the temple wall far above them, and called their names, neither was aware of the intrusion, and neither woke. The new arrival called, and called again, each time in a louder voice; and at last, as though in desperation, bawled out with full lung-power.



Norah was silhouetted black against the moonbeams.

O'Neill rolled over, rubbed his eyes, yawned, and hailed back: "Ahoy there!" He had just dreamt of sailing back to Erma with Norah, and imagined that a boat was rowing up and trying to speak to him.

"Ahoy there!"

The voice called his name again.

The Irishman leaped to his feet. "Great powers!" he exclaimed; "is that you, Norah?"

"'Tis," replied the girl. "I made a bamboo ladder, and climbed up. I've come to help you."

"It's a dear, kind angel y'are," replied O'Neill. "But you shouldn't have ventured in this haythen counthry. But, Norah, darlint," he continued, as another thought struck him, "have yez a score or so of the Erma bhoys at yer pretty heels?"

"No, Murtagh, I'm alone. I came for your sake. I thought I might save you. And if I was too late for that, I'd have let the Dajians have me too."

Sneyd was awake by this time, and had grasped the situation.

"Can you pull your ladder over, Norah, and lower it this side?" he asked.

"That's what I intended," she said; "but I've been trying, and I can't lift it. The thing's too heavy."

Sneyd gave a low whistle.

"I know I'm a fool not to have brought a rope as well,"

Norah continued, with evident tears in her voice; "but I thought I could lift the ladder over. I made it in the woods, and brought it here in two pieces, and then tied them together. Each half was heavy, but I could carry it. How silly of me not to see I should never be able to lift the two together."

Here she broke down completely, and O'Neill was fully employed in throwing up scraps of verbal comfort. Sneyd meanwhile bit his moustache perplexedly.

"Norah," he said at last, "could you make a rope?"

"Ach now," interrupted the Irishman; "don't bother the poor wee child any more. Don't yez see she's done her best an' av there's a slight mistake, 'tis cruel to throw it in her pretty teeth."

But Norah, quick to catch any hint that would help her lover out of his danger, caught at the words immediately.

"Yes, I can weave a rope as strong as you wish for; and then—yes, I see. I could lower down an end, and you could climb up. I will run away and commence at once. It will take some time, but this place is seldom visited by the Dajians, and likely enough they will never see me."

"Can't you get it finished before daylight?"

Norah was silhouetted black against the moonbeams which were streaming in from behind her. They saw her shake her pretty head.

"No," she said; "it would take a long time to plait. Besides, I must get the grass first. No, day would be well up before I could get it finished. But what does that matter? I came to save Murtagh. I am not afraid. The little risk does not scare me. Don't fear, I shall bring your rope."

"Me darlint," exclaimed the Irishman; "Yez shall do nothing of the kind. You have run a million times more risks already than our paltry carcases are worth. Besides, we have till the day afther to-morrow, they said that this afternoon. So do you stay in the woods an' take your time over it; an' then when it's night, if you've got the rope made, and you're sure the coast's clear, why, then, it's plazed an' proud we'd be to see yez again."

"Good-bye, Murtagh dear."

"Good-bye, Norah asthore. Mind an' hide yer laddher. If any of the blayguards saw it, the sight might put them on yer thrack."

"All right. Good-bye, Sneyd."

"Good-bye, Norah, and take care of yourself."

Norah disappeared, and the Irishman turned to his companion.

"Isn't that girl a thrump? The queen of thrumps? Av any man was to say he could point out her aqual, I'd call him a liar, no matter who he was. But, man dear, my feelin's before was peaceful compared wid what they'll be now. 'Tis torture I shall be sufferin' so long as I'm alive, an' that sweet darlint's on this infernal island. Just fancy av one o' them devils was to catch sight of her."

O'Neill paused, trembling violently.

Sneyd put a hand on his shoulder.

"We must hope for the best. My presentiments have been right so far, haven't they? Well, I can assure you, I'm confident that it will come all right in the end."

(To be continued.)

A Dual Personality.

It was one of our Friday night symposiums at the Cosmos club, and as our particular clique was made up of Merton, from the geological survey, Herring of the Fishery Commission; together with Long, from the Agricultural Department; Forrest, of the medical staff and myself, then serving as correspondent for a Liverpool paper, it is needless to say that the talk had run the entire gamut of art, literature and science, and had for the moment settled on the belief in dual personalities.

"I tell you, gentlemen," said Merton, with the authoritative air by which he always attempted to settle questions under discussion, "that while I am willing to admit that there may be some things almost impossible to prove or disprove scientifically, yet this talk about dual personality, subconscious mind and all such stuff is nonsense."

And he lay back in his chair with a self-satisfied air, as though there was nothing more to be said on the subject.

Long took up the argument, and the debate grew rather warm.

Dr. Forrest had thus far taken no part in the discussion, but had smiled once or twice at our assertions in a way that assured us, who knew him so well, that he had a good story to tell if we could only draw him out.

"Come, doctor," said Long at last, "you ought to know something about this question, for you told us last week that you had studied under Charcourt when you were in Paris."

Forrest selected a fresh cigar from the box at his side, lighted it in his usual careful way and blew a few rings of smoke, which he watched float lazily to the ceiling, before he spoke.

"Well," he began, "as Merton has just said, there are some things which we cannot as yet decide by purely physical methods. We cannot weigh the soul in our most delicate balance, though the scale sinks if we add but the fraction of a hair, nor can we by our most subtle reagents analyse that vital spark we call life in our laboratories. I do not care to-night to speak of the many curious phenomena which I witnessed during my studies in Paris, for they might furnish you with a clue to the story which is to follow; but I'll tell you a little incident in real life, which occurred when I was very young in my London practice, and then to leave the question for you to decide.

"When I established myself in the metropolis fresh from my studies at Vienna, I joined the Bohemia club.

"We were a rather jolly lot at the Bohemia, for we worked hard at our different lines all day and then met at the club in the evenings for relaxation and to compare notes. You see we were young then, and not authorities in our several branches, as you all are here," and he smiled in his quizzical way as he looked round our little circle.

"There were two men in the club," he continued, "both M. D.'s, and although greatly alike in their features and wonderfully so in their dress, they were totally different in character, and I suppose it would be hard to find in any club two men further apart in their moral and mental qualities. Whiting had been a practising physician for a year or more and had already a large connection. He was a splendid fellow, large of frame but straight as an arrow, with great brown eyes that looked you squarely in the face when he spoke, and, with all his physical strength, kind and gentle as a woman. He was loved by every one at the club, where we knew him as the soul of honour and generous to a fault.

Digitized by Google

"Davis, on the other hand, he was enough like Whiting in features to be his twin brother, had a sneering expression on his face, and when he looked at you with his eyes half closed and that cynical smile on his lips he made me think of a snake.

"He was a heavy drinker, and spent money enough at the club, but he was never known to do a kind act, and we were sure that he never spent a shilling on anyone unless he saw that he would gain some advantage in return.

"Both of the men had ample means of their own, but Davis had never practised, so far as we knew. Where he lived no one seemed to know. Some said that he was an expert chemist and dabbled in alchemy as well, but he made no close friends, and seldom spoke of his own life.

"It happened that Davis and Whiting had never met at the club as each came but seldom, but we often chaffed one about the other, and from their facial resemblance dubbed them the two Dromios. Jekyll and Hyde would have been more appropriate, but this was long before Stevenson's book was written.

"Whiting always resented any chance allusion to his double, although good-natured at the rest of our chaff, and seemed to doubt the actual existence of Davis, whom he had heard of but never met, and thought we were simply trying to have a game with him. Naturally, the more he scoffed at the reality of Davis the more we nagged him, until finally in sheer desperation he proposed to give a quiet little dinner for four of us, at which Robinson, an artist and fellow club-member, myself, Davis and Whiting were to be the quartet.

"Davis promised to be there, if possible, and said he was already acquainted with Whiting—of course by reputation only, he added with that cynical smile we all hated. On the night of the dinner Robinson and I were there early, for we were anxious to see the meeting between Davis and Whiting, and had made several bets with the other fellows as to whether Davis would show up.

"Whiting appeared punctually as usual, but though we waited until midnight, Davis failed to materialise. Of course this settled the matter in Whiting's mind for the time being, and he made us set up several bottles of wine to drink the health of his mythical counterpart, as he called him.

"The next night, however, he came to the club, and, drawing Robinson and me aside, said: 'Look here, this matter has gone too far. I like a joke, but I think it is rather rough for you to keep it up.' And on our expressing our ignorance of his meaning, he showed us a letter from Davis, regretting his inability to be present the night before, and saying that he was too ill at the moment to express his regrets in person.

"'But my dear fellow,' said Robinson, 'if you really think us guilty of this letter, will you kindly explain how it happens to be written on your own paper?'

"Whiting seized the note and seemed frightened for the moment, for at the head of the letter was his crest, and the envelope bore the impression of his private seal, which he always wore on his watch-chain. He looked at it searchingly, and then left the club without a word.

"After this occurrence we ceased bantering him about Davis, and passed the word around to the other fellows to drop it, for we saw that the matter worried him greatly, and feared the effect of our chaff on his high-strung, nervous temperament. Davis came to the club less frequently during the winter, but at every mention of Whiting's name he smiled, and said he was very sorry they did not happen to meet.

"One day, early in the spring, Whiting sent a note asking me to come up to his den after dinner, as he had something of importance to tell, and begged me not to fail him. I had often been to his consulting rooms, but had never visited him at his rooms in Perth Street.

"The house was one of a row of old-fashioned buildings still in good repair, but backed up against their rear were several ramshackle old tenements, nearly deserted by tenants.

"I had not seen Whiting for some months and was shocked by the change in his appearance. There were dark circles under his eyes and a strange, hunted expression in his face. He grasped my hand eagerly and drew a chair for me in front of the fire, for the evenings were still cool.

"'Doctor,' he exclaimed suddenly, after we had lit our cigars and talked glittering generalities for a few minutes, 'that fellow Davis is killing me by inches.'

"'Why, old man,' I said, 'so you have come to believe in him at last.' I started to laugh, but checked myself when I saw the expression of his face.

"'What is it, my dear boy?' I asked, soothingly. 'It certainly can't be so serious. What has he been up to now?'

"''Tis queer business,' said Whiting excitedly, 'and I can't imagine his motive; but these are the facts. For several weeks this fellow has dogged my footsteps, and after I have made a professional call and left the usual prescription he has sent a note to the patient imitating my handwriting and changing the medicines for others, which had they been taken as directed, would, in some cases, have proved fatal. Fortunately the chemists have sent word to me that there was some mistake and I have been able to correct it. But of course this constant changing of prescriptions has affected my practice terribly, and people are beginning to think that my mind is unbalanced.'

"'But, my dear fellow,' said I, trying to quiet him, 'why not give up your practice for a few weeks and take a decided rest, and meanwhile we will deal with this fellow Davis as he deserves.'

"'But that is not all,' continued Whiting, despairingly. 'It is true I don't need the income from my practice, and work more from the love of it than for fees, but he has gone still further and dared to call on Miss Wiley, my fiancée, and tell her many of the foolish escapades of my college days, the secret of which I thought was buried in my own breast. I have tried to explain them away, but, of course, cannot deny the tales, and I fear it is all over for me in that quarter. I can't see how she could listen to the cad or where she could have met him.'

"Davis's actions seemed to be more inexplicable than ever, and I longed to get hold of the brute and force an explanation from him; but, hiding my anger, I tried to quiet Whiting, and finally prevailed upon him to take a heavy dose of chloral, which I prepared, and to try and get a night's rest, promising to see Miss Wiley shortly and attempt to patch up matters.

Digitized by Google

"I left him asleep on his lounge, and, as it was still early, determined to call on Miss Wiley, whom I knew slightly, and tell her of Whiting's condition.

"There was a light in the drawing room, and, ringing the bell, I gave my card to the servant, but he ushered me in unannounced. Miss Wiley sat at the piano, her hands on the keys, while standing at her side and looking down ardently into her upturned face was—Davis.

"For a moment I could not speak and seemed glued to the floor, but Davis quickly advanced and, after a few polite inquiries about my health and his dear friend Whiting, pleaded an engagement and left.

"His presence in the house and his unmistakable lover-like attitude made it very painful for me to speak, but remembering the condition of poor Whiting and how heartbroken he seemed, I ventured to speak about Davis and asked where she had met him.

"'Oh, I have only known him a few weeks,' she said. 'He called with a letter of introduction from Dr. Whiting and said they had been fellow students. He has been most kind and attentive to me, and is teaching me some of his own songs.' And she rattled on about his divine voice, while I sat speechless at the new complication of affairs.

"At last I blurted out. 'Would you kindly let me see the letter of introduction?' adding that Dr. Whiting had promised me letters to some of his friends and I wished to see his methods.

"I felt that this was a most feeble excuse, but could think of nothing else, and of course Miss Wiley was too polite to express her surprise at the strange request. Going to a dainty writing desk in the corner she came back and handed me the letter.

"There was no doubt of the chirography being exactly similar to Whiting's. I saw the same old fashioned capitals and crisp, sharp endings of each word, and as for the signature, his bank would have sworn to it. Besides, there was his crest and seal which I now knew so well.

"I don't know what I said in thanking her, for my head was in a whirl, but I had enough sense to say good-night and quickly withdrew.

"How Davis could have obtained the paper and seal, or how he learnt of all those college scrapes of Whiting's I could not imagine. But I saw that his relations with Miss Wiley had gone so far that it would do no good for me to interfere, and that I should only be snubbed by her for my impertinence in meddling in other people's business.

"Whiting was out when I called at his rooms next morning, and his servant told me that he had gone to the country for a rest and left no address.

"It was perhaps a month afterwards that he turned up at the club one night, looking more ghastly than ever. He would not say where he had been, and positively declined to discuss the Davis matter.

"I know he talked widely about hypnotic control and kindred subjects until we thought his mind was affected, and tried to calm him; but he grew more and more excited, until, finally, I saw him turn pale and clutch the back of a chair, and noticed a little stream of frothy blood oozing from between his clenched teeth as he staggered out of the room.

"I jumped up from the sofa and followed as quickly as I could, but when I reached the front door he was gone and I met Davis just coming in.

"He walked leisurely into the café and leant against the mantelpiece. To my excited enquiries about Whiting he simply smiled and said he had not noticed him going out, but I saw him scratching a small red spot from his cuff with his finger nail and felt sure they must have met.

"'Gentlemen,' said Davis, in his drawling voice, 'I beg you will congratulate me on my approaching marriage, and pardon my not mentioning the lady's name in the club. Waiter, please take the orders.'

"Most of us refused to drink with him, for we despised the man, and I left him chatting with a few of his particular cronies and went up to Whiting's room. I heard that Davis left very shortly after I did.

"Whiting had not come home and I spent the night hunting through hotels, police stations and hospital, for I felt sure he had ruptured a bloodvessel in his lungs, which must quickly prove fatal.

"But I could find no trace of him, and finally, utterly worn out, went to my rooms to toss about until mid-day with a horrible nightmare, in which Whiting and Davis were struggling in one another's grasp, each striving to kill the other.

"At lunch I picked up a morning paper and scanned the society news listlessly until my eyes lit upon 'the rumoured engagement of Dr. J. H. Davis of — and Miss Isabelle Wiley, the well-known belle, etc.'

"I sat musing over the strange vicissitudes of fate and wondering what had become of poor Whiting. Suddenly a news-boy rushed into the restaurant calling extras, and the first headline I saw was:

"'Sudden death of Dr. Davis.'

"I eagerly read the usual detailed account of how he had been found that morning dead in his bed, evidently, the paper stated, from a ruptured blood vessel, as the bed clothing and carpets were stained with blood, but no wound was found on his body.

"Strangely enough, he lived in one of the old tenements at the back of Whiting's home, and measurements which I made subsequently showed that his rooms and Whiting's must have been on similar floors and directly back to back.

"Remembering the stolen notepaper I tried to find some entrance between the two houses, but the walls were solid, and even the wall papers showed naught but the few little cracks due to their many years' service.

"This, gentlemen," said Dr. Forrest, draining his glass and taking up his hat and cane from the sofa, "is a story of actual life, and if any of you have an explanation to offer I should be happy to hear it."

We could say nothing for a moment, and then the irrepressible Merton found his tongue.

"But how about Dr. Whiting?" he asked.

"As for him, gentlemen," said Dr. Forrest, solemnly, as he stood by the open door, "I know nothing further except that he was never found. But I have my theory. Good night!"

And he closed the door.

A. W. Worth.

Digitized by Google

HESTER'S LOVE.

WHEN pretty Hester Warren married Ezra Banks, who was twenty years older than she, and a shy, silent man out of touch with village life, everybody said that she made a mistake that she would soon regret. Yet, though village eyes kept keenest watch upon them, village prophecy was for once at fault. Hester's girlish beauty changed into comfortable, middle-aged comeliness, and Ezra grew stiff and rheumatic, yet their devotion to each other was unchanged; indeed, after Nannie, their only child, married and left home, it seemed as if the pages of life had blown back for them and they were once more lovers, and the world was for them alone.

That was before Ezra had typhoid fever. Through his long illness his wife nursed him tenderly, but he came from it, a broken-down old man, with his ears forever sealed to all the common sounds to which his life had been set. He was slow in realising this, but one day as he lay watching his wife and the doctor, the knowledge broke harshly upon him. He could see his wife's lips move as she smoothed the bed with her soft, wrinkled hand, but he could hear no word. Then he turned his dull eyes, with a pitiful look of pain darkening them, toward the doctor. He too, was speaking, but the deaf ears could catch no sound. His weak, peevish voice jarred suddenly upon their talk.

"Why don't ye speak so's I can hear ye, stid o' mumbling so?"

His wife started and then cast a quick, imploring glance at the doctor. She leaned down over the bed her face was in the shadow and her husband could not see her eyes.

"Do you hear me now, dear?"

The words reached him faintly, and from a distance. He struggled with the sounds a minute or two before they resolved themselves into words.

"Of course I hear ye," he said fretfully, "only why don't you speak up? I ain't so sick, be I?"

The words were a little clearer now, though still far off.

"You have been very ill. It has to be quiet for you you know, dear, but you will soon be up now."

The old man shut his eyes wearily; the effort had been a heavy one for him. His wife turned to the doctor, her eyes shining through her tears.

"I can make him hear," she cried; "I knew I could. I didn't believe Ezra could get where he couldn't hear me. And he needn't ever know now."

The doctor looked at her and said nothing. He was a young man, and it seemed very pitiful to him.

But he had not understood the old man's strong constitution. In a few weeks he was about again, as well as ever, apparently, save for the sealed ears. His wife chattered to him in her old fashion, and kept out of sight the medicines she took for her strained voice; she cautioned the neighbours who came to see him, and thought that he did not know. But she was mistaken; there were other sounds—many of them—that had been woven into a life of nearly seventy years, and in place of these there was a great vacant stillness; and he knew all.

One afternoon she found him sitting in the big wooded chair in the kitchen, studying his old twisted hands. He gave her a tremulous smile as she came in.

"I'm most broken up, Hester," he said.

"Don't!" she cried, "don't Ezra!—I can't bear it! We're both getting older, but that's all 'tis."

He shook his head sadly.

"No, 'tain't, Hester—I've been a-seeing it for a long time. You're young yet—you can see and hear just as you uster, but I—I'm an old man, Hester. You've been a good girl, and we've had a happy life together, but I didn't calculate for you to be tied up to an old man. I've got to thinking about it lately, and sometimes I think folks was right and it hadn't orter been."

The woman listened and a great pain seemed to beat up in her throat and choke her voice. She leaned over and put her trembling hands on his.

"Ezra," she cried, and the appeal in her voice carried it with clear distinctness to him, "Ezra, have I ever said or done a thing to make you feel so?"

He looked up, startled.

"Heaven knows you haven't Hester," he said earnestly.

"And, Ezra, if anything should happen to me—if I should be sick or helpless, would you love me less? Would you?"

A change came over the old man; it seemed for an instant that the face of his youth looked back at her.

Digitized by Google

"If it wasn't for your suffering, Hester, I wish you could see," he said almost passionately.

He rose stiffly, and stood with his arm about her, looking down the road. It was toward nightfall, and the valley was full of shadows, while above the hills floated soft grey clouds—the dead sunset. And even as they looked a sudden thrill and flush came across these, and the valley was filled with the glory of the after-glow, and the two old figures stood silent in the midst of the golden light.

It was a few weeks after this that Hester caught a severe cold. She was in bed for several days, and Nannie had her husband and child to care for, and her mother would not let her stay long.

"They'll be needing you—I can get along now," she said.

"I expect they can get along without me a little while longer," answered Nannie.

"What do you say?"

Nannie looked alarmed; she raised her voice and spoke with careful emphasis:

"I expect—they can get along—without me a little while," she repeated.

Her mother nodded.

"I said it had been quite a while," she said. "I'm glad you're going, Nannie, though we shall miss you so."

Nannie's face filled with a pitiful tenderness.

Her mother looked up suddenly and noticed, and a strange expression came into her eyes. She spoke with curious eagerness.

"Nannie," she said, "tell me true, don't I hear as I used to?"

Nannie's face flushed. With a sudden impulsive gesture she threw her arms about her mother, sobbing bitterly. But in her mother's eyes the strange expression grew into a glad light.

"Don't feel so, Nannie," she said. "I—I'm almost glad I'm going to tell your father."

Nannie went home the next day sorely against her will. She told her husband that it almost broke her heart to think of them so; if it wasn't for little Nannie she would go back there and stay, but she couldn't take the child—it might hurt her throat seriously to have to shout to them. Then she caught Nannie up and kissed her again and again; she wondered how she could live if she couldn't hear that baby voice. She was troubled too, for the child had a delicate throat and she dared not take her often to see the old folks—and they would miss her so!

But it was not so hard; her mother spoke of it herself, and said that she and father had talked it over, and they knew it would be best not to have the child there often. And Nannie mustn't worry—they could get along all right as long as they could hear each other. Indeed, it seemed as if the bond of suffering drew them closer together. It was beautiful to see the old man's care for his wife, and the tenderness in speaking to her. The neighbours who had pitied at first talked often of it; they said they never saw two deaf people take such comfort in each other. Often on summer days the two high-pitched voices would be heard, and the people passing would smile at each other, and sometimes linger a little.

So the winter passed and the summer, and then quite suddenly, one night when the earth was lying hushed and silent under a soft fall of snow, the old man passed from the silence of his life into the silence that is beyond the reach of human voice.

The neighbours for miles around came to the funeral and the house was full of grave decorous whispers, broken strangely when any one spoke to the wife. She was pale and silent; only once did she speak of anything that she wanted done, and then she called Nannie hesitatingly.

"Tell him I don't want him to speak so's I can hear. It—it wouldn't seem proper, somehow. It won't make any difference to Ezra now,"—she faltered a moment, and a tender light came into the faded blue eyes—"he can't say anything about my husband that I don't know a hundred times better than him."

"I'll tell him, mother," said Nannie, gently.

Her mother spoke slowly, choosing her words. "And tell him," she said, "that we've lived together thirty years, and it don't seem more than thirty weeks as I look back. And tell him that in it all was never an angry word, never anything but a love I can speak of; and tell him" (she was crying a little now, but her face was still touched with the wonderful light) "tell him that the only thing I'm sorry for now is that there wasn't more I could do to show my love for my husband."

"I will tell him all," said Nannie.

That was a strange funeral—the neighbours spoke of it afterwards. The still figure that sat dead to the words of tender healing spoken by the minister seemed to lend an element of mystery to the scene, and the contrast between the darkened room and the brilliant, sparkling world outside flashed upon their eyes like a miracle.

When the old man was laid to his last rest, the lonely widow quietly turned away from the grave, and was assisted into the carriage of her daughter and son-in-law and driven to their home. She was so quiet that her daughter did not disturb her.

"I don't feel as if I knew what to say to her, though she is my mother," she whispered to her husband.

They helped her tenderly into the house and Nannie put her into the easiest chair. From the next room a baby voice broke in upon them.

"Mamma, can I see dran'ma? Nannie wants to see dran'ma!"

"Let me have Nannie, please—it's so long since I have!"

Nannie stopped at the door, a great wonder in her eyes.

"Why, mother!" she exclaimed.

Her mother looked up at her with a tremulous smile.

"Yes, I know. I meant to tell you before, but I couldn't somehow and I've heard all the time; I was only deaf a day or two from cold. I thought I really was at first, and then I kept it up, because it comforted—him—somehow. He'd felt he was old and breaking down, you know, but when I did, too, he felt better and cheered right up. There was only one thing—I did want the baby so! And it seemed as if 'twould break my heart when she did come not to answer her and to have her strain her little voice to make me hear!"

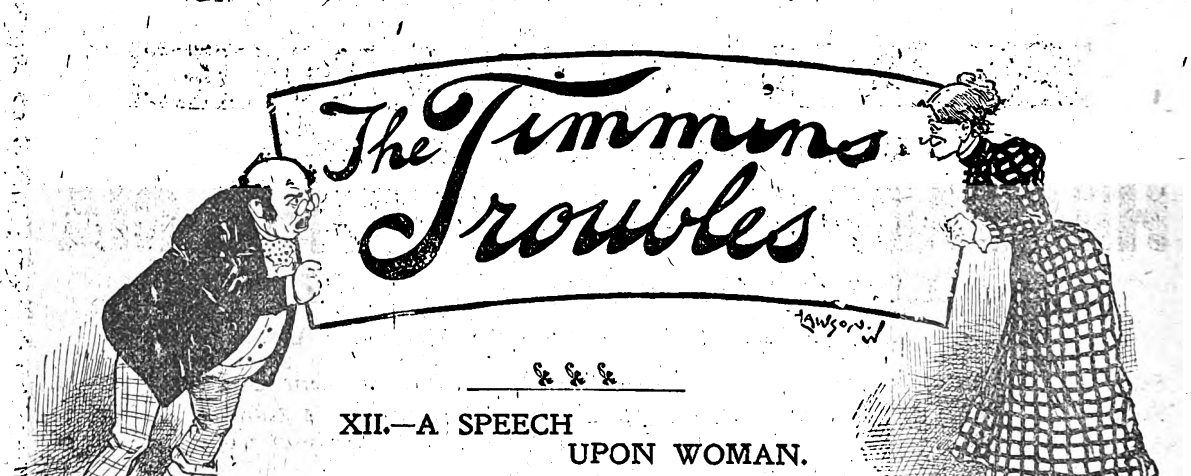
"And you kept it up all these months!" said Nannie in hushed tone.

Her mother looked up; she was holding little Nannie with eager, trembling hands, and it almost seemed as if the golden baby head reflected a wonderful light upon her tired face.

"When you've loved a man more than thirty years, that isn't much to do," she replied.

Wm. Bryant.

Digitized by Google



XII.—A SPEECH UPON WOMAN.

"Now, my dear," said Mr. Timmins, as he drew writing materials towards him, "now I want your woman's wit. These fellows insist that I must respond to the toast 'Woman,' to-morrow night, and I must prepare a few remarks. If we both set at it, we'll get up something nice."

"What you want," argued Mrs. Timmins, entering into the spirit of the undertaking, and tapping her teeth with her thimble, "what you want is woman in her various phases."

"What I want is a speech," retorted Mr. Timmins. "They haven't put me down for a panorama. I want a short address, full of good points and pleasant things about the ladies. Now I shall begin. 'Fellow citizens ——'"

"But women are not fellow citizens, you know. I should say——"

"You'd say, 'Fellow back-hair,' that's what you would say. I'm addressing the people, and they're all men; don't you see? I've got to commence somewhere, and then I go on. 'Now, fellow citizens, regarding women, our sir girl, our companions, our posterity, our mothers, our wives, our daughters, what more can we say than that they give us life, make it happy, and soothe its decline?' How's that?"

"Is that the same woman?" asked Mrs. Timmins, bending over the table. "It doesn't strike me that she would care to have it put in that way. Why not say, 'Fellow-citizens, we are assemb——'"

"What's the matter with you?" demanded Mr. Timmins. "I've got to open with a sentiment, and you can't find anything more graceful than that. Then I will go on: 'She rises in the cradle, reaches her meridian at the altar, and goes down in a flood of dew at the grave.' Can you grasp that?"

"I don't like that as well as the other," remonstrated Mrs. Timmins. "You make her a mother while she's a baby, and as for the grave part, you don't stop to think that she may be another meridian by getting married again. I would say something like this, 'Fellow-citizens, we are assemb——'"

"No, I won't either. Who's going to get married again? Can't you see that I'm only carrying out the first idea of origin, companionship, and posterity? Suppose I say next, 'We revere her as a mother, adore her as a wife, and—and'—what do we do for her as a daughter?"

"Well, you might say, we dress her, we educate her, and keep an eye on her, and—and—and—"

"Spank her! Why don't you spank her?" howled Mr. Timmins. "Can't you think of something practical? I've got that we revere our mothers and adore our wives, and I want something for the daughter. Can't you originate something?"

"We provide a home for her. Wouldn't——?"

"Yes, of course!" raved Mr. Timmins. "That's the ideal! That settles it! All you want now is two 'prolonged laughters,' four 'continued applauses,' one 'enthusiasm,' and 'a voice,' to be an oration! 'Fellow-citizens, we furnish her with poached eggs and beans! Fellow-citizens, we revere her as a mother, we adore her as a wife, and as a daughter, we change the sheets once a week! Fellow-citizens, we pass her the gravy!'

"'Fellow-citizens!' yelled Mr. Timmins, gesticulating like a horse chestnut tree, 'Fellow-citizens, if she wants her beef underdone, we give it to her. Fellow-citizens, we give her all the butter she can paste on her bread!' Is that what you want me to say? Have you got any more suggestions? Do you know any more eloquence?" And the worthy gentleman leant back in his chair speechless.

"Couldn't you leave her out altogether?" recommended Mrs. Timmins. "Can't you just revere her as a mother and adore her as a wife? As for the daughter, you might pass it over with saying: 'Fellow-citizens, we are assem——'"

"Yes, or I can cut her throat," exclaimed Mr. Timmins. "I can take her to the pound! I can salt her down for winter use! Hang the speech!" and Mr. Timmins danced on the fragments of his notes, and banged himself out of the room.

"Well," thought Mrs. Timmins, as she took down her hair and put it up again, "I don't see why he couldn't say: 'Fellow-citizens, we are assembled here to say something poetical about woman, and the best I can say is, we don't always show her when we love her, and we love her when we don't always show it.' That's sensible, and it's so," sighed Mrs. Timmins.

KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR.

KAPUTINE

SAFE REMEDY CURES

HEADACHE and NEURALGIA

IMMEDIATELY,

And is sold by all leading Chemists in Packets of 18 Doses, 1s.

To ANYONE HAVING THE LEAST DIFFICULTY, it will be sent post free for 12 Stamps by "KAPUTINE Ltd.," Huddersfield; or, on receipt of a stamped addressed envelope, A. M. Kaputine, Huddersfield, you will receive a supply of free sample.

The fact that "KAPUTINE" is recommended by many leading Medical Men, and is used in National Hospitals and Infirmaries proves that it is THE, THE recognised SAFE REMEDY FOR HEADACHES.

Refuse Substitutes and demand "KAPUTINE," the Safe Remedy. There is no substitute "LIKE IT"; nothing "AS GOOD"; nothing "SIMILAR."

KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR.

KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR.

PYN-KA

THE WONDERFUL METAL POLISHER

The Lustre Lasts!

Pyn-Ka Leaves no Scratches!

Cleans and burnishes gold, silver, plate, copper, brass, nickel, tin, glass, etc., better, quicker, and at less cost of labour and money than any other polish known.

Paste or tablets, 1d. to 6d. All dealers.

NOSE

MACHINES as worn by Nobility. Shape altered permanently by few weeks' wear, from 9/9 each. Red Nose Cure, Medically Approved, 3/9. Pamphlet, "Cause and Prevention," 1/-; particulars for stamp. Mention Paper.

LEES RAY, Specialist, South Castle St., LiverPool.

A SUM of from 12s. to 25s. per week can be earned in spare hours or evenings by either sex everywhere.—Send addressed envelope for particulars to Box 24, Eclipse Works, 92A Aldersgate Street, London.

TOOTH-ACHE

CURED INSTANTLY BY

BUNTER'S NERVINE

Prevents Decay, Saves Extraction, Sleepless Nights Prevented.

Neuralgic Headaches and all Nerve Pains removed by BUNTER'S NERVINE. All Chemists, 1s. 1½d.

Don't Cough - use Keatings Lozenges

They at once check the Cough and remove the cause.

The Unrivalled

One Lozenge alone relieves. Sold everywhere, Tins 13½d. each.

PAMPHLET AND ADVICE POST FREE.

Every man and woman in search of HEALTH should write without delay to The Medical Battery Co., for their

NEW MEDICAL WORK

which will be sent POST FREE to any address. The treatise contains particulars of the treatment of the various ills that flesh is heir to. It also contains a selection from the thousands of testimonials received in favour of the Electropathic Belt and other curative appliances. Advice Free of charge (personally or by letter.)

Medical Battery Co., Limited,

489, OXFORD ST., London, W.

Write at once.

SILVER QUEEN CYCLES.

ON MONTHLY PAYMENTS. Immense stock Ladies' and Gents'. New and Secondhand. Wonderful bargains. Carriage paid. Easy payments from 10s. monthly, or large cash discount. 1 year's guarantee. Illustrated Price Lists post free on application. Old cycles exchanged.—THE SILVER QUEEN CYCLE CO. Ltd., 221 Tottenham Court Road, London.

ATLAS LOCKSTITCH MACHINE.

Works by hand or treadle. Guaranteed 4 years. Equal in quality and size to any machine To ensure satisfaction, we will send machine on receipt of 5/- P.O. for ONE MONTH'S TRIAL. Balance can be paid 5/- Monthly. Call or write for designs and Samples of work.

39/-

THE ATLAS SEWING MACHINE CO., 188B High St., Camden Town, London, N.W.; 63 Seven Sisters Rd., N.; 14 High Rd., Kilburn.

PIANOS. UPRIGHT IRON GRAND.

Complete Iron frame, Brass Pin Plate, Nickel-bolted Wrest Plank, Check Action, Full Trichord, Full Compass, Rivetted Hammers, Handsome Walnut Case, Inlaid Marqueterie Panel, Sconces, Trusses, etc. Tone and touch perfect. Guaranteed 25 years. 28 guineas, at 19/6 per month. Delivered free on payment of 10/6. Approval. Catalogues Free.

ORGANS. GENUINE AMERICAN.

Imported Direct. Solid Walnut Case, Mirror Top, Music Case, 2 Knee Swells, Mouse and Dust Proof, 8 Stops, 3 Sets of Reeds, 14 Guineas, at 6/- per month. 10 Stops, 3 Sets of Reeds, 2 Octave Couplers. 15 guineas, at 7/- per month. Illustrated Lists Free. Kindly mention this paper.

THE LONDON AND LIVERPOOL PIANOFORTE CO., Granby St. & Selborne St., LIVERPOOL.

Agents wanted where not represented.

ON THE BEST AUTHORITY.

V. D. L. writes to ask if I can tell him when is a man serving in the Army entitled to a pension.————A man is entitled to receive a pension for life varying from 1s. 1d. to 2s. 9d. a day after twenty-one years of service. If a warrant officer, he should receive from three to five shillings a day.

David.—Your friend has informed you correctly; there is an annual Welsh service in St. Paul's Cathedral—that is, the service is conducted wholly in the language of the Principality. This takes place on the eve of St. David's Day. It is also true that the medical fraternity have a special service, late in the summer, at the Cathedral, in which Latin plays an important part.

Wood.—There is a considerable difference, from the point of view of shipbuilders and others, in wood cut in winter from that cut in summer. During the period of rest—from October to April, roughly speaking—the wood is filled with starchy matter, and if the trees are cut down during this interval it is much firmer. Experts always choose winter-cut timber.

S. B.—In former times it was common to build chapels on bridges at the entrance of towns and villages. One of the best existing specimens of such edifices is that on the bridge across the Don, at Rotherham, in Yorkshire; it was built in 1383. It is mentioned in the works of John Leyland, the antiquary, who died in 1553.

J. H. H.—The Albert Medal was instituted in 1866 for the purpose of rewarding acts of heroism performed by civilians either on land or at sea.

F. I. B.—There are several branches of the Bank of England. In London alone, besides the head office, there are two branch offices. There are also branches in Liverpool, Manchester, Birmingham, Leeds, Hull, Bristol, Newcastle, Plymouth, and Portsmouth.

F. L.—A Belgian illustrated paper was recently produced in a novel manner. Owing to a strike of compositors, there was no one to set up the few lines of descriptive matter required for a certain issue, and it looked as though the paper would not appear at the regular time. But the editor was a man of resource. He had the matter typewritten, and this and the sketches were arranged on cardboard, sheet by sheet. The sixteen sheets were reproduced by photography on zinc and etched in the usual manner, the size of the sheets being reduced somewhat so that all the matter could be printed on pages of the regular size of the journal. That issue had a large sale.

One.—Surnames and names of places consisting of one letter only, are to be found in several foreign countries. The Chinese General I distinguished himself in the war with Japan. There is a family in Belgium with the name of O, descendants of a French marquis. In the Department of the Somme, France, there is a village Y, and a bay in the Zuyder Zee has the same name. In Sweden there is a village called U.

V. G.—No, the wife of an Archbishop and the members of his family bear no title as such.

K. G. asks: "Has a negro ever been knighted by the Queen? I know that certain celebrated Indian gentlemen have been so honoured, but I mean a coal-black negro."————Yes. Sir Samuel Lewis, first mayor of Freetown, the capital of Sierra Leone was knighted by Her Majesty. He is a distinguished gentleman, a barrister of the Middle Temple, London, and Chief Justice of the Colony.

Parliamentarian.—All public Acts affecting the United Kingdom, and all local Acts affecting only limited areas, as well as private Acts of Parliament, are published, and may be obtained from Messrs. Eyre and Spottiswoode, East Harding Street, London, E.C.

Miss G.—Some of the principal clubs for ladies in London are the Alexandra, in Grosvenor Street; the Denison, Buckingham Street; Adelphi; the Somerville, in Oxford Street; and the Pioneer, in Bruton Street, W.

A. B. G.—The Corps of Commissionaires was founded about forty years ago for the purpose of employing retired soldiers and sailors of Her Majesty's regular forces. You are quite right in the belief that the institution was originally intended only for men who had received wounds in the Crimea and Indian Mutiny. This regulation was not enforced for long, however, as the demand for the services of commissionaires rapidly increased.

Ambitious would like to know if there are any qualifications of property necessary to become a member of Parliament.————None whatever. Any male of full age, with the exception of English and Scotch peers, judges, clergy of the Established Church, and a few others, may be elected to sit in the House of Commons.

Q.—Just three years ago, there was an instance of father and son, both soldiers, being decorated by the Queen on the same day for distinguished service. Major-General Low, who commanded the Chitral Relief Force, and his son, Lieutenant Low, who acted as aide-de-camp, went to Windsor together; the former received a G. C. B. and the latter the Distinguished Service Order.

T. G.—Bank Holidays were unheard-of luxuries until the year 1871, when Sir John Lubbock brought in a Bill declaring that certain days of the year, namely, Easter Monday, Whit Monday, First Monday in August, and Boxing Day should be kept as public holidays.

R. N.—Your friend is altogether wrong. The total tonnage of steamships and sailing vessels owned by the United Kingdom and her colonies is more than a half of the world's grand shipping total. Britain and her colonies own 11,143 steamers and sailing vessels, with a tonnage of 13,665,312, whilst the total tonnage of all countries in the world is 26,561,250 tons, distributed among 28,052 vessels. The United States of America are second on the list, with 3,150 vessels of 2,448,677 tons. Germany is a somewhat poor third, France fourth, and Russia a very bad fifth, only having 1,159 vessels of 594,434 tons.

W. E.—When a man talks of "drawing his salary," it amounts to saying that he is receiving his salt-money, for the word "salary" comes from the Latin sal, "salt." Roman officials, when absent from home on duty, received a limited sum, nominally intended to cover the cost of salt—regarded as a necessary part of one's food; but the money so paid was really to defray travelling expenses. It is said that it was this custom that gave rise to the expression "not worth his salt"; but it is difficult to ascertain the exact origin of the saying.

SHORT STORIES' ADVERTISEMENT RATES.

Single column, per inch, per insertion	£0	10	0
Double ,, ,, ,,	1	0	0
Full page inside, facing page of matter, either white paper or 2nd or 3rd page of cover, or back page, per insertion	10	0	0
Half-page ,, ,, ,, ...	5	0	0
Quarter-page ,, ,, ,, ...	2	10	0
Eighth-page ,, ,, ,, ...	1	5	0
Front page, whole ,, ,, ,, ...	12	10	0
,, half	6	5	0

All spaces above one-eighth of a page are charged at per page rate.

Series discount: 5 per cent. for 13, 10 per cent. for 26, 15 per cent. for 52 insertions.

Black blocks are charged 25 per cent. extra. All advertisements are subject to approval. All copy must be sent in by Noon on Tuesday, March 7th, if intended for the Issue on sale March 21st, and dated March 25th. The Proprietors reserve the right to hold over or suspend the insertion of any advertisement without prejudice to other insertions on order. All communications should be addressed to the Advertisement Manager, "Pearson's Weekly" Offices, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Printed and Published by C. Arthur Pearson Ltd., at Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

"Burning a Penny Candle to Look for a Farthing."

That is what some folks do when they try to save pence in the purchase of low-priced adulterated soap. They not only "burn the candle" but they "lose the farthing" as well, when they subject costly fabric to the corrosive action of such soaps. Pounds are literally thrown away in washing fabrics like lace, muslin, damask, cretonnes, silks, and cambrics with common soap.

SWAN WHITE FLOATING SOAP

is expressly manufactured for the washing of such dainty articles. It is made from the purest and sweetest of vegetable oils and fats. White goods become whiter and coloured goods brighter when washed with it, whilst its absolute purity makes it an ideal soap for the bath and toilet.

A Purer Soap is beyond the Art of Soapmaking.

A MAGNIFICENT COMPLEXION ASSURED

By the Free Use of Lillie Powder.

Whatever is the matter with your skin LILLIE POWDER will soon put it all right again. LILLIE POWDER is a sure cure for Red Faces, Blotches, and indeed all ailments of the Skin. If you try it once you will be more than satisfied. If you go to a chemist or elsewhere for it, be sure that it bears this label, beautifully printed in red and black upon a delicate pink paper. Firmly refuse substitutes, as they may be injurious. ☞

SEND FOR IT AT ONCE—NOW or To-morrow.
This is what other people say.

TESTIMONIALS.

Used for Many Years.—"The Lillie Powder is prepared from my original recipe. I have used it for many years, and recommend it as being most beneficial to the complexion."—Lillie Langtry.

The Very Best.—"I think your new Lillie Powder quite the very best, and you may be pleased to know I have used it ever since I first went on the stage."—Ellaline Terriss.

Most Exquisite.—"I think your new Lillie Powder most exquisite."
Adelina Patti.

Unrivalled for the Skin.—"I guarantee that the Lillie Powder is prepared according to Mrs. Langtry's recipe, and that as a preparation for the skin it is unrivalled, owing to its medicinal qualities."—William Clarkson.

THREE TINTS—White, Flesh-colour, and Cream.
Can be ordered of all the best Chemists and Hairdressers.
PRICE ONE SHILLING. BY POST, 1s. 2d.

THE LILLIE SYNDICATE (P. DEPT.), 3 HENRIETTA STREET, STRAND, LONDON, W.C.

Digitized by Google

IN THESE DAYS OF HIGH PRESSURE

when the incessant grind, necessary for a decent existence, is severe enough to knock vital sparks out of the constitutions of the best of us, who shall deny that they are wise in their generation who, without waiting for a danger signal, appeal periodically to some proved medicine which can be implicitly trusted to cleanse and renovate the marvellous mechanism of the human system? At no time since the days of Adam have breadwinners, whether man or woman, stood in such pressing need as they do nowadays of a sure, convenient, and, at the same time, perfectly harmless antidote against brain fag, irritability, and drooping spirits. Well, to balance the bitters, you will generally, even in this hard world, find the genuine sweets somewhere, and undoubtedly it is just here where . . . . . .

BEECHAM'S PILLS

come cheerfully, and cheaply, to the rescue. A remedy always pleasantly speedy—for we have no time to rest by the way—certain in its curative powers, safe and gentle in its action, and permanent in its results, is it any wonder that Beecham's Pills have found, and are ever finding, their way into the waistcoat pocket of every wise man and into the cupboards of every thoughtful woman—maid or matron? Beecham's Pills have long been prized for their distinct virtue of pleasingly appealing to the brain viâ the stomach, and by dispersing all "cobwebs," at once fitting us to face the struggle of modern life. Vast numbers owe their good health to Beecham's Pills—nay, more, we repeat the old, bold, but honest statement that Beecham's Pills save thousands of lives yearly. Therefore, we consider the forcible assertion that first caught your eye on this page to be the truth—viz., that "in these days of high pressure" Beecham's Pills

ARE AN ABSOLUTE NECESSITY.

Worth a Guinea a Box.

BEECHAM'S PILLS

CONTAINS 56 PILLS.

FOR ALL

BILIOUS and NERVOUS DISORDERS,

Sick Headache, Constipation,

Weak Stomach, Impaired Digestion,

Disordered Liver, and Female Ailments.

The Sale now EXCEEDS SIX MILLION BOXES per Annum.

Prepared only by the Proprietor, THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.

Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere, in Boxes, 1/1½ and 2/9 each. Full Directions with each Box.

Digitized by Google

OUR NEW £1,000 PRIZE. £25 FOR NEWSAGENTS AND BOOKSTALL CLERKS.

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

No. 532. FOR WEEK ENDING MARCH 11TH, 1899. [ONE PENNY.

Digitized by Google

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

COFFEE WITHOUT DREGS.

GOOD! ITS MASON'S

An agreeable, stimulating and sustaining beverage. Instantly prepared and most economical. Equal to the very finest coffee. Highly recommended by the Medical Profession.

Of all Grocers and Stores, or a Sample Bottle post free for 9 stamps.

ALSO TRY

MASON'S WINE ESSENCES

AND

MASON'S EXTRACT OF HERBS.

Sample Bottle of either sent free for 9d.; two assorted 1/3 three assorted 1/8.

Agents Wanted.

Manufacturers—

NEWBALL & MASON, NOTTINGHAM.

"WORTH A GUINEA A BOX."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

FOR ALL

BILIOUS & NERVOUS DISORDERS,

SUCH AS

Sick Headache, Constipation, Weak Stomach, Impaired Digestion, Disordered Liver & Female Ailments.

SALE NOW OVER SIX MILLIONS YEARLY.

In Boxes, 1s. 1½d., and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.

Prepared only by the Proprietor,

THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.

Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere.

GOOD FELT HAT, Black, Navy, Brown or Grey 2/6. Carriage 4d.

THE John Noble

HALF-GUINEA COSTUMES

promptly sent by Parcel Post, safely packed, direct from the Largest Firm of Costumiers in the World, and made to look smart and yield faithful service.

TRIMMED HAT, as sketch, 5/11. Carriage 4d.

Model 984.

Exceedingly well-made and carefully finished Chesterfield Coat, and full-wide Tailor Skirt. Price complete Costume, 10/6; carriage 6d. Skirt alone, 5/6; carriage 5d. Good value. 10/6

Stylish blouse bodice and neat skirt. Bodice lined through, and made with prettily gathered front and shaped belt, as sketch. Lengths and Prices: 6/11 7/11 8/11 9/11 ea. 35 38 42 46 in. } Carriage 5d. extra. 6/11

Lengths are from top of neck-band to bottom of skirt in front.

PRETTY MAID'S COSTUME Model 1016.

These Costumes are supplied in the following two good durable Cloths:
I. John Noble Cheviot Serge, weighty and weather-resisting.
II. John Noble Costume Coating, smooth-surfaced and of medium weight

PATTERNS SENT POST FREE,

together with the Illustrated Annual Sale List. Please mention Short Stories when writing.

A FULL DRESS LENGTH of either cloth (6yd. 52in. wide) for 7/6. Carriage 8d. 7/6

COLOURS of all Costumes are Black, Navy, Electric, Brown, Ruby, Myrtle, Fawn, Grey, Moss, Sage Green, and Purple.

THE THREE SIZES IN STOCK are 34, 36, and 38 in. round bust (under arms). Waists 24, 26, 28 in.; Skirts being 38, 40, and 42 in. long in front.

Any other size can be specially made to measure 1/6 extra.

BANKERS: "London City & Midland Bank Ltd." Please name "Short Stories" when writing to

JOHN NOBLE LTD., Brook St. Mills, MANCHESTER.

You will be pleased with CHANCELLOR SOAPS.

That's why we want YOU to try them. As First Prize we offer a £300 HOUSE, and hundreds of other prizes. By using Chancellor Soaps and saving your wrappers till June you get the best and cheapest Soaps extant, you may get the House or a 50 guinea Piano, you will probably get a splendid Lady's Silver Watch, or if not you must get a money Prize.

Every Competitor gets one.

GET A BAR TO-DAY!

Won't You?

Send 4d. for Sample Bar

GIVEN AWAY

HUNDREDS OF POUNDS IN PRIZES - EVERY COMPETITOR GETS ONE OR A £300 HOUSE

LIBERAL PAYMENT FOR WRAPPERS. PARTICULARS WITH EACH 2½d AND 3d BAR.

CHANCELLOR SOAPS

to 13 Clerkenwell Road, London.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

No. 532. ONE PENNY.

For the Week ending March 11th, 1899.

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON

Jean Barlow's Story.

"EXTRA special!" The words were bawled in my ear as I was hurrying into Charing Cross Station with just three minutes to spare before the train for Wrexley started.

Still, I wanted an evening paper, so seized one, fumbled for and found a copper, then dashed on to the platform and jumped into my train, only just in time, as it began to move a minute afterwards.

The compartment was "3rd class," and there was one other occupant, a man.

I began to read my paper. I had been staying in Scotland, in the extreme north, for a fortnight, where news got stale before it reached me, so I quite enjoyed the knowledge that I held in my hands the latest news of the day. I glanced over the "House" column, read the Foreign intelligence, skimmed a "leader,"—then—the name of my own village caught my eye—it was in a heading:

"Dreadful murder at Wrexley," and the paragraph below ran as follows:

The list of murderers, men and women is, alas! a long one, but in this instance the case is peculiarly shocking, as the accused, by name Jean Barlow, is only aged eighteen.

It appears that, on Sunday the 8th, James Brown, carter, was found lying dead in a lane near Wrexley. There were signs of violence on his body, but death had been caused by a heavy blow from some instrument which had such force as to kill him instantaneously. The police were very much puzzled at first, but afterwards, a heavy, knobbed stick with a leaden top was found close to the scene of the murder.

Beside the murdered man stood Jean Barlow (now in custody).

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

Her limbs had evidently become partially paralysed with terror and had refused to carry her from the spot where lay the victim of her crime.

When she was taken into custody, the girl said nothing, when questioned, refused to answer—and we are informed that no word of any kind has passed her lips since she was found standing beside the dead man clutching (of all things!) a prayer-book.

Inside this book, on the fly-leaf was written: "To my sweetheart Jean from Jack Reynolds."

The book gives no clue, as it belongs to Jean Barlow herself, and she was engaged to the above-mentioned Jack Reynolds. The only difficulty is, how could a girl (slender and of medium height as she is described to be) attack and kill a big man.

The police answer this, by saying that James Brown was struck from behind—and that the marks on his body may have been the results of some other fight, as James Brown was rather addicted to pugilistic exercise.

The stick which had been found belonged (so four different witnesses allege) to Jean Barlow's father, long since dead. So far, the evidence seems very much against the opinion held by a small number of persons, namely that Jean Barlow was not the criminal.

However, in a day or two, there will doubtless be further developments.

As I came to the end of this paragraph, the paper dropped from my hand.

"Little Jean Barlow! Good Heavens! Our old gardener's orphan daughter! Impossible!"

So ran my thoughts.

I turned away from the passing landscape which seemed at that moment only a series of blurred, meaningless views—and noticed that the man who sat opposite me was regarding me fixedly.

"I dare say you have seen the case of Jean Barlow?" he queried; "no wonder you are shocked! It is a terrible thing that one so young——"

"It is an infernal lie," I said hotly. "Jean Barlow lives in my own village, at Wrexley, and a sweeter, more gentle, more womanly woman never lived!"

"Hum," said the stranger; "such assertions won't count for much in the evidence, I don't think."

There was a covert sneer in his voice which I strongly resented.

"What interest have you in the matter?" I asked sharply.

"None very special," he said calmly; "only I happen to be her brother."

"Merciful Providence!" I ejaculated. "Her brother! Then you ought to be ashamed of yourself for even suspecting her to be capable of such a deed!"

"Ought I?" he asked lightly.

"Time will show. Opinions differ; I stick to my own."

"It is a false one," I said violently.

"Perhaps so," he returned in a slow, drawling voice, enough to exasperate anyone in itself.

"As you have put the question to me," he said, "I suppose I have an equal right to ask you why you take such an interest in this case?"

"Certainly," I said shortly. "Jean Barlow's mother was a very faithful servant to my mother, and we have always taken a deep interest in her children, left orphans at a very early age—I presume that you are the half-brother of whom I have sometimes heard Jean speak, the son of Barlow's first wife?"

"Just so—and I am now on my way to Wrexley to investigate this matter—I suppose I am speaking to the young Squire—to Mr. Lynton?"

"That is my name," I told him, "and I am glad to hear that you are going to 'investigate' things at Wrexley, for I am one of those people who believe that 'truth will out,' and so, in your 'investigations' you will probably find that Jean is not guilty."

To my surprise, the man Barlow suddenly held out his hand.

"Thank you, Mr. Lynton," he said in a moved voice (how different from his former tone I can hardly describe). "Thank you, in Jean's name and my own. It is true I am only her half-brother, but I love the child—I was only trying you, to see on whose side you were—I have an intimate conviction that you are worthy of trust (Heaven grant that I am right!)—and so I am going to confide in you, a thing I rarely do to anyone—man or woman.

"But in this case you may be able to help me, as your father is a man 'having authority' where prisons are concerned, and I may require some 'red-tape' in the way of permissions in my work.

"I must first tell you that I am a detective by profession and my chief has given me this task as a special favour! (The irony of Life!)—He noticed the coincidence of my name being the same as 'the accused' with a smile and a joke, for he has not the least idea that 'Jean Barlow' and 'Paul Barlow detective' are in any way connected, and I thought it better not to mention that fact. I am now going to Wrexley, to see if I can extract any information from those dunderheads the Fellings (cousins to Jean) who were always hanging about the cottage where she lived with old Aunt Maggie (you know them sir?)."

"Yes, I do," I replied, "and I can tell you something else, and that is that Jack Reynolds, Jean's fiancé, is the best fellow who ever stepped, and that James Brown (a disappointed suitor) was furiously jealous, and would have given worlds to have stood in the other man's shoes."

"Ah!" said Barlow thoughtfully, "that is something to know. Jean didn't tell me these things. She is a shy lassie, and was doubtless afraid of being teased. Have those two ever had words?"

"Often," I said, "to Jean's extreme discomfort—but she patched up a kind of truce between them the very day before James Brown was murdered. I was at home, I remember, some weeks back, and she passed me in a lane—I stopped and talked to her for a while, and asked her how she kept the turbulent pair in order! My mother and I were laughing about it afterwards, and the other day she wrote to me (her letter was dated Saturday the 7th), and she told me, amongst other items of local news and gossip:

"'I have just seen pretty Jean Barlow; she tells me that she has bound James Brown by a bribe to keep the peace and that she felt like a bone between two dogs! I tell you this as I know how amused you have been over this village comedy!'"

"Did she tell you what that bribe was?" Barlow queried.

I shook my head.

"That is a pity," he remarked, "because (you mark my words, sir) that bribe was the cause, I don't doubt, of a fresh quarrel. The murder took place on a Sunday—the quarrel was over a prayer-book."

I gasped. "Over a prayer-book!" I repeated. "But it was Jean's prayer-book, given her by Jack Reynolds."

"Precisely. Had it been anybody else's prayer-book it wouldn't have been any clue in this instance."

"I give it up," I said. "I'm not a detective. But, one thing I do beg of you, and that is, that you will come and tell me of any further developments, and, if I can be of any use, I hope you know that you can rely upon me."

"I will certainly, and thank you, sir, very much. I have a plan in my head," he added, "and if I can't find out anything at Wrexley, I am going to try and see Jean in prison—there is where I shall want your help."

Digitized by Google

"And then?" I asked him.

"I will do a thing which goes sorely against the grain with me," Barlow said slowly, "but her life hangs in the balance, and it is a life which is a very precious one to me. My plan is this: To get Jean to confide in me—by promising secrecy—with a mental reservation to the effect that such a promise shall not be kept (unless her confession implicates herself, which Heaven forbid!)."

I shifted uncomfortably in my corner.

"It's an awfully underhand way of proceeding," I grumbled.

"Tell me a better plan," he said sharply, "and I will undertake to carry it out." At which I was silent.

After all, I thought, detectives' work is never above board, it can't be, or in nine cases out of ten, criminals would escape the law—so——"Do as you think best," I said resignedly.

Just then the train stopped at a small station. In got a woman and a boy.

The woman had an evening paper in her hand, and was very red in the face.

"The h'dea!" she said, "of hour Jean a-doin' such a thing!" (addressing the boy indignantly). "She who's 'ardly strong enough to do the 'ouse-work up at Maggie's, let alone knock big hulking fellows down like James Brown! The perlice 'ave just gone stark staring mad, that's wot it is doin'."

"I s'pects so," was Tom's laconic reply. He was evidently too sleepy to pay much attention.

I looked at Barlow.

"What she says is only common-sense," I said in a low voice.

"Of course," was his answer. "But time will show."

* * * * *

Paul Barlow is interviewing his sister in the prison to-day. So much I know, having obtained the order for him to see her. Afterwards he is to come and tell me with what results.

* * * * *

"Mr. Lionel to see you, sir," announced the butler.

By some intuition I knew that "Mr. Lionel" was Paul Barlow.

"Show him in here," I said (I was in my own "den"), "and Bennett——"

"Yes, sir."

"I don't wish to be disturbed while he is here."

"Very good, sir."

And Bennett departed to return presently and usher in Barlow.

We shook hands, but I waited until the door was shut to ask eagerly:

"Well, what news?"

Barlow's face was very white.

"Jean did not do it—I need hardly say that to you—but she knows who did and will not say."

"She will not say!" I exclaimed.

"Then it can be only one person——"

"A girl will not lightly contemplate hanging—unless for somebody's sake who is, to her, dearer than life."

"You are right—the man who did the deed can be no other than Jack Reynolds," Barlow said quickly; "but we have no data to go on—though I have constructed a theory of my own.

"It is this, that Jean gave, or rather lent her prayer-book—(the one given her by Jack Reynolds)—to James Brown, on condition of 'keeping the peace'—(you know what trifles are prized by men in love)—James Brown took it, but broke his word and flourished it in his rival's face on Sunday, when they met in that quiet lane where the murdered man was found. Jean doubtless snatched it from his hands.

"Jack began to upbraid her with being false to him—(you know how reason goes with men in love!)—James lost his temper and struck him—a fight ensued, and at last, Jack Reynolds picked up 'old' Barlow's (my father's) stick, and having grasped it by the wrong end, dealt James Brown that fatal blow.

"The stick was a queer-looking thing, just the kind to take a young man's fancy, and so, probably, Jean had given it to him.

"Seeing what he had done, Jack Reynolds took to flight, leaving Jean standing there, paralysed with fear horror and fright."

"Your theory is a very ingenious explanation of the mystery," I said, "but—I wish you could fit your saddle to some other horse. Do you think Jean will thank you for taking the rope from round her neck to fix it round that of her lover?"

"Bah," said Paul Barlow. "She can get another soon enough."

But I could see he did not mean what he said.

"You don't know women," was all I said.

"And do you profess to be a judge?" he asked smiling.

"No," I said quietly, "but it would take a cleverer man than either you or I, Barlow, to guage the height and the depth of a good woman's love and devotion."

His keen eyes softened.

"She is a good woman if there ever was one. The steadfast look in her eyes I can never for get when she said to me:

"'Don't fret about me Paul. We are all in God's hands. He who takes note of a humble sparrow falling to the ground, will not desert me in my hour of need. I have absolutely no fear—I trust in Him so utterly.'

"They were her last words to me—I wish I had her faith."

"I wish you had," I said gravely. "It is a gift we cannot value too highly."

After some more talk, Paul Barlow went away, and I did not see him again until the day of Jean's trial.

* * * * *

The Court was crowded.

The case promised to be one of great interest.

I made a point of being there.

I was painfully anxious to hear the trial to the end—above all, the verdict. I could see Jean's face clearly.

She was very pale—but her big blue eyes shone with so calm and steadfast a light that, to look at her, gave me a curious feeling of awe. The case proceeded.

As one witness after another was called up and gave their evidence, I could see plainly that it was all going dead against the prisoner.

Already, I seemed to see the judge putting on his black cap, already seemed to hear the ominous words which pronounce the murderer's sentence: "that she would be hanged by the neck till she be dead."

At last it drew towards its close—the judge was preparing to address the Jury before they retired, to issue forth presently with the words "Guilty," or "Not Guilty"—words on which a life depended—when suddenly, there was a disturbance in the outer court.

"Let me pass!" a shrill voice cried, and presently a tall thin old woman was led in by a policeman.

Digitized by Google

"She says she has important evidence to give, my Lord, bearing on this case," was his brief, business-like announcement.

The old woman was conducted to the witness-box, and duly swore in to speak "the truth, the whole truth, nothing but the truth."

There was perfect silence in the crowded court, unbroken even by the voice of the new witness for a moment.

She looked round.

Presently her eyes fell on Jean, standing pale but steadfast against the prisoner's bar.

"She is not guilty," the new witness said. "And, had I known that any human creature had been blamed for James Brown's murder she would not be standing there now. The murderer of James Brown,—sir,—was——"

She paused, and the pause was breathless—"Henry Webber, my idiot son."

A great murmering of relief, excitement, and what not, passed through the crowd like a wave, then there was once more silence, and the poor mother resumed her narrative. "On Sunday, the 8th, my son Henry was very restless, he went down to Maggie Barlow's cottage and stole a stick there which used to belong to Jean's father. He told me that he had taken it, because he wished to kill James Brown who had mocked him the day before, being silly with too much drink, I paid no heed to his words, he being weak in his head and for ever talking nonsense. But, on coming home from morning service, I heard sounds of fighting, and going into the lane from where those sounds came, I was just in time to see my boy, in a fit of mad fury, strike the blow which gave James Brown his death.

"I hurried forward, seized Henry by the arm, flung the stick away and led him home. Next morning, all remembrance of the scene had vanished from his brain. (He is weak in his head, sir, as I said before.)

"And I—how could I tell?—put the rope round the neck of my own son! So I took him away to a little place where I have a brother farming, intending to keep quiet until this had all blown over. But, yesterday, a newspaper arrived, it had been used to wrap a piece of bacon in—I smoothed it out to read it, and came upon the account of Jean's trial—and how, it was more than likely she'd be hanged. Sir—I could not, even to save my boy, allow so great a wrong. I have no more to say."

From my corner, I was watching Jean's sweet face, and I saw her expression change from relief to gladness, from gladness to surprise, then, her hands were clasped, and I knew, without words, that she was thanking God for having so rewarded her trust.

The Judge spoke gently to the witness. "The crimes of those afflicted with insanity," he said, "are not treated like those who are in full possession of their minds. Your son is no longer in a fit state to be at large. His case must be looked into by the doctors—and, if it is proved that he is of unsound mind, he will be placed under confinement. This is only just and necessary."

He said no more, and Mrs. Webber came out of the witness-box crying.

My heart bled for her—I knew her well. She was the wife of the village attorney, a highly respectable, superior woman.

At last, all was over—and Jean, our little Jean, was free. She herself, when somewhat recovered from all she had gone through, gave me an account of her behaviour, and of the awful fears she had entertained.

It appeared that the "bribe" she had given James Brown was the loan of her prayer-book. He had promised her jokingly "to come to Church and forgive his enemies" if she acceded to his request, which was the loan of the afore-mentioned book.

She had barely got home from the morning service, when one of her cousins ran into her calling out:

"Run Jean, run, Jem Brown and Jack have come to blows."

The boy has since confessed that he only did this to get a "rise" out of her.

Jean ran—retracing her steps towards the Church, and found James Brown lying dead beside the ditch—her prayer-book lying close by.

She picked it up mechanically and was still standing, rooted to the spot with horror, when two mounted police happened to ride by.

The rest of the story is known—except that Jean, when she heard about the leaden-topped stick, made up her mind that it was Jack Reynolds who had done the deed. He had admired the stick the day before, and she had told him he should have it for his own if he would come to fetch it on Sunday.

Seeing it gone from its accustomed place on her return from Church, she concluded that he had been in to fetch it, and wondered why he had not waited to see her when she came home from church as he usually did. Then came the foolish boy's fib—which roused her worst fears—and, when she found James Brown lying dead, she made up her mind that Jack Reynolds, in a fit of passion, had killed him.

So that her feelings of surprise, relief, and gladness, on hearing that the murder was done by Mrs. Webber's idiot son, can hardly be described.

Before that, she had fully made up her mind to bear the full brunt of the accusation until the end, even it she had to lay down her life to save Jack Reynolds.

"Jean is more than a woman!" I ejaculated, admiringly. But Paul Barlow shook his head.

"She is only a woman," he affirmed, "but a woman of the stamp men love and honour still when their beauty fades and old age robs them of outward charms, a woman who is not ashamed to exercise a woman's highest privilege"

"And that is?" I queried.

"To love," he answered, "and love divinely."

So I will end, having no more to say, but I had to write down what I knew of Jean Barlow's story.

Constance Craigie Halkett.

Digitized by Google

- A PRIZE OF -

£1,000 FOR A "S.S." READER.

£1,000 £1,000

£25 FOR A NEWSAGENT! £50 FOR WITNESSES!

- - MAKING A TOTAL OF £1,075! - -

THE BIGGEST PRIZE EVER OFFERED FOR SO SIMPLE A TASK.

TO win this substantial sum of money, all you have to do is to fill up the coupon below, giving in the proper place the number of births and the number of deaths which will occur in the thirty-three great towns in the United Kingdom for the week ending April 22nd, 1899.

Then write down your name and address, and ask five of your friends to write their names and addresses in the spaces provided. Any coupon not bearing these names will be disqualified.

Also ask the newsagent or bookstall clerk, from whom you obtained this copy of "S.S." to insert his name and address in the space provided. Although such a course is obviously to his advantage, it is not compulsory for the coupon to bear his signature.

Witnesses, newsagents, and bookstall clerks may sign any number of coupons, and competitors may sign each other's as witnesses.

To the person whose attempt is correct we will pay the sum of £1,000.

To the newsagent or bookstall clerk whose name appears on the winning coupon we will pay the sum of £25, and £5 to each of the boys attached to the bookstall from which the paper was bought.

To each of the witnesses whose names appear on the winning coupon we will pay the sum of £10.

As a guide to your estimate we give below the number of Births and Deaths which have taken place in the thirty-three largest towns in the United Kingdom for the corresponding period for the past three years.

The figures as published by the Registrar-General will be taken as correct. On December 2nd, 1898, a competition similar to this was declared legal by the Appeal Court.

Registered during the Week Ending April 25th, 1896.		Registered during the Week Ending April 24th, 1897.		Registered during the Week Ending April 23rd, 1898.
Births.	Deaths.	Births.	Deaths.	Births.	Deaths.
6,783	4,062	6,226	3,965	7,202	3,905

If no competitor estimates the correct number of births and deaths, the £1,000 will be awarded to the individual whose forecast is most nearly correct.

In the event of two or more persons being correct, the £1,000 will be divided amongst them. This condition applies also to the £25 for the newsagent or bookstall clerk, the £5 for the boys, and £10 for each of the persons who sign the winning coupons.

One competitor may send in any number of attempts, but each coupon must be signed by five persons under the conditions mentioned above.

It must be clearly understood that all persons who enter for this competition must abide by the decision of the Editor in any question that may arise in connection with the competition.

All attempts to be addressed to the Editor, Short Stories, Henrietta Street, London, W.C., and the envelope to be marked in the left-hand corner with the word: "Births."

THE COMPETITION CLOSES ON MONDAY, APRIL 17th.

My estimate is { Births ..... / Deaths ..... } Write in large figures.

Name .....

Address .....

.....

Signatures of five people:

1. .....
2. .....
3. .....
4. .....
5. .....

Newsagent or Bookstall Clerk * .....

.....

* If a bookstall clerk the name of the station will be sufficient.

THIS PRIZE IS OFFERED IN CONJUNCTION WITH "PEARSON'S WEEKLY," "HOME NOTES," "SUNDAY READER," "BIG BUDGET," "PICK-ME-UP," AND "PASTIMES."

Digitized by Google

OUR ATTENTIVE WAITER.

In the first place, I wish it distinctly understood that my hair is not red.

Flo insists that it is, and takes a wicked delight in calling me "Carrots" whenever there is anyone to hear her. But when a girl has verses made in honour of her locks which describes them as:

Ambrosial masses, bronze-hued in the shade,
But burning with the glimmer of deal gold where sunlight falls,

I think she is fully justified in calling her hair auburn, and in defending it against sarcastic attacks.

Yet, after she has passed thirty by several years, I presume that such vanities become ridiculous; they should be laid away somewhere, in a little box, with the fan and faded roses of her first ball and other cherished mementoes of her past girlhood, to be taken out and looked over only in secret, on a rainy afternoon, when she is in the mood for memories—and tears.

It was five years ago that Flo and I did Switzerland, with Aunt Mary for chaperon, and when sight-seeing had been pushed to the utmost limit of human endurance Aunt Mary gave out, and said she must go and rest for a time where there were no mountains that must be climbed and no mules to be ridden.

So we settled upon Interlaken, and decided to make it our headquarters for a fortnight's stay.

The evening we arrived it poured in torrents, and when we reached the landing at Interlaken we made a rush for the first omnibus that looked inviting and were driven at once to the Hotel de l'Imperatrice Victoria.

It was half-past nine next morning before we were ready for petit déjeuner, served in the dining-room, where we were almost the only guests, the others having started on their rounds.

We therefore monopolised the entire attention of our waiter, and as he moved noiselessly about, serving us with that quick intuition of our wishes that marks perfect training, I could not but observe what a remarkably refined-looking man he was.

Tall, straight, with light moustache and hair that stood up from his forehead, he had quite the appearance of "the distinguished foreigner." He spoke English fluently, though with a slight French accent, and answered with the utmost intelligence and politeness all the questions that we put to him in regard to Interlaken and its surroundings.

When we rose to leave the table he drew our chairs away and preceded us to door, which he flung open, standing aside for us to pass with a bow that would have done credit to a courtier.

I felt rather than saw that his quick, bright eyes were fixed upon us and that he was regarding me particularly—but there was nothing impertinent in his gaze.

While Flo and Aunt Mary went upstairs for their hats and sunshades, preparatory to a stroll among the shops, I sauntered out upon the broad lawn, when a voice behind me said, politely:

"Your pardon, mademoiselle, but I think you left this in the dining-room."

Turning, I beheld our waiter holding in his outstretched arms my white woollen shawl, which I now remembered having tossed into the chair next to mine when I entered the room.

"Oh, thank you very much," I said; I was about to take it from him when, with a quick movement, he flung it lightly about my shoulders.

"The mornings are cool; I feared you might need it, mademoiselle, and so took the liberty of bringing it to you. Again I ask your pardon." He bowed respectively and withdrew.

While he spoke, his nervous eyes had rested with a most peculiar expression upon my face; but in spite of the familiarity of his action, his manner had been perfectly deferential. I gazed after him in blank surprise, scarcely knowing whether to be annoyed or amused; and just then Flo and Aunt Mary came down, ready for their walk, and we set out.

We were charmed with Interlaken, with the situation, with the scenery, with the people. We were as comfortable as possible. Our hotel was a model one. But I think that which more than all contributed to the enjoyment of our stay was the attention of Carl, our waiter.

From that first morning, he had, as it were, taken us under his special protection and left nothing undone that could add to our comfort.

He was quick to see what was needed, so solicitous of our welfare, and yet, with it all, so perfectly respectful that it was a pleasure to have him about.

Sometimes, indeed, it struck me that he was a little more attentive to my wants than to those of Flo and Aunt Mary.

If, for instance, I happened to leave my wrap or my book upstairs, he noticed their absence at once and ran to fetch them for me; and now and then I would catch his eye fixed upon me with that peculiar expression that I had noticed on the day he brought me my shawl. But, as the others did not appear to observe this, I suppose it was my imagination.

On one or two occasions he had brought to my door some flowers which he said had been left from those provided for the table decorations and which he thought I might enjoy.

It struck me at the time that this was, perhaps, just a little—but then, how could I refuse? He certainly meant it only as a kindness, and though it was not quite what one would have expected from a waiter, I should have hurt his feeling had I not accepted them. Besides, Flo said I had done quite right, though she laughed about it for a long time afterwards.

Whenever we left the dining-room Carl always contrived to be near the door, and as we passed out he would make some pleasant remark—generally to me. Of course, there was very little opportunity for him to converse with me, except during breakfast, which I usually took by myself, as Flo and Aunt Mary made it a regular practice to sleep late every morning. Then Carl and I would have quiet little talks together, and it was through them that I learnt something of his history.

Digitized by Google

As I had always surmised, he had been born to a position in life quite different from that which he now occupied. His father and mother were Alsatians—people of some account in Strasburg—and he had himself been at one time tutor in French and German in the family of an English gentleman. But reverses had come and "Fate had been his enemy," as he touchingly expressed it, until now he was reduced to serve as a waiter.

"But surely," said I one day, when he had been telling me of his woes, "surely with your education and accomplishments you need not stay here, you can find a position and work more worthy of you?"

He shook his head sadly. "Mademoiselle does not know all," he said. "There are some reasons which cannot be explained. I have a duty to perform for my unhappy country, bound under the hated foreign yoke." Then bending low, he whispered:

"My name is not Carl; that is the name of a German—a tyrant!"

"But in some other country where you are not known," I urged. "In England; surely there is a field for you?"

He shook his head again. "It is my oath, mademoiselle. I am pledged on my honour to remain here. You cannot understand, because I cannot explain."

And then he hinted darkly at a political embassy upon which he was employed—a mission for his country which rendered his incognito a necessity.

As I rose from the table I heard something strike the floor at my side. It was the amber pin which I usually wore in my hair, and which had in some unaccountable way become loosened. I was scarcely aware that it had fallen when Carl's quick eyes spied it, and before I could stretch out my hand to take it from him, with a deft movement he had replaced it in my hair.

"Pardon me, mademoiselle," he said, as he drew back his hand. "Perhaps I should not have taken the liberty, but it was a service for you—and—your hair, it was so beautiful. I could not help it."

What could I say? He should not have done it, of course, it was frightfully familiar. And yet his manner was so respectful that it was impossible to take offence.

We had been ten days at Interlaken, and intended to stay a fortnight, but during that evening Aunt Mary received a letter from a friend who was ill at Lucerne, which necessitated our making a change of plans, and going away in the morning. "So, girls, this will be our last night here," she said. "You must get your trunks ready for an early start."

As she spoke I heard a deep, long-drawn sigh, so near to me that I was fairly startled. At first I thought it came from Flo, but on turning to look at her I saw that, though she was evidently struggling with some emotion and was choking and gasping over her soup in a way that bade fair to end in strangulation, the motion appeared to be only suppressed laughter.

The sigh could, then, have only come from Carl, who, as usual, stood directly behind my chair.

"Poor fellow," thought I; "I suppose he is thinking of his oath and his duty; no wonder he feels sad." And when, a moment later, he passed me the bread, I took a piece, which I did not want, out of pure sympathy for him and because to refuse it seemed somehow like slighting him.

As soon as dinner was over Aunt Mary went to her room to do her packing. Flo asked me to join her in a farewell shopping excursion, but I declined, for I hate shopping and preferred to spend the last evening in the society of the Jungfrau.

So off she went with some friends, mumbling some rubbish or other about sentiment and moonlight—Flo has no appreciation of Nature, and is always teasing me about what she is pleased to term my "sentimentality."

It was a heavenly night. I strolled idly along the promenade, enjoying the loveliness of the scene. The long row of hotels that fronted the promenade were all brilliant with electric light and thronged with merry people.

In the garden of one of them, beneath the spreading chestnuts, a band of Neapolitans, gaily costumed in red and white, were singing the popular songs of Italy. They played divinely, and I sank down on one of the benches beneath the trees of the promenade to listen to them.

I fell into a reverie and sat there listening, scarcely conscious of the passing of the time and but half aware that someone had come up and was standing but a few feet from me.

A deep, long-drawn sigh startled me to a sense of my surroundings, and, turning my head quickly, I perceived the figure of a man just behind me. He stood well in the shadow, so that I could not see his face; but in the slim erect figure and the manner of holding his hands behind his back I recognised Carl, our waiter.

"Oh, Carl! how you startled me," I said, as soon as I had recovered from the surprise which his presence caused me.

"Pardon me, mademoiselle, if I intruded," he said, gently, moving a step nearer. "But I did not mean to alarm you. I, too, have been listening to the music, and I thought there could be no harm—"

"Why, of course, there is no harm, Carl," I answered, kindly. "The music is lovely. I have been making the most of my last evening here; we leave in the morning for Lucerne."

"Yes, I know that," he replied, sighing again; "I know that it is the last night." His tone was wonderfully sad, but I supposed it was his own affairs that troubled him—I never thought of connecting his sorrow in any way with my departure.

"I shall be sorry to leave, too," I continued, dreamily. "It is so quiet and beautiful here, and everyone has been so kind to us. I am sure I shall not find Lucerne half so charming."

"And must you, then, really go, mademoiselle?" he asked, eagerly. "Can you not remain, since you are so satisfied here?"

"I fear not, Carl," I answered, laughing. "My aunt would scarcely be willing to leave me by myself."

"Ah, true; I had forgotten," he murmured, lapsing into silence again.

"It seems so strange," I continued, half to myself, "to find a place where one is quite content; to settle down and live there; to actually become a part of it for a few weeks, and then to pass on, perhaps never to return."

"Ah, no, no, mademoiselle! Do not, I pray you—do not say that!" he cried. "You do not know what you are saying—what your words are to me—you, so kind, so good, so sympathetic——."

"Why, Carl!" said I smilingly, looking round at him in surprise. "You are excited, surely. It is pleasant to think that we perhaps have helped you a little, but we must go on, of course; that is to be expected. Surely that is something that happens to all of us."

Digitized by Google

"Yes. it is always so," he said, gloomily; "with places, with persons, with everything. We see them, we are fascinated by them, we strive after them, they become our ideals, and then—they pass out of our lives for ever."

"Ah, but that need not be so; that is not true if one is determined that they shall not pass out of one's life," said I.

He came a step nearer and laid his hand on the back of the seat.

"You really mean that, mademoiselle?" he said, his breath coming fast. "You mean that it is possible to hold one's—to one's ideals in spite of fate?"

"Assuredly it is," said I, "if one sets about it in the right way."

"And how is that?" he asked with interest.

"It is because 'Fate,' as you call it, is merely a combination of circumstances, many of which lie distinctly within our control. All those who enter our lives, but especially those by whom we are attracted, leave their impress upon our characters—an impress which we cannot altogether obliterate, but which we may strengthen, if we will, by constantly holding up to ourselves for contemplation and imitation those qualities in them which we love and admire, till we ourselves gradually draw nearer and nearer in spirit to our ideals."

I spoke, perhaps, with unnecessary fervour, quite forgetting, in setting forth a favourite theory, that I was addressing only a waiter. But the effect upon him was electrical.

"Ah, mademoiselle, you give me hope!" he cried, eagerly; and as I turned to look at him, wondering at his intensity, he held up his hand to implore my silence while he continued rapidly: "Mademoiselle, from time to time I have told you somewhat of myself—of my history—to which you have listened with the patience, with the sympathy of an angel. You know that I am not—how do you say it?—in my true station; that I am forced to occupy a position lower than that for which I am fitted. But, oh! mademoiselle, you do not know how, ever since I have seen you, I have been another man. How it has been the delight of my life to be near you—to wait upon you! How all the years I have suffered have been wiped away in the delight of your presence!"

"No, do not stop me, mademoiselle, I beg," he implored, as I rose overcome by surprise at his speech.

"Your own words have given me courage, have given me hope. You tell me that an ideal may be won, may be held in spite of all. Then pardon me, mademoiselle, if I ask you—if I dare to ask you—to listen to my plea. I am only a waiter, and you a lady—perhaps a great lady—I do not know; but if you knew, if you could guess how much you are to me, you would take pity. With you to help me, I could go on; could fight against this cruel fate that holds me down. You would inspire me to be myself—to overcome——" He stopped, his voice quivering with the intense emotion of his plea.

As for me, I was too utterly overwhelmed with astonishment to speak for a moment. "Do you mean to say—to ask me——" I managed to gasp at last.

"Yes, yes, that is it!" he interrupted, eagerly. "I mean to say that I love you, that I want——"

"Oh, hush! for Heaven's sake, hush!" I cried fearful lest someone should overhear us. "What can I do; what can I say to you?" I wailed. "How could I dream that you felt so towards me? What have I done to make you speak so to me?"

I felt indignant; and yet, unconsciously, by my own words I had actually given him encouragement. I could not, therefore, blame him wholly, and to treat with contempt a declaration so manifestly sincere, although so out of place, would have been heartless. As well as I could for nervousness, I gathered up my wits and spoke to him.

"Carl," I said, "you have made a great mistake; and how grieved I am that it should be so I cannot tell you. What you desire is, of course, out of the question—is impossible—for many reasons. And yet, if all you say is true, if I have helped you, if in your difficult position it can still be a help to you to think of me as—as—an ideal—why, then I have no right to forbid you to do so. But, oh, it must be as an ideal only; you must not see me again; indeed, indeed, you must not. Now good-night, good-bye."

I held out my hand, he took it in both of his, bent over it a moment, and then let it go. I gathered up my shawl and fled back to the hotel, leaving him standing there motionless, his hands by his sides, his head bent forward on his breast.

Next morning we left Interlaken.

It is needless to say that breakfast was sent to my room, and I went direct to the carriage, so that Carl and I met no more. But I could not help my thoughts reverting to him with a pity in which there was nothing of contempt.

Often in the years that followed I saw him standing as I had left him—his head bent sorrowfully upon his breast. Yes, I thought tenderly of Carl, though in the eyes of the world the affair might have appeared ridiculous. I was glad that I had been a help to him. It was something to have been one man's ideal, chosen from among the whole world of women, even if that man was only a waiter.

* * * * *

Five years later Flo and I revisited Interlaken and stopped once more at the same hotel. To me the place seemed very little changed. The scenery was as lovely, the hotel quite as comfortable and our little German host as attentive as before. But Carl was there no longer.

I naturally felt a slight embarrassment in speaking of him, but curiosity got the better of me.

One evening while chatting with the proprietor in the hall, I turned the conversation in that direction.

"By the way," I asked quite casually, "à propos of waiters, what has become of a very excellent one whom you had in your employ when we were here before? A young German, or Alsatian, called, let me see, I think it was Carl."

The proprietor scanned me rather quizzically for a moment, and, I thought, with special attention to my hair.

"Oh, Carl," he said; "he vas in de mad-house; I tink it vas now five years."

"In a mad-house!" I gasped.

"Oh, yes," he said. "He vas mad like, how you say?—a hatter. He tought he vas all sorts of tings in de secret services of de country."

"And he was not?" I asked; "he has never been?"

"No; he had travelled much, and had read much books; but he never been noting at all only just a waiter. He had, vat you call it, the mania for red hair. It made him crazy-like. I remember, it vas five years ago, and ve had de unusual number of de red-haired ladies in de house dat summer. Vell, Carl, poor fellow, he couldn't stand it, de strain vas too much for him, he propose to dem all!"

Walter Wilson.

Digitized by Google

THE MISSING BONDS.

A BANK MYSTERY.

CHAPTER I.

CLOSE AT HAND.

THERE had been a full half-minute of expressive silence at the breakfast-table of old John Belford, the banker.

"Gideon!"

The old-fashioned name seemed set to a sort of conversational music by the rich, full tones which uttered it, and it was followed, in default of any instant reply, by:

"I'm going to do you a very great favour."

"You don't say so? Well, I'm ready; all my firmness is rallied."

"No, sir; you may finish your coffee."

"And then the astonishment?"

"You can have that now. I've tickets for the concert to-morrow evening, and you're to take me."

"Ruth, my dear!"

Mrs. Belford, from behind the urn, spoke quite suddenly, and Gideon showed his presence of mind by promptly remarking:

"Mrs. Belford, I'm deeply obliged to you. Those are the very words, only I should not have dared——"

The lady of the house was not at that moment smiling upon her husband's big, yellow-haired step-son. She even in a manner cut him off by repeating, in a tone of reproof:

"Ruth, my dear!" and then, after a dignified pause, she added, "did not Mr. Marvin Belford speak to you about this very concert?"

"Did he?" growled old John Belford from the other end of the table; "then Ruth's right. Self-preservation is the first law of nature."

"Ruth," said Gideon, "I'm your man. I'll save you at any cost."

"It will cost you nothing at all, sir, and the music will be good. Besides, I shall wear a new dress, and be unusually handsome. You will be a much envied man."

"And Marvin," smiled Gideon, "will love me better than ever, and I shall be happy."

Gideon Street did not look like a man to be much troubled by the opinions of other people, particularly of anybody he was just then thinking of. Neither did he bear the customary marks of a general favourite among men or women.

It is not easy to make a pet of a broad-shouldered, bearded Viking, with steel-gray eyes, and a deep voice.

Through all the explanatory remarks which followed, he was profoundly polite to Mrs. Belford, and a little more so to Ruth; but there was all the while a species of suppressed chuckle in ambush behind the politeness.

"Ruth Faraday," exclaimed Mrs. Belford at last, "you are much too severe upon your cousin. Marvin Belford is one of Nature's noblemen."

"He's not a cousin of mine, Aunt Carrie; and I must say I think that Nature might have done better."

"And not try very hard," muttered Gideon Street.

At that moment, Mr. Belford said to his wife:

"Now, Carrie, you must let us go. I want a talk with Gid in the library, about some business matters. You can have him, Ruth, after I've done with him."

"I don't want him, Uncle John. I'll be perfectly fair. He need not come near me again until it's time to start for the concert."

"That's fair," said Gideon.

"And even then I won't expect him to talk. All he really need do is to look round him and smile now and then, after I've led him to the right seats."

Her dark, brilliant eyes were dancing with fun, and Gideon, as he slowly rose from the table, thrust his face half-way across it with a remarkable contortion of his manly features, as he asked:

"Would something like this do?"

"Not if there were children."

"Well, you must put me in mind, you know. I can smile."

An hour or so later, without any smile at all upon his face, Gideon Street came out of John Belford's library.

He carried in one hand a Gladstone bag of respectable size, and on his hasty march towards the front door he muttered:

"Good! They've gone upstairs. Shan't have to answer any questions."

Behind him, in the luxurious library, the stalwart, grim old banker sat by the table in the centre, very much as if he were listening for the sound of the closing of the front door.

It came—a sharp, decisive sound—and his heavy fist fell upon the table with a thud.

"That's attended to," he said. "I believe I can trust him. There'll be music all round before a great while, but I don't believe I shall hear much of it. The rest of them, though, will all have tickets."

There was mention being made of tickets and music at that very moment in the drawing-room, for, although Mr. Marvin Belford had been there some time, he had been but a few minutes in the enjoyment of Ruth Faraday's conversation.

He was not so tall nor so strong a man as Gideon Street, but he was much better-looking, his eyes and hair were darker, and he was dressed with more care.

His response to Ruth's greeting had been made with a grace which did him credit, but the pair, had they been listening, might have heard the street door open and shut just as the young lady innocently remarked:

"The concert? Delightful? Yes, it will be no doubt. Mr. Street has promised to take me."

"Con—— him! You're booked already! Too late, am I? Now, Ruth, you might have known I should come. Gid Street, too!"

"Well, yes, I did think you possibly might, but I could not run any risk. I've been of age now these three days, and it's made me ever so much wiser than I used to be."

Digitized by Google

"Nothing could make you more beautiful, Ruth."

"Now, Mr. Belford, you must call me Miss Faraday. I'm quite taken with my new dignity and I mean to claim all its advantages."

"What? With me, Ruth?"

"Certainly. Why not?"

"I've known you from childhood. You used to call me your cousin, and Marvin, and——"

There was a touch of earnestness in his voice and manner, enough to suggest something more than a whim in Ruth's forethought concerning the concert.

Her interruption was baldly matter-of-fact.

"Oh, yes, Mr. Belford, that's all very true; but I insist upon being a grown-up young lady now. Call me Miss Faraday, and tell me whom you think you'll take to the concert, now you find I'm out of the question."

"Nobody on earth."

"Now, Mr. Belford! You're not acquainted anywhere else? Why can't you be good and unselfish, just for once, and ask some homely girl?"

"I declare I will! I'll get the ugliest, worst-dressed, most ill-tempered, cross-eyed——"

"Poor, too; don't forget that."

The rest of that conversation was not worth repeating on behalf of Marvin Belford.

It was a relief to him, at last, when Mrs. John Belford came into the room, called him her "dear nephew," and gave him the stately kiss of an admiring aunt.

It is quite possible she might have been doing better service in the library at that moment, in the part of a devoted wife.

There sat the banker yet, by the table, his grey head bowed upon his wrinkled hands, and the voice which came through them almost sepulchral:

"I can't quite make up my mind to it, but I know it's coming. It has waited a long time, but it will not wait much longer now. Glad I can trust Gid. It's a strange thing to think of, and to know it is so close at hand, after all these years. Coming—coming. I cannot make up my mind to it. She is a good girl, and I've loved her ever since she was born."

CHAPTER II.

The First Blow Falls.

There were five persons whose grave position or duty gave them access to the strong-room belonging to Belford Brothers, the well-known and highly-respected banking-house.

Of these, the first two, the heads of the house, John, and his brother, William, rarely looked into it.

Those who did so more frequently were the junior partner, Mr. Marvin Belford; the spectacled book-keeper, Mr. Ruggles; and Mr. Gideon Street, in his confidential capacity of cashier.

The minor dignitaries of the ancient house could all say, indeed, that they had often looked in upon the sombre security of that iron-bound cell; they had even awe-struck memories of having put their feet inside it; but not one of them had been entrusted with the keys of the massive locks.

But on the day after the events just narrated, there were five consecutive visitors to the strong room, and each in turn found some attraction for his eyes in a large oblong package, tied with cross-belts of red tape, which lay a little by itself on one of the lower shelves.

The ancient book-keeper did not touch the package but he bent his white head over it as he said:

"Miss Faraday's bonds? Well, they're a special deposit, but I wish they were somewhere else. It won't do for me to meddle; but her uncle ought to look out for that. I forgot: Mr. John Belford does not know exactly."

He shut his lips tightly and went out.

His place was soon after taken by the portly form of Mr. William Belford, more grim and stately than his brother John, and more a walking assurance of financial solvency.

He glanced round the safe, to see that all was right, and his cold brown eyes rested on the package.

"Ruth's fortune, eh? We must look out for that, for Marvin's sake. I must tell John to put it somewhere else. He doesn't know the real condition of things, but I can give him a reason for it."

His heavy, stately tread passed out of the strong-room, and he may have been correct as to his brother ignorance of peril to that package, for in less than ten minutes later John Belford was regarding "Ruth's fortune" with an iron smile, and hoarsely chuckling over it.

"That's safe, at all events. I owed that much to her mother. I'm glad nobody can touch it."

It was necessary, a little later, for Gideon Street to carry into the vault a small, japanned tin box, and the smile he turned upon the tape-bound parcel would have answered him admirably for skirmish uses at the concert on the coming evening.

"There it is. Ruth is more of an heiress than I thought for. The old gentleman's managed well for her."

The smile faded as he spoke, and its place was taken first by a crimson flush and then by a singular paleness.

"They're not for you, Gideon, my boy. Any fool can see that. Do your duty, but don't you let it make a fool of you."

Excellent words to be uttered in the strong-room of a bank, whether as a riddle, or an exhortation; and when he had taken one more look, he returned to his desk.

It was late in the day before Mr. Marvin Belford found any occasion for crossing that iron threshold, and when he did so, there were no eyes upon him.

He had a deposit to make, taking it from a travelling-bag which he carried in his hand.

It was an oblong package, fastened curiously with red tape, and when he put it down upon the shelf beside Ruth Faraday's fortune, he was certainly justified in remarking:

"No man alive could tell them apart. Even the tape is of the same width, and the creases in the paper come exactly right. A perfect pair of twins."

He was evidently pleased with the comparison he was making, but at the end of it he picked up one of the "twins," and slipped it into his hand-bag.

A change of mind, doubtless, and he had decided not to leave his deposit in the vault, for he carried that bag with him in his cab, after banking hours, when he went home. He seemed in low spirits, too, all the way, and it was probably well for him that he had in prospect an evening of amusement.

He went to the concert, truly, but he had failed to comply with the charitable suggestion of Ruth Faraday, for she herself could claim no great advantages over the well-dressed girl at the side of Marvin Belford.

"Shall I smile on him, Ruth?" asked Gideon. "I want to do so."

"Do, please—your very best. It's just what I've been doing."

Digitized by Google

"Yes, I saw; and he tried to smile back. Failed awfully. I'll give him a chance to try again if I catch his eye. He loves me."

"There! you hit him."

There are a few things which Ruth either had not yet learned, or had forgotten.

For instance, you may know a man for years and years, and you may respect him exceedingly; he may even be your uncle's step-son and live a good while in the same house with you, and yet you may not become the least bit in the world intimate with him—especially if you have it in your mind that you half-way dislike him, and can't tell why.

If, however, you begin to let him slip from "old acquaintance" into "old friend," there is no telling how far he will slip along the line—or you either. It is a very slippery line.

That night, however, Ruth was in remarkably high spirits, and Gideon had something upon his mind which absolutely compelled him to smile occasionally.

Mrs. John Belford had retired before her husband's niece returned from the concert, but he was up still, and he waylaid Ruth as she passed the library door.

"Come in, my dear," he said, as he slowly returned to his seat by the table.

"What is it, Uncle John?" Her fair face was yet flushed with excitement and pleasure as she stepped lightly in, but she quickly added: "Are you not well? Is there anything the matter?"

He was looking in her face earnestly and lovingly, but there was a white, strange shade on his features as of suppressed and bitter pain.

"Nothing at all, my dear. Listen to me: can you keep a secret?"

She was serious enough now, as she listened to those deep, ominous, all but tremulous tones.

"I can," she replied. "Try me."

"It may not seem a great one just now, but you must keep it. You are good friends with Gideon?"

"Good enough, Uncle John, especially this evening."

"The music was good?"

"A charming concert. But what about Gideon?"

"He is a man to be trusted. In a little while it will be necessary for you to trust someone. Trust him. Not anybody else."

"Not even you?"

"No, not even me. I am an old rascal. He is young and honest. No matter what turns up, trust Gideon Street."

"What can you mean?"

"Go to bed now. Keep your secret. One of these days you will know what I mean."

She tried again, but there was no breath of explanation to be obtained from the old gentleman. His face grew hard and his voice harsh, but he kept to himself all the remainder of his secret.

The next day things seemed to go on as usual, but if John Belford had intended a deep and cunning plot to increase the distance in Ruth Faraday's behaviour to Gideon, he had planned well, and with complete success. Even smiles across the table died like flowers in frost.

Gideon took it all with external calmness, and Ruth could not complain of any attempt on his part to break the barrier of ice she had so unaccountably raised.

The days went by for about a fortnight in a curiously chilly way, considering how fine was the bright October weather, and then there came a great sensation to a very wide social and financial "circle."

Gideon Street carried it down to the bank, and delivered it to Mr. William Belford and his son Marvin, on their arrival. A telegram sent earlier had missed them.

"Apoplexy? Dead in his bed? Marvin, come in with me at once. This is an awful blow!"

In half-a-minute more the two were closeted in the private office at the bank, leaving Gideon and Mr. Ruggles to spread the sensation as customers came in.

* * * * *

"Father," asked Marvin, "had you any suspicion of such a danger?"

"Knew he'd been in fear of it this long time. He was under medical treatment. Well, he's gone!—Marvin, this will precipitate matters. This will be a rough day, but you can keep all steady while I drive to John's house and back. I'll see Carrie, and give some directions, and then we must prepare——"

"For a storm? No, I don't see how it can come to-day."

"It will come. I've been fighting it off these ten years."

"Nobody knows there's any deficit any more than they did yesterday."

"You're not as old as I am. I can feel it in my bones."

He hurriedly left the bank, and drove away, and it did seem for awhile as if he had been under some mistake.

Not a breath of suspicion had ever blown upon the credit of Belford Brothers. In this, their hour of trial, they were entitled to all imaginable sympathy and business courtesy, and it was lavishly extended to them—especially the sympathy, in many and varied expressions thereof.

Still, as the day went by, and after William Belford's return, a good many people seemed to be in need of money, and those who had any right to draw on Belford Brothers "at sight" began to do so.

"We've weathered it, father," said Marvin, at three o'clock.

"How about to-morrow?"

"Well, the funeral won't be till the day after that——"

"John's or the bank's? I tell you, my boy, there is something in the air. That affair will have to come out if we suspend. There is one thing we might do——"

"Not with my consent."

"Never mind, now. I will think about it. That would tide us over, and we could arrange afterwards."

"Never! And we can weather it just as well without."

"Don't you be too sanguine. You'd better look in at John's with me on our way home."

That had been a dark day at the banker's residence.

Gideon Street had been glad to get away from it in the morning on the plea of business necessity. He had discovered, before going, that his affection for his step-father had been stronger than he knew, and so the blow fell on him the more heavily.

He had also been astonished at the extreme grief expressed by Ruth Faraday; but he had been greatly puzzled by a thing he heard her whispering to herself, as she leaned above the cold face of her uncle:

"I know now a part of what he meant. What can the rest of it be? This was coming then, and he knew it."

Gideon had not heard Mrs. Belford say, in the shelter of the curtained window:

"I'm glad my own property is settled on me. William will be in control of everything else."

Digitized by Google

Nevertheless, it was not without some show of reason that Gideon had remarked to Ruth, before he left the house:

"I will say just one word. I'm glad there's one person besides myself with heart enough to be genuinely sorry."

"Why, Gideon, I loved him."

"He loved you, too, and you will know it some day."

"I'm sure he thought everything of you. But I can't talk now. Do you think they will come here immediately."

"Of course they will. I don't mean to be here when they come."

Ruth was within a breath of saying: "I wish you would!" but she did not say it, and so, when William Belford and Marvin called to mingle their grief with that of the stricken household, Gideon was not there.

CHAPTER III.

An Awkward Discovery.

It was the middle of the day before the funeral, and the private room of the old banking-house contained only Mr. William Belford and his son. Business went on in the outer office in a manner strictly conformed to the needs and proprieties of so sombre a state of affairs,

"Marvin, it's only a loan."

"I protest!"

"You have no right as yet. If you and Ruth were already married, it would be different, I am my brother's sole executor."

"What of that, father? Ruth is of age. This is her own private property. You've no control. I doubt if Uncle John would have any by right, if he were alive."

"It's a deposit, Marvin; I won't break if I can help it!"

The oblong, tape-bound package lay on the table before him, and he tore it open with a movement so sudden, that Marvin's outstretched hand was all too late.

"What! What is this?"

"Mere waste paper!"

"Whose work is this?"

It was hard to say which face of those two was changing colour and expression the more rapidly as their eyes glanced from each other to the heap of rubbish on the table.

"Could Uncle John——"

"No, indeed! Nor old Ruggles. This is worse than the deficit. It is utter and everlasting ruin!"

"There is but one other man."

"Gideon! Call him in."

In a moment more Mr. William Bedford was sternly pointing to the contents of Ruth Faraday's special deposit and demanding:

"What does this mean, Mr. Street?"

"Rubbish, I should say. Why?"

"What do you know about it?"

"Nothing at all."

"Mr. Street, do you know we have found a large deficit in the books of this house?"

"Perfectly well."

"And now here is this robbery, evidently committed by someone who had access to the vault."

"It looks very bad indeed."

Not a hair of Gideon's yellow beard and moustache quivered, but the latter had a twitch in them as if they were beginning to curl a little.

"Have you any explanation to offer?" thundered the banker.

"Possibly I have. The plundering has been done quite systematically. I think it has required co-operative labour—say of two persons, at least."

"Sir, I will have you arrested!"

"A scapegoat would certainly be desirable, but I doubt if I am the right man. I shall certainly refuse to serve."

"Leave the room, sir!"

"I will, and I shall also immediately leave the bank, but not the town. I shall not run away, Mr. Belford."

"Go, sir! Go."

He went, not hastily, nor as one who had flight in his mind.

"Marvin, this is awful! We can stand it through to-day."

"To-morrow is the funeral, next day Sunday. We shall not open our doors again, father, now those drafts are coming."

"We can't pay ten shillings in the pound; but we shall manage to keep a-going till three o'clock."

So they did, but the air was becoming mysteriously filled with rumours undefined concerning the stability of the bereaved firm.

It was surprising how many men were ready to remark, "I don't know what to think about it; John was the backbone of the house." And he was dead, and that very evening his brother was compelled to remark to his widow, "There will be nothing to divide, Carrie."

"What, William! Nothing?"

"Not a shilling. There has been a heavy defalcation, heavy losses on top of it. Quite a run now, and more coming. The house will go into bankruptcy to-morrow."

"Oh, Mr. Belford," suddenly exclaimed Ruth, whose ears had lost no word he had been saying, "can I not help you? There are my bonds; take them. Uncle John said he had more than doubled the amount left me."

Mrs. Belford was staring at her brother-in-law in opened-eyed, silent astonishment, while he on his part seemed struggling with a great gasp of some kind, as he turned his head away from the tearful generosity in Ruth Faraday's face.

"Your bonds, my dear? There has been a robbery as well as a defalcation. Your fortune is all gone—every penny of it."

"Robbery? All gone? Who could have done it?"

"It's all a robbery!" all but Mrs. Belford screamed. "Who did it, William? Who did it?"

"Be calm, Carrie, be calm. It's an awful state of affairs. Tell me, did Gideon Street come home as usual?"

"Yes, but he went out again."

"I doubt if you will see him again very soon. Thank you for your kind offer Carrie. It is time for me to go."

"Do you suspect Gideon?"

"I will not say more now."

"I will, then," said Ruth firmly. "I do not suspect him. You must not do anything against him, so far as I am concerned."

"My dear, generous hearted girl, things must take their own course."

There was nothing Ruth could think of in reply to that, and, after Mr. Belford withdrew, she had quite enough to do in soothing the now hysterical grief of the bankrupt's widow.

Digitized by Google

Only one gleam of common-sense broke through the black cloud of all that wifely sorrow.

"Ruth Faraday," she said, "how could you be such a fool? If your fortune had been in your own hands, you'd have lent it to them, and you'd have lost it. It's just as well somebody stole it. I'm glad mine's safe, what there is of it. What will become of you?"

That was a question with which Ruth had not yet begun to wrestle but she saw that it must come, by the light Mrs. Belford let in upon her.

She said nothing at that moment, but she did a great deal of thinking all that evening, while she sat alone in the library wondering when Gideon Street would return and what could keep him so late. So late? It was very late; and the thought whispered to her at last that she would rather not see him when he came in, for she would not dare to tell him the dreadful things Mr. William Belford had said about him.

Gideon chose his own hour, and he did not return, but he was at the breakfast-table next morning, as usual.

He was all alone, for neither of the ladies came down. Then he went to his own room, and, some hours later, none of those who gathered to join in the solemn ceremonials of the occasion perceived, in his behaviour, or in that of any member of the Belford family, a trace of improper feeling, only the uncommunicative reserve of men and women in affliction.

Perhaps it was as much Ruth's fault as anyone's that Gideon Street, and not Marvin Belford, assisted her to a carriage, and took a vacant seat beside her.

All the proprieties were duly observed but in less than an hour after the return from the funeral, a couple of gentleman called to see Mr. Street.

He went out with them, and did not return that day; he did not even leave word where he was going, or send back any message to inform his anxious friends why he should not come back.

CHAPTER IV.

Hoist With His Own Petard.

That same night, it was well known in the financial community that Belford Brothers would never again open their doors for business. It was known, too, that there were "some particular nasty features" about the failure.

Mr. Marvin Belford's own room was, therefore, the most comfortable place for him to be in, and he was there; but he had been somewhere else first. He had spent an hour with Ruth Faraday, and he was evidently thinking about her now, as he sat and stared at the small bit of coal in the grate before him.

"I've been too fast with Ruth," he said aloud. "She's feeling awfully cut up just now, I ought to have waited. She'll come round, of course, when she wakes up to the facts of the case. Hasn't a glimmer of an idea what it is to work for a living. I shall have to play for a while, but it beats me what I'm to do about those things just now. It's a queer secret to keep, but I'll keep it. Yes, I will, if I have to keep it for ever."

There was something harshly husky in his voice as he uttered the last words.

He rose, and walked slowly to a trunk in a corner.

The door of the room was already locked, so that he was in no danger of intrusion, while he drew from the trunk, and placed upon his table an oblong, tape-bound package, remarking:

"I'll see what there is of it!"

In about half-a-minute more he had seen, and he was staggering back from the table with a large white envelope in his hand.

On the table, released from its careful wrapping, was a heap of old letters, and other worthless things, and Marvin Belford had not found a single word to express the feeling of astounded disappointment with which he had stripped their mockery bare.

That one envelope had lain on top, and was addressed in a large, firm hand to "William Belford Esq."

"I may as well open it," he gasped.

He did so, and the broad sheet of paper he unfolded from it bore only these words:

We are even now, my dear brother. Let us divide the deficit between us, You will not be able to lay your hands upon Ruth's fortune just now.

Affectionately,

John Belford.

"Divide it between them?" gasped Marvin. "I thought as much. All I took didn't make the matter any worse. So Uncle John swamped Ruth, too, did he? It's rough on me just now; but what if she had accepted me? I should have been in a box then."

There was comfort in his misery, therefore, and there was fire in the grate, and all that pile of rubbish would burn, including Uncle John's letter.

That was an uncomfortable evening for a great many people; but not one of all those who mourned for John Belford, or for the failure of the house of which he had been the head, passed the long hours more wretchedly than did Mr. Gideon Street.

There is hardly anything more trying to manly fortitude than an arrest on a felonious accusation, to be locked up over Sunday, to sit and eat one's heart out in solitude, with a prospect of possible years and years of just such looking-up in some lonely cell or other.

"It would be almost as bad to be let out now," said Gideon to himself more than once, "and have men look at me as they will."

Late in the night, as he lay there in the darkness other words burst from him:

"And she! Ruth Faraday, to think I am a thief And that I stole from her!"

It was not exactly a yell of agony, but it was a very good suppressed likeness of one.

He could send for a lawyer, even on Sunday, and he could be assured that his arrest was an unwarrantable, hasty proceeding, and that the magistrate would surely let him out again on Monday morning, after a few formalities, but something very black had settled over the soul of Gideon Street. He knew, as well as if he had been told, that the reason of his absence was now well understood at the residence of John Belford's widow.

What he did not know was that the news had been carried their by Marvin Belford, or how much of emphasis it had added to the replies made by Ruth Faraday to sundry gracefully, even passionately, tendered pleadings.

One night more, a dreadfully dark one, full of tempests out of doors, and marked by other tempests in some homes, and in such dim crypts as they lock up suspected felons in.

Gideon's man of law was right, nevertheless, and

Digitized by Google

before mid-day on Monday he was free to walk past the closed doors of the old banking-house.

He knew he was stared at by a number of men who passed him as he came up the street; but only one old acquaintance actually spoke to him.

"What's the cause of the failure?" was Gideon's reply. "Can't say. I'm told the money ran short, and they had to close. I left them the day before. You will have to ask somebody else."

Ruth Faraday was in her own room that afternoon when a servant knocked at the door and told her Mr. Street wished to see her.

"Tell him I'll come down immediately."

Then she sat down upon a trunk she had been packing.

"Gideon," she exclaimed. "I thought he was in prison. What shall I say to him? Guilty? No, indeed; I don't believe a word of it. If I keep waiting he will think I do."

He stood in the middle of the apartment when she flashed in, and she paused a moment.

He had never looked so very large, and strong, and noble, only his face was ghastly white.

"Miss Faraday—"

"Gideon, I don't believe it!"

"But, Miss Faraday, I spent last night, the day before and the night before that, in a police cell. I am dishonoured."

"You did not do it? You did not take their money, or my bonds?"

"Their money—the deficit?—it was gone before I entered the bank. But I did take your bonds, all of them."

"You did? Gideon!"

"Yes, I did. Your uncle gave them to me to keep for you, and I have kept them. Here they are."

She had seen the valise he was now opening. It had given her a swift thought that he was going away, but now he took from it a package which he tore open in her presence.

"Gideon—"

"They are all here, Miss Faraday. I have been true to my trust."

"Don't count them, Gideon; please don't! I would trust you with anything; I promised Uncle John I would. Did you say they put you in prison?"

She was close to him now, and looking up in his face. for the idea was growing upon her that he had somehow been suffering on her account, and the tears were in her eyes and voice.

"Never mind that, Miss Faraday. I can't leave, of course, till the investigation is over. I shall go then; but I wanted to put your property in your own hands as soon as possible."

A great storm was shaking him from head to foot, but his eye and voice were steady till her answer came.

"These things? What on earth can I do with them? Won't you take care of them for me? Wouldn't they help you to get into business, Gideon, or half of them?"

"Ruth Faraday!"

"You are not dishonoured; you are not disgraced. I don't believe a word of it. Won't you, Gideon? Please do."

The tears were pouring down her face in a great shower as she looked upon the terrible pain in his, and her hands went out to him in such a way that he could but take them; they seemed so eager to be taken.

"I suffered all yesterday," she cried, "after I knew what they had done to you."

The two pair of hands—the small ones and the very large ones—clung fast to each other for a moment, and a beautiful light dawned first in Ruth's face, and then in Gideon's.

"Ruth? Is it so, Ruth?"

"Gideon, I've been finding it out for two weeks, but it must have been so long ago."

"I found it out a year ago, and it all but killed me. Yesterday, all the night long, as I lay there——"

"Gideon, please do not! It is dreadful!"

His head had been bending lower and lower for some seconds, and he dropped one of her hands, that his arm might be free.

"Oh, Ruth, I can face anybody now. All the world."

Too much time could not be devoted to this interview, for it was due to Mrs. Belford that the state of affairs should be explained to her.

"I don't understand it at all, Ruth," was the widow's final comment. "It's all terrible. And so your fortune is safe, and you are engaged to Mr. Street, and nobody knew a word about it, and they put him in prison. It's enough to drive me out of my senses."

Ruth had yet another explanation to make that day, and it seemed to puzzle very much a pair of brisk-mannered gentlemen who called to see her on important business.

"Do we understand you aright, Miss Faraday? Do you mean to say you had no property in the hands of Belford Brothers?"

"Not any, sir. It was all removed some time ago—before the death of my uncle. I have not lost anything."

"But Mr. Street is accused——"

"No, he is not, sir; not by me. I am of full age. He has my entire confidence, and he is in entire charge of my business affairs."

"Ah! Certainly. Of course. I think we had better go: do you not, Mr. Johnson?"

"I suppose so. There's an awful leak in this business somewhere. 'Tisn't here."

Ruth Faraday had never in her life before appeared dignified and positive as she did while she was bowing out those two emissaries of law and justice, and there came a rustle of silk behind her as she did so.

"Ruth, dear, I'm so glad Mr. Street saved your bonds! But what will brother William say, and your cousin Marvin?"

"What will they say? I never want to see them again. How will they dare to look Gideon in the face, after what they have done? Arresting him!"

"Oh, dear me! I had almost forgotten about that. I was thinking of you and Marvin."

"Aunt Carrie—well, you might as well know. I told Marvin what I thought of him and his father last night, when he told me they had given Gideon into custody. He will never trouble me any more."

It was not likely he would, now that any vision he might have of Ruth would surely confound itself in his mind with another of Gideon Street.

Nevertheless, after all was settled, even long afterwards, when Mrs. Ruth Street and her husband had freely pardoned everybody, neither Mr. William Belford nor his son, Marvin, was able to give himself a satisfactory explanation of the mystery of the tape-bound package and the bonds it did not contain. Like the long-hidden deficit, it remained one of the "mysteries of banking."

Walter Michael.

Digitized by Google

BOOK IV.—CONCERNING A SOJOURN - - AMONGST THE DAJIANS.

CHAPTER II.

How the Dajians foolishly arrived before their appointed time: how Norah wisely and pluckily did the same: how she and the two white men climbed the giant stairs: how they supped off baked eggs: and how Sneyd and O'Neill made a solemn compact.

I AM afraid that Murtagh O'Neill did not get much sleep during the remainder of that night, and I rather think that Laurence Sneyd shared his vigil. But neither of them spoke, so we will not examine their thoughts. Day came, hot and glaring as usual—for it was only the lower ground that was veiled by the morning's mists—and after breaking their fasts, they lay stretched on their moss beds wishing that the leathern-footed hours would deign to hasten their pace.

They had never felt kindly towards the Dajians; but now, if wishes could have done it, the whole aboriginal population of that island would have been swept into eternity in less than a moment of time.

The two were lying listlessly on the moss, pestered by their intruding thoughts, and scheming threatening things in their minds. The sun had passed his zenith, and was arcing a course of scorching splendour away down to the brazen waters of the west, when a sound from behind them made the two prisoners spring to their feet, weapons in hand.

The noise which had disturbed them was the grating of the huge stone that closed the temple doorway. With a noiseless tread, and without interchange of a word, they stationed themselves one on either side of the passage, hidden by the projecting corner from those without, yet in positions which could not be bettered. The great rock rolled upwards, and a couple of savages entered the passage side by side. They walked carelessly through the thickness of the wall, and saw at a glance the attitude their prisoners had taken. But too late. The clubs swung down, and the savages sank to the earth, corpses. Two others pressed forward pluckily enough to avenge their deaths, but only shared the same fate; and after them, others. But their efforts were without avail. Far their superiors in point of physical strength at ordinary times, and stirred up as they were now, either of the white men was more than a match for four of the sturdiest of his opponents.

There was no thought of quarter. It was kill or be killed. The ground was a shambles. The green mossy turf was trampled into a dark red slime. The passage was choked with corpses.

"Out into the open," shouted Sneyd. "They are shutting the door."

He sprang forward as he spoke, beating down a savage who opposed him. O'Neill followed, but it was too late. Those without, terrified at the slaughter which they had witnessed, were shutting in all together; and as the huge stone sank to its place, it crushed the life out of one of their compatriots who was vainly endeavouring to escape from the raging furies who were so remorselessly slaying within. Sneyd's desperate plan of renewing the combat against all comers outside had failed.

The survivors would go away and return shortly with an overwhelming force. Well, they would doubtless contrive to kill some of them too before they fell in their turn. And so they would cross the Styx at the head of a large company. But poor Norah, brave loving girl, what of her? How could she escape from these man eating ruffians?

"Why!" exclaimed O'Neill in his agony, "why are men tortured like this? Why can't they do their devil's work by themselves without dragging a woman into it with them?"

"It isn't your fault," Sneyd said to him soothingly. "Remember you didn't know of her coming. She crossed to Daji of her own free will and accord."

"Don't shpake like that," exclaimed the Irishman roughly. "She's an angel, an' I won't hear a word against her. There, don't take it unkindly. I didn't mane to say anything hard. Ownly, the fact is, I'm nearly off me head wid the thoughts o' what'll happen to her, poor girl, and—Howly wars! there she is, as I'm a red and tatthered sinner."

Sneyd followed his companion's excited gaze, and saw the girl just landing on the top of the wall.

"Norah, Norah darlint," cried O'Neill, "av yez ever loved me, go away out of this. Those murtherin' devils are close beside, an' they may grab yez any minute."

"They've gone away, and they won't be back for another hour," she replied coolly enough. "I've watched everything from the wood, and saw exactly what was going on. There is no fear of them yet. And if they were close at hand, I wouldn't stir without you. Here's the rope. I'll make it fast to the top of the ladder, and then let it down. There; is it long enough? Yes, it is; how fortunate. Be quick and come up now. I'll hold the end."

"Up wid you, Sneyd. You're lightest. And then you can take hold till I'm aloft. I wouldn't have my hulking weight cut her pretty fingers for all the gould in Peru, an' all that's in Chili to boot."

Digitized by Google

The clubs swung down, and the savages sank to the earth, corpses.

Up the ex-cornet climbed, hand over fist, and seized the rope from Norah's hand. O'Neill quickly gained the cornice, exchanged one short tender embrace with his sweetheart, and then helped her on to the ladder. She was on the ground in twenty seconds, and in less than the minute the two men were beside her.

O'Neill began to move off up the valley.

The girl hesitated. "I have been hiding in the woods," she said. "There is a very snug place in the middle of a thicket of agave bushes."

"That won't do now, me poor darlint," replied the Irishman. "It will be a hue and cry with a vengeance when they open the cage and find the birds is flown. They didn't guess ye were on the island, an' so they never looked for yez. But they'll know there are three of us here now, bad scram to 'em, an' it's mighty little pace we'll be allowed, accordin' to my way o' thinkin'. So away we go to the mountain."

"Where is the canoe that brought you over, Norah?" asked Sneyd, as the three of them set off at a sharp jog trot.

"I hauled it up and hid it in some mangroves. But the place is a good way from here."

"So much the better. This immediate neighbourhood will be dangerous to our health for some time to come. But if we can contrive to lie low amongst the hills for a few days, till the hottest of the pursuit is over, we may manage to slip down to it some dirty night, and get clear away before the morning's sunrise."

They hurried along over the rough boulder-strewn floor of the valley, heading to what appeared to be the only practicable pass to the upper ground, a narrow sloping gulley where the steep sides joined together. It was little better than a fissure, and a tidy stream of water was foaming down it with monotonous roar. But that path was their only chance. To turn back would, in all probability, be to run into the very arms of the Dajians. And the sides of the valley, near its head were utterly unscaleable. So they went to the foot of the waterfall as fast as their legs would carry them, rested for half a minute to regain their wind, and then began to climb the slippery crags.

Their progress was slow. Though her little feet had never known the protection of a shoe, and their natural soles were not easily affected, the rough jagged stones, over which she had been running for the last two miles, had made poor Norah terribly footsore. She limped along bravely enough, and flatly refused to let O'Neill carry her as he wished to do.

But the pace had slackened for all that towards the end of the run; and when it came to climbing, their forward movement was even more retarded. The fissure had appeared steep from a distance; but on trial it showed itself to be even worse than its looks. It consisted of a series of giant steps, so to speak, many of them nine and ten feet high, and all wet with spray or running water, and greasy with slime.

Each step was gained with a heavy effort. Sneyd climbed on to the Irishman's sturdy shoulders, put his hands on to the slippery ledge above him, took one more step on to the fiery head beneath, gave a spring, and scrambled as best he could. Then leaning down, he caught hold of Norah, who was held up as high as O'Neill could reach, and pulled her up beside him. And then Norah held his legs whilst he stretched over to grasp O'Neill's hand, and lug him up also.

One could hardly conceive a more arduous piece of exercise for a hot day; and had not the water of the fall kept them continuously moist and cool, I don't think they could have stood it. But as it was, remembering what each had at stake, they stuck doggedly to the task, and scaled the steep ascent little by little, till they opened out a small rocky plateau right up in the heart of the crags.

The place was wild in the extreme, and full of strong-beaked sea-fowl, who circled around the intruders' heads, screaming madly and fiercely. On all sides rose bold bare rocks, whose summits had never been crossed by the foot of man. On the stony ground beneath them lay the innumerable nests of the sea-birds, packed so closely that there was not room to tread between them. The threatening attitude of the birds terrified Norah, and instinctively she clung to her lover for protection.

"Never fear me, pretty one," he said to her assuringly, "they'll do yez no hurt. They mayn't be the pleasantest of neighbours. They're dirthy, an' untidy, an' they talk so loud, one can scarcely hear one's own lips move. But they're a sight less harmful than the other two-legged bastes we've all three been livin' amongst for the last few weeks. Now we must look around us for some sort of a place to camp in for awhile."

"Here we are," said Sneyd cheerily. "These two big stones have got a fair-sized hollow beneath them. The entrance is small, but one can squeeze through, and once inside, we shall find ourselves as snug as can be. We can rob these nests of enough sticks to make a fire, and there's a hole in the roof to let the smoke out. And—by Jove, yes—how fortunate. There's another tiny cave further in, that will make Norah a bed-room. Really, we are in luck's way."

"In wid yez, Norah," exclaimed O'Neill, "an' light us a fire. Here's wood. Sorry to trouble yez, but we're so clumsy at that game. We might rub the stuff to powdher, an' never get it so much as to smoke."

Norah selected a pointed stick about as thick as a lead pencil, and started rubbing it up and down another larger piece of wood which was laid on the ground, working out a narrow groove, and pushing the dust which formed into a heap at the end furthest from her. Presently a thin spiral of smoke commenced to ascend from the wood-dust. She rubbed away industriously, and the smoke increased, till a glow showed through the little pile. Then desisting from her efforts, she piled a few dry splinters on the smouldering ember, fanned it into a blaze with her breath, adding more sticks, and in five minutes from commencing the task, had a reeking fire shooting up flames four feet high.

"Bravo, Norah," said Sneyd, coming in with another armful of fuel. "We people from the west are apt to think a great deal of our cleverness, but that's one thing you can beat us at, and always will do. I've tried times out of number to light a fire in your fashion. But I make myself hotter than I can the tinder. Ha! here's O'Neill with the supper."

"There's two score of eggs at the very laste," said the Irishman, depositing his burden gingerly on the rocky floor. "Some of 'em may be addled; others is shure to have chickens in 'em; but there should be some new-laid, an' on them, plaze the pigs, we'll sup. It don't do to be over dainty, an' besides, there's worst things than say-fowls' eggs. Let the fire burn away a bit, Norah darlint, an' then put 'em into the red embers. They'll bake bravely in their own jackets, just like spuds. An' whilst yez get 'em cooked, we two bhoys 'll go out an' see av we can't lay our fists on something else."

Sneyd looked up inquiringly. The rocky little plateau afforded no other food besides eggs, and the fishy-flavoured gulls who laid them. He was going to make some remark on the futility of such a search, but the Irishman silenced him with a look, and so he went outside without demur.

When they had moved away out of earshot of the girl, O'Neill said, "Those bastes know the road we've gone."

"How did you find that out?"

"Wid me eyes. I thought I'd give a look round when I came for them eggs, an' so crept cautiously up behind that big rock yonder, an' looked down. Come along an' see for yerself."

They went in the direction O'Neill indicated, and peered down into the valley, taking care not to show themselves. A knot of Dajians were standing half-way between the temple and the foot of the waterfall. It was too far for their voices to carry, but their gestures were unmistakable. They had evidently come across some footprints on a piece of soft ground—there were two or three marshy patches beside the stream—for they were examining these every now and then, and trying to follow them up. And what with that, and the fact that one or other of them kept continually pointing to the cliffs above the waterfall, there was not the slightest doubt that they had deduced, from the evidence before them, the route that the fugitives had taken.

Some were evidently for continuing the pursuit without further delay, but a second faction had other ideas. The argument waxed loud and stormy, but those in favour of delay seemed to win the day. For presently the whole band, with the exception of three, stopped and stretched themselves out to rest under the lee of an outlier of rock. The three sped away down the valley, making for the woodland.

"They're going to blockade us. And those three fellows have been sent off for provisions," said Sneyd.

"Maybe," replied O'Neill, "but if so, why do they go to cover? My idea is, that they are keeping out of sight in the hope that we shouldn't know they're there. When night comes they'll scramble up here, an' hope to take us by surprise."

"So much the worse for them," returned Sneyd grimly. "This is a hard position to storm, if it is defended. And that's a thing which can easily be done. Look, there's shot ready piled up for us at the very brink of the precipice. There's been a fall of rock there some time or other, and the stone has cracked into fragments as it fell. There are small pieces that we can heave, and larger pieces that we can't lift. But we can roll them over. I shall have little compunction in giving these brutes a lesson."

"And I none at all," said the Irishman. "I don't love 'em on me own account. But now Norah's here to fight for, it's a regular demon I am, an' no less. Let's be gettin' back now. The poor girl will be fidgeting av we stay away over long. Besides, there's no need to kape a look-out yet awhile. They won't throuble us before dark, an' we've at laste a couple of hours more daylight before us still."

So back they went to the hollow beneath the rocks, and discussed Norah's cookery as merrily and cheerfully as if they were in Maantee's bamboo-house on lovely Erma, and the nearest cannibal Dajian was eighty long miles away.

"Crept cautiously up behind that big rock."

Digitized by Google

"That," said O'Neill, "seems the best blow out I've ever had in the whole course of me chequered career. A shaugh of a pipe an' another smile from me Norah's pretty face is the only two things left to make bliss perfect. An' as I can't have the one, I'm going to ask for double allowance of the other. Darlint," he went on, regarding the pretty blushing creature with most affectionate gaze, "I'm prouder of yez than man ever was of woman before; an' it's me firm belief that there's not another girul between here an' Timbuctoo on the one side, an' Chaney on t'other, that would dare what you've done this day. Plaze heaven av we're spared to get back to Erma, his honour the king shall marry us fairly and tightly, an' av I don't make yez a good, kind husband, may I be put out of the world I don't desarve to live in."

Sneyd felt himself somewhat de trop, and got up to go, but the warm-hearted Irishman stopped him. "Don't you run away," he exclaimed. "What I said was for all hands to hear. An' besides," he went on in English, "there's another thing. This is an awkward situation for a pretty young girl to be in, trapezing about the country wid her lover an' another single man. Av coorse, these islanders don't think as we do about such matters. They'd throuble their heads very little about it. But dacency's dacency, an' me father always brought me up to respect it. He used to say when I was a gossoon, 'Murtagh, ye young blayguard, be honest av ye can, be prosperous av yez can manage it, be good av they'll let yez; but be dacent whether yez can or can't.' An' those is words I've never forgotten. The girl's goin' to be me wife some day av we get out of this infernal place, but till then I'll thrate her as though she were me own sister, and nothing more or less, heaven help me. And you, you're a gentleman, an' it's the good shipmate you've been to me, come storm, come fine weather; you'll help me to that?"

"I'll be a brother to her also, Murtagh O'Neill. There's my fist on it."

The two exchanged a hard hand-grip, and looked one another steadily in the face for a full minute. Then they turned to talk again to the girl, and the subject was never re-introduced.

CHAPTER III.

How the storming party was repulsed: how the retreat was continued to the mountain tops: how a raid was made for food: and how the Chief Sorcerer came to a bad end.

The night was dark with heavy clouds. A thick rain was driving up the valley. Both Europeans had left their cosy lair, and were spending the night in the open. They might have taken the watch in turn; but each, through an unspoken feeling of delicacy, professed his desire to remain on the look-out. One certainly did lie down for an hour under the big boulder which served to shield them when they reconnoitred in the daytime, whilst the other peered into the blackness over the brink; and so turn and turn about they did manage to snatch a few winks of sleep. But Sneyd had just roused his companion, and the two of them were crouching at the edge of the precipice with every sense on the alert.

"I can hear nothing," the Irishman remarked in a hoarse whisper, after listening intently for a minute or so.

"They are doubtless coming cautiously, and the howling of the wind and the hissing of the rain drown all sounds. But I'm certain that I heard the rattle of a falling stone just before I woke you."

They listened again with all their ears, but no sound could be heard above the swishing of the gale, and the dull monotonous roar of the waterfall. They strained their eyes, but save for the glistening of the wet on the rocks near them, they could see nothing through the deep thick gloom. Their sight could not penetrate the darkness half-a-dozen yards.

"I'm sure that stone wouldn't have toppled down of its own accord," Sneyd mused half aloud, half to himself.

As the murmured words left his lips a black cloud slid past the moon, and a stream of light shot down as though from the opening of a small round trap door away in the heavens. The whole gully was lit up in the instant. It swarmed with naked armed men. Two were scrambling on to the very last step but one of the ascent. The others were moving steadily up behind them.

When the moonlight shone out, each savage instinctively glanced upward, and saw on the brink of the fall, the two white men they had hoped to surprise during their sleep. The pair had risen to their feet as the gentle glare shot out, each holding a huge fragment of rock poised above his head. The savages saw their danger, and several of them tried to retreat. But they were too late. The stones were let fall. One crashed heavily on the rock, and bounding out into the air, flew harmlessly down far over their heads. But the other, truer to its aim, smashed on to an arm of the foremost climber and made him loose his hold. His body reeled backwards, clearing with it him on whose shoulders he stood. The two of them rolled down the steep descent, carrying involuntary havoc as they went; knocking savage after savage from his hold, and reaching the bottom in company with no less than seven other mangled corpses. Again rocks were hurled through the wet night wind, and again the same red drama was re-enacted. The white men were merciless, remorseless. Black clouds slid over the moon again, and the scene was wrapped in dense obscurity. But the avalanche of rock was kept up with unremitting zeal. The Europeans felt that it was no time to offer quarter, and so they gave none. Throwing the lighter stones into the air, rolling the heavier rocks laboriously over the brink of the precipice, they kept up the Titan's hailstorm till the pale lamp on high once more emerged from the obscuring veil.

Then pausing for a moment in their work, they looked down the line of the fall. The black slimy rock was starred with white in every direction where the great stones had cannoned from point to point in their fierce course. Here and there a naked body lay stark still and bruised on a ledge. But at the bottom was the most gruesome sight of all. Scattered over an area twenty yards in diameter were the rest of the savages, lying singly, or in mangled heaps, some, in pools of water, some uncovered, some pressed into the earth by a rude weight of jagged rock; but all motionless, all dead. Every member of the force had been slain. Yes, they looked away down the desolate valley, and scrutinised the cliffs of the fall again—not one had escaped to tell the tale.

Sneyd shuddered. Such awful slaughter appalled him. He was used to seeing death in a good many uncomely shapes, and he had often and often killed his man, and thought nothing of it in the heat of combat. He had seen an ugly shamble at Culloden Moor, in the 'tween decks of the Sta Thérèsa, and at other places. But he had never personally swept so many human beings into eternity at one stroke, as it were, as he had helped to do just now.

Some words to this effect escaped his lips.

The Irishman turned on him almost fiercely. "An' you're wishin' some o' them could have escaped?" he cried. "Begob it's meself that would like to see the whole thribe lyin' stark and stiff at the cliff-foot there. When I think what they'll do to me poor girl, av they can lay their murtherin' hands on her, I have no pity. I'd kill 'em when I catch 'em, just as I'd kill muskitties."

"We shall have the whole island at our heels, when this night's work comes to be known."

O'Neill shrugged his shoulders.

"They're all afther us as 'tis. So it can't be worse. Better, in fact, for we've thinned them down a thrifle. But as no one got off, their friends won't know what's happened for a day or two. Then they may send out others to inquire how matters is goin' along, and when they come to the cliff-foot here, what little the birds have left of their dirty carcasses, will tell the tale pretty plainly. They'll learn to treat us wid more respect, after that, an'll come at us wid caution. But we will be far enough away by the time they do start, and they'll have to find us before they can try to do anything worse."

"Well, there's nothing to keep us standing out here in this cold rain any longer," said Sneyd. "We shan't be disturbed for the rest of the night, and for the whole of to-morrow, at any rate; so we may as well turn in now, and get a good long sleep, whilst we have the chance. Heaven knows when the next opportunity may occur."

"Slape's the best thing for us," assented the Irishman, turning away towards their shelter with his companion. "But don't tell Norah how we've been spendin' our evening. 'Twould do no good; an' although the poor darlint isn't squeamish—thanks to the devilment she's been forced to see these past two months—it's best to kape her in the dark as much as possible, about the hot way these blayguards are chasin' afther us."

They crept through the narrow opening into their den, raked up the smouldering embers of the fire, and replenished it with fresh fuel; and then, lying down in the warmth, were quickly asleep.

The sun was high up in the heavens when they woke. The tired girl was slumbering still, and as there was no need for it, they did not disturb her, but going outside, collected a fresh supply of eggs for their breakfast.

"The nests we emptied yesterday are replenished again, so this time we can be sure of getting none that are addled, and none that contain half-hatched chickens," observed Sneyd. "That's a great convenience."

"It would be av we intended to make a stay here."

"And why shouldn't we? They'd never dare to try and storm the position by the waterfall again."

"No, honest man, I'll grant yez that. But what 'ud yez say av the tables was turned? What av they climbed the cliffs above this little flat, an' began heavin' rocks down on us? How should we take the bombardment, eh? 'Twould be our turn then to look foolish, I'm thinkin'."

"True enough. What a dolt I was not think of it. But it never occurred to me that these rocks could be scaled from the other side."

"P'raps they can't," O'Neill allowed. "But it wouldn't be wise to stay here on the chance of that same."

"It will be hard work getting out."

"'Twill. But we must do't, for all that. Luckily climbin' comes by nature to us sailor men; an' as Norah's pretty nimble, too, we ought to make a good shy at it. I'll grant yez it's not aisy to see which way we'll have to go from here; but we must hope to find out as we get higher up."

Taking with them as many hard-baked eggs as they could carry, they set off on the arduous climb, as soon as their meal was finished. The rain had ceased, but the gale still tore up the rocky valley and whistled round the crags with remorseless force. Overhead, the sky was thatched with leaden scurrying clouds.

Around, all was grey and cheerless. The little party of fugitives clambered up the steep ascent, foot by foot. The going was terribly bad. Often they had to make a long détour to get round a precipice, whose sheer front offered no foothold whatever. And more than once, being brought to a dead standstill, they were obliged to retrace their own steps, and try for a more feasible route.

But the avalanche of rock was kept up with unremitting zeal.

Whither this blind retreat would lead them they knew not. The mountains were barren in the extreme. There was not so much as a piece of lichen to clothe their bare and cheerless sides. But away up amongst those rocky fortresses, which were hidden in the grey cloud-vapour, they hoped to find a temporary asylum, where they would be quite secure from the prying eyes of bloodthirsty cannibals. So, with torn hands and blistered feet they struggled on, helping the woman with tender care, making light of the difficulties to be faced, and keeping up her spirits as best they could.

They got amongst the clouds soon after gaining the summit of the rocks above their last resting-place; and with the view circumscribed to twenty yards, they were often in danger of blundering terribly, if not fatally. But they couldn't halt and, holding on in blind confidence that Providence, which had not deserted them so far, would still continue to stick by their side, finally got through the clammy belt of mist, and breathed the clear crisp air of the mountain-top.

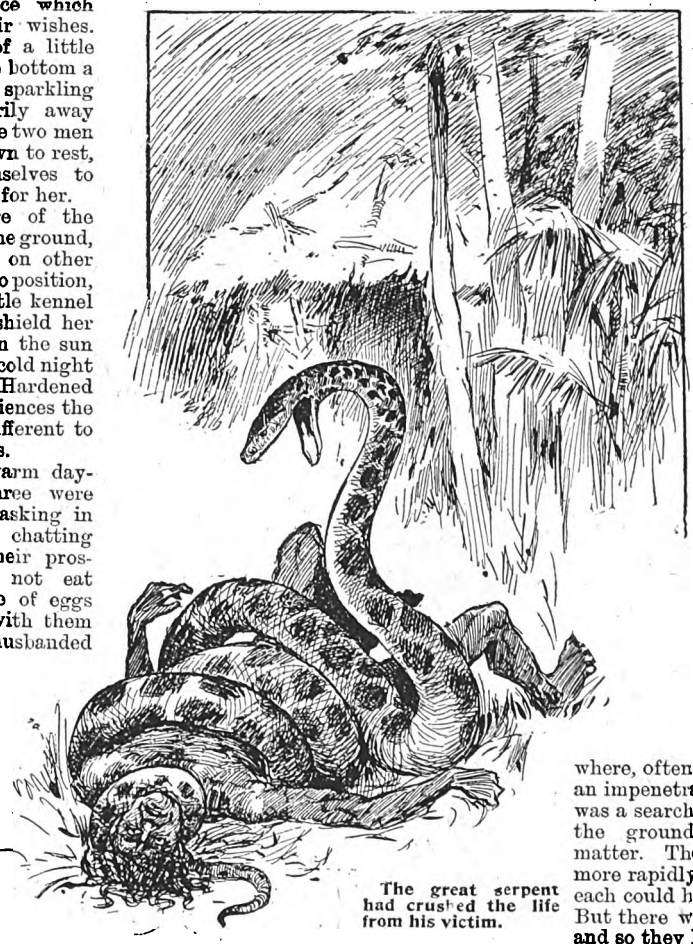
Below, there was a vast, smooth, moving sea of woolly, white vapour, stretching in all directions as far as the eye could reach, till it met the dark-blue vault of the heavens, which was unflecked with traces of other cloud. Mountain peaks still rose jagged and steep above them, but as Sneyd remarked, there was no necessity to climb higher. "We must just hunt about for some secluded cranny where we can make a sheltered camp, and then set ourselves down and make things as comfortable as we can under the circumstances."

Not inclined to be over-fastidious, it did not take them long to find a place which accorded with their wishes. It was on the side of a little ravine, down whose bottom a slender rill of cool sparkling water tinkled merrily away over the stones. The two men made Norah lie down to rest, and then set themselves to build a rude shelter for her.

Taking advantage of the natural features of the ground, they piled boulders on other boulders already into position, and soon had a little kennel made that would shield her from the gusts when the sun went down, and the cold night air chilled them. Hardened by their past experiences the two men were indifferent to exposure themselves.

But while the warm daylight lasted, all three were very comfortable basking in the sunshine, and chatting hopefully about their prospects. They did not eat heavily. The store of eggs they had brought with them was small, and if husbanded to the utmost, could not last more than a couple of days. It would not do to make them spin out longer. They could not afford to grow weak through too great an insufficiency of food. After these were consumed, they must raid the lower country for fresh supplies. The mountain peaks were barren of food. The only thing they offered which would help to support life was water, and although that was in superabundant quantity, they could not nourish their bodies on it alone.

"We are quite safe from the Dajians here," Sneyd said, after they had stayed there the two days, and consumed the last of their eggs. "They could not possibly follow our tracks. And a haphazard search amongst these endless hills would be absurd. Well supplied with food, we could lie snug here, till we one and all died of sheer old age. But that's just the rub. The food's run out, and starvation's as cruel an enemy as cannibals. The only question is, where are we to get the supplies from? For some reason best known to themselves, the gulls seem to have avoided all the valleys we tried yesterday. That's a nuisance, for their eggs are very tolerable feeding."



The great serpent had crushed the life from his victim.

The clouds had cleared away, and the lower wooded parts of the island lay stretched out like a profile map below them.

"It seems pretty aisy goin' to the head of that glen yonder," said O'Neill, pointing the direction he meant with outstretched arm. "You and I might slip cautiously down, an' see av we can't lift something or other. We should come across plantains, or bananas, or oranges, or something o' that kind, an' av we don't, we must just go on till we find a yam garden or a taro patch, an' take our chance o' raidin' that widout being dropped upon."

"Very well," said Sneyd, "we'll just tell Norah, and start off at once,"—both of which they did.

Judging from their experiences of the adjacent island of Erma, the two confidently expected that when once they had descended to the level of the "timber line," they would have but little trouble in finding fruit-trees which would readily supply their wants. But as I have said before, Daji was not so favoured as Erma. Food did not grow on every bush. And every clump of palms, every thicket of plantains, every grove of orange trees, had its special owner, who jealously cared for his precious property.

The two Europeans walked rapidly down the bare mountain slopes, scrutinising the tree tops below them in hopes of spotting the familiar foliage of some clump of fruit trees. But being unsuccessful in this cursory search, they passed through the outlying scattered scrub, and plunged into the thick matted forest beyond.

Their progress was of necessity slow, for the undergrowth was rank and stony, and the rattans and lianes which were present everywhere, often bound the trees together into an impenetrable wall. But as their object was a search, and not a rapid passage over the ground, this did not particularly matter. They could have done their work more rapidly had they separated, for then each could have quartered a separate beat. But there were many reasons against this, and so they kept together.

The work was very hot. Little sunlight got through the matted crests of the trees, it is true, but the virgin ground was pulpy underneath, half swamp, half slime-pit. There rose up a thick steam, which no breath of wind could get at to blow away. The air was close and sultry, filled with a foul odour of decaying vegetation, heavy on the lungs. A great monitor lizard, on whose back Sneyd had inadvertently trodden, wriggled away from underneath him. He halted and shuddered involuntarily. "We might find eels in this filthy place," he said, "but not plantains."

"It's gettin' worse too," observed O'Neill. "We shall be comin' in amongst mangrove bushes next."

"We must move away in a fresh direction. The only question is, which? I have lost my bearings altogether. There isn't a breath of wind to guide one, or anything."

Digitized by Google

"We must just sthrike out an' try to find higher ground. Stay a minute, I'll nip aloft, and take a look round."

The Irishman circled the stem of a tall cottonwood tree with a length of rattan, and climbed it native fashion, till he got amongst the branches. Then putting his impromptu rope on a place of safety in readiness for the descent, he ran up the natural steps with a sailor's nimbleness, and disappeared amongst the foliage.

Presently he scrambled back again, and slipping down the smooth trunk at a pace that was scarcely compatible with safety, stood on the oozy soil beside his companion.

"What is it?" Sneyd asked, seeing from the other's face that there was something of considerable moment in the wind.

The Irishman had already turned off, and was tearing recklessly through the undergrowth as fast as his giant strength would let him. "Come along, or we'll be too late. It's close here. You'll see when we get there."

The communication was mysterious, but Sneyd knew his companion would not act as he was doing without a full and sufficient reason. So he followed without demur, and helped to tear aside the interlacing plants that barred their mutual progress.

Panting with their efforts, half stifled with the rank moist heat, bone-weary both of them, they struggled on and on, till at last exhaustion brought O'Neill, iron-muscled though he was, to an involuntary halt.

"Is it much further?" Sneyd demanded.

"Unless I've lost me bearings, we should be almost on it now."

"It—what?"

"A wee clearing. There's——"

"Never mind telling any more. Let me come to the front. I've got a bit of go left in me still for an emergency."

So Lawrence Sneyd fought the tangle of plant stems with all his remaining strength, and just as he, too, was coming to an involuntary halt, he saw through the thick foliage of a flowering bush an open space close ahead of him. Thrusting aside the intervening leaves, his glance fell on a sight that nearly froze him with horror. Before a small and squalid hut was a native tightly wrapped in the glistening folds of a huge anaconda. The great serpent had crushed the life from his victim, and was preparing to devour him. As Sneyd looked, the two massive jaws with their rows of instanding teeth opened, and approached the prey.

Fascinated by the sight of the reptile, he had up to this moment scarcely noticed anything besides. But his gaze fell on the victim just as the head was being sucked down.

Great heavens! Those bleared eyes glaring with an unnatural stare, and sensuous nostril, that cruel mouth. It was Ebry's, their enemy Ebry, by whose treachery they had fallen into the hands of the Dajians.

(To be continued.)

CHARITY BEGINS AT HOME.

WITHOUT doubt there are many readers of S.S. who heartily sympathise with the FRESH AIR FUND, but are unable to subscribe to it. It is now possible for them to do so, for everybody must use soap. To help the Fund, Messrs. Jeyes' Sanitary Compounds Company Limited, have promised to hand over a farthing on every 2½d. bar of their "Fresh Air" soap sold in the United Kingdom during the current year. It can be had from the vendors of such commodities all over the country. But if any of our readers experience difficulty in getting supplies, they should write to the Company, at 64 Cannon Street, London, E.C.

LADIES WHO PLAY

any instrument, and who have a liking for music, may turn their ability to good account by reading the article on "Ladies Orchestras" in PEARSON'S WEEKLY, dated March 11th, 1899.

During the coming summer months there will be ample opportunities for giving indoor and open-air concerts, not only in inland towns and villages, but on the coast, and the writer of this article shows the way to go to work.

WHO IS YOUR DOUBLE?

AMONGST the many, many thousands of readers of P. W., there are surely several who very closely resemble one another, and I want to find out who they are. For this purpose I am going to ask you to send in your photograph to this office, and I shall give a sovereign to each of the five pairs of competitors who look most alike—£10 in all.

It will be a very interesting thing to you to find whether there is any person who weekly peruses the same pages as yourself and who bears a strong facial resemblance to you. This you can now find out by sending in your photograph.

The competition will remain open until Monday, March 20th, and all attempts must be sent in envelopes marked "LIKENESS."

If the photographs are to be returned, each must be accompanied by a stamped addressed envelope sufficiently large to carry them. Under no circumstances will they be returned if stamps alone are sent. While every endeavour will be made to guard against loss or damage, the Editor does not make himself responsible for either.

NOT ONE MAN IN A THOUSAND

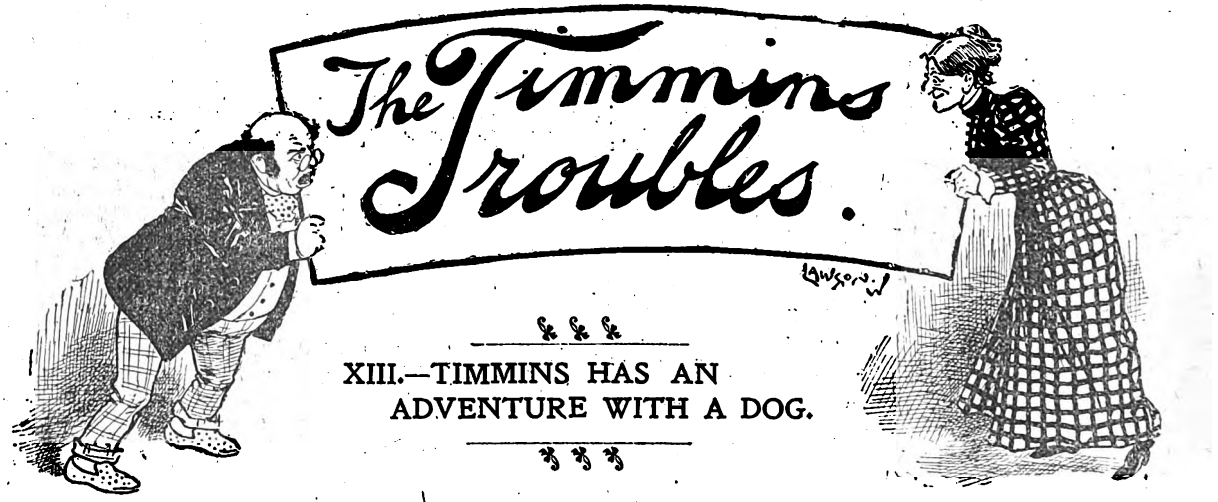
has a library worth speaking of. The difficulty of obtaining good books at a nominal price has been, in the past, unsurmountable. Tens of thousands of men and women have stocked their brains with knowledge obtained from books that have been borrowed from lending libraries, or from friends. How many of these tens of thousands ever thought that the day would come when they would be able to obtain for a weekly payment of 5s.—extending over a few months—one hundred of the most famous books ever given to the world? Yet this is what we are offering you to-day, and although, figuratively speaking, we shall be offering you this to-morrow, we cannot promise—so large has been the demand and so great the tax on our resources—that we shall be offering you this the day after to-morrow. In short, we would strongly urge you to decide as rapidly as possible, whether you will or will not entertain the idea of taking advantage of this truly excellent offer. Perhaps, though, you have not the list by you. If this is the case a postcard will bring one along by return of post, together with all the necessary particulars. Anyway, a halfpenny postcard won't break you, and the list is worth keeping among your papers for reference.

Meanwhile, we would ask you to bear in mind the all-important fact that

Go North, or South, or East, or West,
You can't improve the Hundred Best.

All communications to be made to "Best Books Department," C. Arthur Pearson Ltd., Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google



XIII.—TIMMINS HAS AN ADVENTURE WITH A DOG.

"Look here, my dear," said Mr. Timmins, as he led a huge and shaggy dog into his wife's room, "I've got a dog a friend of mine gave me. What do you think of him?"

"Good gracious!" exclaimed Mrs. Timmins, mounting a chair in dismay. "Is he mad?"

"No, Mrs. Timmins," retorted her husband. "he not only is not mad, but he isn't a step-ladder either, nor a bird's eye view. He's a dog, and if you don't get down off that chair he'll probably bite your leg off."

Mrs. Timmins got down on her feet and eyed the brute with some trepidation.

"Maybe he's got the hydrophobia," she suggested, by way of a hearty welcome.

"P'raps he has," agreed Mr. Timmins, "but if he has he's got it in his pocket. Come here, doggee, doggee," and Mr. Timmins snapped his fingers persuasively.

"Why doesn't he come when you call him?" asked Mrs. Timmins, deeply interested in the proceedings.

"Because you make such a noise you scare him," explained Mr. Timmins. "Come, doggee, doggee!"

"I don't quite like the way his tongue hangs out," objected Mrs. Timmins. "It doesn't look natural."

"Maybe you don't like the way his tail hangs out, either. P'raps you think that's artificial, too. With your information about dogs you only need a tiled floor and a broken hinge to be a dog pound. Keep quiet, now, while I teach him some tricks. Come here, doggee! Sit up, sir."

The dog stretched out his forelegs, opened a mouth like a folding bedstead, and growled.

"What makes him do that?" asked Mrs. Timmins, sitting on the back of the chair with her feet in the seat.

"Why?" shrieked Mr. Timmins. "Who do you suppose made him do it? Do you think he works on a wire? Have you got a notion that he goes by steam? He doesn't. I tell you he's alive, and he does it because that's the bent of his mind. What are you sitting up there for? Can't you see he doesn't like it? Now you sit still. Here, doggee, doggee, good doggee, sit up and beg!" and Mr. Timmins held up an admonitory finger.

The dog eyed Mr. Timmins with anything but an assuring glance.

"He's hungry," suggested Mrs. Timmins. "Dogs do like that when they want to be taken down the yard and fed."

"Of course you know," grumbled Mr. Timmins. "All you want is perfect ignorance on the part of the police to be a dog-fight. Got anything in the house for him to eat?"

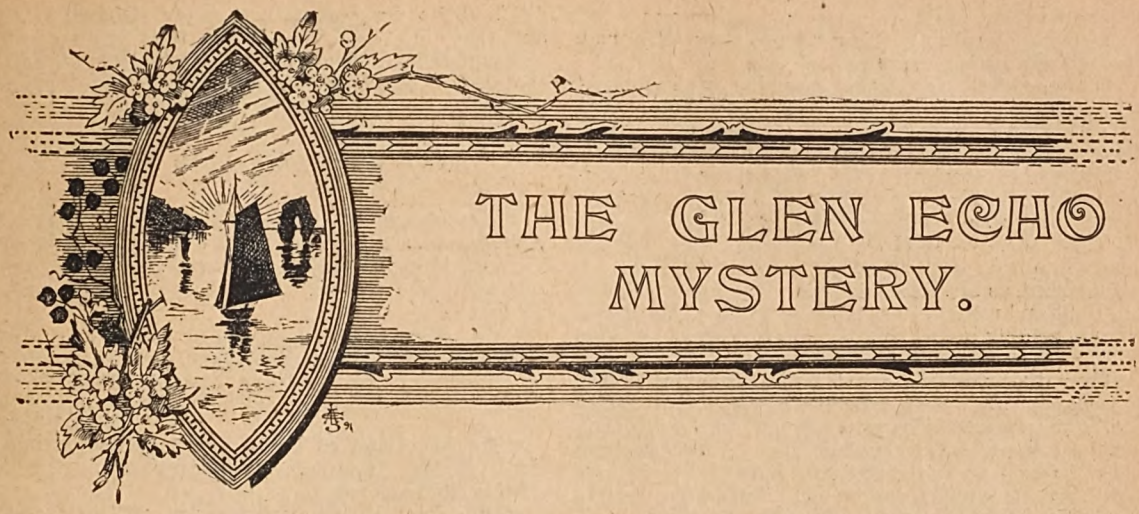
"There's some cold stew and a piece of custard."

"That's it!" raved Mr. Timmins. "That's what's the matter with the dog. He wants custard. You've got it. You only need a committee and a fight over the proceeds to be a dog show. Where's the custard? Haven't you got some cold coffee? Give him a lemon to stay his stomach!" and Mr. Timmins jumped straight up into the air and landed on the dog. The dog made for the open air with a howl, and Mr. Timmins gathered himself up and looked after his prize.

"Never mind, my dear," said Mrs. Timmins soothingly. "he'll come back."

"If he does, I'll kill him!" shouted Mr. Timmins. "See what you've done? You've made me lose my dog and tear my trousers. Is there anything more about dogs you don't know? Have you got any more intelligence to impart about dogs? All you want is a bucket of brandy round your neck and a snowstorm to be a monk of St. Bernard," with which logical conclusion Mr. Timmins began exploring his outlying districts for possible bites, while his wife speculated upon the salvation of the cold stew and the custard by the sudden and eminently satisfactory disappearance of the dog.

Digitized by Google



THE GLEN ECHO MYSTERY.

Six months ago, through the death of a kinsman in the north of England, a lot of old pictures, furniture, bric-à-brac and papers came into my possession. Most of these were stored away in the garret of my house. One day, having occasion to go to the storeroom, my attention was attracted to an old-fashioned, battered leather trunk.

I had often thought of satisfying my curiosity as to its contents, but had never been able to find a key that would fit the lock. This day, however, it occurred to me that the ancient leather contrivance was of no value, and that a knife would do quite as well as a key; so I whipped out my pocket-knife and ripped a long slit in the leather top.

Within I found a large number of packets of old letters, account books and diaries, and all sorts of manuscripts and pamphlets.

All these I tumbled out on the floor, and looked through them in an idle way. At first I found nothing of unusual interest; but soon I came to a packet of peculiar shape.

It was apparently a sort of home-made envelope, composed of two pieces of old-fashioned blue linen paper folded and glued together. Upon the face of the packet was inscribed these words:

STRICTLY PRIVATE.

Never to be opened by anyone but me.

HENRY STONE.

This was the signature of my dead kinsman, and I suppose I should have respected his injunction; but I did not.

My curiosity was stronger than my reverence for the dead, so I slit open the packet.

Now I wish I had not done so. By prying into the secrets of the past, accidently placed within my keeping, I had come face to face with a mystery which appals me. For days and days and nights and nights I have turned it over in my mind, have looked at it from every point of view, have analysed, searched, thought, imagined. But it has been all in vain. I am completely baffled. So are my friends to whom I have submitted the matter. Our combined ingenuity fail to afford a solution.

What I found within the packet of old blue linen paper was simply the following three cuttings from newspapers of long ago:

MYSTERIOUS DISAPPEARANCE AT GLEN ECHO.

"POUGHKEEPSIE, Oct. 20.—The police officials here and detectives from Chicago are unable to throw any light upon the mysterious disappearance of Sylvester Baldwin from the house of our esteemed fellow-townsman, Professor Edwin Stone, who lives in the old Stone Manor House, at Glen Echo, one of the picturesque suburbs of this city. Mr. Baldwin strangely disappeared last Sunday night, and though diligent search has been made for him during the the forty-eight hours that have elapsed, not a single clue has been obtained.

"Mr. Baldwin's home is in England. He came about two weeks ago to visit Professor Stone, who was his classmate at Cambridge. He was about twenty-five years of age, and a rising young lawyer. Mr. Baldwin was unmarried, but it is whispered that he has become engaged since his arrival here.

"Almost every day the guests had indulged in picnics, boating excursions, fishing, horseback-riding, and other amusements. Mr Baldwin was the life of the party with his vivacity, wit, and love of fun.

"On many of these excursions it was impossible for Professor Stone to go, as it is well known that in his laboratory, located on the roof of the Manor house, he is carrying on some important experiments. When he felt compelled to remain in his workshop, Professor Stone designated Mr. Baldwin to act as his representative in the entertainment of the party.

"Sunday last the ladies and gentlemen, accompanied by Professor Stone's aged mother, with whom he lives, attended divine service in the morning, and spent the afternoon in walks and drives.

"Toward evening, the weather growing colder, they all assembled in the big dining hall, where they made a rousing log fire in the old-fashioned fireplace. They had refreshments and music, and Mr. Baldwin's fine baritone voice was never heard to better advantage.

"About ten o'clock, after planning their excursion for the next day, all retired to their rooms on the second floor.

"Mr. Baldwin was heard by Mr. and Mrs. Jones, and

Digitized by Google

by Miss Davidge, guests who occupied adjoining rooms, to enter his chamber a few moments after they had reached their own apartments.

"He was whistling softly and humming an air, indicating the happy condition of his mind. He was also heard closing a window, and closing and latching the outside blinds.

"Between the apartment of Mr. Baldwin and that occupied by Mr. and Mrs. Jones there is a door, somewhat warped by time, and through the cracks and the big, old-fashioned keyhole Mr. Jones heard Mr. Baldwin bounce into bed; but as the light in his room was not extinguished, as Mr. Jones noticed when he put out his own light and retired, the supposition is that Mr. Baldwin was reading in bed before going to sleep, as was his habit.

"From that moment not the slightest trace of the young lawyer has been secured. The last known about him, he was apparently lying in bed, reading, a happy man. Next morning he was not in his room. All his clothing and effects, save only the pyjamas which he wore as a night robe, were in the apartment. He had disappeared as completely as if the earth had swallowed him.

"It is inconceivable that Mr. Baldwin suffered an attack of mental aberration and wandered away, for there had been a light fall of snow that evening and no tracks were found in it round the house. The barn and outbuildings, as well as every nook and cranny of the manor house, were carefully searched. The police looked under the hayricks, and even lowered a man into the wells.

"They scoured the country around, but no one had seen or heard of a man wandering about in his pyjamas. If Mr. Baldwin left the house, he went away without shoes, hat, or clothing; and as cold weather has prevailed since his disappearance, it is almost inconceivable that he has not been obliged to apply for shelter or food during the last forty-eight hours.

"The detectives do not believe that Mr. Baldwin left the house. The morning after his disappearance the shutters in his room were all found fastened on the inside. So, too, were the front door and the rear or kitchen door of the house. All were locked with the keys in place inside. The detectives have satisfied themselves that the fall of snow on Sunday evening ceased about nine o'clock, and it would have been impossible for Mr. Baldwin to wander away, or be carried away, without leaving traces of footsteps.

"But neither Mr. Baldwin living nor Mr. Baldwin dead is to be found in the house now. The search has been thorough from cellar to garret. Professor Stone's laboratory upon the roof has been thoroughly ransacked. As is known to our citizens, Professor Stone is engaged in investigations in connection with a new illuminating process and also in the water-proofing of fabrics. For these purposes he keeps upon the roof quite a collection of apparatus, retorts, gas generators, a large lot of fabric, some of which has been chemically treated, tools, fine instruments, etc. Professor Stone says he was in his laboratory hard at work the night his friend disappeared. No other member of the family or any of the guests heard Mr. Baldwin's steps that fateful night. Professor Stone insisted that the detectives should thoroughly search his laboratory. The officers opened the gas machines, sifted the cinders in all the retorts and overhauled all the piles of fabric. They found not the slightest trace of the missing man, dead or alive.

"Professor Stone and all the members of his house party, so merry a few days ago, are bowed down with grief. They not only fear that Mr. Baldwin is dead, but they are overwhelmed by the mystery which surrounds them. They feel that they are living within the shadow of a tragedy which has not been explained and which thus far is wholly inexplicable."

"MYSTERY PILED UPON MYSTERY.

"Poughkeepsie, October 22nd.—The mystery of the disappearance of Silvester Baldwin is not yet cleared up. In fact, it grows deeper and darker. This morning a telegram was received from Saratoga. It read as follows:—

Chief of Police, Poughkeepsie.—Body of man in night-clothes found last Monday morning at daylight by a mail carrier on bridle-path in the Adirondacks about one hundred miles from here. What was date of your man's disappearance?

City Marshal.

"To this, Chief of Police Kipley replied, giving the date of Mr. Baldwin's disappearance, and adding: 'Impossible same man.'

"Of course, it is impossible, and yet it is a most strange and striking coincidence. Have two men disappeared in their pyjamas during the past week? This most extraordinary development did not impress Chief Kipley as having any bearing upon the Baldwin case. When asked if there could possibly be any connection between the two incidents he replied:—

"'It is absurd to think there was. Mr. Baldwin disappeared after ten o'clock on Sunday night. Early next morning the body of a man was found in the Adirondacks, two hundred miles from here. There is no railway nearer than Saratoga. It is a journey of about two days from the place where the body was found to the nearest railway station, and that is by mounted courier. A waggon would need four days over these rough roads. It was a physical impossibility for the body of Mr. Baldwin to be carried to that remote point in the Adirondacks by next morning, and, therefore, we do not need to discuss this phase of the case any farther. The body found in the mountains is that of some other man.'

"Chief Kipley is undoubtedly right. Your reporter has ascertained that the only train for the north after Mr. Baldwin retired to his room was the midnight express, which does not make connections at Albany or Saratoga. The earliest possible arrival at Saratoga would have been at ten o'clock on Monday morning, and that is still one hundred miles by a rough mountain road from the place where the body was found, according to the telegram, at daylight on Monday morning.

"Notwithstanding the utter impossibility of there being any connection between the two incidents, Miss Davidge, who has taken much to heart the strange fate of Mr. Baldwin, has insisted that careful investigation be made of the Adirondack case. In this she is supported by Professor Stone, and by others at Glen Echo house. Their anxiety is so great that they grasp at straws. Chief Kipley, to humour their strange whim, has agreed to send a man to the mountains to inquire carefully into the finding of the body there, though protesting that it is useless expense and trouble.

"Chief Kipley is still convinced, as are all the detectives who have worked on the case, that Mr. Baldwin, living or dead, is still in the manor house. He has expressed his belief to Professor Stone, and the latter has insisted on a more thorough search. In consequence, the old house has been nearly pulled to pieces. Partitions have been cut down, floors ripped up, walls opened, the floor of the cellar dug up, and the ashes and cinders in every furnace and stove, including the retorts in Professor Stone's laboratory, have been subjected to chemical analysis by Professors Tausig and Brunier, of the Polytechnic School. The barns and outbuildings, strawstacks and wells, have all been researched. Every scrap of paper in Mr. Baldwin's room has been scrutinised. All the inmates of the house have been subjected to another examination, but without disclosing any new facts. Not a single trace of Mr. Baldwin or of the manner in which he left or was taken from his room, not even a shadow of a clue, has been discovered."

Digitized by Google

MR. BALDWIN'S BODY FOUND.

An Astounding Case.

"Saratoga, October 26th.—The body found in the Adirondacks a week ago this morning was that of Silvester Baldwin, after all. It has been positively identified by Professor Stone, Mr. and Mrs. Jones and Miss Irene Davidge, who came here to view it, accompanied by your reporter. But instead of clearing up the mystery, this discovery has darkened it into one of the most inexplicable crimes of the century.

"All we know now is that Mr. Baldwin is dead; that he disappeared from his room in the manor house at Glen Echo after ten o'clock on Sunday night, the 8th inst.; that his body was found at daylight next morning 200 miles away, a 100 miles from the nearest railway; and that he must have been fouly murdered.

"Detective Brown, who was sent by Chief Kipley to investigate the Adirondack case, reached Saratoga last Friday morning, and by hard riding over the mountain roads arrived at Cascadeville on Saturday evening. There he found the body, which had been brought in from a point eight miles north. Mr. Brown closely questioned the mail-carrier who had found the body about six o'clock Monday morning, on his way from Lake Placid. There was no doubt as to the day and hour, as these were attested by the mail carrier and others.

"When Givins came upon the body it was lying in the road. His horse was frightened by it. The remains lay in a sort of heap, and were not yet quite cold.

"The skull was smashed, the neck broken, and the head driven into the shoulders. Many bones in the body and limbs were broken, indicating that the remains may have been tightly packed in a box or crammed into a cask.

"The only clothing upon the corpse was a suit of silken pyjamas, tied around the waist with a cord of the same material.

"The deceased had never been seen in that region, nor was any one known to be missing. The population is sparse, and every tourist and sportsman is known along the trails to the guides, boatmen, and innkeepers. No man could carry a human body to that remote spot save on the back of a horse, and no mysterious horseman or other person was reported from any part of the district.

"The manner in which the body has made its appearance in the midst of the mountains was as much of a mystery to the people there as the means by which it had been removed from Poughkeepsie was to Detective Brown.

"Detective Brown had known Mr. Baldwin, and as soon as he saw the body he was convinced of its identity. Accordingly he sent a messenger with a telegram to Chief Kipley, and hired two men and two horses to help him to carry the remains to Saratoga. They arrived here at three o'clock this afternoon, and there was a sad scene when our party from Poughkeepsie were admitted to the undertaker's rooms to view the body. Everyone at once recognised in the broken and mangled mass of flesh, handsome, manly, Silvester Baldwin. Professor Stone was greatly agitated when he beheld the features of his college chum and best friend, and Miss Davidge uttered a cry of pain and would have swooned had not Mrs. Jones led her away.

"The face of the deceased is natural. In one of the front teeth is a gold filling just such as Mr. Baldwin had in one of his front teeth. The silken pyjamas are precisely like Mr. Baldwin's, and, moreover, his initials, 'S. B.,' are embroidered upon a little linen tag under the neck. The name of the maker, a Boston firm, is there, too. Still stronger proof of the identity of the remains, if any were needed, is found in the fact that in a pocket of the pajamas was discovered a locket containing the miniature of Miss Irene Davidge.

"There is, therefore, not the slightest doubt whatever, that this is the body of Silvester Baldwin. There can be no doubt either, that he was murdered. But how and by whom? And above all, how was his body carried in six or seven hours, some two hundred miles from his room in the manor house at Glen Echo to that lonely spot in the mountains, to reach which a journey of two days is required, even under the most favourable circumstances?

"It cannot be possible that the body which we have here is that of another man. It is beyond reason to suppose that there was a simultaneous disappearance of two men, both wearing silken pyjamas alike, the two men resembling one another in figure, face, colour of eyes and hair, teeth and everything as closely as if they were twins, both bearing the initials "S. B." and both carrying in their pockets a minature of Miss Irene Davidge, of New York.

"Every one is greatly depressed, not only on account of Mr. Baldwin's sad fate, but by the inexplicable mystery surrounding the dreadful tragedy. The doctors and the professors who have carefully examined the body and subjected part of its raiment to microscopic tests are without any explanation, however shadowy and unsatisfactory. Have the Black Arts been revived, or must we ascribe this extraordinary tragedy to the working of some modern miracle?"

This is the strange story my curiosity had unearthed from the recesses of my dead kinsman's trunk. You will now see why I am sorry I disobeyed the injunction which I found written upon the blue packet. The tale which these old newspaper clippings tell has wrung in my ears and whirled about in my brain, robbing me of sleep and making me nervous and restless. I have searched the old trunk again and again for further light upon it, but without success. I have had a feeling that somehow or other I must discover the dread secret, for this tragedy was in my family. Not only did it occur, or at least have its beginning, in the house of my kinsman, but, now that the circumstances have been brought so strikingly to my attention, I recall that my relation, Professor Stone, married the Miss Davidge who figures in the story, lived with her in happiness for many years, and reared a fine family of boys and girls. Though I had never known either Professor Stone or his wife, Mr. Henry Stone, their brother, who left to my charge the fateful trunk, has told me of the professor's successful and useful career and happy home life.

Digitized by Google

But all my efforts have been unavailing. I am unable to find a clue or even to evolve a satisfactory theory. I can only give my readers the facts and leave them to struggle with the problem, as I have struggled.

Postscript: "The foregoing was written some months ago. Meanwhile I have made strenuous efforts to throw off the strange fascination which this mystery has exerted over me—to stop thinking and worrying over it; but to no purpose. It has continued to harass me. To-day, feeling more desperate than usual, I went up to the garret with a hatchet and a big knife, determined to cut the old trunk to pieces in order to discover if its shell contained any clue to the mystery. Underneath the lining in the bottom I found a letter, apparently no more than five or six years old, and dating from Scotland, which read as follows:

"My dear brother Henry:—I am writing this letter to you with my own hand, despite my physical weakness. It is the last letter I shall ever write to you, for I know my end is fast approaching. The doctor tells me I shall recover, but he cannot deceive me.

"I have, as you know, led a busy, useful, and successful life. My inventions have brought me distinction and reward. There is only one thing in my career which I regret, and even that does not fill me with remorse. Once there came to me a moment in which all that life seemed to promise me—all happiness, success, and ambition—were involved in a struggle for mastery between two men—myself and another.

"It is the law of nature that when two forces come into collision the weaker must give way. Nature has thus established the principle of the survival of the fittest, the dominance of the superior over the inferior. It matters not whether the struggle comes between planets or molecules, men or animals, nations or tribes, the law is the same. No man can be above the law of his being and his surroundings; it is his right and his duty to work out his salvation within his sphere and under the principles which nature has ordained.

"And yet in my case that which I had to do was extremely disagreeable. I had to remove a man from my pathway. One or the other had to suffer a most grievous loss, a fatal disappointment; and when this clash of interests came I had the right, under nature's laws, to defend myself. The man whose life crossed mine, and whom it was necessary for me to remove, was my best friend, and, for the moment, my guest. These circumstances added to the unpleasantness of my task, but did not deprive me of my right of self-preservation—a right which exists in every living thing, from the humblest to the highest, and whose exercise nature restricts only with limitations of power.

"You may wonder, brother, why I write these words. I write them because it is not in my nature to die with my secret untold. All these years I have carried it alone, absolutely alone. An impulse which I can neither describe nor control leads me to share my secret with just one human soul; and of course he can be none but you, my dearest friend and brother, who has shared all his secrets with me.

"You will recall all the circumstances of the tragedy which happened at our house in Glen Echo shortly after I left college, and while you were in Europe. We have often talked them over in the past, and you, like everyone else, tried to solve the mystery. If you had only known what I knew!

"I loved Irene Davidge before Silvester Baldwin did. Before he and she met at our house I was passionately devoted to her. I made up the house party for the purpose of providing a good opportunity to press my suit, which I knew was not unpleasing. Before she returned home I had confidently expected she would be my promised wife. But from the first day that she met Baldwin I knew my star was setting and his was in the ascendant. He was rapid and prosperous in his love-making, and I was forgotten. In a week they were lovers. One day I saw him kiss her as they stood behind some rose bushes in the garden. Had I not been a philosopher, a man of cool, calm reasoning, I should have killed him there and then.

"But you know my self-possession, my absolute control of self, my favourite theory that he who can master himself can master the world. All that night I reasoned it out with myself. My conclusions, which to me then, as now, appeared logical, were as follows:

"1. Without her my life is ruined, as I know myself well enough to know I shall never love again.

"2. If he lives she will be his, and I, the superior man in all, save those superficial qualities which attract the other sex, shall be the loser in life's battle.

"3. Nature has ordained that the superior shall triumph, and therefore I have the right to remove him from my way.

"4. If I do remove him, in proper fashion, she will be mine, as she would have been mine had he not come between us. Therefore his removal will give me that which I must have.

"Conclusion: I will remove him.

"Action being determined upon, it only remained to decide the means. It was necessary that everything should be done in a prudent and orderly way. There must be no danger of discovery or even of suspicion being fastened upon me, for of course that would defeat the purpose in view. To obviate the possibility of pain or humiliation to our dead mother, or to you, my brother, was as much my duty as to protect the mind of Miss Davidge from being poisoned against me. Therefore, it was necessary to proceed only after thorough consideration of all the possibilities. A minor point, but still one worthy of attention, was that I should not be compelled to do any actual butchering with my own hands, nor have any gruesome scenes about me. Even in this supreme moment, when I was successfully to work out my destiny or utterly ruin myself, I could not overlook the fact that I was a gentleman. Nor could I take the risk of employing a confederate.

"In a few hours my plans were laid. I hope you will agree with me that they were laid with judgement, skill, and thoroughness, as became a man of science and self-possession. Fortunately I had in my laboratory all the materials needed for my operations. But there was much work to do. Day and night I toiled up there on the roof of the old house, where you and I afterwards passed so many happy hours while perfecting my inventions. I absented myself as much as possible from the house party, in part because I could not endure seeing him and her together, and in part because I needed all the time for my preparations. During a period of one hundred hours I took only as much sleep as one ordinarily gets in twenty-four.

"At last I was ready. I remember that it was Sunday noon, just after services, that I tested my work, reviewed all my calculations, and found nothing had been neglected. After dinner in the evening I spent some time with the party in the dining-room, and the loving glances exchanged between Silvester and Irene were more endurable to me than they had hitherto been. Excusing myself about nine o'clock, I went upstairs. Entering Baldwin's room, I struck a match and found the book which he was engaged in reading. It was 'Horace's Odes,' from my library. I knew Silvester's habit of reading an hour before going to sleep—he formed it in college. Opening the volume to the bookmark, I turned over six pages and inserted there this note which I had prepared.

Digitized by Google

"'Dear Silvester:—If you are not too sleepy when you find this, come up to the laboratory. I have something important to show you.

E. S.'

"I calculated that it would take him a quarter of an hour to read from his bookmark to my note, and I felt sure he would come, as he had displayed much interest in my experiments, and had complained because of late I had admitted him so rarely to the laboratory. My only fear was that, in the time which I had given him, not all of the other people in the house would be asleep, as I naturally did not want anyone to know he had visited me. At the same time I dared not have placed the note farther on in the book, lest he should not reach it before falling asleep himself. Of course I could have deferred the removal till another night, but now wind and weather favoured, and I courted no delay.

"He came a few moments before eleven o'clock. I was ready for him.

"'Silvester,' said I, 'here is a machine I have built for experimental purposes, and I want you to help me test it.'

"'All right, Edwin,' he replied; 'what is it now?'

"'A new gas-holder, made of silk,' said I, 'and here is some of the new gas. Take a good whiff of it—it is like wine in the nostrils.'

"He took the metal flask which I handed him, turned the cock, and in a moment or two fell insensible at my feet. I had filled the flask with a combination of chloroform and hydrogen, under pressure, and when the cock was turned a cloud of most powerful anæsthetic fumes burst into his face.

"Now I was master of the situation. First I locked the door leading to the floor below. I noted with satisfaction that he had brought my note with him, thus saving me a perilous trip down to his room after it. I burned it in my furnace. A look at the anemometer showed a wind movement of thirty miles an hour, and I was glad to see that the barometer was still falling. If it had been possible for a man of my temperament to have faltered in a set purpose, the sight of the locket containing Irene's portrait which had fallen from the breast pocket of his pyjamas as he fell, would have served to have nerved me for my task.

"With your knowledge of thoroughgoing methods, dear brother, you will easily imagine how carefully I had planned everything. Sylvester's exact weight I had ascertained by a casual inquiry a few days before to be one hundred and sixty-two pounds. I assumed that he would come to me without stopping to dress, for he was hardy and athletic, and proud of his ability to endure exposure—an important point on account of the nicety of my calculations. The weight of the gas-bag was eighteen pounds; total, one hundred and eighty pounds, and of its lines and netting, five pounds; total, one hundred and eighty-five pounds. By careful test I had found the weight of my gas—it was nearly pure, dry hydrogen—was eighty thousandths of an ounce per cubic foot; and as air weighs one and two tenths ounces per foot, I had a net power of fully one and one tenth ounces per foot. The gas-bag was spherical, and a little more than eighteen feet in diameter, giving it a capacity of three thousand one hundred and fifty cubic feet, equal to two hundred and seventeen pounds lifting force.

"It was necessary to have a little margin, to compensate for loss of gas by leakage. Careful calculations of the rarity of the atmosphere at various altitudes showed me the bag with the burden would at first ascend to a height of about five thousand six hundred feet, where there would be an exact counterbalance of the weight of air displaced and the weight of the apparatus and its burden. Then it would slowly descend as the gas escaped from the bag. It was, of course, desirable that it should at first ascend to a great altitude, as that would prevent it being seen by anyone who might be astir. It was quite as desirable that the whole machine should remain in the air at least six hours, that it might be carried a proper distance away. At the same time, it must drop its burden before daylight—before anyone could see it and perchance understand its dread significance.

"It was highly important too, from my point of view, that the body should be found sooner or later, and be unmistakably identified; otherwise Irene might take it into her pretty head to do the romantic by waiting year after year for the possible re-appearance of her absent lover, which would be decidedly unpleasant for me. Hence I did not dare to arrange to send the apparatus out to sea, as I might easily have done. For the same reason I replaced in the pocket of Silvester's pyjamas the locket with Irene's miniature in it, which had fallen from it.

"It was absolutely necessary that the apparatus and its burden should not be found together, for in that case it would be easy to trace the two to a common source—to wit, my laboratory—thus defeating the purpose in view To obviate this danger I had made careful experiments in the effect of various acids upon fibres, and was able accurately, to determine the time in which a given quantity of diluted vitriolic acid would eat away a cord of given strength so that it would part under the strain of a weight of one hundred and fifty-six pounds. By this means I made sure that the apparatus and its burden should be separated before daylight, and the latter fall to earth, and the former, relieved of its incubus, to ascend to the skies and fly perhaps a thousand miles before coming down.

"Such a cord, twisted with acid and timed to sustain the load just six hours, I tied about the waist of Silvester and made fast to the netting beneath the gas-bag.

"The moment had come. Carefully I looked all about from the roof to see that no one was watching my operations, and noted with satisfaction that the night was extremely dark, and in all respects favourable to my purpose.

"At a quarter past eleven o'clock, Sunday evening, October 18, I took Silvester's living right hand in mine and pressed it with a farewell greeting. Then with three rapid slashes of my knife I cut the guy ropes of my little balloon, with the body of my rival dangling beneath it, darted upward and northward into the gale.

"Your affectionate brother,

"Edwin Stone."

* * * * *

Such was the secret of Silvester Baldwin's death. Was it to be expected that anything less than the diabolical craft and ingenuity that brought it to pass should penetrate the mystery?

Geo. Fenmore.

Digitized by Google

THE BELLE OF THE R.M.S. "TREBIZOND."

I.

Plaisir d'amour dure pour un jour,
Chagrin d'amour dure pour la vie.
DU MAURIER (Trilby).

"It's a beastly bad bit of business, and the worst of it is a fellow can't do anything in it. Why on earth don't things slide round into their proper places in this world and not go fooling round trying to make square holes fit them when they know they are round?"

With such ill-expressed and badly-worded logic did Niels Barton soliloquise as he paced up and down his little cabin. Honest men are sometimes—nay, very often—slow of speech, and that was the only title Niels Barton claimed from the world. He had traversed every league of its sea and almost every country known; he had formed few ties that it would have caused him a pang to break; seen very few races that did not in some respect resemble his own, especially in their follies and vices.

Niels Barton had no quarrel with the world; he loved it well, but he had learned the approximate value of almost every factor that went to the making of it; learned to see everything in proper proportion, always and excepting one—woman.

He had been brought up with a profound respect for the sex, and, shaken as his faith had been in his wanderings, he had not yet lost sight of his ideal. He did not belong to the class of men who "like a woman who's a perfect fool," though he knew there were such and that they had succeeded in manufacturing just the very thing they wanted.

Niels Barton took himself seriously—too seriously, his friends thought—yet they all respected him for it; and it was with his characteristic soberness of mind that he thrashed out the question that now occupied his attention.

That question contained that most perplexing of paradoxes—a woman. Not that the one in question was even remotedly connected with his own fate; but another woman was; and that was the reason; so Niels Barton told himself that all women claimed his chivalrous attention.

His musings were interrupted presently by a cheery voice.

"What on earth are you muttering about, Barton?—you, the only optimist aboard as far as I can make out in spite of your solemn old face. Why, one would think you were expecting the Sydney Mail to contain the news of the sudden death of all your relations in one fell stroke."

"Talking of the mail, that reminds me, Thornburgh, that I must catch the homeward French packet to-morrow; we shall pass her coming out. You don't mind my being candid, old man, but just now you are in the way. Come in later, will you?"

And with the best of good graces Thornburgh departed, whistling as he went the latest air that had been imported from England.

Hugh Thornburgh was the first refrigerating engineer of the Trebizond, the greyhound of the Pacific, and now on her way from Vancouver to Sydney. In spite of (perhaps because of) their wide difference in character he and Barton, the second officer, were such chums.

Barton, to any casual observer, was not handsome. He possessed the Sonata kind of face that required studying to appreciate its beauty. Thornburgh, on the other hand, had what gushing young ladies call "the features of an Adonis."

There were others besides this superficial difference; the chief, perhaps, being that although Barton was three years the younger, Thornburgh possessed one of those boyish dispositions that made one prophecy on the shortest possible acquaintance that he would never be a man, while Barton gave one the impression that he had never been anything else.

It was white suit weather, and the Trebizond was only two days off port.

A fortnight since there had been added to the list of passengers—some two hundred odd of varied types of the human family—the Governor of New Zealand, Sir Philip Armstrong, and his only child, Cherith.

Young—she was barely nineteen; pretty—of the wax doll type of beauty; lively and accomplished, Cherith Armstrong was bound to be more than a cipher wherever she went. Needless to say, in her short reign on the Trebizond, she had been the cause of much speculation, many heartbreakings.

Among the saloon passengers, which included successful prospectors from Klondyke, Government officials, interesting couples on their honeymoon, intrepid old ladies, lively young ones, consumptive misanthropes, and globe-trotting elder sons, was one of the latter species, who attracted, and, what was more, demanded no little attention.

Hiram Jackson, of Boston and Philadelphia, was a man not to be lightly regarded. "When found make a note of," Captain Cuttle would, no doubt, have observed. Certainly one could hardly help making mental notes on him. His profusion of gold chain, his length of shirt cuff, the size of the check in his tweed suit, the quality of his cigars, and the dollars he spent daily at the first class bar were facts too much in evidence to be passed over.

The officers, most of whom were men of education and culture, got a vast amount of amusement out of him and the patronising airs he assumed towards them. Most of the passengers tolerated him with that air of bonhomie one usually finds among passengers on short voyages; a select few pointedly snubbed him; and others treated him with indifference.

Among the latter was Cherith Armstrong. She consented to be amused by him and his inane, vulgar boasting so long as it amused her, but when a winsome, handsome young officer was near Hiram received his congé.

Needless to say, this did not meet with his views of the fitness of things, and not long after Thornburgh left Barton to his thoughts and his mail, an interesting, though somewhat one-sided conversation was taking place in the reading room of the Trebizond.

Niels finished his letter, lighted his pipe, and commenced to pace his cabin. It was not a cheerful letter that he had written; but he wrote as the mood moved him, and it was a black, or at most a grey one to-day, for he had made a discovery.

Digitized by Google

When Cherith Armstrong had come on board there had been a lively discussion by the officers off duty, and all, with the exception of Barton, had been unanimous in giving her the title of the "belle of the ship."

"Oh, it's no use trying to convert an old Benedick like Barton," said Thornburgh, his champion. "He likes a woman with ideas, and I don't think we shall find the belle has any."

And in spite of the changes his mind had undergone in the ten days that followed, Barton was still ignorant of one idea at least that had taken root in her mind, and grown till it was a certainty with her, and that was that she loved Hugh Thornburgh.

It was a well-known fact to all on board that Cherith was on her way to her fiancé, the newly-made commissioner of lands and mines for Western Australia, and preparations were in progress for a society wedding in Sydney, to which end Lady Armstrong had gone in advance of her husband and daughter to arrange matters.

This fact it was, added to the double discovery that Thornborough was very hard hit, that had given Barton's face more than its usual seriousness on this sunny day in April.

It was the beginning of Australia's autumn, and the sun had begun to soften the intensity of its rays. It had been bearable—nay more, delightful—sitting on the quarter-deck that afternoon with Cherith Armstrong under the cool awning, but for the revelation that she had made to him.

Niels Barton could never understand why people confided in him as they did. It was deucedly awkward at times, he reflected, and this was one of them. Barton had never tried to borrow a little reflected glory from the Navy. He was quite proud enough of the service to which he belonged, in spite of the fact, so hard of realisation by a few restricted souls, that a man may be equally a man and a gentleman in the M.M.

As he had sat by the side of the fair, fragile little girl, whom he had found trying, or pretending to read, and listened to her little tale of woe, all the honour that was in him rose in revolt against a fate that seemed to be decreed.

He took the book from her listless hands, and had chosen one of Kipling's poems that he had taught her to understand and love. He had not read many lines before he found that to-day she was not listening; her blue eyes had a far away, misty look in them, and her delicately-veined hands locked and unlocked themselves nervously.

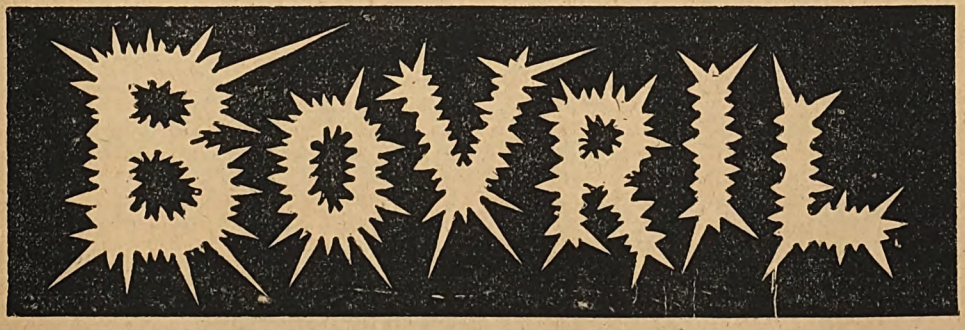
Presently she broke the spell of a silence that only the flutter of the leaves of the book had interrupted for some minutes.

"Mr. Barton, will you forgive me if I make a safety-valve of you? I must speak to someone, and I think you are the only one on board who would understand at all. I am going to confess.

"A fortnight ago I, Cherith Armstrong, was the girl you took me for—yes, don't contradict—I was, I know you did, and I deserve it; yet hear my defence. I was brought up to live for my own ends—my own amusement. I have made many conquests; so many that, when a year ago a new man out from England, came to Government House, my parents, who were getting tired of the responsibility, told me that he was the eligible parti whom I was to marry.

Influenza

is an insidious germ disease which lies in wait for those whose system is not in a condition to resist it. Even the healthy and strong must keep up the resisting power. In all cases Bovril is an invaluable safeguard; it maintains strength, vitality, body-warmth; it stimulates the circulation, and gives to the system that healthy tone without which it is an easy prey to the epidemic. A hot cup of Bovril between meals, and as a "night-cap" is all that is necessary.



Digitized by Google

"They had decided the question, and I acquiesed. I had no thought in the matter. You see, I had not been taught to think—only to amuse myself. I pinned my faith to the idea that so long as a girl had her fling it mattered little whom she married, so long as it was what the world called a good match, and I consented to be engaged.

"Only twice since have I seen the man I am to marry, and now I go to be his wife; but I swear to you solemnly that until I came on board the Trebizond I have never known what 'love' is."

She hesitated, flushing a deep crimson beneath her Leghorn hat with its masses of roses that matched the ribbons on her muslin dress. She was just a wee little bit of the daintiest Dresden china, Niels thought. It seemed sacrilege almost to touch her; and here, wonder of wonders, was the woman—the soul of the woman waking up, the gay butterfly whom he had decided had none. She went on with an effort:

"How could I help loving him? I know it's madness from any point of view but mine; but you—oh! you know him; he is your friend. Tell me, how could I help loving Hugh Thornburgh?"

Niels gripped the arm of her deck chair as in a vice.

"No," he said, "you couldn't help it. I grant you full absolution on that point."

"But you see," she went on, "how impossible it is. The mater is now in Sydney ordering my trousseau, and oh, think of me," she added pitifully, "at Warrimo—that's the pater's wedding gift to us, you know—seven miles from anywhere, with an husband who is M.I.C.E., an F.R.G.S., and—and other horrid things. At intervals there will come lectures on wifely obedience from the mater, and oh, you can take it from me, however often you may hear it quoted to the contrary, that there is no happy marriage possible in this world without love."

Niels Barton rose and ground his heel into the polished surface of the deck.

"Miss Armstrong, I thank you for your trust in me. I cannot help you in this, but if at any time I can, promise that you will let me know."

She gave it with a tremor in her voice, and he caught the words "I'll try—try and be worthy of his and of your good opinion" before she fluttered like a bird down the companion way and into her own room.

So Niels Barton concluded that he had grave reasons for his seriousness.

II.

And each for the joy of the working, and each in his separate star,
Shall draw the thing as he sees it, for the God of things as they are.
L'Envoi (Kipling).

He had refilled his pipe, and renewed his pacing once more, when Thornburgh again appeared with a very different expression from the one he had worn an hour since.

"May I come in, Barton?"

"Why, of course you may! I'm on my second pipe already. Light up, if you've come for a yarn; there's an hour yet before I need dress for dinner. It's part of your luck to get out of that ordeal."

With that fineness of sympathy and tact generally supposed to be the attribute of the so-called gentler sex, but more often found in the sterner, Barton ignored his friend's white face and proceeded to search diligently for something he did not want in a drawer.

Thornburgh had deposited his well-set frame on the edge of Niel's bunk, and, as he finished speaking, he lifted his handsome face from his hands.

"Barton, old chap, that globe-trotting idiot, who hasn't succeeded in engrossing all Miss Armstrong's attention this voyage, has had the impudence to corner me in the reading room and inform me that it is my doing; and insulted me by saying it was not likely that Miss Armstrong would look at a beggar of an engineer with only his pay. As if any but a born idiot expected her to! I suppose one may be permitted to view the Promised Land, even though one may not be of the elect. I retorted that it was not likely she would look at a globe-trotting American, even accompanied by the almighty dollar, in any light but that of a curiosity, seeing she is going to Sydney to be married; but, perhaps, you don't keep the eighth commandment yourself, I added; I don't need any reminder, thanks; and with that I left him."

Barton smiled.

"He's in perfectly safe hands there, Thornburgh; but—but I'm afraid, old fellow, you're rather hard hit!"

"Pretty bad, Barton, thanks, but it's all in the day's work, you know. Of course, she doesn't suspect it. She'd never believe I'd the impudence to fall in love with her: and even if I were cad enough to let her know, why, what hope would there ever be of her ever caring for me? No, Barton, things are best as they are. She'll never know, and she may be happy if the man isn't a brute, which, please God, he isn't."

Niels gripped his hand. He was facing it so like a man that he would not make it worse for him by telling him what he knew. He would tell him after; perhaps she would leave some token for him to give him.

Twelve more restless hours for at least three on board the Trebizond and then she steamed slowly up past the creeks and inlets flanked by orange grooves and gum trees of the most beautiful harbour in the world. The sun shon out over its waste of waters, blue and still, in unconscious irony at least to those same three.

Thornburgh, who was on duty, kept religiously in the background. There was no good to be gained by a good-bye either for the Governor's daughter or for himself, so Barton was the last to see the "belle of the Trebizond."

He had been helping her to collect her music in the music room, and, as he rose with the heap in his arms, where she had placed it, to follow her, she turned and lifted her pitiful, fair, little face to his, and Niels Barton, with an impulse he could not resist, still less explain, turned and kissed her. She seemed to be asking to be comforted, and it was all he could do.

A week later a sorry little note arrived for him from the "Gresham." They were to be married from that hotel. It ran:

My Friend,

The only one who has told me the truth for the truth's sake—let me thank you for all your goodness to me. Remember your promise, and—forgive me. I am very weak, I know, but I am so lonely. I love Hugh Thornburgh more than life itself.

Have some pity for your poor little friend,

Cherith.

* * * * *

And did they run away these two lovers, as the up-to-date novelette would lead us to suppose? No; it was all very commonplace, and so like life, and we do not even know whether the unhappy couple lived unhappily ever after.

Edna S. Gamble.

(The Sequel will Appear Next Week.)

Digitized by Google

The Queen of Music Boxes.

Messrs. Nicole Freres'

REGINA AND POLYPHON Musical Boxes.

PLAY YOUR OWN SELECTION OF MUSIC.

These boxes render on steel combs the most exquisite music, with a compass and volume of tone equal to that of a piano. As a social entertainer they are unrivalled, playing over 1,000 different tunes, including all the latest popular music, as well as classical and operatic selections. With one winding run 20 to 30 minutes. The tune sheets are of metal and practically indestructible, while the mechanism is solid yet simple. Handsome cases.

SPECIAL LINES:

INFANTA, GENEVA, GORDON, HAVELOCK	Polyphon, with 6 Tunes,	32s., 60s., 80s., 115s.,	extra Tunes, 5d. 8d. 1s. 4d. 1s. 8d.
REGINA No. 20.	,,	160s.,	2s. 0d.

All Prices, from 16/6 to 100 Guineas.

All Dealers, or Illustrated No. 3 Catalogue Free to Readers of "SHORT STORIES."

NICOLE FRERES Ltd. (Dept. 3)

21 ELY PLACE, HOLBORN, LONDON, E.C. Established 1815.

VARICOCELE.

Every man suffering from Varicocele and the allied troubles, or Varicose Veins, should send for treatise, describing their Causes, Symptoms, Results, and Successful and Painless Treatment without surgical operation or the use of cumbersome trusses and electrical appliances. Will be sent sealed, post free.

S. S. MURRAY,
7 Southampton Row, London, W.C.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK

Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London.

INVESTED FUNDS £10,000,000.

The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free.

FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

PYN-KA

THE WONDERFUL
METAL POLISHER

The Lustre Lasts!
Pyn-Ka Leaves no Scratches!

Cleans and burnishes gold, silver, plate, copper, brass, nickel, tin, glass, etc., better, quicker, and at less cost of labour and money than any other polish known.

Paste or tablets, 1d. to 6d. All dealers.

THE ELECTROPATHIC BELT CONSTIPATION.

Rev. D. Sutcliffe, Vicar of Holme, Burnley, Lancashire, writes:—"My health has improved very satisfactorily, and I am now entirely free from the constipation I used to suffer from so severely."

Speedily cures all Disorders of the Nerves, Stomach, Liver, and Kidneys. Thousands of Testimonials. Pamphlet & Advice free on application to Medical Battery Co., Ld.

489, OXFORD ST., LONDON, W.

Call to-day, or write at once.

A SUM of from 12s. to 25s. per week can be earned in spare hours or evenings by either sex everywhere.—Send addressed envelope for particulars to Box 24, Eclipse Works, 92A Aldersgate Street, London.

£20

Hairdressers fitted up. Estimates free.

Tobacconists Commencing. See Illd. Guide (259 pages) 3d. How to open a cigar store, £20 to £2,000 Tobacconists Outfitting Co., 186, Euston Road, London. The largest and original house (50 years reputation. Mgr., H. Myers

PASTIMES

A WEEKLY MAGAZINE OF SPORT & ADVENTURE

KEATING'S LOZENGES

THERE IS NO BETTER REMEDY IN THE WHOLE WORLD FOR ALL COUGH AND THROAT TROUBLES THAN KEATING'S LOZENGES. ONE GIVES RELIEF. THEY WILL CURE, AND THEY WILL NOT INJURE YOUR HEALTH. THEY CONTAIN ONLY THE PUREST DRUGS.

Sold everywhere in 1/1½ Tins.

ALL FAT PEOPLE

can safely Reduce Weight and cure Corpulency permanently by taking TRILENE TABLETS (Regd.) for a few weeks. They are small, agreeable, harmless, and never fail to IMPROVE both HEALTH and FIGURE without Change of Diet. An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."

Send 2s. 6d. to THE TRILENE CO., Sole Proprietors, 66 Finsbury Pavement, London.

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

Princess Liechtenstein writes from Landsberg, Austria: "Pray send your excellent tablets directly." Mr. Canham, 87 Alexandra Road, Norwich: "Tablets cured my wife of extreme stoutness; it has never returned." Mrs. H. Cox, 28 Watnall Road, Hucknall Torkard, writes: "The Tablets reduced me 1½ stone." Mrs. S. Alexander, 102 Dixon Street, New Swindon, says: "They reduced me 28lb., and I am cured." Mrs. Darnley-Smith, of Landscove Vicarage, Ashburton, says: "Tablets have reduced me very much." Mrs. Crossley, of Rose Hill, Torver, Comston, says: "I weigh much less and can breathe so much easier; I am delighted."

SULPHOLINE LOTION,

For clearing the skin from Spots, Blemishes, Redness, Roughness, giving a Beautiful Complexion and pleasing appearance.

SHILLING BOTTLES.

ATLAS LOCKSTITCH MACHINE.

Works by hand or treadle. Guaranteed 4 years. Equal in quality and size to any machine To ensure satisfaction, we will send machine on receipt of 5/- P.O. for ONE MONTH'S TRIAL. Balance can be paid 5/- Monthly. Call or write for designs and Samples of work.

39/-

THE ATLAS SEWING MACHINE CO.,
188B High St., Camden Town, London, N.W.;
63 Seven Sisters Rd., N.; 14 High Rd., Kilburn.

ZOX

CURES

NEURALGIA

Toothache, Headache, Sciatica, and all Nerve Pains.

PURE, HARMLESS, AND NON-APERIENT.

Do not be persuaded to take a substitute, there is nothing as good as ZOX.

Of all Chemists, 1s. and 2s. 6d. per Box.

ZOX Co., 11 HATTON GARDEN, E.C.

PIANOS. UPRIGHT IRON GRAND.

Complete Iron frame, Brass Pin Plate, Nickel-bolted Wrest Plank, Check Action, Full Trichord, Full Compass, Rivetted Hammers, Handsome Walnut Case, Inlaid Marqueterie Panel, Sconces, Trusses, etc. Tone and touch perfect. Guaranteed 25 years. 28 guineas, at 10/6 per month. Delivered free on payment of 10/6. Approval. Catalogues Free.

ORGANS. GENUINE AMERICAN.

Imported Direct. Solid Walnut Case, Mirror Top, Music Case, 2 Knee Swells, Mouse and Dust Proof, 8 Stops, 3 Sets of Reeds, 14 Guineas, at 6/- per month. 10 Stops, 3 Sets of Reeds, 2 Octave Couplers. 15 guineas, at 7/- per month. Illustrated Lists Free. Kindly mention this paper.

THE LONDON AND LIVERPOOL PIANOFORTE CO.,
Granby St. & Selborne St., LIVERPOOL.
Agents wanted where not represented.

Digitized by Google

YOU AND I.

Slum.—Berlin may be called a city without slums. There are districts in the north and east of the city where the poor live, but they are better housed than in most large cities; there are no alleys and courts, such as we know in London, for instance, and there is an absence of that misery and squalor that seems to chill us when we penetrate the poorer neighbourhoods here.

Court.—Sir H. Halford, M.D., was Court physician to four Sovereigns, namely, George III., George IV., William IV., and Queen Victoria. This is the only instance of the kind. He died in 1844.

M. E.—The natives of Easter Island, in the Pacific Ocean, had a curious custom, according to which their king was chosen. There was a legend to the effect that many years ago there was a good king, who used to collect the eggs of the seabirds. When he was old he did not die, but turned into a butterfly. The natives thought so much of him they could not decide which chief should succeed him. At last they determined that the one who collected the largest number of eggs within a certain time would be most like the old man, and from that time the appointment of king was decided in that way.

G. P.—No, the Danish flag, strictly speaking, is the oldest. It is a white cross on a red ground, and the adoption of this—the Danebrog—flag as the national standard of the Danish army dates from the victory won at Reval in 1219 by Valdemar II. It was at that time that the Northern Kingdom reached the highest point in its history. There is a traditional legend to the effect that the flag descended ready-made from Heaven in answer to Valdemar's prayer as he was leading his troops to battle.

F. A. G. asks: "Can a snake poison a snake?"——Reptiles are never affected by a bite from one of their own species; the common viper does not die from a bite from one of its own kind; the bite of the hooded snake, however, would probably be fatal to it.

H. B.—The best of the transparent soaps are made by dissolving ordinary soap in alcohol and then distilling it off again; otherwise they do not differ in constitution from the best primrose. English soaps are undoubtedly the best in the world. Continental soap is quite inferior, being less carefully made, and principally from oils instead of fats. It contains more soda and is irritating, although it makes up into more showy-looking toilet articles.

Q. W.—The first Quaker, and the founder of the sect in England, was George Fox, who flourished in the middle of the seventeenth century. There are, at least, two stories of the origin of the name "Quaker." One is that it was given to them because they made people tremble at the word of the Lord, and the other that they were so called owing to their gesticulation and shaking while preaching.

L. M. S. asks: "What is the idea in firing guns as a salute to any illustrious stranger visiting our shores?"——To show the visitor that he or she, as the case may be, is regarded as a friend, and that, therefore, it is unnecessary to keep the guns loaded as if an enemy were in the vicinity.

W. B.—Sovereigns were first issued in the reign of Henry VIII., and was so called because His Majesty in Royal robes was represented upon them.

J.—Railway travelling in Russia promises to become more agreeable than it has hitherto been. The companies have been smitten with a surprising desire for improvement; they are about to establish free libraries on the trains. If, during your stay in the country, you have to make a journey from Moscow to Sebastopol, you will be provided with literature—if you understand Russian.

R. H.—The largest statue ever made was the Colossus of Rhodes, the next largest being the statue of Bavaria, erected by Louis I., King of Bavaria.

D. R.—A tomb-dance is performed at St. Ives, Cornwall, by ten girls every fifth year. A Mr. Kaill, who died in 1811, left a sum of money to defray the expenses of ten girls of ten years of age who should dance for a quarter of an hour in the morning on a plot of land adjoining his mausoleum. They were to be dressed in white and have their hair elaborately curled and frizzed. A fiddler plays the music, and two elderly widows also receive a substantial gratuity for acting as witnesses.

G. M.—The Royal yachts are the property of the nation, not of the Queen personally.

W. H.—Windmills are in great request in European Russia, and there is money to be made by anyone who pushes on the trade of windmill machinery there. The country is flat and windy, and the people, backward as they are, seem to realise that the wind may be made to do something for the good of the community.

T.—I find that 1,000 tons of sugar are used every day in this United Kingdom in connection with tea drinking.

Mar.—You are quite right; in former times marriages were prohibited in this country during certain seasons. These were periods connected with religious festivals, as from "Advent Sunday to the octave of the Epiphany." In an almanack for 1678, the information is given that "marriage comes in on the 18th of January, and goes out on Septuagesima Sunday," and the like.

I. T.—In 1799, when the income-tax in its present form first came into operation, the rate was two shillings in the pound; it realised £6,000,000. Last year, with a rate one-third that amount, the tax brought rather more than £18,000,000. The tax was repealed. In 1842 it was re-imposed, and has stayed with us since without intermission. Not many persons will celebrate that centenary.

Monarch.—Of the seven Presidents of France (including the newly chosen one) who have been called to the head of affairs during the existence of the present French Republic, only one has been unanimously elected. That distinction was granted to M. Thiers, whose great services to his country was thus fittingly recognised.

X. I.—The greatest lady explorer of the present day is Miss Mary Kingsley, whose travels in West Africa astonished every well-seasoned male explorer about three years ago. The object of her journeyings was research into the social manners, folk-lore and customs of the natives; she visited some of the fiercest cannibal tribes of the interior, and collected many valuable objects, many of which are in the British Museum.

R. H.—Your friend is quite right. The word "Pup," properly speaking, should not refer to a little dog, but a little boy or girl. A little dog is so called because it is a pet.

SHORT STORIES' ADVERTISEMENT RATES.

Single column, per inch, per insertion	£0 10 0
Double ,, ,, ,,	1 0 0
Full page inside, facing page of matter, either white paper or 2nd or 3rd page of cover, or back page, per insertion	10 0 0
Half-page ,, ,, ,, ...	5 0 0
Quarter-page ,, ,, ...	2 10 0
Eighth-page ,, ,, ...	1 5 0
Front page, whole ,, ,, ...	12 10 0
,, half	6 5 0

All spaces above one-eighth of a page are charged at per page rate.

Series discount: 5 per cent. for 13, 10 per cent. for 26, 15 per cent. for 52 insertions.

Black blocks are charged 25 per cent. extra. All advertisements are subject to approval. All copy must be sent in by Noon on Tuesday, March 14th, if intended for the Issue on sale March 28th, and dated April 1st. The Proprietors reserve the right to hold over or suspend the insertion of any advertisement without prejudice to other insertions on order. All communications should be addressed to the Advertisement Manager, "Pearson's Weekly" Offices, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Printed and Published by C. Arthur Pearson Ltd., at Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

SUPERIOR PRINTING OUTFITS

For 1/2, 2/3, 2/8, 3/4, 3/9 and 6/9, post free.

Consisting of Letters, Points, and Ornaments, a Type-Holder, supply of Ink, Pad, and Tweezers. Any name, &c., can be made at pleasure, for stamping Books, Papers, and Printing Cards.

ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUE FREE.

Agents wanted for the Sale of Patent "Air Cushion" Rubber Stamps and Type.

The "Mignon" Dating Stamp.

COMPLETE IN BOX, WITH PAD AND INK.

Price 2s. post free.

Indispensable for Receipting Bills, for Dating Correspondence Papers, etc.

FUN FOR THE MILLION!

THE "HARLEQUINADE" SET OF SIX COMICAL RUBBER STAMPS.

Same Size of Drawings with Self Inking Pad.

Endless Variety of Mirth-Provoking Pictures can be produced.

Price, all complete, 2/6 only. Postage, 2d. extra.

THE

FLUX Stylographic Pen

TRADE MARK.

embraces all the good points necessary in a Good Pen, and is as near Perfection as Skill and Long Experience can make it.

IT IS PRACTICALLY INDESTRUCTIBLE, BEING MADE EXCLUSIVELY OF NON-CORROSIVE SUBSTANCES, VIZ., COLD AND VULCANITE. IT IS FITTED WITH OSCILLATING NEEDLE, THE USE OF WHICH ENABLES THE WRITER TO HOLD THE PEN AT ANY ANGLE.

3/= The Cheapest Pen for Universal Use.
Each Pen supplied in Box with Filler and full Directions for Use. will be sent Free. Postage 1d. each; if "Registered," 3d. extra.

No. 500.—Plain Polished Vulcanite, each, 3s.
For FOUNTAIN PENS refer to Illustrated List, which

Agents Wanted. Illustrated Lists Free.

M. LINDNER, Patentee, Manufacturer, and Importer, 170 Fleet St., London, E.C.

100 PACKETS showy Flower Seeds, 1/6; unequalled anywhere.
DANIEL STONE, LOUDWATER, BUCKS.

FOR LADIES AND CENTLEMEN.

JUNO CYCLES

LISTS POST FREE

ARE THE VERY BEST AND MOST UP-TO-DATE.

Carriage Paid. Cash Discount.

Write for New Season's List.

JUNO Cycles and Accessories sent Post Free.

Juno No. 4. £10 10s.	17/6 monthly, Monthly		Monthly
£10 ... 16/8	£12 ... 20/-	£14 14s. ...	24/6
£10 10s. ... 17/6	£12 12s. ... 21/-	£15 15s. ...	26/3

METROPOLITAN MACHINISTS' CO. Ltd.,
Juno Cycle School & Works, 75, 76, Bishopsgate Street, Without, E.C., and Piccadilly Circus, London, W.
Typewriters, £9 9s. 15s. 9d. Monthly.

ROYAL MAGAZINE

Published on 22nd of each month.

3d.

COMFORT, CLEANLINESS AND CURE

FOLLOW THE USE OF

Dr. PAUL'S WHITE PILE OINTMENT.

Gives ease at once and effectually removes Piles, Cracks, Fissures and Ulcerations.
In boxes 1/- & 2/6 each. Post free 1/2 & 2/9

PENN & CO., 89, BLACKFRIARS ROAD, LONDON, S.E.

SAVE HALF YOUR BUTCHERS' BILLS and BUY from our DIRECT SUPPLY STORES. Orders of 4s. free delivered. Terms, cash on delivery. Orders posted before five p.m. delivered next day everywhere.

MUTTON.—Loins and saddles, 6½d.; shoulders, 6d.
MUTTON.—Legs, 8d.; necks, 5d.
LAMB.—Hind-quarter (9lb.), 8d.; fore-quarter (9lb.), 6½d.
BEEF.—Topside, 7½d.; silverside, 7d.; sirloin and ribs, 8d.
BEEF.—Suet, d.; gravy beef, 4d.; brisket, 4½d.
BEEF.—Rumpsteak, 11d.; beefsteak, 8d.; salt silverside, 7d.
VEAL and PORK equally low prices.

The ENGLISH FARMERS' ASSOCIATION (Limited), 6 Holborn Circus, London, E.C.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

ASK FOR & INSIST ON HAVING
HARRIS'
DELICIOUS & ABSOLUTELY PURE
MADE ONLY BY HARRIS AND CO.
GOLD MEDAL
BERMONDSEY CAKE FACTORY, LONDON, W.
OF STORES & GROCERS EVERYWHERE
CAKES
APPLICATIONS FOR SOLE AGENCIES INVITED

'DOLLY' BLUE

Notice.—"DOLLY" Blue is neatly tied in a white bag to a small handle to hold by whilst using. It is the cheapest and best Laundry Blue in the market. "Dolly" Blue is sold by all Grocers and Oilmen at 1d. per bag.

IMPORTANT.—The public are cautioned against attempts which may be made to supply other Blue, Tints, and Dyes than those of Messrs. W. Edge and Sons Ltd., when "Dolly" Blue, "Dolly" Tints, and "Dolly" Dyes are ordered.

The Dolly Specialities are manufactured by
W. EDGE & SONS LIMITED, BOLTON, LANCS.

LYLE'S
COLDEN SYRUP
LONGEST ESTABLISHED, PUREST & BEST.

HALL'S
COCA PELLETS

TRIAL
SAMPLES
GRATIS.

PREVENT FATIGUE from WALKING,
TRAVELLING
STUDY
CYCLING
SINGING
SICK NURSING BUSINESS WORRIES
&c., &c.

CURE
SLEEPLESSNESS
BRAIN FAG
NERVOUSNESS
NEURALGIA
DESPONDENCY
EXHAUSTION
MENTAL STRAIN
&c., &c.

SEND POSTCARD
FOR A FREE SAMPLE.

PRICES:
1/2, 2/11,
4/9, &
11/3
POST FREE.

SOLE MAKERS:
GILBERT & HALL,
CHEMISTS,
BOURNEMOUTH

RED WHITE
BLUE
SOLD EVERYWHERE
AND
FRENCH COFFEE
DELICIOUS FOR BREAKFAST OR AFTER DINNER

ZEBRA
Grate Polish.
In Packets or as a Paste in Tins.

HAVE YOU TRIED FOR OUR NEW £1,000 PRIZE?

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY G. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

NO. 533. | FOR WEEK ENDING MARCH 18TH, 1899. | [ONE PENNY.

PILLS NOT MADE IN GERMANY.

During the past few years "Made in Germany" has become all too familiar to Britishers. But though the Germans run us close in many a market, there is one department in wl ich they shiver on the brink and fear to launch away. We never see advertisements of "Pills made in Germany." Why? Because they lack the skill, genius, and brains to make a Pill that shall equal—say Page Woodcock's Wind Pills, the finest remedy in the world for the cure of Indigestion, Wind on the Stomach, Liver Complaints, Biliousness, Costiveness, Sick Headache, Palpitation of the Heart, &c.

A few days ago a delicate lady was overheard to say to a friend, "Do you notice I have looked so much better lately?" "Yes," said the other, "How is it?" And the reply was "I have been trying Page Woodcock's Wind Pills, and they have done me a world of good." You doubt our word? Send us a post-card, and we will send both their names.

All sufferers from Indigestion, Liver Complaints, Wind on the Stomach, Sick Headache, Costiveness, Nervous Debility, Palpitation of the Heart, Biliousness, &c., should avail themselves of this most excellent Medicine.

Page Woodcock's Wind Pills, being purely Vegetable, Tasteless, and Mild and Tonic in their action, may be taken with perfect safety by the most delicate of either sex. Children may take them in reduced doses.

Page Woodcock's Wind Pills are sold by all Medicine Vendors at 1/1½ and 2/9. Post free for price from Page Woodcock, Lincoln.

10/6 Allen Foster & Co 10/6

SOLE MAKERS OF THE 'ALFOSCO' COSTUMES

Buy Direct by Parcels Post from the Leading Firm of London Manufacturers.

Design No. 94. 10/6

Great Bargains in Ladies' Costume Skirts, in Black and Navy Serge (lined throughout). Price only 3/11; carriage paid, 5d. extra.

Design No. 97. 10/6

Design No. 94.
HALF-A-GUINEA.

Design No. 94 is a truly marvellous creation as a Costume. It stands unrivalled in point of value, style, and appearance—acknowledged everywhere the best Half-Guinea Costume of the Season. It is produced in the excellent Venetian Cloth or in the Specialite Serge—two grand cloths, unsurpassed for wear and durability. It is a velvet trimmed Costume with bodice and sleeves lined. It has a pretty pleated front and fits tight to the figure. The skirt is cut full and well-made. Truly marvellous value, and only 10/6 Costume complete. Carriage paid, 6d. extra; or Skirt alone, 5/6; carr. 5d. extra.

Design No. 97.
HALF-A-GUINEA.

Design No. 97 is the smart and fashionable Chesterfield Coat and Skirt. It consists of a tailor-made single-breasted coat, with velvet collar, and full, well-made skirt. This smart Costume is made in the smooth-faced Venetian Cloth or in the Specialite Serge for Half-a-Guinea, Costume complete. Carriage paid, 6d. extra The Skirt alone can be had for 5/6; Carriage, 5d. Colours in either cloth are: Black, Navy, Electric, Blue-Grey, Myrtle, Brown, Fawn, Bronze-Green, Moss, Dark Grey, Purple. When ordering, please give measurement round bust (under arms), length of sleeve inside, size of waist, and length of skirt in front.

New SPRING SKETCH BOOK OF FASHIONS sent Post Free on application.

ALLEN FOSTER & CO.,
The London Manufacturers,
17 ROSCOE STREET, GOLDEN LANE, LONDON, E.C.

Digitized by Google

COFFEE WITHOUT DREGS.

GOOD! IT'S MASON'S

An agreeable, stimulating and sustaining beverage. Instantly prepared and most economical. Equal to the very finest coffee. Highly recommended by the Medical Profession.

Of all Grocers and Stores, or a Sample Bottle post free for 9 stamps.

ALSO TRY

MASON'S WINE ESSENCES

AND

MASON'S EXTRACT OF HERBS.

Sample Bottle of either sent free for 9d.; two assorted 1/3 three assorted 1/8.

Agents Wanted.

Manufacturers—

NEWBALL & MASON, NOTTINGHAM.

By Special Appointment
Makers to Her Majesty.

Borax Starch Glaze is a great help when starching and ironing. It overcomes the vexatious difficulties which always beset that particular work. Mix a teaspoonful of Borax Starch Glaze with a pint of liquid starch, then ironing is a pleasure because it is a success. Borax Starch Glaze prevents the iron sticking; it makes it work smoothly. It will make your linen, lace, and muslin look like new; give them an enamel-like gloss, and a permanent stiffness not obtainable by any other preparation. Borax Starch Glaze is sold in small packets by Grocers, Oilmen, and Stores. Write for our Booklet.

The Patent Borax Company, Ltd.,
Ladywood, Birmingham.

London House: 129, High Holborn.

No. 10.

ALL FAT PEOPLE

can safely Reduce Weight and cure Corpulency permanently by taking TRILENE TABLETS (Regd.) for a few weeks. They are small, agreeable, harmless, and never fail to IMPROVE both HEALTH and FIGURE without Change of Diet. An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."

Send 2s. 6d. to THE TRILENE CO., Sole Proprietors, 6 Finsbury Pavement, London.

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

Princess Liechtenstein writes from Landsberg, Austria: "Pray send your excellent tablets directly." Mr. Canham, 87 Alexandra Road, Norwich: "Tablets cured my wife of extreme stoutness; it has never returned." Mrs. H. Cox, 23 Walnall Road, Hucknall Torkard, writes: "The Tablets reduced me 1½ stone." Mrs. S. Alexander, 102 Dixon Street, New Swindon, says: "They reduced me 28lb., and I am cured." Mrs. Darnley-Smith, of Landscove Vicarage, Ashburton, says: "Tablets have reduced me very much." Mrs. Crossley, of Rose Hill, Torver, Comston, says: "I weigh much less and can breathe so much easier; I am delighted."

£20

Hairdressers fitted up. Estimates free.

Tobacconists Commencing. See Illd. Guide (250 pages) 3d. How to open a cigar store, £20 to £2,000. Tobacconists Outfitting Co., 186, Euston Road, London. The largest and original house (50 years reputation. Mgr., H. Myers

100 PACKETS showy Flower Seeds, 1/6; unequalled anywhere.
DANIEL STONE, LOUDWATER, BUCKS.

VARICOCELE.

Every man suffering from Varicocele and the allied troubles, or Varicose Veins, should send for treatise, describing their Causes, Symptoms, Results, and Successful and Painless Treatment without surgical operation or the use of cumbersome trusses and electrical appliances. Will be sent sealed, post free.

S. S. MURRAY,
7 Southampton Row, London, W.C.

FOR LADIES AND GENTLEMEN.

JUNO CYCLES

ARE THE VERY BEST AND MOST UP-TO-DATE.

Carriage Paid. Cash Discount.

Write for New Season's List.

JUNO Cycles and Accessories sent Post Free.

Road Racer, £10. 16s. 8d. Monthly.

	Monthly		Monthly		Monthly
£10	16/8	£12	20/-	£14 14s.	24/6
£10 10s.	17/6	£12 12s.	21/-	£15 15s.	26/3

METROPOLITAN MACHINISTS' CO. Ltd.,
Juno Cycle School & Works, 75, 76, Bishopsgate Street, Without, E.C., and Piccadilly Circus, London, W.

Typewriters, £9 9s. 15s. 9d. Monthly

You will be pleased with CHANCELLOR SOAPS.

That's why we want YOU to try them. As First Prize we offer a £300 HOUSE, and hundreds of other prizes. By using Chancellor Soaps and saving your wrappers till June you get the best and cheapest Soaps extant, you may get the House or a 50 guinea Piano, you will probably get a splendid Lady's Silver Watch, or if not you must get a money Prize.

Every Competitor gets one.
GET A BAR TO-DAY!

Won't You?

Send 4d. for Sample Bar

GIVEN AWAY
HUNDREDS OF POUNDS IN PRIZES - EVERY COMPETITOR GETS ONE OR A £300 HOUSE
LIBERAL PAYMENT FOR WRAPPERS.
PARTICULARS WITH EACH 2½D AND 3D BAR.
CHANCELLOR SOAPS

to 13 Clerkenwell Road, London.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK

Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London.

INVESTED FUNDS

£10,000,000.

The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free.
FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

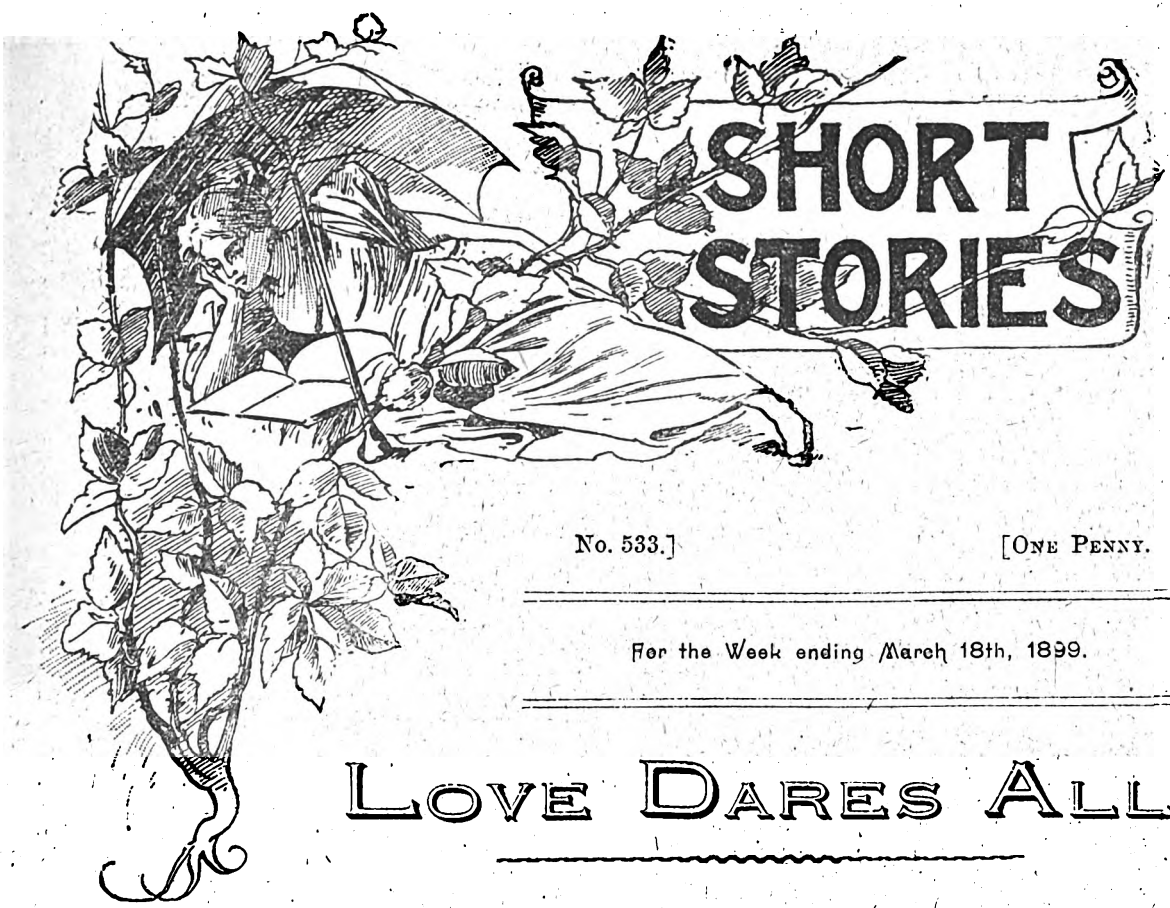
SEVEN PRIZE MEDALS.

These series of pens neither scratch nor spurt. They glide over the roughest paper with the ease of a soft lead pencil. An assorted sample box for 7 stamps from the works, Birmingham.

Digitized by Google



No. 533.] [One Penny.

For the Week ending March 18th, 1899.

Love Dares All.

Tat-tat-tat sounded in a dreary monotone from the drums, and slowly, in single file, the miserable prisoners came into view. Ragged, dirty, unkempt, footsore, panting from the blazing August sky, they were truly a pitiable sight. Yet they held up their heads defiantly, and smiled derisively at the insulting epithets and grimaces which the lower classes heaped upon them, especially in the vicinity of any officer's residence. The better classes of the Havanese showed their sympathy in striking contrast to the jeers and jibes of the baser sort.

The year was 1851, directly after the capture of Crittenden, Lopez's brave lieutenant, in his ill-starred expedition to Cuba. He and his Spartan remnant were these forlorn prisoners.

When they reached the Calle de la Lamparilla, one of the narrow streets of the city, the guards suddenly halted the column and reverently bared their heads. A funeral procession was approaching from the opposite direction, and the line was pushed close towards the houses jutting on the narrow footway, scarcely worthy the name of pavement.

A youth among the foremost prisoners, who, evidently, had not the fortitude of his elder companions, judged by his bowed head and deep dejection, now looked up with a wan smile of recognition as a pair of dark eyes brimming with tears gazed through a latticed window at the pitiful sight.

"Amalia!" he whispered.

"Robercito! Is it indeed you? Oh, how terrible! I did not dream you were with them."

All rights reserved.]

"Dearest cousin, save me!" he replied, in Spanish as fluent as her own. "We are all condemned to be shot in two days, perhaps sooner. I am too young to die."

"Would that I could, but, alas! I am powerless as a lamb among wolves!"

"Amalia, don't say that! You have friends among the Spaniards. For the love of my mother——"

"Forward, march!" rang on the air, and the weary column passed on to the dungeons of Morro Castle.

That night the Señorita Amalia de Valdez was a dream of loveliness as she reclined listlessly among the cushions on a lounge in her handsome salon. She was considered to be the beauty of beauties in the capital famed for the grace and loveliness of its women.

Young Captain Antonio de Ramon, who presently entered, was so enraptured with her appearance that only the presence of the inevitable duenna restrained him from throwing himself at her feet in reality, as well as in the formal salutation with which Spanish gentlemen greet all ladies.

But she looked pre-occupied, sad, despondent, and replied absently to his greeting. He seated himself near her, while the duenna, her gentle aunt Maria, retired to a distant corner.

"Tell me, my soul," said he, "why are you so melancholy?"

A sigh was the only answer.

"Ah, yes! I know your tender heart aches for the poor prisoners you have seen to-day. Poor fellows! Theirs is a terrible fate. But tell me, what is it you wished to ask me? Can there be a wish of yours I would not gratify at the risk of my life, if need be? I have your precious note safe here," and he pointed to his heart. "You have but to command and I will obey."

"Aunt mia," said Amalia, turning to her aunt, "I have mislaid my pearl bracelet upstairs. Will you kindly look for it?"

The duenna vanished as if she had expected the request. Amalia turned to him at once and said:

"You have often sworn that you love me to distraction; is it not so, Antonito?"

What happiness it was for him to hear from her lips the diminutive "ito" added to his name, which, in itself, is a caress in words.

"My life, with all my heart and soul," he exclaimed. But she drew back.

"No, I give myself only to him who proves his love."

"What can I do for you, beloved? Dispose of me as you will for life."

"It is life I ask. Sit here, beside me, dearest, and I will tell you."

She then related the scene of the morning, the discovery that Roberto, who had passed the previous winter in Havana with his family, was now among the prisoners.

"He is the son of my favourite aunt—so young, barely sixteen. He came here to perfect himself in Spanish, and I inspired him with my own enthusiasm for the Cuban cause. He has returned, alas! to die, unless you will save him for my sake. Should he perish, I can never know another happy moment."

Antonio grew pale as he listened.

"Amalia, you cannot break my heart thus. Ask me anything else."

"Antonito ma! I love you," she sobbed. "For you I would give up home, relatives, country, for this one favour. Save that poor child, and I swear to become your wife in another month. You have said that if I would marry you, you would resign your hateful commission in the army and seek a home in Mexico. I will follow you there and to the end of the earth."

"You have won," he said after a pause. "For you I will dare anything. They are to be shot the day after to-morrow. I have but a short time, and now must leave you, dearest. If I fail, you will forgive me, will you not? or I will not survive my disgrace."

* * * * *

Roberto lay on a pallet beside two comrades, who, in the midst of their own misery, tried to cheer and fortify the boy, exhorting him to meet manfully a doom which they felt was even more terrible for him than for them.

He had been one of the most enthusiastic volunteers: had fought well, but now the near prospect of death seemed to make a coward of him.

A soldier entered the cell at this moment, and roughly bade him rise and follow to the captain's room. Roberto rose tremblingly.

"Courage, my boy," said a middle-aged man, "perhaps it is good news for you. If not, beware lest he wring from you a word about Lopez's plans."

"Never fear," he replied, making an effort to control his agitation. "I hate to die"—here he gulped down a sob—"this way, but I'll not be a traitor."

The guard interrupted further speech by pushing him into the corridor with his musket.

"Here is the prisoner, captain."

"Very well, you may retire, sergeant."

Antonio locked the door after him, and in a low tone briefly related to Roberto the plan he had formulated for the latter's escape.

"Each prisoner will receive three shots. By dint of extensive bribery, and the co-operation of a surgeon, a secret friend of the Cuban cause, I have arranged that three blank cartridges shall be fired at you. You must be careful to simulate death as much as possible until the word 'Amalia' is whispered in your ear. Then you may breathe freely and open your eyes, for you will be temporarily safe.

"Further details will then have been arranged and will be communicated to you. The least indiscretion on your part, the least bungling on that of those I have employed, though only two are in the secret, will ruin me as well as seal your fate."

Roberto thanked him fervently, and promised him implicit obedience.

"You must not return to your comrades."

"Poor fellows!" muttered Roberto.

"The light of hope is shining in your eyes, and might betray us. Look as downcast as when you entered, if possible. Come in, sergeant," he said, and, as he entered the door, added, "conduct this prisoner to a solitary cell. He must have no communication with the other filibusters."

They passed out, and Antonio, groaning deeply, murmured:

"Oh, my love, what a sacrifice!"

* * * * *

The courtyard of the castle was thronged with soldiers as the unfortunate band were marched to their death-place just as day was breaking over the beautiful bay. Surrounded by hostile soldiers they still maintained a defiant air, even when the glittering line of bayonets faced them, and they knew all hope was over.

"Kneel, filibusters!"

The command was not obeyed; the men proudly refused.

A struggle ensued, in which some were forced to their knees; perhaps all might have been, had not the officer in charge, with a touch of humanity, begun giving the orders.

At the word "Fire!" so deadly was the volley that few survived it, and they but a few moments. Roberto, happily, had no need to simulate death. The shock and strain of the suspense had caused him to faint, and the surgeon, who hastened to his side, gave a deep sigh of relief as he perceived Roberto's rigid unconsciousness

"Carry this body, and this, and this,"—pointing to several—"to the hospital."

"If they are not dead now, they will soon be under his knife," laughed one of his assistants.

When Roberto revived, he found himself in a carefully darkened room. With joy he heard the word "Amalia" in a friendly voice. In a day or two, according to Antonio's previously concerted arrangements, he was smuggled, in the disguise of a waterman, to an English ship in the harbour and concealed in the hold all night.

The next day he thanked his devoted cousin as he inhaled with a glad sense of freedom, the fresh breeze of the sea. He never returned to Cuba.

The gay capital of Cuba was quite electrified a month later to learn of the resignation from the Army of Captain Antonio, and his marriage immediately after, in spite of opposition on the part of her family to the beautiful Señorita Amalia de Valdez.

Winnifrede Wilberforce.

Digitized by Google

"The Belle of the Trebizond" appeared last week.

A FAIR, fragile, small-featured, little woman, neatly dressed in black, and wearing the tokens of her widowhood, knelt by the side of a huge dress basket into which she was tumbling, pell mell, sundry articles of clothing.

"Is 'oo doin' way, muvver, 'oo take Nigel?" said a baby voice at her elbow. She looked down to meet the gaze of a pair of wistful blue eyes turned on her questioningly.

"Why, of course, Sonny. Oh, don't look at me with those eyes, child. You seem to reproach me. You look at your mother as if she were about to commit some awful crime. Will the child never smile, I wonder?"

But the baby eyes were all misty, and in an instant she caught him in her arms passionately.

"Your mother is a brute, Sonny, and you—you are an angel, only I wish you were a little more human. Now, if only you'd howl as most babies I have seen do, instead of looking hurt; but you can't help it, I suppose, it's your poor dear father's heritage passed on—Sonny," she said, releasing him, "go and tell Oko Yama mother will have tea on the veranda."

The little feet trotted off willingly. Nigel Croft was the essence of implicit obedience although but two and a half years old. Cherith Croft threw herself into a low deck chair.

"Oh, life, how strange you are," she said. "Here am I, a widow of but two months, now on my way back—back on the old, old trail, the trail that in my thoughts is always new; back to Wellington, and—and, of course, I'm very wicked, but all the time I'm wondering why Mr. Barton hasn't written, and if he and Hugh are still on the Trebizond. I don't think I could trust myself to cross again with him; but he may be married, or—or dead." She shuddered at this last thought. "What nonsense to think of him at all."

Pattering feet were heard returning on the veranda.

"Ah, Sonny—what, a letter for mother? Oh, Nigel, from Mr. Barton, too."

His mother had got into the habit of talking to the child of all that was in her heart, and she never knew how much he understood. The long, long months that she had been left by her husband, with only Jap servants and her one English maid (whom she had now sent into Sydney in advance to arrange for their removal from "Warrimoo") had thrown her and the child very much together, more than perhaps was good for him.

"Muvver," he interrupted, "is Mr. Barton muvver's fwend on the big ship. Sall Nigel love him?"

"Yes, sonny, you must love him right up to the skies. He's mother's only friend; and now I'm going to read his letter," she added.

And she did aloud. She had forgotten she had told the babe to listen, and he sat at her feet, his blue eyes full of wonder and a pucker in his little bronzed forehead.

"DEAR MRS. CROFT,

"I was indeed glad to have your letter, though sorry at the news it contained of your trouble. You know already that you have my sympathy, do you not? And I am sure I can say truly that of one other. Need I mention his name? You ask three questions concerning him; let me answer them. He is not on the Trebizond, having removed the voyage after you were with us to a newer ship of the line. There he has been promoted to first engineer, and still writes me. He is still unmarried. As answer to your third question, I am going to say what, but for your husband's accident and death, would never have been said, and that is that Hugh Thornburgh loved you on the Trebizond, kept out of your way the day you left, because he could not trust himself to see you, and left the ship because he could not bear it after. We shall be leaving again next week—the Black Watch the week after. Need I say I can guarantee you the greatest attention on either.

"Yours always to command,

"NIELS BARTON."

Cherith Croft was alone. She had sent Sonny out at the mention of his father to tell Oko Yama to pull the chairs out of the sun, and be quick.

She looked lovingly again at the words in the latter half of the letter, then buried her face, blushing as that of a girl of nineteen at her first love-letter, in the soft cushions of her chair. "And to think that I'm reading it in the very same chair that I sat in when I told Niels. Oh, Sonny, Sonny, your little mother's very wicked, but so very happy, dear," she said, hugging him to her as he returned to say tea was waiting.

"My little muvver's very good," said Sonny reproachfully, as though she were slurring him, slipping his wee hand into hers and toddling off.

Ere he had drained every drop of his lime juice and set down his silver mug with an air of satisfaction, his little mother had decided that she could not catch the Trebizond, and that the time of starting of the Black Watch would suit her admirably.

Three days later, with her boy and her retinue of faithful Jap servants, the wife of the late Commissioner of Lands and Mines left "Warrimoo" behind her for ever. She called it her life school; there she had learnt the value of obedience without question, of duty minus love.

Content had come into her life and left its traces on her face, which motherhood had softened wondrously; but never had she known the happiness that now filled her heart as they steamed up the coast by the Government yacht to Sydney.

* * * * *

"Louise, are you sure it was only 650 lbs. baggage the agent said? Then I must leave Sonny's portable kitchen behind."

Scarcely had Cherith Croft given vent to this most prosaic reflection, when she felt the gaze of two dark brown eyes riveted on her, and she looked up to see a handsome, boyish figure, half hesitating before her, his hand to his cap.

"Ah, Mrs. Croft, I thought I could not be wrong," as she smiled, "but this," touching her arm lightly, "makes a difference. I did not know," he added, rather confusedly.

"Of course not—how should you? Why, you've only arrived to-day, haven't you? We are waiting to cross by the Black Watch, and I was discussing the baggage with Louise. Louise, you may return to the hotel with baby—and, Louise, order tea for two. You will come, will you not?"

Hugh Thornburgh smilingly bowed his delight at the prospect.

"We were on our way to the office," she went on.

"So I supposed when I met you in Bridge Street," he put in.

How handsome he looked, thought Cherith as she glanced up at him from the side of her little widow's bonnet; but the light on the brass buttons of his new uniform was dull to the light that shone in Hugh Thornburgh's dark eyes as he said:

"Can the baggage wait now. I have something to tell you—a bit of good luck that has fallen to my share. Can I count on your congratulations, I wonder?"

What could it be? she wondered. Was it possible he was going to tell her that he was engaged? Did that account for his bright face? She caught her breath sharply, and forced a little smile as she answered:

"That will depend on whether you think you deserve them."

"Well, my old granddad—did you know he was Sir Jasper Thornburgh, of the Windermere family?—has thought fit to depart this life and to leave his favourite grandson, whom I have been informed by his lawyers was me, the great bulk of his fortune. The estate goes to my eldest brother, my father being dead, and the neat little sum of £20,000 to yours truly."

A glad new light broke on her face.

"Oh! I am so glad—so glad for your sake," she said.

And as they walked up the steps of the hotel, which looked out on to the harbour, and he made her feel so happy and at ease with a new air of protection that sat so well on him, visions of Government appointments that her father might find to suit the heir of Sir Jasper Thornburgh—who was, of course, quite another person from the second engineer of the Trebizond—flashed through her mind.

"I suppose you will leave the Black Watch now," she said, as he brought her her tea, "and," falteringly, "go to England."

She looked up with a brave attempt at a smile.

"Well, I suppose I must, as I scarcely want the berth now, and there are others wanting it badly. You see, I only knew an hour since, when I got my letters."

An awkward pause was filled in by Sonny, who appeared, robed by Louise in his best bib and tucker in honour of mother's visitor.

"Muvver," he inquired, his blue eyes dwelling with a look of curiosity on Hugh's bright buttons, "is zis muvver's only fwend, Mr. Barton, off the big ship?"

"No, dearest, this is Mr. Barton's friend. Mr. Thornburgh, this is my little son. Come and say how do you do, Sonny. Nigel is an angel, but the child never smiles," she added sotto voce. "Do you think anything would make him?"

"I think I could do it if only you would let me try," he said; then added softly, "It will be partly conditional, I presume, being the angel that he is that Nigel copies his mother in everything. Now, if his mother were happy she would smile; so you see the cure must begin with mother. Isn't that so, Nigel?"

The boy nodded his golden head that Hugh was stroking with that bronzed hand of his that could be as gentle in its touch as any woman's.

"Iss, but muvver won't have 'oo for a fwend like Mr. Barton, else I fink 'oo could, 'cos muvver loves him and says he made her happy. Will 'oo have him for a fwend, muvver," he added, dragging Hugh towards his mother's chair, his blue eyes full of the solemn earnestness of the question in his childish mind that he only half understood.

His mother looked up, and Hugh caught a flash of the old Cherith he had known on the Trebizond.

"I didn't think he'd be satisfied with that title, Sonny," she said shyly, blushing a rosy red.

Hugh had been dragged to her feet by Sonny to await the verdict, and when he saw her blushing face and the downcast eyes he caught her two little white hands between his own brown palms, rapturously covering them with kisses.

Sonny smiled his approval—the cure had begun already—and sat down to the discussion of some cakes he had found.

"Is it possible, my queen, my sweet little Cherith, that you have another title to give me?" went on Hugh. "I have so long been the poor man content with the crumbs from the rich man's table that I cannot take in all this happiness at once, and—and I was afraid of this," touching her sleeve lightly. "I did not know how long since it was."

"A little more than two months," she said; "but oh, Hugh, though I tried so hard to be good, I was never happy, never as happy as I am now, dear. He was good, oh, so good, and I respected him, but I did not love him, Hugh. Is it very wicked to be so happy now. I was true to him, aye, even in thought till his death, for I promised Mr. Barton I would live to be worthy of his and your good opinions, and I think I made him a good wife," she added pleadingly.

"Sonny, it is time for bed, dear. Go to Louise." And the little one trotted off obediently.

Then Hugh took her in his arms, and kissed away the unshed tears that were trembling in the blue eyes; and when he left her later, to get off a letter to his lawyers, it was with a bright, glad face and a gay laugh that she said "And you'll see to the baggage, Hugh?"

"Aye," he answered, "and the sauciest bit of it, too, for I guess she will give me most trouble, eh?"

As Hugh had surmised, there were many ready to take his place, and since he found he could draw on his granddad's legacy from the Sydney branch of his bank, he sped up to the Metropole early next morning, his project fresh in his mind.

"Don't you think, little one, that I could take you home and ask for the paternal blessing—not that it's a necessity—at the same time? We can wait for the Trebizond's return. Will a month's courtship satisfy you, dear? and that will appease society, too. Then Barton can be best man, and we can be married in Wellington. You'll like that better than Sydney, eh, dear?"

"Yes," she answered, nestling into his strong arms. And so it happened that two months after a quiet wedding took place from Government House.

* * * * *

A year later they were sitting on the veranda at "Coogee." Sir Philip had given them his little country bungalow on the outskirts of Wellington as his wedding gift.

A tiny morsel of humanity, with twinkling black eyes, and draped in gauze and costly laces—for it was the New Zealand summer, and the thermometer registered sixty in the shade—lay on its mother's lap. Its father was engaged in puffing volumes of smoke into its face "just to see if it could sneeze."

Nigel stood over him as protector, and, when too exasperated, made a lunge at his father. He had approved of his new father when he found that he could draw plans and pictures; but, although Hugh succeeded in making him smile, he had never got him to romp.

"Hugh, don't tease him any more," said his wife as severely as she could, "or I shall order you to carry baby in."

This threat always had the desired effect—he was afraid the thing would fall in pieces, he said—and he desisted from experimenting on the face of Hugh Barton Thornburgh.

"What a contrast the two boys will be, Hugh. Nigel loves little Hugh very much, but he'll keep him in order when he grows up; and he'll need it, too. Just look at the rascal now, laughing at six weeks old."

"What do you expect when he has a mother who, for all her dignity now, was once the Belle of the Trebizond. And Cherie," he added seriously, "you'll keep that roguishness always, won't you, for I learnt to love you then."

And, for all we ever heard to the contrary, this couple lived happily ever after.

Edna S. Gamble.

Digitized by Google

IN A PALE PINK GOWN.

THE scene — Waterloo; the hour — mid-day. A throng of eager men pressing towards the barrier that keeps them back until the train for Kempton Park is ready. The event coming off that afternoon is an important one. The Heir-Apparent has announced an intention of being present. The ever gracious Princess proposes accompanying His Highness, and a gentleman who passes the busy, gossiping groups on his way to another platform, sends a wistful look towards them.

He is recognised and seized by a couple of acquaintances.

"Hi, Cheltnam; Hallo, Rollo; Whither bound, my boy? Aren't you going with us?"

"I wish I were. I should dearly like to see that race run."

"Not too late," interposed one of his friends. "Get your ticket, and come along."

Rollo Cheltnam shook his head, and declared it to be impossible.

"I did not know that word was in your dictionary," laughed the other. "But you're made up for travelling—dust-coat and valise. Whither goest thou? Running away from your creditors, or off for your honeymoon? Married your landlady's or your laundress' daughter on the sly, eh?"

It was Rollo's turn to laugh now, which he did rather ruefully.

"I don't know if I should be much worse off if I had committed the sin of matrimony, providing the maiden was fair to see. But if I haven't, my brother Tom has, and I'm suffering for it."

"But that's ten years ago," he was reminded. "Didn't Tom marry the prettiest of Mayor Ernest's daughters just before he went to India to take up that appointment?"

"Yes," said Tom Cheltnam's brother; "and he is now the happy parent of six or seven, I forget which, and had made arrangements for a two years' leave, that he might bring his wife over to recruit her health, and find schools for the elder boys. But unluckily, there has been a revolt of some of the hill tribes, and Tom must stay to help quell it, so he has sent Mrs. Tom and the olive branches by the Enterpe and will follow as soon as he can."

"In the meantime, on you devolves the delightful task of meeting the lady when she lands."

"She has landed. Owing to that gale, the Enterpe arrived before the mail that brought Tom's letter. My sister-in-law is already housed at Borton Court, a pretty little place, half farm, half country-house, near Hythe, secured for her by one of her sisters, whose husband is in the Artillery, and quartered at Dover."

"And you?"

Rollo shrugged his shoulders.

"I am the happy individual who, being popularly supposed to have nothing to do because I am a journalist, am expected to go to Mrs. Cheltnam's and execute all her commissions. I have a cart-load of them in the guard's van, besides the high chairs, perambulators, and bath-tubs that are to follow by goods train. Tom will depend on me—so he writes—to keep up her spirits till he can join her; and I am to take care that no one imposes on her. Cissie herself telegraphs that she cannot stay in that lonely place unless I am there to keep guard over the safety of her darling ones. She evidently anticipates their being gurgled one by one, and will expect me to do sentry—go in her nursery, armed with a revolver and a Malay creese."

"I don't envy you, old fellow," said one of the young men.

"But you'll think of me tenderly, won't you? and, by Jove, that's my train over yonder. Here's my new address; send me a fuller, truer report of the day's doings than I shall glean from the newspapers. Adieu!"

Rollo Cheltnam's sister-in-law was waiting for him at Hythe Station in a pony-chaise, so small that it was difficult to find room for his valise, even though the boy groom was left to follow with the sundries in a cart.

"It is hard on your long legs, my poor Rollo," said Mrs. Cheltnam, a still pretty, though faded blonde, "but these are such up-and-down roads, and my wrists are so weak, that I thought it prudent to hire the lightest vehicle I could get. If I am to be upset, I don't want to be buried under a ton weight of iron and clumsy wood-work."

"Shall I relieve you of the responsibility of driving?" she was asked.

"Well—no, thanks; I think not," said Mrs. Cheltnam. "You see, if we do have a spill, I shall not be half so angry with myself, as I should be with you, if the fault were yours."

Digitized by Google

"You are as frank as ever," her brother-in-law told her. "As frank as when you objected to my acting as best man to my brother, because I was so ugly and awkard."

"Ah, that was when you were but a lad. I shouldn't say so now. You really have improved so much, so very much that—I have two marriageble sisters; I think I shall ask them to come to Borton Court while you are with me."

"Better not," was the laughing response. "I cannot wed both, and it might cause dissension in the family. Besides I am not a marrying man. With so many nephews and nieces, it is my bounden duty to live and die a bachelor after amassing a fortune for them."

To which speech Mrs. Cheltnam irreverently answered:

"Bah! I suppose the truth is, you are already engaged."

"No, on my honour; the bright, particular star I am to worship, has not yet dawned on the horizon."

"Then you must be dreadfully hard to please, sir!" This was said with much severity.

"There's lots of good, pretty girls to be had, now aren't there?"

"Ask Tom. He'll tell you he never knew but one, and as he snapped her up, there is nought left for me."

"If you are going to talk such utter nonsense, Rollo!" and the lady frowned, and menaced him with the whip, "why, we shall quarrel."

"To avert which sad catastrophe shall we agree to banish the subject on which we have differed? I promising to do my devoirs, as your trusty knight, and you binding yourself not to put any snares in the way of my unwary footsteps."

"Snares, indeed! I'm not so sure that either Pet or Popsy would consent to accept a newspaper-man," cried Cissie, tossing her head.

"And so you'll not expose me to the mortification of a rejection. Bless, thee, sweet sister mine! Is there either of your babies to whom I could be godfather, in token of my gratitude?"

"You'll have to be very fond of them all, or I shall be dreadfully hurt. Tom is such an adoring parent. Oh, Rollo, I feel lost without him; no one to appeal to in any difficulty, no one to rely upon!"

"Rely upon it, we shall be over that bank if you do not wipe the tears out of your eyes. Did you have a pleasant voyage?"

"Pleasant, with six children, an incompetent ayah, and an English maid who fibbed shamefully. She wanted to get home to her soldier-husband, so protested, by everything sacred, that she was never ill at sea, and yet lay in her berth three parts of the time, and I—yes, I—had to crawl out of mine to wait on her. Don't I look a perfect wreck? But, of course, I must after what I went through."

"Do you like your house?" queried Rollo, desirous of introducing a new subject.

"I have scarcely looked at it. There must be stronger bolts and locks put on the doors, or how shall I be able to sleep? and outside shades to the windows, for the glare hurts my eyes; and some soft felt laid down in the passages; for the clatter of the children's feet distracts my poor head. And there must be double doors to the nurseries, and bars to the windows—what would Tom say to me if I let one of his darlings fall out?—and a railing round a nasty little fish-pond there is in the orchard; and the drawing-room paper is odious. It must be taken down before I can sit there, or receive visitors. But, of course, dear Rollo, you'll see to all these things for me, and don't forget some donkeys for the little ones. I told them they should have some when Uncle Rollo came."

"With I myself as the leader? My prominent thought just at this moment is what are you going to give me for dinner. I suppose you have engaged a cook?"

"Oh, yes, and kitchenmaid, besides a couple of housemaids. I don't know whether the latter will prove satisfactory. My cousin Marian, who met me when I landed, pressed me so strongly to take a couple of girls, sisters, from her industrial school, that I had to say yes. They seem active and willing, but so stupid, so vacant that, after trying for half an hour this morning to make one of them understand what I meant by a portiere, I gave it up in despair. I really cannot be worried. I don't want Tom to find me haggard and ill."

"Is the cook as stolid? If so—alas! and woe is me—what shall we have to eat?"

"Oh, she sent up a lovely curry last night, so there's hopes of her. I went downstairs to interview her this morning, but my first glance at her frightened me away. She is one of the ugliest, boniest women I ever beheld! As tall as a grenadier, with a voice like a bassoon, and eyes—protruding eyes—so fierce that I shiver when I think of them. I shall never venture into her domain again—never! The remembrance of her hideousness will give me bad dreams."

"Which her excellent cooking will chase away. There's consolation in that thought, isn't there? Now tell me something about my unknown nephews and nieces."

But though Rollo Cheltnam testified the correct amount of interest in his young relatives, he was not sorry to hear on his arrival at Borton Court that they were just going to tea, and then to bed, and the interview must be deferred till the morrow.

Mrs. Cheltnam had not lauded too extravagantly the abilities of her ugly cuisiniere. The dinner was not only cooked well, but served prettily, flowers decorating the dishes and the table with a tastefulness of which the stolid maids who waited were evidently incapable.

"She will be a treasure if she keeps out of sight," her mistress declared; "but I must either shut my eyes when I give my orders, or send written ones. Dear me!" and Mrs. Cheltnam leaned back in her chair to survey herself in a mirror, "what an affliction it must be to be plain!"

Anxiety on the score of her complexion sent the lady to her room at an early hour, Rollo sitting up till midnight to write letters.

He had just completed his task when, in tying a string round some papers he wanted to have posted, he contrived to dig a pen-knife into the fleshy part of his thumb, and, to his vexation, it bled so much that he was obliged to make his way to the kitchen, there to bathe the wound, and try to find someone to bind it up.

But the servants appeared to have followed the example of their mistress, and retired early, for not a sound could he hear as he pushed open the double doors leading to the offices. However, a bright little fire still glowed in the stove; a lamp was burning on a small table by the hearth; and he saw, as he softly advanced, that a young girl was seated in an arm-chair beside the table, an open note-book and pencil on her knees, and in her hand a volume, in which she was so absorbed that she did not detect his footsteps.

Digitized by Google

Her dress was an ordinary print, her cap and apron of coarse muslin, but the gown of palest pink fitted her splendid figure à merveille, and her apron was as coquettish and becoming as the little French cap tied in a bewitching bow and ends under the coronet of her dark hair.

She sprang up as soon as she became aware of Rollo's presence. Her colour deepened, and she bit her lip in manifest embarrassment, but still hers was not the awkward confusion of an uneducated girl. She bowed politely in acknowledgment of his apology, offered her help as soon as she learned what had brought him there, fetched sponges and warm water, and tore up her handkerchief—a cambric one—to form a bandage for the wounded thumb.

He thanked her warmly for her assistance, saying, with a smile:

"I shall have to recant one of my heresies. I thought that between fifteen and fifty your sex were wont to greet the sight of blood with a swoon or hysterics."

"Not now that so many of us gain presence of mind and experience by joining the ambulance classes," she answered quietly.

"Have you won your medal yet?" he asked. "If not, and a testimonial from your latest patient will be of any service, I shall be most happy."

She smiled a smile so arch, so merry, that it quite changed the pensive character of her regular features; then gathered up her towels, etc., and carried them away, leaving Rollo peeping between the pages of the volume she had let fall.

It was Schiller, and in the original.

A highly educated woman apparently; but who could she be? The governess to Cissie Cheltnam's little girls? Her attire seemed to contradict that suggestion; her demeanour, her refined voice and cultured speech rendered it equally doubtful whether she could be the nurse of whom Mrs. Cheltnam had spoken slightingly, as picked up at Madras just for the voyage, and proving more plague than profit.

Rollo stood with the book in his hand, waiting to restore it to its owner, till the silence that reigned around awakened him to the truth. She had gone away with no intention of returning; and, laughing at himself for not guessing that sooner, he too, went to bed.

Cissie condoled with him at breakfast when she saw his tied-up thumb; but when he mentioned how skilfully her lady help, or children's governess, had played the doctress, she opened her blue eyes wonderingly.

"I have no lady help! Higgins is my maid, Rollo, and I have not felt up to the exertion of engaging a governess yet. I suppose I must advertise. Couldn't you interview the candidates? It is such a hateful task. I shall be harassed into my grave before I've seen half of them."

"Let Higgins—faugh, what a name!"—this sotto voce. "Let Higgins select from them. She looks capable enough."

"Ah! yes, she's a good soul," replied Cissie. "Rather obstinate and provoking. I'm afraid it's a mistake keeping servants with one so long. They get exaggerated ideas of their own value. She was with mamma thirteen years, and now ten with me."

Then it could not have been his sister-in-law's attendant Rollo had seen.

"It must have been your nurse who ministered to me so tenderly," he said.

"Which of them? But you must be making game of me, for you could not mistake Maimee for an English upper-servant, and I got rid of the other as soon as we landed."

Rollo forced a laugh.

"How very ridiculous I am, and how good-natured of you to bear with my nonsense so calmly!"

And then he edged away to avoid being tormented with further questioning. But all the while he talked and laughed, played with the children, and made himself useful to their indolent, exacting mother, he was carefully noting her every word and look.

Someone was mystifying him. Could it be she? Had she been in sober earnest when she spoke of her sisters, and was the lady of the pale pink gown one of these damsels already introduced into the house with designs upon his heart and hand?

* * * * *

A few days spent at Bolton Court brought Rollo Cheltnam to the conviction that Cissie's intellect was not equal to the strain of carrying out a deliberate scheme. Besides, the dangerous damsels, her unwedded sisters, had written to postpone their coming. "Dear Cis must excuse them till after their return from Weymouth, where they had been due these three weeks, and were entered to play in a grand tennis match against the officers of the regiment stationed at Portland."

Still, as he often told himself, it was queer, exceedingly queer, that so charming a person should be a member of his sister-in-law's household, and yet hold no definite position in it. She was neither nurse nor governess, maid nor help; never appearing in the drawing-room nor the nursery, where Uncle Rollo soon proved a welcome visitor.

Mrs. Cheltnam was her own housekeeper, and she had not engaged a needlewoman or sewing maid, and by no amount of indirect questioning could Rollo elicit a spark of information respecting the unknown. She was in the house, for he had seen and spoken with her, but who and what was she, and where?

Baffled at all other points, he made an excuse for revisiting the kitchen. It was that he had first beheld her, and there that his curiosity might be satisfied. In these days of progress and Board-schools, was it not possible for the student of Schiller to be neither more nor less than the daughter of the highly-respectable matron whose culinary achievements proved her to be a genius of no mean order?

But when Rollo walked into her domain, on pretence of wanting a luncheon basket packed, his first glance at Mrs. Cheltnam's Sarah, convinced him that there could be no such tie between her and the maiden of the pale pink gown. Cook was a clumsy, commonplace woman of thirty, with the limbs of a grenadier and a face that was only redeemed from positive ugliness by its air of honesty and good humour.

She was civil and obliging, but in such a monosyllabic fashion that he came away no wiser that he went. Once he fancied he caught a glimpse of flowing draperies through a half open door, and made an excuse for approaching it; but when he peeped in, nothing was to be seen but the table at which cook herself appeared to have been making pastry when he disturbed her.

He was strongly tempted to put the question outright. Where is the young lady to whom I was indebted the other night? But in spite of her civility, cook eyed him with distrust, as if suspecting some ulterior object for his presence, and to lead up to the subject with a woman who rarely answered his remarks with more than a nod or shake of the head was impossible.

Digitized by Google

To his surprise, she abruptly addressed him as he was walking away discomfited.

"You're a lawyer, ain't you, sir?"

"A barrister—yes; but I do not practise much. Why did you ask?"

But she only dropped a curtesy, said "Thankye, sir," and dived into the scullery, where he could not very well follow.

Rollo was musing over the oddity of the circumstance that evening, as he smoked a cigar, while pacing a path at the end of the grounds, to which he frequently retreated, partly because Mrs. Cheltnam disliked it as gloomy, and forbade it to her children as damp.

The night was cloudy, darkness almost intense wherever the lime trees met overhead, and it would have startled the bravest, when a tall, gaunt figure noiselessly stalked from behind a mass of rhododendrons, and suddenly stood before him.

"It's only me, sir; Sarah Colby, sir; Mrs. Cheltnam's cook," he was told. "You gives legal advice to them as wants it, don't yer, sir?" Here a broad palm was thrust before his eyes, with a gold coin lying on it; "You'll be pleased to give me as far as it'll go, for the 'mount of that sovereign."

Rollo smiled as he replied that he dare say he could give her the information she stood in need, without putting her to any expense at all.

But he was heard with a dissenting shake.

"Thankye, sir, but it must be pay as we goes, or she won't like it; nor it wouldn't be fair neither to take up your time for nothing, seeing it's no trifling matter in which we want you to 'vise us."

We; then she was acting for another more than herself. Was it his fancy that he could hear a slight movement behind the shrubs? And was it the mysterious maiden who stood there awaiting the result of this dialogue?

"Tell me, then, plainly and frankly, what induced you to come to me. If I cannot give you the advice you lack, I can at least direct you to a gentleman who will."

Sarah was grateful, and said so in her slow, lumbering style.

"Thankye, sir. You see, it's not for me so much as the young lady as came to the hotel at Dover, where I was kitchen maid. In great trouble she was; father dead, and relations that had fetched her from convent school wanted to marry her right off there and then, to one of 'em as she couldn't abide. And when she objected, told her that her pa had left his dying orders upon her, as she was to, and must; or give up the whole of her fortune, and be a beggar."

There was quite a romance in this brief and awkwardly told story. Perhaps it might not have awakened such vivid interest if Rollo Cheltnam had not seen the person of whom it was related.

"No one in England can be compelled to marry against her will," he said. "If the relatives of this young lady were persecuting her, she should have sought other protection."

"That's just what she did, sir, catching hold o' me when I was sent to take her some tea. 'I'm ill,' says she, sobbing dreadful, 'quite ill with want of sleep and grief, and these people harass and frighten me till I feel as if I should lose my senses. Who will protect me from them?'"

"She should have appealed to the nearest magistrate."

"In the middle of the night, an' neither she nor me knew where he was to be found?" objected Sarah. "An' them downstairs always on the watch, too; an' givin' me orders to let 'em know directly, in a minute, if she stirred to leave her room. Such a big, masterful man the gentleman was! snapped you most in half if you only looked at him."

"It was a difficult position," Rollo admitted. "Could you not have spoken to the hotel-keeper?"

"The very thing as we ought to have done, and what I should ha' 'vised myself, for they're most respectable, well-conducted people; but then, they'd gone to London for a day or two, so you see we couldn't."

"Then what did you do?"

"Why, Miss Vera cried, and begged me not to leave her. She said if I could get her away—so I did it."

"Helped her to evade these people? And successfully?"

"Hid her for two nights and a day at my old aunt's, and then came here with her. They were advertising for servants for this house, and as I was known in the neighbourhood, and of good character, I got the place, and here we've been ever since."

"With Mrs. Cheltnam's knowledge and consent?"

The rhododendrons were agitated now, and from out their deep shadows glided the slender figure and fair face so deeply impressed on Rollo's memory.

"Your question, sir," she cried, "makes me keenly feel that I must not remain here any longer. I have wronged Mrs. Cheltnam, for the Belgium nuns in the convent school where my dearest father placed me, had made me proficient in all domestic matters, and I could teach this good, kind Sarah all she had not learnt. But we have only used this as an asylum, in which to hide from my cousin and his mother, till I could ascertain the addresses of some of papa's old friends, and I know I am not justified either in remaining under Mrs. Cheltnam's roof without her knowledge, nor in asking her to interest herself in my difficulties."

"That's why I says to Miss Vera the gintleman stopping in the house is a lawyer, meaning you, sir! let's hear what he's got to propose."

"Have you any reason to fear that these relations are still searching for you?"

"Yes," she replied with a sob. "Sarah just discovered that after seeking me in London, they have gone back to Dover. As they insist that they are acting on authority given them by my father, what am I to do if they succeed in finding me?"

"Are you not of age?"

"I shall be in a few days; a week at the most."

"Then do nothing hastily," Rollo advised, "but stay quietly here for the present, and trust me, they will have to give very convincing proofs of the legality of their proceedings before they shall be allowed to remove you without your consent."

The heartfelt thanks this speech elicited were very gratifying, and before Mr. Cheltnam quitted his new client, she had provided him with the names of half-a-dozen men of good position who had been on intimate terms with her father, the late Mr. Estridge, before his passion for hunting and exploring led him to join an expedition to Central Africa, where he fell a victim to fever.

Rollo's last promise, as he said good-night to Vera Estridge, was that he would go to London early on the morrow, and hunt up the said old friends till he found one capable of, and willing to accept the guardianship of the lonely orphan, and with this promise she was well content.

Mrs. Cheltnam stared, and marvelled, and murmured,

Digitized by Google

when she found her brother-in-law on the point of starting for the rail before she found time to overwhelm him with commissions, calling him back when he was actually en route to assure him that unless he returned in twenty-four hours she should die with ennui and dread of the house being entered by burglars.

"Perhaps I ought to have taken Cissie into my confidence," he mused. "She must have been charmed with Miss Estridge, and all women love a spice of romance; but then she is so helpless, so brainless, that she might have been a clog on our movements instead of a help. On second thoughts, it will be more prudent to keep her in the dark."

And with this decision Rollo Cheltnam dismissed his sister-in-law from his mind, and dreamed and dwelt only on the sweetness and wrongs of Vera Estridge, and the gratifying post to which he had been elected of her defender.

* * * * *

Rollo had planned to dispatch his business in town and return speedily, in case the dreaded enemy had tracked the fugitives as surely as Sarah's friend's had warned her that they were certain to do, sooner or later.

From his conversation with Vera, he had gathered that, some time since, her father had forbidden her intimacy with these relatives; for what reasons she knew not; but it surprised her very much when they came to the convent where her education had been carried on, professing it was by Mr. Estridge's dying injunctions, communicated through the servant who was with him in his last moments, that they came to take upon themselves the charge of his only child.

Not till they had induced her to start for England with them—not till she was weak and ill with the effects of a rough passage, yet shrinking in much disgust from the lover-like attentions forced upon her—had she learned that this man was making arrangements for their marriage; the ten thousand pounds that formed her inheritance being doubtless his attraction, and his ambitious mother doing all in her power to further his plans.

That she must be saved from such nefarious schemes, was a matter of course; but it was exasperating to find that of the four or five individuals, whose names Vera had supplied, only one—a certain Lady Dunsford, the widow of a general officer—was actually in England, and she was lying at her house at Kensington, too ill to be seen, or even to read a letter.

However, two of the others were expected home shortly from a tour in Canada, and if Vera's unworthy relatives could be kept at bay till Mr. and Mrs. Lemaitre landed in England, all would be well, as he remembered the young lady had expressed herself sure of a most loving welcome from them.

These researches took up time. Rollo left Borton Court early on Tuesday, but it was the afternoon of Thursday when he came once more in sight of his sister-in-law's temporary abode.

Mrs. Cheltnam, who was writing in the drawing-room, started and screamed when he sprang in through the window. He was breathless with running; his coat torn with forcing his way through a gap, and his looks so disordered, that she began to ply him with questions.

How should he tell her that the same train that brought him back to Borton Court had also conveyed a tall, unpleasant-looking man whose name he had read on the small portmanteau he carried—"Silas Estridge."

He had watched this man take possession of the only vehicle in the station yard, and had then rushed off, bent on reaching Borton Court by short cuts and field paths before him.

From the top of a hill he had caught sight of Silas Estridge, and he was not coming alone; two roughly-dressed fellows were with him, and who could doubt that if Vera resisted, she would be dragged away by force?

He must seek and save her; but here was Cissie barring the way. How should he shake her off? Unless she could be persuaded to promise silence she would admit that Sarah Colby was in her employ, and further revelations would soon follow.

"Do not question me now," he implored, "there is not a moment to be lost. The truth is, a posse of villainous rascals are now within a hundred yards of us, and I suppose I ought to explain——"

"Pooh! you are too late with your explanations, Mr. Rollo," she interrupted. "No thanks to you for keeping me in the dark so long; but Vera has told me all about it. Yes, Vera herself. Darling Alfie was seized with croup the night after you went away, and with no one here but those stupid maids, I'm sure the child must have died, and I should have gone to a lunatic asylum if Vera had not come to me. Oh, she's a dear! and we are the best of friends. As for that wretch, let him touch her if he dare! She is under my protection now."

And Mrs. Cheltnam drew up her tiny figure, and swelled and strutted about the room, till Rollo could have laughed, if he had not been full of thankfulness for her timely aid.

Vera, too, came quickly to her side, pale and trembling, but placing every confidence in her new friends and their assurances that not even the dying injunctions of a parent could give Silas Estridge authority to remove her from Borton Court.

A few minutes, and the object of her dread and dislike was ushered into the room. Vera could scarcely sustain herself. Rollo stood beside her frowning and defiant, but Mrs. Cheltnam, with smiling self-possession, greeted her visitor.

She believed she had had the pleasure of meeting Mrs. Estridge somewhere, some time since. She could not remember at whose house, her memory was so defective; but she was sure she recognised the likeness in that lady's son. Now, was it in England they met? Did Mr. Estridge like England with its horrid climate? What a day it was for a journey! He must be parched with dust, and she was afraid their sherry was not of the best; but such as it was——

She pulled the bell, and it was with difficulty he could evade her hospitable attentions, and cross the room to where Vera was sitting. And even then he found Mrs. Cheltnam still beside her.

"If you are here, Mr. Estridge," she said, pleasantly, "with any cruel idea of robbing me of my guest, I forbid it. I shall not be able to spare her just at present."

There was an ugly smile on Silas Estridge's coarse, sensual mouth, and he answered with a cynical deliberation that made Rollo impulsively clench his hand, and Mrs. Cheltnam comprehend why Vera feared him.

"You are most kind! I am so sorry I cannot accept your generous hospitality for this foolish, this mistaken child; but, unfortunately, she must go to London with me at once."

Digitized by Google

"There is no must where a lady is concerned," Cissie told him. "I cannot consent to let Vera go, and, frankly, my dear sir, I will not."

Mr. Estridge threw up his hands deprecatingly.

"It is not I, my dear madam, who would dream of opposing your wishes. I am merely here to give Vera the support of my presence. She will travel in the custody of these men," and he pointed to them as they stood at the open door.

"Custody?" repeated Rollo, furiously; and Mr. Estridge eyed him with covert malice.

"Alas, yes! My mother, I grieve to say, has been robbed of some valuable ornaments. They were in a travelling bag, to which no one but her niece had access, and in anger she has sworn an information against——. Officers, this young lady is the Vera Estridge mentioned in your warrant. This is your prisoner."

Then his villainy had triumphed. Knowing that he was powerless to force her into his arms in any legitimate way he had obtained her arrest, and only by suing to him for mercy, and consenting to become his wife, could she escape the horror of imprisonment—the degradation of a public trial.

Even Mrs. Cheltnam looked aghast till Rollo hurriedly whispered:

"Time, I must have more time!" and then her courage revived.

After pertinaciously questioning Silas Estridge till he was crimson with suppressed rage, she affected to believe that the charge must be well-founded, but firmly refused to let Vera's trunk be packed, or Vera herself taken away from the house, till she had ascertained that none of her valuables were missing. Drawers were searched and boxes ransacked for certain articles of jewellery that Mrs. Cheltnam insisted on having lost, and she bewailed their disappearance so naturally, and screamed so delightedly when they were found, that the policemen were hoodwinked and Silas Estridge, eager to get his prisoner away, fretted and fumed in vain.

He declined the lunch brought in, but drank copious draughts of the sherry, which Mrs. Cheltnam still disparaged, while his followers, leaving him in charge of their prisoner, went to the kitchen where Sarah Colby heaped their plates with viands, and placed between them a huge brown jug of ale, so delicious that they were in no hurry to leave it.

As for Vera she was passive, afraid to hope, yet confident that both Rollo and his sister-in-law were to be depended upon; and if, when the carriage was brought to the door that was to convey her to the station, she cast a wild look of appeal on both, their smiles revived her courage.

Silas Estridge, his face flushed, his movements none the steadier for the liquor he had been imbibing, would have drawn her hand through his arm, whispering triumphantly that she could not escape him now.

But he was seized from behind. Another train had just arrived from London, bringing with it two of the chief officials from Scotland Yard; gentlemen with whom Rollo Cheltnam had been in consultation before leaving London, and whom a telegraphic message had now brought to his assistance.

To the dismay of the schemer, he found himself under arrest for the attempted abduction of Miss Estridge, for whose appearance to answer the charge of robbery, if persisted in, bail was speedily found.

Need we say it was not persisted in. The morrow brought Mrs. Estridge to Borton Court, confessing her own guilt, and pleading for the forgiveness of her son.

